CONSTANT repetition has robbed the story of the crucifixion of almost all emotional force. Poets have often tried to breathe life into the story by reinterpreting it. By reducing the supernatural element, they have hoped to achieve a more credible story and thus to make a more powerful impact upon modern readers. Sometimes they have, by requiring us to adjust ourselves to the idea of, say, Judas as a hero, disrupted the usual pattern of responses. Such methods have not infrequently resulted in a certain vigor and freshness. But there is another way of bringing life to the dead bones of the too familiar. Negro spirituals of the crucifixion make, as a rule, more impression on our sensibilities than any carefully conceived revision of the legend. They do so because the authors did not feel the remoteness of the story in time and place, and because the personal implications of the events were to them altogether real and even novel.

But the conditions which made possible the spirituals do not exist today among either Negroes or whites. When, therefore, Lola Ridge accomplishes—in, of course, a richer and more sophisticated way—precisely what is accomplished by the spirituals, one recognizes that the poetic imagination has performed an extraordinary feat. There is no novelty in the conception of the events and characters of "Firehead," and the fictitious elements that have been introduced are strictly limited by the outlines of the tradition. Nevertheless, Miss Ridge's telling of the story utterly breaks through conventional responses; the events she describes are alive and almost terrifyingly close to us.

Somehow, out of her own intimate acquaintance with suffering, Miss Ridge has found a way to plunge herself into the midst of the happenings of the crucifixion day. She has conceived for herself the uniqueness of Jesus, and she has recreated the effect which the death of such a person would have on his associates. And then, by a tremendous effort, an effort perhaps too apparent to the reader, she has contrived means for the communication of her vision.

To such an achievement one must yield full measure of appreciation. The power of the poet's imagination, the beauty of innumerable passages, and the sustained force of the poem as a whole impress the most critical reader as evidences of an uncommon talent. It is enough, one must repeat, to have made real and affecting the sufferings of Jesus and the struggles of the disciples. And yet Miss Ridge has not been able to do the one thing—it was almost certainly impossible—that would have given her poem enduring greatness. Though the events of the crucifixion have for her both a personal and a kind of cosmic significance, she has not succeeded in making that significance completely felt by the modern mind.

The quality of Miss Ridge's achievement can be measured by the failure of Countee Cullen to accomplish a simpler task in "The Black Christ." The poem has merits of its own, but

Books in Brief

Pay Day. By Nathan Asch. Brewer and Warren. $2.50.

This story is a studied report rather than a novel. But it is a swiftly moving, accurate, and engrossing report. Jim is a thirty-dollar-a-week clerk. He is very young and it is pay day. And he has a date with a new girl. He boards the Bronx-bound subway express, washes up and has supper, and "beats it" back downtown again to keep his date. Jim's thoughts roam a dark forest. They are dominated by fear and sex urge in turn. So he wants to fight every man and he has thoughts about every girl. He dreams of becoming a traveling salesman—plenty of "jack," living in hotels and riding in Pullmans, plenty of drinks and cigars, with women in every town. He and Helen go to the movies; then to Paddy's backroom speakeasy. What a night! Jim gets drunk, then sick. Helen leaves him for another boy. And Jim arrives home at dawn broke, ill, savage, and remorseful. There are thousands of pimply-faced Jims in every big city. Mr. Asch has done an excellent study of the type.

The Hidden City. By Philip Gibbs. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Through the clear eyes of the thirty-five-year-old Doctor Jevons, Sir Philip Gibbs looks out on the tumultuous life of London streets and ponders on such subjects as poverty, the post-war generation of slim-legged young girls and neurotic boys, sex in young lives in our hectic megalopolitan civilization, and free will or determinism—which? All this is not to deny the fact that his latest novel also contains a good story. After Doctor Jevons puts up his brass plate on the door of his house in Walpole Street, he becomes drawn into an ever-widening circle of troubled lives, many of which—since one patient leads to another—are intertwined. It is a good idea. There is a mild Dickensian flavor about this story with its dramatic, sentimental, and heroic moods, though the philosophy is contemporary. And if in place of the villain there are glands, environment, heredity, neuroses, complexes, yet in the figure of the intelligent and tolerant young doctor the author has provided his readers with a perfect modern knight for a hero.

Audacious Audubon. By Edward A. Muschamp. Brentano's. $3.50.

The story of John James Audubon, the Frenchman who became one of America's greatest naturalists, is of an order that always has a wide appeal—that of the man who achieves fame after years of failure, almost disgrace. Having lost his original fortune, and having failed in his many efforts to retrieve it because of his own neglect of what he felt to be his duties and responsibilities, this Audubon, encouraged and aided by a remarkable wife, finally gathered together the by-products of twenty years of "folly" (his bird pictures) and set forth to conquer the world—in his own field. The story of the succeeding fourteen years is the story of his extraordinary work, "Birds of America," originally published in four gigantic volumes, each volume three feet three inches high and two feet five inches wide, the size being due to Audubon's obsession that all his bird portraits should appear life-size, even the wild turkey. After this book came international fame, followed by other books. Mr. Muschamp's admiration for his hero, though it affects his

"The Majority Rules"

AT least, that's the theoretical basis of government in America.

But majorities have a way of becoming careless about HOW they rule.

So it devolves upon the minority to keep the majority straight, or at least in a tolerable state of effectiveness.

That's why the public so sorely needs the service of that little group of progressive Senators in Washington.

Likewise The Nation—a minority journal devoted to the interests of the majority. It gives publicity to the essential facts and trends in government and cultural life here and abroad. The minority read it; the majority feel its influence—and hate it simply because they do not understand its purpose and effect.

judgment, has not led him to distort or conceal important facts, all of which are to be found in the two-volume biography by Francis Hobart Herrick published about twelve years ago. "Audacious Audubon" is in no sense a critical biography, nor, as a study of the man, does it penetrate very far beneath the surface, but it is a spirited retelling of a tale which in itself contains all the necessary elements of drama.

The Overland Trail. By Agnes C. Laut. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $3.50.

Endeavoring to combine history with present conditions in a picture which would show both the pioneer and the grown-up stages of an important section of the country, Miss Laut has achieved little more than a jumble. In her pages the past jostles the present rather than runs along beside it or blends with it, the effect not being helped by the author's tendency to gush. The Oregon Trail was indeed what the subtitle of this book calls it—an "epic path." But it was not made in a single bold stroke. On the contrary it was formed bit by bit, by new bands of adventurers pushing on from the point reached by preceding explorers. Nor was it a simple, direct line. Rather was it a set of rough routes over land and through streams. These routes would have presented a colorful scene to one who could have viewed them from a low-flying airplane, with their caravans of horsemen and wagons, their hovering Indians, their occasional forts. This panorama Miss Laut depicts, partly in her own words, partly in quotations from the diaries and other accounts left by a few of those who made the perilous journey. But her story is neither clear nor comprehensive. For a proper historical record one must turn elsewhere.

The Gothick North: A Study in Mediaeval Art, Life, and Thought. By Sacheverell Sitwell. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

The English poet writes a "history of the tall, fair-haired races in Art," containing a few admirable and poetic re-creative studies of tapestries, castles, and monasteries, together with much quite extraneous matter in which he airs his ideas, his prejudices, and his hates.

Drama

For the Defense

"THE Plutocrat," Booth Tarkington's defense of Babbittism, has been adapted for the stage of the Vanderbilt Theater, where it is acted with genial abandon by Mr. and Mrs. Coburn. In it Earl Tinker, Napoleon of the meat trade, blunders from his native Omaha across the ocean to Egypt, and by the simple process of stepping firmly on everyone's toes succeeds in revealing to all the real greatness of American character. He sings "Sweet Adeline" in the smoking-room, he slaps the foreign adventuress on the back, and he exhibits the depth of his homely humor by addressing a sensitive young Frenchman named Hyacinthe as Hollyhock, Heliotrope, and Hibiscus; but (though one would hardly believe it without the incontrovertible evidence of the play itself) they like it, and it is only the most absurd of his countrymen who object. Earl has, to be sure, neither manners in the conventional sense nor even the most rudimentary beginning of that capacity to understand the tastes of another upon which manners are founded; yet this fact only serves to convince his victims that he is the modern analogue of the Roman conqueror, and when that dubious compliment has been paid to his hero Mr. Tarkington is content. He has set out to demonstrate not only that Babbitt is likable but that Europeans like him, and he is apparently satisfied that he has established his contention.

Now most controversy cast in the form of drama or fiction is peculiarly futile for the simple reason that the controversialist is able to invent all the evidence upon which his argument is based, and this fact is responsible for one of the many defects of "The Plutocrat." Thus it is, for example, far from clear where Mr. Tarkington got his idea that Babbitt is better liked abroad than he is in the more effete portions of his native country; for though, perhaps, he ought to be, I at least have never observed any tendency on the part of the English or the French to judge him with that affectionate leniency which the play represents as typical; and if I remember my history aright the Greeks did not generally regard the Roman conquerors who rode roughshod over their decadent civilization with any particularly genial admiration. Yet the most striking of all the striking things about "The Plutocrat" is not this dubious premise concerning the attitude of Europe toward the magnates of the Middle West, but the plain fact that Mr. Tarkington has drawn a libelous portrait of his hero, and out of the depths of his admiration attributed to him speeches and actions which would be set down to extravagant malice had they been imagined by a Lewis or a Mencken.

If Mr. Armour, Mr. Ford, and Mr. Du Pont were outward bound on the Ile de France they would not put their arms around one another's shoulders and make the timbers ring with barber-shop ditties. Any one of them would probably know what an "impresario" is, and not one would be likely to inquire "house or sign" when introduced to a young man who is described as a painter. Neither is it probable that Mrs. Chrysler would take her husband publicly by the ear because she saw him talking to an attractive woman, or even that any captain of industry would habitually dismiss all inhabitants of the Atlantic seaboard as "frozen-faced Easterners." Yet such is the behavior attributed by Mr. Tarkington and his adapter to men supposed to be of equal eminence, though represented as possessing habits, tastes, and opinions which would disgrace the proprietor of a village filling station.

Much can be said for the American, but these authors seem singularly unfitted to say it. By some strange twist of mind, they are led to suppose that a comic-strip husband sneaking away from a termagant wife constitutes a convincing picture of our superior family life and that, in general, the best way to exalt our countrymen is to label a gross exaggeration of all their most obvious defects "American virtue." We can survive our enemies; but may God defend us from such friends as these, and preserve us from the folly of the ass in Swift's fable who boasted of his voice while confessing that his ears were, perhaps, a little too short.

The "International Revue" (Majestic Theater) is an elaborate spectacle featuring Harry Richman, Gertrude Lawrence, Florence Moore, and Jack Pearl. Most of the scenes fail dismally to come off. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

It is hardly necessary to remark that "Simple Simon" with Ed Wynn at the Ziegfeld Theater is as uproarious a revue as one is likely to see. Mr. Wynn has simply to remark that he loves the woods to send any normal person into gales of laughter. And he is supported by charming Urban scenes and by some of the most original and lovely Broadway dancing that has yet appeared, even under Mr. Ziegfeld's auspices.

In "The Infinite Shoeblack" (Maxine Elliott's Theater) a poor Scotch Puritan falls in love with a notoriously promiscuous woman, reforms her by talking about her soul and the virtues of child-bearing, and marries her. Although there is much lofty quotation from Carlyle, the play is essentially a melodrama, and most of its humorous moments are not intended.

The Massacre at Aux Cayes

By L. J. de BEKKER

A PEACEFUL day in Aux Cayes, a little port in Haiti chiefly busied in shipping coffee to France. A week of student demonstrations and a dock strike had just ended part of the general strike which included even the lawyers of Haiti and resulted from the troubles that Dr. Freeman, head of the $1,000,000 agricultural school at Damien, brought upon himself by his shortsighted treatment of the students. The marines had been restrained from a bayonet charge against a procession of striking students; Lieutenant Fitzgerald Brown, U. S. M. C., sub-commander of the military district, had proclaimed the rigors of martial law; and on December 5 there was no visible disorder, although the strike leaders were holding a conference in a warehouse. Out of a cloudless sky came three naval airplanes, which circled the city discharging machine-guns and rifles, dropping shell-cases from time to time, then flying out over the bay where they discharged real bombs. Terror-stricken men, women, and children ran into streets, where they were joined by the strikers, all expecting instant death. But they did not cry for mercy; they shouted: "A bas l'Occupation! A bas Borno!" No one was injured, and when this "demonstration of force" had continued for an hour, the naval planes flew away in the direction of Port au Prince. Secure in their barracks-fortress, the marines this time made no attempt to restore order. The people of Aux Cayes were permitted to rage through the streets and shout "Down with the Occupation!" and "Down with Borno!" until they calmed down through sheer exhaustion.

That same day in Port au Prince, R. M. Cutts, signing himself "Colonel, United States Marines, Commanding First Brigade, United States Marine Corps and United States forces ashore in Haiti," had proclaimed martial law in Port au Prince, ordered the inhabitants to be in their houses by 9 p. m. and to remain there until daylight, and informed them that "articles or speeches of an incendiary nature or those that reflect adversely upon the United States forces in Haiti or tend to stir up agitation against United States officials" would constitute offenses to be brought to trial before a military tribunal. Thereupon all the Opposition newspapers suspended publication.

Captain Evans, U. S. M. C., major general and commandant of the Garde d'Haïti, and Sergeant Belton, U. S. M. C., lieutenant in the Garde d'Haïti, telegraphed the Associated Press and the United Press, for which they were correspondents, that trouble was apprehended in Aux Cayes, and that a shipment of arms had been received there from Guatemala.

They were wrong about the arms from Guatemala, but right about trouble at Aux Cayes. The correspondents of the Associated Press and the United Press wired their American offices the first news of the massacre at Aux Cayes, saying that five Haitians had been killed and several wounded by marines in suppressing disorders arising from the strike. All Haiti knew next day how inaccurate these figures were, but the Temps, the Presse, and other Opposition newspapers could not give the correct report and the Occupation press stuck to "five killed and several wounded." This was the story, of course, that appeared in American newspapers.

Murmurs of dissatisfaction with the official figures became too much for Colonel Cutts, and to suppress them he sent an official communiqué to the Haitian newspapers, which they published at his request on January 7, without comment. The Cutts communiqué reads as follows:

> It is requested that a brief report be published relative to the events at Cayes of December 6, 1929.
> The inquiry having terminated, and the last reports having been received, the following facts are established:
> A mob of 1,000 to 1,500 persons, more or less drunk, marched on Cayes from the neighborhood of Torbeck, encountered a patrol of twenty marines at the passage of the river, and were stopped by the patrol. The mob agreed to return home if the strike at Cayes should prove to be ended. Leaders of the crowd were permitted to enter Cayes to reassure themselves, and declared on returning that the strike in Cayes was over. The mob violated its promise and refused to go home. A number of functionaries and men of eminence in the town then approached the mob and urged them to be reasonable and to turn back, but without result. Then the mob began to surround the patrol, and the latter fired over their heads in an attempt to stop them. They halted, but again advanced. The patrol again fired over their heads, but this failed to stop them. Night was approaching. The mob then surrounded the patrol, which, in legitimate defense, fired in earnest. The first volley was with muskets, but when this failed to halt the mob, the marines fired with machine-guns and automatics. The machine-guns fired twenty-four cartridges in a fixed position. The fusillade ceased the moment the mob abandoned its attack. The firing was directed low against the legs, for the purpose of checking the mob while killing as few as possible. Reports from the hospital demonstrate that all wounds made in bodies were caused by ricocheted bullets. First reports received stated that five were killed and twenty-five wounded; final reports from the hospital at this date say ten were killed and twenty-four wounded. There is little probability that there will be any changes from this final report. If the patrol had wished, or if it had intended to kill, three or four hundred persons could have been easily struck down. The weapons utilized were of the government standard type, such as were used in the World War. There are no longer any other kind here.
> There have been no disorders in Cayes or in the neighborhood since. But as many unfounded rumors have been placed in circulation, it is desired that this short statement of the affair be published.

This circumstantial if unveracious narrative only made matters worse. The communiqué, after a delay of a month for Colonel Cutts's inquiry, raised the figures still being published in the United States from "five killed and several wounded" to "ten killed and twenty-four wounded." But

Individual and Community Social Work

The social worker working with Jews must be trained to deal successfully with the socially maladjusted Jewish family and individual.

But he must be able, also, to see the problem in the large. He must "see" the Jews of America as a distinctive group aiming at adjustment to the general environment for its own greater happiness and the enrichment of American life.

Holders and prospective holders of a bachelor's degree are invited to examine carefully the advantages of

Jewish Social Work as a Profession

A number of scholarships and fellowships ranging from $150 to $1000 for each school year are available for especially qualified candidates.

THE NATION

by this time news had been published of President Hoover's intention to send a commission to Haiti. Colonel Cutts accordingly permitted the Haitian dailies to publish a list of the dead on January 16, giving names, ages, residences, and the nature of the wounds. The dead numbered twenty-four. Among them was a woman of twenty-six, a boy of eight. One of those "ricocheted" bullets caught the boy 300 feet away from the mob, while he was down in the ravine giving his horse a drink. Another of the dead was not attacking the marines when slain; he was buying cigarettes. On January 17 Colonel Cutts permitted the Haitian dailies to publish a list of the wounded, with names, addresses, et cetera. They numbered fifty-one. The American Occupation has not disputed these figures: twenty-four killed and fifty-one wounded. The marines withdrew to their barracks immediately after the massacre, leaving the dead and wounded alone in the dark all night, except for such aid as the Haitians could render. Haitian physicians hurried to the scene next day. The unsupported evidence of some of the Haitians is that they counted the dead, that the total was 212, and the number of the wounded proportionately greater. The real figures may never be disclosed, but the President's commission may get some light on the subject. Meantime the State Department and the Navy Department at Washington decline to give any information to the press.

Two narratives of the events at Aux Cayes, both written on the spot by eyewitnesses, are before me. They corroborate each other. I give one in translation.

> Friday, December 6. This day, destined to end in tragedy, opens with a somewhat comic incident, worthy of a place in burlesque: a gendarme undertakes arbitrarily to arrest a workman, who (assisted, it is true, by some comradés) gives him a sound drubbing. Work is resumed. Except for the lingering emotions aroused by the day before, normal life has recommenced. But in the afternoon two airplanes fly over the town, this time peacefully.
> Toward five o'clock there is great alarm. Announcement is made that a considerable crowd which has come from the borough and the plain of Torbeck (principally from Gauvain) is about to enter Aux Cayes. According to information at hand they do not come as enemies. They are persons who believe the rumors that Aux Cayes has really been bombarded by airplanes; who had heard that the strikers in Aux Cayes had obtained satisfaction; and who wished to claim for themselves abolition of the tax on alcohol and removal of the seals put on their stills, both of which mean ruin for the proprietors of sugar plantations and of small distilleries. Down there in the country misery is killing them. Their molasses, when it finds a buyer, is paid for at a fifth of its price, at one-tenth of the price of certain epochs. They have not the means to build the costly reservoirs demanded by the tax service, nor to pay the tax on the production of alcohol. All along the road the protestants, among whom are well-known citizens, have been joined by peasants and women, the latter chiefly from nearby neighborhoods. Later on the charge was made that some of these persons carried, carefully concealed, machetes and even small pikes. This has been strongly contradicted. What is true is that some of the horsemen carried small sticks for their mounts, or simple whips made of ox sinews. But nearly all had empty hands. It was not an armed band.
> The crowd crosses the ravine and marches toward the Calvary of the Sacred Heart. They had intended, it was said, to remove the seals from the distilleries of Quatre Chemins, which had been closed by the tax office. Georges Butreau on the one side and Ulysse Simon on the other, former military chiefs of the district, dissuade them from this purpose, however, and fuming and cursing they turn back, massing themselves to the number of three to four hundred on the far side of the ravine to await, they say, the return of some of their companions from town.
> A detachment of twenty to twenty-five marines arrive, armed with machine-guns and automatic repeating rifles, and post themselves at the corner of the Avenue des Gabions, near the bridge facing the ravine, covering these poor people, who do not show any intention either to advance or retreat. The district sub-commander [Lieutenant Fitzgerald Brown] goes to them and tries to persuade them to retire. Several citizens of Aux Cayes—Maître Duclervil, dean of the lawyers' association, Maître Joseph V. Delerme, some civic authorities, Edmond Sylvain, government commissary, and Antoine Ferrer, president of the Communal Commission—then cross the river, tell the crowd that all manifestations have been stopped in Aux Cayes, and advise them to go home. But they insist on the liberation of three of their companions who have been detained. They give the names of the prisoners to Maître Delerme. The sub-commander of the district promises to give them satisfaction on this point. They insist upon the removal of the distillery seals. There is hubbub and tumult. And all this time the barrels of the American rifles are pointed on the unfortunates, notwithstanding the presence among them of the conferees. Some women throw stones, which cannot reach the marines but fall into the river or in the dry part of the ravine. The parleys continue. The unfortunate wretches do not imagine for an instant that they will be fired upon.
> It is sunset. A resounding oath is heard and suddenly the fusillade begins, first blank shots and then almost immediately the murderous rattle of the machine-guns. In the midst of horrible screams, men, women, children, and horses fall. There is a stampede. One distiller from Gauvain, who had come on a handsome horse, unharnesses the dead animal and leaves with saddle and reins. The scene is horrifying. One hears the screams and moans of the wounded (they are going to pass the night under the stars), the death rattles of those in agony. There is the twenty-year-old son of Surveyor Molin struck dead. Night arrives. The marines withdraw.
> The news throws the town into consternation. The wounded come in to have their injuries dressed in the drugstores. These are mostly innocent bystanders who have had no time to move away. The machine-guns and rifles have worked in all directions, to the south, where the crowd had chiefly gathered, as well as to the north, east, and west. Houses in the region are riddled with bullets and peaceful inhabitants killed or wounded in their homes.
> Some victims are carried to the hospital. The rumor is spread that, furious against the people of Aux Cayes who had let them be massacred, the crowd had reformed their lines at Coquette in order to invade the town during the night and deliver it over to pillage. However, the night is very quiet. Toward three o'clock shots are heard. They come from the marines at General Headquarters. Nobody replies, for there was neither a riot nor an organized rebellion, as the rumor promised.

American physicians, according to both eyewitnesses, withdrew after the massacre to marine headquarters, where there were no wounded, leaving their Haitian colleagues the care of the dying and wounded, not only in the field, but afterwards in the hospital.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NATION-WIDE COMMUNIST demonstration of Thursday, March 6, passed off, on the whole, extremely well. Special honors go to the Mayor of San Francisco and to the Police Commissioner of Baltimore. Both of them were politeness itself, permitted the Communists to march, and protected the parades; all rioting was avoided, and the populace remained good-humored and even amused. In New York 40,000 persons attended a completely orderly and good-natured assemblage in Union Square which was turned into a nasty row when the police attempted—successfully—to clear the streets in a quarter of an hour. The original police arrangements for the meeting were admirable. Mr. Whalen's own bearing was at first excellent. He himself offered to take the leaders in his own car to see the mayor, guaranteeing them an audience to present the claims of the unemployed. He was quite within his rights in refusing to allow a parade without a permit. Unfortunately, when the trouble began a number of his police lost their heads and attacked persons right and left, whether they were guilty of a breach of order or not.

GLAD AS WE ARE to praise Grover Whalen for his behavior on March 6, we can only censure the bitterness and vindictiveness shown by both him and the District Attorney, Mr. Crain, against the five Communist leaders who were arrested. Nothing could so increase Communist bitterness and arouse sympathy for them as any obvious effort to railroad these misguided and misguiding leaders. The address made by the Police Commissioner the day after the riot in which he boasted that his stool-pigeons were on the inside of all Communist activities, even to the extent of being beaten up by their comrades of the police, reflects very little credit upon his intelligence. If the police are doing that sort of thing it would hardly seem wise to notify the Communists themselves as to their movements. Moreover, Mr. Whalen admits going far beyond his proper sphere when he declares that the police are giving the employers of labor information as to Communists in their employ. Americans still have the right to their own beliefs however mistaken, and to freedom of conscience. This fact we commend also to the New York Chamber of Commerce, which has just appointed an entirely reactionary committee, chiefly representatives of "patriotic societies," to root out the reds and especially to rouse large employers of labor against the Communists in their employ.

THE SUDDEN AND UNEXPECTED DEATH of Justice Sanford of the Supreme Court removes not one of the most distinguished members of that tribunal but one who enjoyed great personal popularity and was universally respected by the bar. That he belonged to the conservative and reactionary part of the Court is, of course, well known. Hence, the filling of the vacancy left by Mr. Sanford will be a definitive test of the President's attitude toward the Court, all the more significant since it is now plain that Mr. Hoover will have the making over of the Court in his hands. At the time that Justice Stone seemed slated for the chief justiceship, it was understood that one of the most progressive and liberal judges in New York would be named to take Mr. Stone's place as associate. With Mr. Stone and Mr. Hughes, both from New York, on the Court it will require courage by the President to appoint still another New Yorker. Meanwhile, Justice Holmes, that noble representative of so much that is best in our American life, has celebrated his eighty-ninth birthday amid universal acclaim. That he is the foremost American citizen today is the belief of multitudes; the recent book containing his dissenting opinions has been selling like a novel. He can well rejoice in this nation-wide applause, for it is proof that his countrymen still know how to honor a great judge, a just judge, a liberal judge, and a fearless one.

WHAT THE MONROE DOCTRINE IS and what it is not is the burden of an elaborate memorandum prepared by J. Reuben Clark, former Under Secretary of State, in December, 1928, but made public for some unexplained reason only on March 3 last. According to Mr. Clark, the Monroe Doctrine means today only what it meant when it was announced in 1823—opposition by the United States to European interference with the political affairs of Latin-American states. The so-called "Roosevelt corollary," under which the United States was at liberty to "attempt an adjustment" of "financial or other difficulties" in weak states of Central or South America "lest European governments should intervene and, intervening, should occupy territory," is held to be without justification by the terms of the Monroe Doctrine "however much it may be justified by the application of the doctrine of self-preservation." We are glad to see what the Bogota journal El Espectador describes as Roosevelt's "audacious adulteration to a formula of imperialism" ruled out of court, but intervention in the garb of self-preservation is just as dangerous as intervention wearing the cloak of the Monroe Doctrine—more dangerous, in fact, because self-preservation is the more comprehensive term. What we should like to read is an announcement by the State Department that the United States proposes henceforth to let Latin America manage its own affairs.

REGISTRATION OF ALIENS continues to be pressed in Congress, three bills on the subject being before that body at the present time. A bill introduced by Representative Aswell of Louisiana calls for compulsory registration annually, with deportation as the penalty if registration is delayed two years. A similar but less drastic bill, sponsored by Representative Cable of Ohio, adds a provision allowing aliens who entered the country illegally between 1921 and July 1, 1924, to legalize their residence. This last provision should certainly be dealt with in a separate bill. A third bill introduced by Senator Blease of South Carolina, similar to one passed by the Senate in January, 1929, provides for voluntary registration. The most serious objection to these bills is the use that would almost certainly be made of them if any of them became law. Voluntary registration, if that policy were adopted, would speedily become compulsory in practice through the insistence of employers, the operation of administrative regulations, and the pressure upon aliens who held out to register as others did. Any attempt to enforce registration would subject all persons of alien birth, whether naturalized or not, to espionage, suspicion, and annoyance.

"PRISONER KILLS the Auburn principal keeper." This headline has appeared for the third time in the last three years. What is more remarkable is the fact that this latest victim of prison rage was stabbed seven times in the presence of all the prisoners, just after three other Auburn convicts had been sentenced to the electric chair and had been removed to Sing Sing for execution. Here we see the deterrent effect of the death penalty. Was there ever a clearer proof of its utter futility? The murderer of Keeper Beckwith was beaten into insensibility by the keepers and lay in a state of coma for three or four days. Immediately Assemblyman Cuvillier introduced into the New York Legislature a bill calling for the use of the lash in jails and the abolition of the Mutual Welfare League. At least one official at Auburn kept his head. He is Warden Hoffman, who refused to be stampeded into threats for the establishment of further tortures, declaring that this sort of thing was all in the day's work for a keeper and would happen just as long as the present prison methods were continued. Major Philip G. Roosa, of the staff of the Commissioner of Prisons, was equally cool. "Give us buildings where we can classify and segregate prisoners, and we can stop this sort of thing," he said. There is no doubt who the chief criminal is. It is the State of New York.

THIRTY-FIVE MINUTES was all that a Charlotte, North Carolina, jury required to acquit five mill foremen of the murder of Mrs. Ella May Wiggins in Gastonia last September. For the killing of Chief of Police Aderholt, seven strikers and union organizers were sentenced to from five to twenty years in prison. But the deputies in Marion who shot and killed six strikers in a riot in front of one of the mills have been acquitted, as have those charged with the murder of Mrs. Wiggins. Governor Gardner made it plain that he wished the trial just completed to be conducted vigorously and fairly; to that end he appointed Attorney General Brummitt to conduct the prosecution after Solicitor Carpenter had clearly shown that he could not force himself to any real activity except in a case where strikers were the defendants. Two State's witnesses identified Howard Wheelus, one of the defendants, as the man who shot Mrs. Wiggins. But Wheelus offered an alibi and the jury evidently found it possible to believe him. It is evident that neither the citizens of Gaston County nor its officials are ready for the organization of the textile workers. Those of the workers who are ready will have to be patient and begin all over again, and they can be sure that sooner or later their strength will impress both employers and officers of the law.

GIFFORD PINCHOT has rendered a public service in again throwing his hat into the Pennsylvania governorship ring. It would be intolerable if the Republicans of that State were to have no choice except one between a Vare candidate and a Mellon one. "I want to help break," Mr. Pinchot declares, "the strangle-hold of the electric, gas, water, trolley, bus, and other monopolies on the cost of living and the government of the State." That his stand as a dry will help him greatly is beyond question; whether he will again have the luck to win the nomination in a three-cornered contest time will soon show. Meanwhile, it is a great pity that there is no one like him to challenge the Vare candidate for the Senatorship, Secretary of Labor Davis, and the Mellon candidate, Senator Grundy, apostle and lobbyist of high-tariff interests. At least Mr. Vare is out of it. He has finally yielded to his supporters and retired.

THE BEST OF NEWS comes out of Haiti. The Hoover Commission has already won the complete confidence of the Haitians and has obtained Mr. Hoover's consent to an arrangement made with the opposition elements to substitute at once for President Borno a provisional president, agreed on by all the protesting parties. This person is to call immediately a constitutional popular election and then resign so that the new assembly can elect a permanent president. General Russell is to be superseded at once by a regular civilian minister. Furthermore, the commission on Monday flatly demanded that President Borno carry out his earlier acceptance of this agreement. All of which merits the enthusiastic cablegram of our special correspondent, Helena Hill Weed, printed on another page of this issue and all the commendatory adjectives with which she describes the work of the commission. The fact that this leaves the American Occupation totally discredited we would not stress; its downfall came because the commission was willing to hear the opposition which appeared in overwhelming numbers to demand freedom, as did the Catholic church—the same opposition which General Russell, in true military style, knew no better way to deal with than to threaten, repress, and imprison. That The Nation rejoices with all its heart at this promised outcome we need hardly say.

PROTESTS AGAINST PROTESTS are the new phenomena which have followed the heated denunciation of the anti-church campaign in Russia. Dr. George S. Counts, associate director of the International Institute of Teachers College, Columbia University, who has lately returned from a seven-months' tour of Russia, declares that the protests of Western sects "can do little good if their object is to moderate" the anti-religious movement, because the religious bodies in Russia that are being attacked "have been for the most part hostile to the Revolution from the beginning." Dr. H. H. Henson, Lord Bishop of Durham, referring to the prayers of intercession for Russian Christians that have been ordered for March 16, joins with Prime Minister MacDonald in deprecating anything that mixes politics and religion in the Russian matter, and warns of danger that the protest may "lose its moral impressiveness." A notable counter-protest is the statement issued on March 5, signed by eighty-seven ministers of various sects in New York City, regretting the omission from the anti-Russian pronouncements of "a note of humility and a recognition of the historical facts which have caused" the Russian policy. Substantially the same position had been taken three days before by some of the faculty and sixty-seven students of Union Theological Seminary. All of these protestants agree in deploring anything that savors of religious persecution, but the Russian problem, as they clearly perceive, is so much more political than religious that organized efforts to exact pressure from the outside might bring in their train a real jeopardy to world peace.

INDIA STANDS ON THE BRINK. As this issue of The Nation goes to press Gandhi is beginning his civil-disobedience program which may result in his immediate arrest. We shall soon learn several things: just how far India is united behind the move for independence and its leader; whether it will be possible to keep the movement non-violent; and how wise or unwise the Viceroy will prove to be in dealing with a situation as difficult as it is profoundly dangerous. Already Vallabhai Patel, Gandhi's chief lieutenant, has gone to jail after issuing a statement in which he said that "our success lies in our capacity for non-violence and self-sacrifice." He then reiterated his program of non-violent non-cooperation and advised that in the event of Gandhi's arrest village officers should resign, Indian barristers should boycott the courts, and wherever people were ready non-payment of taxes should begin. These must be extremely anxious days at 10 Downing Street and in the office of the Viceroy.

CHARLIE CHAPLIN'S GENIUS is best expressed in his matchless pantomime. It is undoubtedly because he knows this that he has abjured the talkies. Chaplin, according to his representative, will organize a new company, erect new studios, and set aside five to ten millions of dollars a year for producing pictures. He will appear personally in one picture a year and will personally direct one picture. His company meanwhile will produce several additional films each year, all silent. The news that Chaplin will direct one picture a year is as heartening as the promise that he will appear in one annually, for it means that we may expect other films as excellent as "The Woman of Paris." The fact that Chaplin will sponsor only silent pictures is good news for those who prefer silence. On the other hand, since the talkies are with us and show every sign of remaining with us, we could wish that someone who combines, as Chaplin does, artistic excellence with financial independence might enter the land of the loud speakers where so far the still, small voice of intelligence has been almost entirely submerged.

ARTHUR TWINING HADLEY belonged to an older generation of university presidents which numbered Eliot of Harvard and Gilman of Johns Hopkins among its distinguished names and it is as president of Yale during a long period of transition that he will be most widely remembered and honored. Few men who have been translated from a professorship to a presidency have carried with them such sound and varied attainments as scholars or held so firmly the enthusiastic loyalty of successive generations of students and alumni. His main contribution to the intellectual life of the country, however, was made not in the field of educational administration but in that of economics, particularly in railway organization and transportation, where he was long a recognized authority. His support of Governor Smith in the Presidential campangn of 1928, largely because of Governor Smith's attitude toward prohibition, did credit to his political independence, for he had left the Democratic Party in the free-silver days, but he could not be induced to accept a Democratic nomination for Senator from Connecticut in that year, feeling, no doubt, that the Bingham machine would be too strong for him. For all his learning, his omnivorous interest, and his genial manner, his temper was conservative, and his insistence upon the public obligations of private business did not carry with it any marked evidence of sympathy with government supervision or control.

THAT ADMIRAL VON TIRPITZ, whose death is reported from Germany, will ever rank with General von Ludendorff as one of the evil geniuses of Germany is beyond question. Supposedly a great expert in his field, as well as a passionate patriot, he was a pure militarist constantly urging his country into a race of armaments which could only lead to war. In his memoirs he declares that the German naval authorities, among whom he had the controlling voice, had decided from the beginning of the war not to use the fleet in any decisive naval battle. Jutland was an accident, and they were fortunate to get out of it as well as they did. None the less, though it was not to be used, the fleet was kept in being, tying up thousands of men and officers who might have been thrown into the submarine service. Fortune had given Germany a weapon with which it could have defeated England and broken her naval power, and yet never at any time did Tirpitz get more than fifteen submarines on the front line, and actually not until September, 1918, when the end was at hand was there an order given for a very large number of U-boats. Some officers, like General von Hoffmann, protested when Tirpitz began the submarine campaign with an inadequate number of U-boats. Von Hoffmann affirmed later that if all the available German naval power had been applied to the submarine campaign it would have won easily. Even as a naval officer von Tirpitz was thus hopelessly inadequate. Yet the leading nations, our own included, continue to put faith in the naval and military mind.

Parity the Enemy

IT is now plain that the naval conference in London is near the rocks, and this is true despite Ramsay MacDonald's radio appeal of March 9 to the American people to shun the pessimists. Nothing but good luck can save it from becoming a genuine disaster to all the world and the most lamentable breakdown of statesmanship since August, 1914. For this the American delegation will not be able to escape a large share of the blame. It has been extraordinarily weak. It has lacked courage. It has blundered damnably. It has forgotten the words and promises of its own members, notably those of Messrs. Stimson and Gibson. It plainly went to London without a clear-cut policy or a program, and it has obviously been inspired by nothing from the White House. Mr. Stimson has merely muddied the waters by his statement of March 5 intended, he said, to refute the "impression that the work of the American delegation at this conference is likely to result in an increase instead of a reduction in the tonnage of the navies of the world." The most superficial examination showed that Mr. Stimson had submitted no figures to prove that his promised net reduction of 200,000 American tons was in sight, "and an even larger reduction on the part of the British fleet"; that his figure was "contingent upon some reductions being made in the fleets of other Powers." Next, Mr. Stimson resurrected obsolete cruisers (including Sampson's flagship at Santiago thirty-two years ago), submarines, and destroyers to make even this promise possible. Finally, it appeared that Mr. Stimson got some of his reduction by counting in ships authorized but not yet begun! Whatever else may be said of this statement it smacks of despair and self-delusion.

Aside from the fallibility of the delegation itself, what is it that has wrecked our undertaking in London? We answer this question by quoting from a dispatch in the New York Times from its correspondent, Edwin L. James. Reporting in it the sullen reaction of our delegation to the cablegram of criticism from 1,200 American protestants, Mr. James, whose language is obviously directly inspired, concludes his dispatch thus:

> America can have parity at the cost of sacrificing her reduction principle at this conference and paying a billion dollars. She can have reduction at a cost of sacrificing her principle of parity and saving a billion dollars. But to obtain parity and reduction both at this conference is beyond the abilities of Secretary Stimson and his colleagues. It is also beyond the abilities of the 1,200 signers of Mr. Fosdick's cablegram.

The New York World, which has ignominiously hauled down its flag by saying that "we cannot hope to reduce existing fleets or reduce the fleets we are building," but that "we can still hope to reduce the fleets we would have to build if the conference fails," similarly admits that parity is the controlling influence. Thus, it says that "the only conceivable basis of agreement between two Powers of such magnitude is equality" and that "any other basis of inferiority and superiority would be the source of perpetual irritation." "Parity," it declares, "is valuable. It costs a price. The price is naval construction up to a standard fixed by Great Britain. . . ." Writing from London in the New Republic, William T. Stone, of the Foreign Policy Association, declares that our delegation is "more concerned . . . with precise mathematical parity than with possible ways of achieving reduction."

Here then is the chief enemy—this new, un-American, recently unheard-of doctrine that we must have parity with Great Britain. We have existed as a nation for 154 years, and no one ever pretended to assert until the last few years that we needed parity with the mother country. We were for generations completely unarmed, notably from 1830 to 1860 and from 1870 to 1900, and never did Great Britain seek to take advantage of it, not even under the terrific incitement of Grover Cleveland's Venezuelan message. But now all is altered. Not at a price as the World says, but at a terrible price we are to have parity—at the cost of building still larger fleets, of reducing not at all; at the cost of an armament race with Great Britain; at the cost of being feared and therefore hated by all the other Powers; at the cost of a billion and then of untold additional millions of dollars; at the cost of some of our finest American ideals.

And parity, what is it? A chimera. The World rejoices that by "an act of high statesmanship and profound common sense" we have eliminated the question of relative naval bases, the merchant marine, trade routes, inland versus continental strategy, financial resources, and industrial resources. What remains? Mere numerical parity. Just as though any two nations could be on a par even with exactly duplicate fleets when the vital question is the brains of the respective commanders, the drill and efficiency of the crews, their marksmanship, their will to win—all the personal factors—and even these, as the battle of Jutland showed, may be offset by weather conditions. Parity is a myth, guaranteeing no victory, but only insuring war.

Will Americans yield to this folly? We cannot believe it. Who has authorized the World, or our delegation in London, or President Hoover, or the Congress, or anyone else to say that the United States must have parity? Who has had the authority to say for the American people that, having grown great and rich and powerful, a "world Power," we must, therefore, assume a crushing naval burden which we declined to consider when we were weak and young and totally undefended? Who has given the World the right to assume that if the conference fails we shall have to build vast new fleets to our own impoverishment? Has anybody asked the American people for its views? Not Mr. Hoover. He would be careful not to seek to ascertain definitely whether the people of this country, opposed to its business leaders and its politicians, wish to embark on this policy. We do not believe for an instant that the aroused conscience of America or its moral forces will submit to any such interpretation of America's future. There will be no yielding without a tremendous struggle, without proper characterization of those who would fasten upon our industry military and naval burdens which, as Mr. Hoover admits, are already greater than those borne by any other nation on earth. On this line there are Americans ready to fight, not only all summer, but as long as they live.

Stones for Bread

THERE is something pathetic about the outgivings of the Administration in regard to unemployment. Secretary Davis, put forward as a spokesman on March 4 to tell how the situation was regarded at the White House, paraded some figures which were quickly shown to be unreliable, admitted that some 3,000,000 persons were out of work and that the situation was "distressing," added the smug protestation that the calamity, thanks to the Administration, had been kept down to less than one-half that of "previous crashes," and concluded by averring solemnly that things would be better if Congress would only hurry along the tariff and public-buildings bills. Mr. Hoover, with the felicitations of Senator Fess—nobody else!—on the achievements of his first year in office to hearten him, followed the next day with the unofficial announcement that he saw business recovering rapidly from the effects of the stock-market crash, and struck hands with his worthy Secretary of Labor in calling for the speedy enactment of the tariff enormity. This was his positive contribution. On the negative side he saw no need of an unemployment conference and was opposed to doles.

The Hoover statement given out on March 7 was obviously intended to bring more specific comfort to troubled hearts. Notwithstanding Senator Wagner's unchallenged assertion that the Administration "has neither the figures nor the means of securing them" about unemployment, the Departments of Commerce and Labor, we are told, have discovered that "unemployment amounting to distress is in the main concentrated in twelve States." The States are not named, but since the concentration is also declared to be "in the large industrial centers," one gathers that the situation is most acute precisely where it should be expected to be. Relatively to the number of workers there is "considerably less than one-half," and probably only one-third, of the unemployment "which resulted from the crashes of 1907-8 and 1920-22." Meantime business is improving, interest rates are lower, bond issues for public improvements are increasing, wage schedules are being maintained, there is less borrowing on insurance policies, and the Federal Reserve is again feeding out credit. Let the country cheer up; "all the evidences indicate that the worst effects of the crash upon employment will have been passed during the next sixty days."

This optimistic piffle is set off by a memorandum prepared by Secretaries Davis and Lamont designed to show that things are going on tolerably well. Mindful, apparently, of watchful critics, the Secretaries are careful to admit that "there are no detailed statistics as to the unemployed, and they can only be approximated." On the basis of a canvass of trades employing some 17,000,000 persons, "and applying the same ratio to the whole," they estimate the number of unemployed at "perhaps 1,000,000 and certainly not more than 1,250,000" more than a year ago. In the building trades the normal seasonal unemployment has risen from about 30 per cent to 40 per cent, but "various surveys" show an increase of employment in all trades of "somewhere from 600,000 to 1,000,000 since the low point at the beginning of the year." The cloud has not only a silver lining, but a golden edge; "the forces of recovery are steadily gaining strength" and "the winter seasonal unemployment will soon relax." "If every business concern and every householder able to do so would survey their situation as to repairs, clean-ups, and betterments that must be undertaken sooner or later, and have them put in hand now with a view to relieving the immediate distress in their localities," and if governments, railways, public utilities, and business generally will "continue their able cooperation toward recovery," there will soon be brightness in place of gloom. Thus the gospel according to Robert and the epistle general of James.

We are not convinced by Mr. Hoover's cheer nor by the optimistic estimates which the two Secretaries marshal to support it. It is small consolation for the millions who are out of work to be told that if they can hold out for another two months they may find jobs. We see no evidence in the weekly reports of banks, trust companies, and statistical agencies that industrial or trade recovery is anything but spotty or that business as a whole is emerging from the doldrums; while as for cheap money, that is as good an argument for the bears as for the bulls. The pathetic thing about these Administration statements, however, is that Mr. Hoover does not seem to know why we are having an unemployment crisis, and that the specific remedies to which he turns have at best only an emergency value.

To acclaim the tariff or public works as satisfying correctives of unemployment is both confusing and futile. Senator Wagner, in the recent speech in which he flayed the President for "artificial attempts at myth-making," spoke the solid truth when he declared that "not a shred of evidence has been submitted to show that the tariff debate has caused business to halt or pause." Public works, on no matter what scale, can at best only mitigate a condition which affects the whole structure of our industrial and business society. It is idle for Mr. Hoover to protest that he does not believe in doles; for doles, whether directly in the form of charity such as many communities are now obliged to dispense, or indirectly in the form of such artificial stimulation of industry as Mr. Hoover has initiated, are inescapable accompaniments of unrestricted competitive production.

There is no need to rehearse the particular causes of unemployment. They all inhere in the conditions of a machine and capitalistic age in which the ability to produce has outrun the normal ability to consume, and in which high-pressure methods of forcing consumption are held to conduce to so-called higher standards of living. What the country would like to know is whether Mr. Hoover realizes this, and if he does, what he is prepared to do about it. As far back as 1921, when he was Secretary of Commerce in the Harding Cabinet, he set out to do something nationally about unemployment. He was still setting out when Mr. Coolidge took him in train. Now, after eight years and more, we have another crisis. Is Mr. Hoover prepared to recognize unemployment as a national disease and champion national treatment to combat it, or will he go on asking the country to cheer up while he temporizes and drifts?

Yachts Gargantuan

IN this year of our financial, economic, and moral depression one of our new multimillionaires with a taste for grandeur has placed an order with the Hamburg firm of Blohm and Voss for the "largest private yacht in the world." It is to cost $3,000,000, its length will be 410 feet, its net tonnage is reported to be 8,000 tons, its speed will be eighteen knots, and with a crew of approximately eighty men it will accommodate, besides the owner's family, some twenty guests. The daily press declares that it will be "one of the most luxurious steamers afloat." The cost of maintenance will be not less than $300,000 a year without depreciation and without the owner's personal expenses for entertainment. This is larger than Mr. Morgan's new Corsair, a mere 3,080 tons, to cost only $2,500,000.

In the case of one of our Pittsburgh Mellons we have already expressed our feeling about American millionaires who, although ardent upholders of protection for our industries from foreign competition, place their orders for yachts in foreign shipyards. What right have they, ask we, to go abroad to purchase in the cheapest markets? Are not our shipbuilders needing support, too? Are these yachtsmen really willing to profit by pauper labor abroad and to take the bread out of the mouths of American workingmen? Where, where is the American Federation of Labor? Is it possible that Messrs. Green and Woll are too deeply engrossed in fighting the Bolshevik godlessness to spring to the rescue of our endangered shipyards?

This sad spectacle does not, however, prevent us from considering further Mr. Williams's yacht. It is but one of about twenty such seagoing vessels over 200 feet long built during the recent boom years. They are equipped with the most efficient turbo-electric or Diesel engines, with gyroscopes to eliminate rolling, with "metal Mikes"—automatic steering devices—to eliminate the wobbly steering of even the most efficient quartermasters, with the most up-to-date heating and cooling devices, and with every other comfort obtainable. More than that, the day of the old-fashioned ship-style yacht interior has gone. The effort is now not to let the voyager know that he is at sea, but to deceive him into believing, despite the pitching, that he is in a country house. Hence the calling in of interior decorators familiar to Fifth Avenue; hence designs which suggest nothing of the sea except the ship painting over the fireplace, in which burns a real log fire.

Less than fifty years ago the greyhounds of the seas were only 500 feet long and were under 7,000 tons—this was the size of the Alaska of the Guion Line which long held the speed record and cost only about $1,500,000. Companies found it not easy to finance such a leviathan. Cabins were small, smelly, and lighted by smoking lamps. They were arranged around the dining saloon so that those at meals might miss none of the sighs and sounds of those in distress at sea. Now a single individual can compass for his private pleasure a ship which costs twice as much as the ocean steamer of the late seventies. Meanwhile the average wage of the textile worker in the United States is $15.49 a week and the average annual income of the American farmer continues to be $774.

William H. Taft

OF William H. Taft it must be said that he had without question one of the most winning personalities in our public life. If his face was not his fortune then his kindliness, his humor, his geniality, and his sincerity were. However much one might differ from him politically, to know him was to like him. One felt his absolute honesty of purpose, however hemmed about his vision. Unbiased people never could believe that he was actuated by an unworthy motive or ruled by selfish ambition. Indeed, his rise to our highest office was not the result of his own desire. The antithesis of Mr. Hoover in this respect, he lifted no finger to achieve the Presidency, but allowed himself to be chosen for that office by the then President, who again proved that the power we have allowed to accrue to our Chief Executive renders it possible for him to dictate his renomination or to pick his successor—in the case of Mr. Taft, at a cost to him of bitterness, disappointments, misunderstandings, and loss of highly valued friendships.

That Mr. Taft's qualities were also his defects is clear. Your kindly, good-humored, easy-going man is not often an incisive executive, especially if he be of stout habit. Life was altogether too easy for him. He was born to means and to social position. He achieved readily his appointment to the bench upon which he might have stayed a respected and happy judge had not the Philippine opportunity come to him—the brightest chapter in his entire career. He carried American ideals with him. He was determined to treat the Filipinos as equals and as our wards in trust for a brief period. He even danced with their women at the most important official functions and so won for himself the anathemas of those who considered the natives "niggers" fit to be ruled over but never fit for fraternization. But always Mr. Taft was apart from the mass of our own people by reason of his good fortune; by the fact that he never had to fight for a living and hardly for office.

As President he ruled—and failed. Not that he wholly merited the anger of Roosevelt or the bitterness of Pinchot and others. His fault was that he was intellectually slothful and constantly procrastinating. He decided the Pinchot-Ballinger controversy in an evening and decided it wrongly, after thirty-six holes of golf that day with Yale undergraduates. The next morning he started on his fatal Western trip and, as he afterwards admitted, dictated his critical Winona speech "between stations"—his freedom to admit his faults was one of his charms. He found himself in the wrong because he had not thought things through.

These were fatal blunders. But it was characteristic of the man that he bore no malice. Given an opportunity to address American newspapermen and to "get even" with them he replied: "Experience has taught me that an exhibition of one's wounds gives only momentary pleasure to the exhibitor and too often furnishes additional gratification to the one who inflicted them. Besides, I have no grievances." He never had enough grievances, or rather hardships, to make him really a tribune of the people or a wise, far-seeing, progressive justice. On the Supreme Court he was conservative and reactionary to a degree. But his heart was golden at all times.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

THE government, even of a great nation, must have concern for little things. In a cosmic scheme which has arranged that the fall of sparrows shall be noted it is not amiss for the House or Senate to give heed to the tribulations of the individual, however humble. And even so I am puzzled to understand what public purpose was served by dragging Mrs. Ruth G. K. Strawbridge from her pleasant Philadelphia home to tell some kindly Congressmen of what she gives her guests for supper. Seemingly, Mrs. Strawbridge had no complaint to lodge with press and public. Her parties are bone dry and she is satisfied. She says that her guests are. None of the guests was summoned. Such potential rebuttal might have covered the ground more completely, but I am at a loss to understand why it should have been touched upon at all.

To be sure, there was no indication of unwillingness upon the part of Mrs. Strawbridge. She faced the limelight bravely and without flinching. No conscript she, but only a volunteer. Indeed, there was evidence that this was not the first occasion upon which the lady from Philadelphia had embraced an opportunity to exert an influence beyond her home sphere. The work of sustaining dry dinners does not seem to be as exhausting as an outsider might imagine. Possibly all the guests left a little early. At any rate, time hung heavily upon the hands of Ruth G. K. Strawbridge. Accordingly, she took up her pen and wrote round-robin letters in a flawless and flowing script. And this was the burden of her letter:

> I am taking the liberty of addressing myself to you, as a representative Philadelphia woman, to inquire quite confidentially whether in your judgment it would be possible to constitute a committee of women of your own standing in the social world who would interest themselves in creating sentiment for observation of the prohibition laws within their own circles.
> There has no doubt recently come to your attention the notable example set by Mrs. Edward B. McLean, of Washington, in this respect. I am sending you herewith a photostat copy of the newspaper article which was published about Mrs. McLean's Easter breakfast party. I have every reason to believe that her courage in making this innovation in Washington society met with the hearty approval of President Hoover and of all others, like himself, who are trying to inculcate in our people at this time a more lively sense of their obligations as American citizens.
> May I reiterate that anything you are good enough to write me or to suggest will be treated in strictest confidence.

A search through the entire "Book of Etiquette" fails to furnish me with any precedent for this singular behavior. In great detail the problem of whether she should ask him in is discussed, and also the station a young man should assume when walking with two young ladies along a crowded thoroughfare. But there is nothing which fixes a method for meddling in the affairs of one's neighbors.

Although the working day of Mrs. Ruth G. K. Strawbridge does not seem to have been filled to overflowing, she did not have sufficient leisure to acquaint herself with the provisions of the prohibition law before she wrote her letter. The serving of beverages in the home is by no means essentially illegal. There are still families in Philadelphia possessing cellars in which repose wines acquired before the mandate of Mr. Volstead. One cannot really think that Mrs. Strawbridge stooped to sniff at any entertainment to which she was invited. No matter how close the constitutional kinship, a social gulf still yawns between the Brookharts and Strawbridges.

That no bootlegged potion ever graced a Philadelphia table I would not be prepared to argue. As a member of the great middle class I would not think of asking any host or hostess: "Just where did you get this liquor and is it come by with honesty and good intention?" Beyond the borders of my home I take the cocktails and the soup which are set before me without question. I had supposed in my ignorance of the ways of the socially elect that this was as fundamental as the injunction not to point, which my parents and guardians dinned into me at four. And so it seems to me that the most impressive thing in the Ruth G. K. Strawbridge inquiry lay in the opening phrase: "I am taking the liberty."

As a student of human psychology I should have liked to see the answers in full. We only heard that other social leaders were favorable for the most part to the suggestion that they should become as pious as any Strawbridge and quit giving guests the stuff which steals away the brain. Unfortunately, the lady could do no more for the House committee than summarize her findings. Her letter was confidential. But one confidence begets another. I wonder if in the collection there might have been even a single reply running about as follows:

> DEAR RUTHIE: Thanks for reminding me of the law and of the duty of us social leaders. I did see the newspaper account of Mrs. Ned McLean's boozeless breakfast. At least my secretary called it to my attention. I hope you agree with me that it was a vulgar display of a passion for publicity. An older woman like yourself must remember back to a day when it was not customary for a social leader to spill all her stuff to the press men whenever she gave a party. But after all, she did marry a Middle Westerner.
> Incidentally, my dear, I want to make a suggestion to you, and I trust that you will take it in the same spirit in which I received yours. Where in Heaven's name do you get your scrapple? I was talking it over with one of the Biddles only last week and we both agreed that somebody ought to have the courage to tell you about it. If you could have seen the face of that poor French count who attended your delightful banquet last Saturday! He was as brave as Lafayette at Gettysburg or wherever it was that somebody said, "Nous voilà." Don't you find history boring?
> Of course, maybe it isn't the scrapple itself. It could be your cook. Several of us have been meaning to speak to you about her. I was discussing it with the Drexels last night. So sorry not to find you there. But to make a long story longer I'll meet you half-way on your proposition. If I agree to give up whiskey sours at my house will you agree to quit serving scrapple at yours? I hope the children are all well. John sends his love.

HEYWOOD BROUN

The Tariff Vote Market

By HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Washington, March 7

THE vote trade is extremely active during these closing days of the Senate tariff debate. The market reached its peak for the present season thus far at three o'clock on Wednesday, when ten Senators who on January 16 voted against raising the present sugar duty reversed themselves without a word of explanation and voted for the new higher rate proposed by the chairman of the Finance Committee. Here are the names. Let them not be forgotten: Dill and Jones of Washington, Ashurst and Hayden of Arizona, Pine and Thomas of Oklahoma, Schall of Minnesota, Trammell of Florida, Goff of West Virginia, and Metcalf of Rhode Island. Let not their geography be forgotten, either. Their astonishing reversal, made without the presentation of a syllable of new evidence, took place in the face of a blistering speech from Senator Caraway, flatly charging them with trading their votes on sugar for votes on other duties in which they are interested.

> Mr. President [said Senator Caraway], I am aware that no argument, no information available or that might be produced, is to be effective in the vote that is pending. The fate of this bill was settled by a trade, an agreement, in which my information is—and I think it is accurate—that eight Senators have agreed to change their votes upon this rate and vote for sugar in return for votes that are to be hereafter cast for other duties that are pending.
> That being true, argument is wasted; because when a matter becomes a matter of trade, of consideration, of bargain and sale, whatever the facts may be, the result has been fixed.

In the face of these charges the ten sat silent. When the vote was taken, Senator Smoot and the Great Western Sugar Company had won by a vote of 47 to 39. Five days earlier the long grueling fight of the Progressive-Democratic coalition had seemed about to come to a triumphant conclusion. Now it appeared to be lost. On all sides one heard that the Old Guard had regained control, and that in the few remaining days of the Senate battle they would put new duties on lumber, oil, cement, brick, aluminum, iron, what not.

What brought about this sudden change in the tariff situation? The facts are quite simple. On January 16 the Senate, in committee of the whole, after full consideration of the sugar duties, adopted by a vote of 48 to 38 an amendment proposed by Senator Harrison of Mississippi to retain the present rate of 1.76 cents a pound on Cuban sugar instead of the rate of 2.20 cents proposed by the Finance Committee. This vote constituted one of the major victories of the coalition. It represented a saving of some tens of millions to sugar consumers, and it seemed as though the housewife might sleep quietly at night without putting her sugar-bowl under lock and key. But during February there began to be heard disturbing rumors of a new combination, particularly among the oil, lumber, and sugar interests. Washington swarmed with oil lobbyists, whose activities have just been ventilated by Senator Caraway's committee. The woes of the sugar producers, of course, have been broadcast to a listening world ever since Senator Smoot and his associates began their efforts to jack up the sugar duties a year ago, but oil furnished a comparatively new story at Washington.

The producers of crude oil have had their troubles for a long time, owing directly to a completely uncontrollable competitive bringing-in of new wells which flooded the market with an output from domestic sources averaging during the past year 2,755,000 barrels per day, and driving down the price. This made it easy, however, to blame the troubles of the industry on imports, which last year amounted to only 78,915,000 barrels, mostly from Mexico and South America, against a domestic output of 1,005,598,000 barrels. Of course, in any rational economy imports of a rapidly exhaustible natural product like crude oil would be welcomed as lengthening the life of the native supply, but the independent oil men (the great body of producers outside the big companies) can see nothing for it but a dollar duty on imported oil, which, they assume, would raise the price of their own product by a like amount—an assumption manifestly unsound unless domestic output is restricted. The independents likewise turned their guns on the big concerns, like the Standard companies, which as the chief refiners are the great importers of crude oil. Altogether, they carried on a tremendous campaign with plenty of well-paid lobbyists and hundreds of oil men from all over the country pouring into Washington to urge on Senators the needs of their imperiled industry.

While this was going on in a semi-public way, the more practical details were being attended to by those expert in such matters. Telegrams now in possession of the lobby committee show clearly enough the line of action taken, which was a combination with the sugar and lumber interests. To quote a single example, take the telegram addressed to C. C. Sheppard, general manager of the Louisiana Central Lumber Company, a constituent of Senator Broussard, one of the most persistent tariff beggars (in behalf of his sugar friends) in the national legislature:

> Russian importation of lumber and South American importation of crude oil without protective tariff will further demoralize these great industries unless protective tariff is secured on them. . . . Pat Harrison of Mississippi and Broussard of Louisiana must be lined up. Depending on you to reach these parties through whatever channels your conscience dictates.

On February 25 Earl Callaway, second in command among the lobbyists, reported to one of the editors back home:

> I am glad to advise tonight that we have secured the support of two of our most obstinate opponents whom we had dreaded on the floor of the Senate, and I believe by Friday [when the vote was to be taken] we shall have at least two more strong men in the Senate who have opposed us heretofore and who will appear in our favor in the debate. It is my prediction and sincere belief that we have won this fight.

It is plain enough how the game was played by the wily high priest of sugar protection from Utah and his associates, notwithstanding their bitter denials of trading. Such heaven-sent opportunities as this situation offered of bringing salvation to imperiled American industry and, incidentally, of picking up the few remaining votes needed to overturn the mistaken Senate decision of January 16, were not to be neglected. As the time for the vote on lumber and oil approached, hopes ran high, but, alas, arrangements for mutual aid are not always successful. Senator Jones of Washington had proposed an amendment for a duty of three dollars per thousand feet on lumber. Finding it impossible to get that, he changed it to two dollars on soft woods only. When the vote was taken on February 27, the amendment was rejected by 39 votes against 34. The next day came the vote on Senator Thomas's amendment proposing a duty of a dollar a barrel on crude oil and 50 per cent ad valorem on all derivatives. After a fiery debate, in which Senator Blaine made a vitriolic attack on the oil lobbyists, this amendment, too, was beaten by 39 votes against 27, or, counting pairs, 48 to 36. On this vote, as on lumber, the chairman of the Finance Committee, with that faithful regular, Metcalf of Rhode Island, voted to maintain the position of the committee as against the duties proposed in the amendments. Of the ten Senators who switched on sugar, Goff, Jones, Pine, and Thomas voted for both oil and lumber duties, and on lumber they were joined by Dill, Ashurst, and Trammell, while Metcalf, Schall, and Hayden were recorded against both oil and lumber. The actual details of the bargaining, of course, were not revealed. When the Senate adjourned on the evening of February 28, the opinion prevailed that the oil-lumber-sugar coalition was beaten.

Such judgments took no account of the resourcefulness and persistence of the Utah Senator who watches over sugar. Oil and lumber had labored under the disability of an unfavorable report from the Finance Committee; not so sugar. Therefore, the apostle of sweetness, defeated on the earlier committee proposal for a duty of 2.20 cents on Cuban sugar, now brought forward a new measure for a two-cent rate. Once more the debate waxed furious and the opponents of the increase hurled their charges of dicker and trade. All in vain! Clad in the panoply of righteousness, denying all charges of log-rolling, admitting the enormous earnings of the Great Western Sugar Company, the saccharine saint yet pointed tearfully to the profits of the candy and pop manufacturers, stated that Cuban sugar the day before had reached the lowest price in history, and let it go at that. No more was needed; for there sat nine of the silent ten, giving no sign but ready to vote when the moment came, while the paired Goff was not at hand.

Before the final vote was taken, Senator Howell obtained unanimous consent for a vote on his amendment proposing a bounty of forty-four one-hundredths of a cent a pound to beet and cane producers, one-fifth to go to the mill and four-fifths to the farmer. He pointed out that the maximum cost under his plan would be $10,600,000 a year, of which $8,500,000 would go to the farmer, while the Smoot amendment would cost $30,000,000, of which not more than $6,000,000 would reach the manufacturer and the farmer. This simple and straightforward plan of taking money out of the public treasury and handing it over to the farmer, the plan favored by the honest advocates of farm relief at a minimum cost to the treasury, was buried under a vote of 66 to 22.

Then the secretary called the roll on the Smoot amendment, and one by one the votes were cast: Ashurst, Dill, Hayden, Jones, Metcalf, Pine, Schall, Thomas, Trammell—with Goff paired and absent. None of his hearers will soon forget the scorching words of Senator Caraway:

> We will need no explanation. None will be necessary and none could explain. When the roll is called, we will know whether legislation is written on the floor of the Senate because the facts warrant the votes, or whether it is made by trades taking place outside of the Senate, because here there is no chance to be mistaken.

Senator Thomas had already defiantly given notice of his intention to reintroduce his oil amendment in slightly different form. Lumber may again come on the carpet. Cement, made free in January, was today charged six cents, Wagner, Tydings, Couzens, Pine, and Pittman reversing themselves. Senator Cutting is expecting a fresh onslaught in behalf of the customs censorship that he fought so valiantly and successfully before; but if the secret smut session threatened by Senator Smoot is actually held, that godly man will be confronted by an impressive document signed by 560 leaders of thought in all parts of the country, opposing the system of censorship by customs inspectors, which document was inserted in the record by Senator Cutting on March 7.

The New York World on Thursday morning uncovered a fresh scandal by disclosing that a considerable part of the office force used by Senator Grundy when he was simply a high-tariff lobbyist, has since his elevation to a seat in the Senate been moved from its downtown offices to his quarters in the Senate Office Building. The Pennsylvania Senator's lame defense on the floor led to a more complete exposé by the lobby committee.

What will be the outcome of the tariff fight, as a whole, no one can say at this stage. The coalition has received a staggering blow, and the Washington Post says that the existing combination "if successful, and the cards certainly seem stacked for it to be, will virtually revamp the bill from a coalition-written one to an Old Guard bill," pointing out that six members of the coalition, Couzens, Fletcher, Frazier, Howell, King, and Nye, voted for the sugar tariff before. It goes on:

> And it was upon this weakness in the coalition camp that the tariff fixers, who have laughed contemptuously at the "high principles" of the coalition from the beginning and predicted confidently that in the end their fixing would prevail, went to work. They went to work upon the coalition, in such a way and at such a time, too, that they bid fair to make them look like political monkeys. . . .
> There was one Old Guardsman who could not restrain his mirth after yesterday's result. "The dynasty fell on the only things about which it was right," he chuckled.

Even after the bill is out of the Senate it must still run the gauntlet of the conference. If the Old Guard succeeds in winning the final battles on the Senate floor, a large part of the good work done there during the past six months of steady fighting may be undone, and the conference will simply have to choose between two sets of thoroughly bad provisions. But the fight is not yet over, and it is too early to assume that the cohesive power of public plunder is going to prevail against the determination of the small band who have persistently fought, with ever-shifting alliances, for a relatively honest tariff bill, if such a thing may be said to exist.

D. H. Lawrence

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ON March 3 D. H. Lawrence died of tuberculosis in a villa near Nice. His death, at the age of forty-five, extinguishes a talent that was one of the most varied and stormy in contemporary literature. Too much of an individualist to be the member of any school or even, for that matter, to be the founder of one, he was nevertheless typically "modern" in his preoccupations and he had his passionate say upon most of the topics which agitated his contemporaries.

Lawrence was born in a miner's cottage in Derbyshire and grew up amid the hardships which he described in his first conspicuously successful novel. At sixteen he became a village schoolteacher and though he was compelled for lack of funds to forego the scholarship which he was awarded at the age of nineteen, he succeeded two years later in matriculating in a training-school for teachers. Shortly afterward some poems written to a local girl were published in a magazine and the fact determined him to embark upon a literary career. His first novel, "The White Peacock," was issued in 1911 and from that time on he wrote with great rapidity, publishing in all some twenty-one volumes in less than twenty years.

Throughout his career Lawrence was the subject of acrimonious controversy and the victim of much persecution, both political and literary. A professed pacifist and the husband of the former Frieda von Richthofen, he was hounded by secret police during the war and he became, besides, the object of persistent hostility on the part of the censors, both here and abroad. Thus, "Sons and Lovers" aroused the protests of Justice Ford; "Women in Love" was attacked by Sumner; the British Home Office seized copies of a recent volume of poems called "Pansies" which he had sent to England from Italy; and a Boston bookseller was arrested just a few weeks ago for selling his latest (and privately printed) novel, "Lady Chatterly's Lover." But though these various annoyances doubtless increased his irritation against contemporary society he was a natural protestant, hardly less at war with the outside world than with himself. And this fact was, perhaps, the one which most clearly marked him off from his older contemporaries in English literature.

The Shaws, the Galsworthys, the Wellses were, however much they might battle with their fellows, patriotic Englishmen at bottom. They believed in modern society, in the possibility of reforming it, and, even more specifically, in the society of England. But Lawrence's abandonment of England and his wanderings in Australia, Mexico, and the American Southwest were outward signs of the fact that he had given up that white man's civilization which he so bitterly reviled. He had no political interests and no social program. It was only incidentally that he condescended to touch a detail of our system, as he did, for example, when he attacked the censorship, for he had repudiated it in toto and he saw no reason for meddling with the details.

Essentially an anarchical individualist, his absorption in the problems of the individual in general and of himself in particular implied that it was useless to consider how men might manage to live together when it was not yet clear how each could live with himself. He was perpetually asking what human nature was capable of and he never succeeded in giving an answer satisfactory to himself. It was the universe that he would not accept and he was angrier at God than he was at kings or censors. Hence, though he believed that nothing was to be gained by reticence or suppression, he never promised any solution, for he was far more inclined to believe that civilization was going down in some stupendous debacle than to hope that even the frankest and freest discussion would save it.

Many maintained that "Sons and Lovers," the first of his novels to attract great attention, was in every respect the best. Nor is there any doubt that it is, with the possible exception of some of the short stories, the most finished and articulate of his prose works. It is a realistic novel not entirely outside the tradition represented, let us say, by the early works of George Moore, and it might very possibly be read as merely an admirable realistic story of the struggles of a young miner. But the very fact that it is less repugnant than most of his other works to tastes which find scant pleasure in "Lady Chatterly's Lover" or "Women in Love" is sufficient indication of the fact that it is not the author at his most characteristic. Its unobtrusive and inexplicit use of a "mother complex" as the dominant psychological factor in the life of the hero serves to announce Lawrence's persistent preoccupation with various sexual abnormalities, but it is essentially the work of a man who still feels the influence of a tradition to which he is adapting himself and it is therefore either not really representative or at least far less characteristic than even such a book as "Aaron's Rod," which may be more difficult to classify but which for that very reason gives more of the peculiar quality of the author.

Indeed, it may be doubted whether Lawrence was primarily a novelist at all in the conventional sense of one whose chief concern is with a picture of the world outside himself. He is at his best when describing the doings and feelings of people who are essentially variants of himself, and from "Sons and Lovers" on his development is centrifugal rather than centripetal. He scatters instead of coming to a focus, and the result is that we lose a novelist to gain an almost frenetically passionate commentator upon life as it affects his supersensitive and irritated soul. He tried at one time or another almost all the forms of literary composition—poetry, fiction, drama, criticism, history, travel, and philosophy—and his purely literary gift, his gift, that is to say, for forceful and peculiarly unhackneyed utterance, was extraordinary; but it is the temper of the man which gives unity to the work and it is ultimately that temper, in whatever form it happened to express itself, which makes the work so interesting. Lawrence was very conspicuously himself whether he happened to be speaking in his proper person, in the pages of a novel, or even in an effort to interpret the character of Benjamin Franklin, whom he recognized, properly enough, as the most perfect possible antithesis of himself.

Russia's New Revolution

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, February 16

THE present is the most interesting period of the Bolshevik Revolution since 1922, perhaps since 1917. A tremendous upheaval has occurred during the past six months. One returns to the country to find not only new achievements, radically new policies, and a new social atmosphere, but a powerful, all-enveloping, newly released wave or wall of energy and enthusiasm. This is my outstanding impression. Even the passive, anti-Bolshevik sections of the Soviet bureaucracy feel the inspiration of recent trends; as for the Communists, they have become machines of permanent motion, more uncritical and impersonal than ever, driving fiercely toward a goal which grows nearer as the milestones are passed in planful fashion. The goal is the complete destruction of capitalism in the Soviet Union, and after that stage the complete enthronement of socialism. We are witnessing the gradual accomplishment of that for which November 7, 1917, took place. This is the revolution.

The greatest innovation is the sharp course directed to the eradication of private capitalism in the village. The kulak, or rich peasant, is to be wiped out "as a class," and the private capital of the middle, poor, and landless peasants is being pooled into collective agricultural units called kolkhozi. The organization of kolkhozi is proceeding far ahead of plan, and soon the majority of the Soviet Union's peasantry—25,000,000 households—should be bound together in cooperatives using government land, borrowing government tractors and seed, and selling their produce to the state. From this to the complete proletarianization of the Russian peasantry is, I think, a long but single step. The subject, however, needs more than a paragraph, more than an article. For the moment I shall limit myself to a sort of bulletin of the changes which struck me on my return.

Collectivization amounts to the ruthless extermination of NEP on the land. How logical, therefore, that the Nepmen of the city be brought under the same head. Private stores in Moscow and other urban centers grow fewer daily, and private trade—both legal and illicit—has shrunk to an unprecedented minimum. Stalin a week ago publicly summoned the party to more temperance in this matter, for the Moscow committee of the party had set itself the task of the wholesale and immediate annihilation of private capitalism in the cities. Yet unless an unexpected trend toward the Right sets in, NEP and the Nepmen are doomed to at least economic death.

Stalin's ultra-radical, revolutionary policy has won the hearts of the Trotzkyists, and they have come rushing back from Siberian, Caucasian, and Volgan exile to participate in the pressing business of construction. They have come back humbly, with clipped wings, acknowledging Stalin's talents and Trotzky's mistakes. The remnant that remains in Barnaul, Tashkent, Tobolsk sulks in remote retirement out of personal affection for the "great Leo." (His brilliancy shines undimmed in his recent autobiography, but its apologia and criticism, which may strike a sympathetic note in the soft air of foreign lands, sound like a far cry amid the clang of battle and the din of the forge that envelop Russia.) Stalin, my ex-Trotzkyist friends tell me, has done more than they wanted of him, and more even than they had expected of Trotzky. Only if the Right raises its head will Trotzky be needed here. But at present it is Left tendencies, like those of the Moscow committee, which require checking.

It is indicative of the extent to which the crushing of everything private has gone that the private practice of medicine has been restricted and will probably soon be entirely prohibited. In anticipation, doctors and dentists are uniting into cooperatives, forsaking private activities in cases where they also enjoy state employment, or preparing for very hard times.

The student of social movements is interested to observe that the moment socialism comes into the foreground communism appears in the offing. The kolkhozi may here and there develop into communes, but especially in the cities one already notes the beginnings of groups which propose to place their varied earnings in a common fund and live on a communistic basis of equal consumption. Some of the new cooperative houses are being converted into communes. Institutions occupied with family and child problems are dreaming what today may still be fantastic dreams of idealistic unions, with state care of children, but tomorrow, when the Five-Year Plan is successfully executed, may gradually assume realistic forms.

A year ago, even six months ago, the Five-Year Plan encountered strong skepticism abroad and resistance at home. Now the slogan is: The Five-Year Plan in Four. In some branches they will certainly do it—in oil, chemicals, agricultural machinery, lumber, agricultural collectives. The Turkestan-Siberian Railroad will be finished in May, 1930—four months in advance of plan. New industrial giants are rising in every corner of the vast land, and the more they build the more they must build. Industrialization begets industrialization, and collectivization, with its concomitant of mechanization, makes maximum factory production a prime necessity. The aim is to make the Union industrially powerful and economically self-sufficient (incidentally, by converting into a commercial asset a wild rubber-yielding plant of Kazakstan, the government hopes to make Russia independent of foreign rubber supplies), and monumental progress is registered each day in this direction. All year, the curve of industrial output has risen; during the first third of the current fiscal year foreign trade increased 23.3 per cent, and in the same period the amount of currency in circulation was reduced. Inflation has been checked.

To increase output, an unbroken working year has been introduced together with a five-day week. As a result, factories, offices, and stores operate 360 instead of 310 days a year, yet each person gainfully employed enjoys six sabbaths per month instead of four. The days of the week no longer exist, and people, even my kindergarten children, count by the days of the month. The social as well as economic effects of this daring departure are manifold and deep.

Sundays and Saturdays have been abolished. This industrial reform, therefore, strikes an indirect blow at church attendance. Yet if this were all, Greek Orthodoxy need not be disturbed. It would be unnatural, however, if the new revolutionary resurgence, the tremendous crescendo of militant socialization, the augmented mass enthusiasm of workers, and the more intimate contact of the peasantry with the state, with Communists, and with the proletariat did not stimulate the spread of atheism. On this subject, too, I promise another article. The change is one not in quality but in quantity—tremendous quantity. It is the thermometer of the crusade against private capitalism and of the newly tapped gushers of popular will, determination, force.

Everything moves here. Life, the air, people are dynamic. When I watch these recently unsealed reservoirs of energy I am sometimes carried away and think that nothing s impossible in the Soviet Union. Russia is pulling herself upward by her own bootstraps as no nation has done before. The Bolsheviks retain all the qualities which explain their past achievements, and now they have another—confidence n success. A promissory note on the future stirs the proleariat to maximum concentrated effort. The technical peronnel of industry, hitherto indifferent or hostile, has finally turned a corner and caught by the spirit of creative, planful building, is throwing itself enthusiastically and loyally at an unprecedented engineering opportunity. This is an added asset to the state and increases the potentiality of growth. Moreover, those dynamos bursting with power—the youth —have been harnessed to the industrial chariot, and they move in shock brigades, putting their shoulders to wheels that are stuck in the mire, closing breaches in the economic front, reinforcing weakened sectors of the line. Really, this country grows younger and younger as the years go by.

The cost is very heavy. The population is being deprived of many comforts and even of some necessities in the name of accomplishments yet to come. The explanation is simple: so much money is being invested in capital development that the needs of the present cannot be entirely satisfied. A score of new large cities, hundreds of factories, a network of electrical stations, a host of schools and scientific institutions are in the process of construction. They will yield goods a few years hence. But today they require funds, labor, materials. What they get is equal to what the population does not get. The hope that they will repay the debt handsomely is the present motive power.

Divorce—and After

IV. The Insecurity of the Child*

FOUR CASE HISTORIES

DIVORCE adds to the insecurity in children's lives. One need not be a psychologist to know that. The question arises whether or not this insecurity would e present, and if so whether in greater or less degree, in omes where parental unhappiness, incompatibility, or hoslity has not led to actual separation or divorce. The four ases detailed here are taken from the actual records of a onsultant in the behavior problems of children and young dults. Each one presents facts and factors which may be uplicated in other cases where the consequences were diametrically opposite to those here described. So much is ontingent on the native equipment and previous training of he children and adults involved, so much also is dependent n other environmental factors present before and after the ivorce, that any effort at generalization is more likely to eflect the truth about its author than about divorce.

I

A wealthy couple are divorced after ten years of retched quarreling. Two children, a boy of nine and a rl of five, remain in the custody of their unhappy, emttered, socially ambitious mother. Long before the divorce e mother has begun to devote herself to her son, to whom e offers the loving attention that a woman gives to a mare man. As her relations with her husband grow more rained, and of course more markedly after the divorce, she kes the boy into her confidence, she uses him as escort, she eks his ministrations when she is ill or indisposed, she discusses her friends with him, they read the newspapers together, she tells him again and again that he is the only one she has left. The boy plays his role to his mother's satisfaction, and thus secures constant praise and appreciation from her and from most of her women friends.

Meanwhile, his younger sister, who has been her father's pet and a spoiled but loving daughter to her father, finds herself alone after the divorce. She is forced to seek out the company of her mother, who intrusts her to the care of a French governess. What little companionship the child receives from her mother is bestowed grudgingly. She soon discovers that she can increase this maternal attention in two ways—by unsatisfactory behavior and by illness. True, the former involves the pain of rebuke and punishment; the latter, confinement and unpleasant medicines, not to mention doctors who even doubt her illnesses. But this behavior is successful in obtaining for her her mother's solicitude, and that reward is apparently worth the price.

She has also begun to punish her father for his absence. When he visits her she is extremely rude and unpleasant to him, accepts his gifts ungraciously, and even offers him her opinion that he is not a very nice man. Her father does what his paternal duty commands: he discusses his little daughter's rudeness with her mother, blaming his wife, of course, for what he considers the child's inadequate training. The mother meets the child's deviations of conduct with criticism, constant correction, deprivations by way of penalty, and other forms of punishment.

This treatment of the girl, who is now ten years old, is grist to her unconscious mill. She achieves, on an anti-social level, an eminence that she despairs of ever attaining on any plane of good behavior, first, because of the discouragement she draws out of the carping criticism of a frustrated mother; secondly, because of constant unfavorable comparison with the paragon, her elder, father-impersonating brother; and thirdly, because of the essential insecurity of her own fatherless life. For years now she has been a serious problem at home; she has recently become a serious problem at school. Meanwhile, the brother, now fourteen, has reacted in an unfortunate manner to the role of husband forced upon him. Tall and robust though he is, his manner, his attitude toward other boys, and his growing disinterest in girls reveal an alarming disposition to identify himself, not with the absent father, but with the omnipresent mother. Effeminacy is not a healthy symptom in a strong young man of nearly fifteen.

There can be little question of the cause-and-effect relationship between the divorce of these parents and the behavior of their children. But it should be pointed out that for every case similar to the foregoing in a divorced household, there are several just as impressive and quite as distressing to be found in the homes of those who are unhappily married but not divorced.

II

A childless couple of means, finding themselves drifting apart, mutually decide that what they need is a child. The young, pleasure-loving mother views with favor neither pregnancy nor the care and worry that in her mind must mark the all-too-protracted period of infancy. She persuades her husband that an adopted child is "just as good"; and a bright and beautiful little girl of three receives their name.

Fundamentally there is something sinful in deliberately avoiding the travail of childbirth. That becomes, for a time, the burden of the mother's conscious regrets. Only for a time, however. Soon they are neatly repressed in the face of other, greater grief. The new little girl had brought about for a while at least that community of interest that husband and wife had sought. But this could not alter their essential incompatibility, nor her infidelities, nor his fury at the knowledge of her infidelities. War was inevitable.

The divorce was decreed less than two years after the adoption. It was all done very quietly, and by agreement the mother retained the custody of the child. Within three months after the final decree the child became desperately ill, recovering completely only after a long and expensive period of hospitalization and convalescence in the country. Now the old feeling of guilt, long repressed, that grew out of her escape from child-bearing, united with a new feeling of guilt because of her sexual infidelities, came to shake the woman's security. Her child's illness could only be retribution. Fear of losing the child grew. She clung to it more closely than ever, inevitably carrying over to the six-year-old her own insecurity. She was "modern" enough to interpret for the youngster the facts of her adoption; but her modernism did not extend to any interpretation of the divorce. Instead, she resorted to false explanations and roused false hopes. Her own sense of guilt precluded any sane effort to rationalize the absence of the father in a way that would be intelligible and convincing to a bright child of six.

The child's insecurity became pathetic. The indulgence attendant on long illness, the over-solicitousness of a guilty, insecure mother, the deprivation of a father she had learned to love, and the knowledge that she does not belong truly even to her mother—all these factors have contributed to change a bright and charming little girl into a neurotic child, spoiled beyond toleration, cruel, wilful, cowardly, unpleasant, and unhappy. Had there been no divorce, would this child be suffering as she is now? Who can tell? Again, this much is certain: Circumstances similar to the foregoing in families that have sternly avoided the divorce courts have again and again resulted in neurotic children, equally spoiled, equally unpleasant, equally insecure.

III

An intelligent, educated husband and wife, parents of three children—a boy of eighteen, a boy of sixteen, and a girl of twelve—are divorced. Even prior to the divorce the children were familiar with the parental differences. Both boys have definitely cast their lot with their father and feel a strong antagonism to the mother because she was the prime mover in the final decision to obtain a divorce. She is too "decent" to inform her intelligent young grown-up sons of her reasons (which are statutory), and they are allowed to believe that the mother's story of "incompatibility" is her only motive. Where the daughter's loyalty would lie had circumstances not been as they were, it is difficult to conjecture. The facts, however, are these: During the period when the two homes were being established, the girl was sick. There was no question that the mother should attend the child through her illness. The boys and the father moved to a new home. When the daughter recovered the mother realized, through the defection of her two sons, that she would be obliged to do battle to hold her daughter's affection against the assaults of her husband. Because of the long period of nursing that had been demanded of her, she claimed the right to see all three children at regular intervals. She would undoubtedly have won her "rights" in any court, but knowing the temper of her sons, and having no desire to awaken in them further antagonism, her only court was her husband's conscience. His decision was in her favor only in so far as the girl was concerned.

Then followed the daughter's travels back and forth, from father to mother, from uncertainty to uncertainty, from insecurity to insecurity. The mother has taken the girl into her confidence, from which she excluded her sons, though they were certainly better prepared for it than their twelve-year-old sister. The daughter's affections are slowly but surely turning in the direction of her mother. The five-and-ten-cent-store trinkets, the cheap millinery, and the movie treats bestowed on her by her "poor, dear mother" are given a value that in themselves they are far from possessing. Her sojourns in her father's home are replete with criticisms of mother and sallies at the cheapness of her new finery. Her father's gifts are intended to be, and are, a little more impressive than those her mother makes. Such a technique, however unethical, might easily have the desired effect were it not accompanied by the teasing, provocative, hypercritical, and unfriendly belittlement of her mother's gifts. After all, it was mother who nursed her during her long illness. The result is not only a gradual drawing away from father, but from her brothers as well because of their callow hostility toward her mother, to whose defense they unwittingly arouse her own constantly progressive partisanship. One beholds here the spectacle of a house already divided against itself becoming even more divided; a father and his sons left womanless; a mother and her daughter left manless; and all because of the incredibly unenlightened selfishness of two otherwise intelligent adults.

IV

The parents of Arthur, aged three, separated. Their arrangement, despite the bitterness that necessitated it, was an intelligent one. For the first year the mother was to devote herself to the child, and the father to see him twice a week, once mid-week for an hour and once during the week-end for a whole day. Thereafter, if there were no reconciliation, divorce proceedings would follow.

The second year ended with the mutual hostility unabated. In fact it was enhanced on the mother's side to the point of her refusing even to discuss divorce. She thereafter found professional employment, but continued her intelligent care of the child through her own contacts with him and through the employment of a thoroughly trained governess whom she carefully supervised.

Her reentry into the world of affairs did much to bring her serenity and mitigate her deep bitterness toward her husband. Divorce was discussed over many months, and at the end of the third year of separation mother and child went to Europe. The father arranged to join them ater, and the divorce mill was set in motion. Arthur was hen almost seven. As soon as they arrived in France the mother began to prepare the child for the final event. She had previously agreed with her husband that geography and business were to be used as the explanation to be given to Arthur in response to questions he might pose concerning his father's absence. But the mother realized that an unruth which is effectual for a child of three, four, or five might not serve for a child of seven. Besides, word from other, less considerate sources concerning the divorce and ts implications might somehow filter through to him.

She watched carefully for opportunities, and some opportunities she went out of her way to create. She suggested his writing a letter to Freddie back in America. Arthur wasn't so keen on letter-writing, and besides he idn't care so much about Freddie anyhow. But he used o. Yes, but he didn't any longer. That was opportunity umber one. It was used gently. Similar opportunities were not infrequent for one who was on the watch for them. Analogies in her own life, analogies of the moment were ound, too—situations that had no apparent relationship with Arthur's father. And thus the ground was laid over many months for the boy's understanding of the possibility f the termination of friendship, of love, of affection.

Just prior to his father's arrival in Paris Arthur was rought face to face with a similar situation in his parents' ves, and therefore in his own life. His first reaction was iolent and painful. Mother must not stop loving father. He would tell father when he came that he must go on oving mother. She was patient; she calmly worked out the whole situation with him in terms that he could underand. When his father arrived Arthur whispered to him fter the first embraces: "Daddy, mother told me the secret."

Four and a half years have passed. The parents, though ivorced, cooperate in the rearing of Arthur. Arthur at even is self-reliant, well-poised, beautifully adjusted, devoted to each of his parents, appreciative of their distant though now amicable relationship. He has in his life a sound security that he might never have had were his parents still together, a security that is absent from the lives of many children who live in quarrel-filled, planless, unhappy, but "unbroken" homes.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter's remarks in this column concerning old-school proofreaders in general and his friend George Schumm in particular have brought forth a letter of gentle protest from James M. Lynch of Syracuse. The Drifter prints it here in full, not only because it is interesting, but also because he considers it a perfect example of the best labor-saving device yet designed for columnists. Mr. Lynch's remarks and reminiscences with regard to the "comma-chasers of another day" run as follows:

> My knowledge of proofreading and proofreaders covers some forty-seven years as printer's apprentice and journeyman. I have also had opportunity for wide observation as an officer for many years of the typographical union. I can remember when proofreaders were capable of doing all of the things they are credited with; and almost without exception during the hand-set days they were journeymen printers of long experience. They were members of the typographical union, it is true, but were not at that time required to be. Union membership was with them a matter of pride and sentiment. Proofreading was not in high regard with employers even in those days of required ability, and the union took over jurisdiction so that for these highly qualified men and women there might be established conditions at least as good as those in the composing rooms.
> In the hand-set days and for some years after machinery was introduced into composing rooms, the printer and the operator were required to know how to set type and correct the errors that so often appeared in the copy coming from the editorial rooms. They had to know names of places no matter how remotely located; they had to have literary knowledge; above all, they had to be familiar with local names both as to initials and spelling, and with the business and social life of the community in which they worked. They were informed as to nations, their rulers, and their statesmen, and they had a store of knowledge gathered by reason of their trade that would astonish the sages of today. So the printer was able and was expected to correct error as he set type. If he missed—and being human he often did—then the proofreader finished the job. The result was as perfect a piece of work as could be expected from a production that had to take into consideration the element of time. . . .
> The conquering machine put an end to this nicety in the setting of type, and the great god Production took its place. Today the rule is quantity and not quality. If type will pass muster, that is all that is required—providing the workman sets enough of that kind of type. The newspapers that still require quality, and they may be counted on less than three fingers, stand out to the discriminating reader as oases in a great desert of sloppy and crude typography.
> And it is all so unnecessary. When it is required by a publisher, the printers of today, who manipulate keyboards instead of movable type, can still do creditable work, approximating that which the Drifter mourns as having passed. Yes, and the quantity would not be seriously diminished. But what may be expected under the rule of production and still more production, with errors seldom marked and as seldom corrected if the forms are gaping for the type? The printer knows this. He sets type accordingly. Most emphatically, it is not a question of unionism. Just as surely is it a question of speed and quantity.

I join with all the nice things the Drifter had to say about George Schumm and his kind. I have not the pleasure of his acquaintance, but in my time I have known many of his type, printers who were editors and could fill any position to which they might be called. These nice things might have been said about Schumm, however, without at the same time placing blame on the typographical union for a sin which it did not commit and which, equally with the Drifter, it deplores.

* * * * *

THE scourge of the machine, and of its twin offspring, speed and quantity, has fallen upon the printer as upon all artisans. To the man who works with his hands, that work is first of all his own. As such, it holds the possibility of satisfaction with the thing done that may be rare but is also deep. Pride in workmanship is inevitable. For the most part, the man who runs a machine literally has no hand in what he is doing. It is not surprising therefore if his attitude toward his job is that of a bystander; but it is none the less unfortunate, both for the workman and for the world at large.

Yes Indeed!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Although I have been a Nation reader intermittently for about fifteen years, I continue to have the same reaction to it. Your anemic nagging can only appeal to infantile intellectuals. Your malignant complacency does not hew a "sharp-shooting line." The only value in your paper is in what it may or might be. I would suggest that you place on your staff a few healthy people.

Are you going to publish this in your readers' column?

National-Gallery Heroes

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On a recent trip to Washington I paid a visit to the new National Gallery, which I had been anxious to see. It is a wonderfully imposing structure, as fine as anything I have seen in Europe. An attendant with an excellent Dublin brogue checked my umbrella and I proceeded to enjoy myself.

The lighting system, the great columns, the splendid floor, all appealed to me. Then I began to look at the exhibits: a bust of Mrs. Coolidge, one of Mrs. Longworth, one of Charles Curtis, the Vice-President—all these right at the entrance, followed by a bust of Sam Gompers, one of Abraham Cahan, editor of the (once upon a time) radical Jewish daily, and a big assortment of generals and miscellaneous heroes of the World War, including Foch, Wilson, Clemenceau, Smedley Butler, Pershing, and many others. The remainder of the first floor was taken up with an exhibit of exact duplicates of the homes of the rich of the District of Columbia and its environs, all nicely arranged and perfectly lighted.

By this time I was so exhausted that I could not make my way to the next floor. Reclaiming my umbrella, I made my way out into the slush and rain for a breath of fresh air—and a little mental relief.

Hard Times

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have discontinued my subscription to The Nation because this wonderful Coolidge-Hoover prosperity hasn't reached Maine yet. Times are not only hard, they are alarming. I haven't the money for a year's subscription or a month's even, and I won't have it right away.

The Nation expresses my own outlook upon world conditions and I'd like to subscribe, but I need $1,000 right now to put my farm on its feet and I haven't got 100 cents.

Southern Chivalry

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There are many progressive women in Virginia who would appreciate your assistance in their seemingly endless struggle against the old order in the South.

As a youngster I was forever gazing at petitions posted in public places pleading for women's right to admittance to the sacred precincts of the State University of Virginia. On February 25 the House of Delegates at Richmond committed itself to the establishment of a college for women at some place in Virginia—not less than thirty miles from Charlottesville!

I recommend to The Nation a study of Southern chivalry in action.

Let Artists Live

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When is an etching not an etching? If we are to believe what the signs in the windows of some of our colossal chain drug-stores tell us, one dollar entitles you not only to an etching but to the frame as well. With the drug-stores thus taking over the care of our aesthetic needs, the private art galleries may just as well shut up business. Artists will have to go without the herrings and crackers that have been their only sustenance.

The pictures labeled "etchings" are, of course, not real etchings but mechanically reproduced facsimiles of etchings, turned out in lots of hundreds of thousands. These reproductions actually cost the producer only a fraction of a cent apiece. A genuine etching is a hand-made proof, done directly from the artist's original plate. The artist's signature on the proof signifies that the proof was made by himself, or under his supervision. The artist may spend weeks to complete the drawing on the plate; the pulling of the proof, too, is a lengthy and skilful job; and the plate wears out after about 75 or 100 proofs have been made from it.

Back-Cover Hyperbole

Sir: The back cover of The Nation for February 26 consists of a full-page advertisement promising that those who will do themselves the favor of purchasing Clement Wood's "The Outline of Man's Knowledge" will thereby equip themselves with the Whole Story of Philosophy, the Whole Story of Science [sic!], the Whole Story of Art, and the Whole Story of History. Nothing less, nothing more—and all for the miserly sum of $5.50.

The Nation is one of the outstanding periodicals that fight against misrepresentation in economic affairs no less than in public matters. You are in full agreement, are you not, with Messrs. Chase and Schling in their volume, "Your Money's Worth"? How is it then that The Nation can carry an advertisement so grossly hyperbolic in its claims?

Watch the R.O.T.C.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The attention and publicity now being given to the London naval conference are all to the good, but the stellar nature of this attraction should not blind us to what is happening at home. Navies are not the only stumbling blocks to peace. May we call your attention to the following:

1. Congress is granting an increase in the army budget. This increase includes the largest sum ever appropriated in this country for subsidizing military training in schools and colleges.

2. The navy rides the high seas and is a cause of fear and suspicion to our neighbors. Army officers are going into our own back yards to play with and teach our children. Let me quote from the official citizenship-training manual now in use (Section 152, headed Destructive Idealism): "An impractical and destructive idealism called internationalism is being propagated by certain foreign agitators and is being echoed and reechoed by many of the nation's 'intellectuals.'"

3. A national organization of "prominent military and civic leaders" has been formed—called the Reserve Officers' Training Corps Association—"to promote and foster the R.O.T.C. in educational institutions." Major General Amos A. Fries, of spider-web-chart fame, is the president, and Lieutenant Colonel Orville Johnson, former secretary of the Reserve Officers' Association, is the executive secretary. This group will have the active cooperation of the Reserve Officers' Association, which sends its monthly magazine free to all college students working for commissions. The R.O.A. last spring announced a gift of $30,000 to be devoted to the R.O.T.C. in schools and colleges. When you remember that there are approximately 115,000 commissioned officers in the Reserve and that most of them are leaders in civil life, you can realize the potential political power of this group for the military viewpoint.

The campaign against militarism must be supported with every resource of the peace-minded if we are to prevent the growth of a powerful military-minded force in our public schools, colleges, and universities. To support this campaign during 1930, the Committee on Militarism in Education needs the gifts of as many Nation readers as feel moved to contribute. Checks may be sent to the committee at 387 Bible House, Astor Place, New York.

The Reparations Referendum

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It is highly regrettable that such a splendid and useful weekly as The Nation is apparently unable to secure any intelligent interpretation of events and of the general situation in Germany, or even any correct reporting of facts. A glaring proof of ignorant reporting is the article by A. H. Feller in the issue of December 4 concerning the reparations referendum.

Your readers are told that "the combined parties of the Right had polled 7,000,000 votes at the last election." They polled less than 6,290,000. Your readers are told that the Supreme Court decided that the action of Prussia forbidding state officials to inscribe their names for the referendum "was legal." The Supreme Court merely refused to issue an injunction, holding that to do so would be to prejudge the case—a rather striking comment, by the way, on German mentality. And the court has now held that the action of Prussia was a violation of the Weimar constitution.

Your readers are told that President von Hindenburg issued a statement denying that he was in favor of the initiative. They are not told that he issued another statement declaring his complete neutrality and amounting to a rebuke to the opponents of the referendum. That Mr. Feller, after reporting that the Prussian government forbade state officials to sign the demand for the referendum, could then venture to speak of "reactionary landlords" driving voters to the polls is hardly less than amazing. The number of state officials who were intimidated by the illegal action of the government—an action that was so obviously a crass violation of the constitution that it is difficult to understand how it could have been earnestly defended at the hearing before the Supreme Court—was far greater than the number of "reactionary landlords." That this was so has been shown by the fact that the vote cast for the Hugenberg bill in the referendum proper exceeded the number of petitioners for the referendum by 38 per cent. It would undoubtedly have been much higher but for the fact that the Socialists and Communists had watchers at the polls who recorded, often with the aid of the election officials, the names of all voters who appeared.

The referendum was an absurd and futile action. Its success would have been most damaging for Germany. But it is silly to attempt to minimize the strength of the elements that were behind it.

The Real Issue

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: An editorial in the Wall Street Journal for February 26, headed The Utility Issue, states that this issue is "non-partisan, but political"; that "the real issue is . . . between those who would keep government out of business and require the users of a service to pay for it, and those who yearn to give something away and conceal its cost in taxation."

Assuming that the government represents the whole people (which it is supposed to do) and that the users are the whole people (which they undoubtedly are) we might translate this "real issue" as follows: The real issue is between those who would keep a few individuals in possession of the public utilities and require the whole people to pay handsomely for their use, and those who yearn to see the whole people own the public utilities and use them at cost.

Not Yet a Word

By EDWIN SEAVER

Not a word, not yet a word, a whisper heard among the crisp dead leaves a tree still clung to, or impact of feathered flake on flake, snow filtering through quiet.

Already the idea stirs in the loam, the seeds turn in their dawnsleep hearing or dreaming they hear down dark unfolding corridors the first song seeking the first bird's throat.

Under the loosened girdle of silence the curled buds quiver, the lean sap mounting the eager limbs gives ear to the muffled pulsebeat in the womb:
the whirr of dynamos, the rush of wings.

The Gods Damned

Treatise on the Gods. By H. L. Mencken. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THIS treatise will do much to restore the recently wavering reputation of its author. It easily stands among the best of his books, and seems to me likely, indeed, to survive longer than any of the others. It is vastly better, for example, than "Notes on Democracy," if only because there is more solid industry behind it. It is a work of genuine scholarship, admirably organized, and for the most part surprisingly sober in tone.

The volume is divided into five chapters or sections. The first discusses the nature and origin of religion. The single function of religion, Mr. Mencken believes, "is to give man access to the powers which seem to control his destiny," while "its single purpose is to induce those powers to be friendly to him." Hence arise the priests who claim to have special gifts in this direction; the hall-mark of a priest to this day is that "he has a god working for him." Religion is supported primarily by the emotion of fear: "Always, in time of bloodshed, pestilence, and poverty, there is what theologians call a great spiritual awakening. But when peace and plenty caress the land the priest has a hard time keeping his flock at prayer, and great numbers desert him altogether, as they desert his colleagues in cheer and comfort, the poet, the publican, and the political reformer." Mr. Mencken's verdict upon immortality is that it is only a sort of wish neurose: "It is grounded, not upon objective evidence, but upon a despairing, colicky feeling that this world we live in is hopeless, and that there must be another beyond to correct its intolerable injustices."

He passes next to the evolution of religion—its passage from primitive animism and unorganized polytheism to monotheism, or at least to a hierarchy presided over by one great deity, usually the sun-god. This section discusses also the growth of the priests as a class, and their constant reaching out for power, secular as well as spiritual, so that "the history of civilization is largely a history of the long effort to shake them off."

Section III is a highly fascinating discussion of the varieties of religion, with elaborate descriptions of comparative ritual, sacrifices, and theological notions—the origin of incense, rosaries, sacraments, and blood sacrifice, from its mildest forms up to those of the Aztecs who killed 70,000 victims at a stroke. We pass on to the habits and morals of various gods, and to the innumerable Hells, particularly the complicated tortures developed by the lush imaginations of the early Buddhists.

Then we are prepared to consider religion in its Christian form. Mr. Mencken here examines the origin and history first of the New Testament and then of the Old, and reveals as remarkable a knowledge of the higher Biblical criticism as he does of comparative religion. But it seems to me that his reasoning in this chapter wabbles considerably. He first accepts the New Testament as "an historical document of very tolerable authority." He then rejects the divinity of Jesus, and even the notion that Jesus ever claimed divinity. He rejects the Virgin Birth, the dogma of the Trinity—"a dogma of which Jesus Himself was as completely unaware as He was of the nine symphonies of Beethoven"—the star of Bethlehem, the coming of the Magi, the miracles, and so on. Finally, as a sort of compensation, and as a way of explaining the colossal importance that the life and death of Jesus later took on in the world, he accepts the Resurrection as probably factual, and seeks to account rationally for it by supposing that Jesus was mistakenly put in the sepulcher before He was truly dead, and that "He Himself, when he came to his senses in the sepulcher, believed He was coming back from death."

This last supposition strikes me as highly implausible. Mr. Mencken confronts the dilemma of all modernists who seek a naturalistic interpretation of the New Testament: they find themselves forced to reject a great deal, but their acceptances and rejections are, in the end, pretty arbitrary. They are merely guessing, and Mr. Mencken's guesses are no more weighty or definitive than those of scores of his predecessors.

The final chapter is devoted to the state of Christianity today. Here the author directs his fire against "the effort of certain alarmed and conciliatory scientists to prove that exact knowledge and theological dogma are not actually at odds." "The only real way," he holds, "to reconcile science and religion is to set up something that is not science and something that is not religion." The Millikans, Eddingtons, and their like "reconcile science and religion by the sorry device of admitting, however cautiously, that the latter is somehow superior to the former, and is thus entitled to all territories that remain unoccupied." Meanwhile the theologians, on their side, yield nothing. On the contrary, they boldly claim "that what no one knows is their special province, that ignorance is a superior kind of knowledge, that their most preposterous guess must hold good until it is disproved." Mr. Mencken, I need hardly add, waves all these claims aside contemptuously. He closes by describing the credo of the "truly civilized man": "If he has not proved positively that religion is not true, then he has certainly proved that it is not necessary."

As the reader may have guessed, there are no subtleties in the book, and few ideas that are brilliantly new; but it is full of a wide and curious learning, it is admirably put together, and its eloquence and pungency never flag. I have myself often engaged in pointing out what I believe to be Mr. Mencken's faults and limitations, but in recent criticism those limitations have been absurdly overstressed, and now that even sophomores are beginning to dismiss him in a lofty and condescending manner, and to flatter themselves that his chief function was merely to clear the way for their own august works to come, it is worth while to remind ourselves of his great gifts and his special contribution. He has been the most influential American critic of his generation, and this eminence has surely not been undeserved. He has set fire to more stuffed shirts and established the reputations of more men of solid talent than any of his contemporaries. There is no other living American writer who remotely approaches him in gusto and in Rabelaisian lustiness. When he has at his adversaries, when he pummels and mauls them, it is not through vindictiveness but through love of exercise. If there is one authentic and original prose style in America today, if there is one style whose every sentence bears the personal stamp of its maker, it is Mencken's. In contemporary English prose only Shaw's can equal it for energy. These are almost platitudes, but they bear repeating here. The man is worth, in brief, whole battalions of Irving Babbitts, and when the present epidemic of Humanism has run its course that fact, I make bold to believe, will be recognized once more.

HENRY HAZLITT

The Mind of Emily Dickinson

Emily Dickinson: The Human Background of Her Poetry. By Josephine Pollitt. Harper and Brothers. $4.

Life and Letters of Emily Dickinson. Edited by Martha Dickinson Bianchi. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

THE proprietary attitude of Mrs. Martha Dickinson Bianchi toward Emily Dickinson and her poems has been both objectionable and unwise. In particular, her reticence regarding Emily's lover and her careful drawing of attention to that reticence have been a little stupid. Even if Mrs. Bianchi could not realize that the poet belongs to the world and not to her family, she might have been shrewd enough to foresee that someone would come along and ferret out her treasured secret. Now that has happened. Josephine Pollitt, with not too much difficulty, has identified the "stranger preaching in Philadelphia" as the Rev. Charles Wadsworth. Can Mrs. Bianchi seriously believe that anyone is the worse off because the world knows?

But Miss Pollitt has gone farther. Mrs. Bianchi indicates that her own identification of Emily's lover is an inference; any authentic version of the affair died with Sister Sue, Mrs. Bianchi's mother. Miss Pollitt thinks the guess was a bad one. Emily, on that trip to Washington and Philadelphia, met not only the Rev. Mr. Wadsworth but also the husband of her girlhood friend, Helen Fiske, become Helen Hunt. Lieutenant Hunt was, Miss Pollitt avers, the tutor who "was not contented I be his scholar, so he left the land."

Miss Pollitt's first clue was an unpublished letter from Colonel Higginson to his wife written in 1870, after his visit to Emily. "Major Hunt," he wrote, "interested her more than any man she ever saw." Who, Miss Pollitt asked herself, was Major Hunt? She found what she could about him, and her investigation convinced her that he fitted the outline provided by family tradition far better than Dr. Wadsworth. The steps of this investigation there is not space to follow. She has, it is sufficient to say, gathered a mass of details which taken separately are open to question, but which taken together make a not unimpressive showing. As Miss Pollitt admits, she has probably failed to discover all the truth; but she has made a good beginning, and it will be surprising if her findings do not lead, in due season, to the revelation of the complete story.

In any case, the value of Miss Pollitt's book should not be regarded as resting solely on her detective work. Far more important is her study of the intellectual influences that touched the young poet. Mrs. Bianchi's "Life and Letters," first published in 1924 and now in its sixth printing, reflects for us the Dickinson family, the habits of the Amherst community, and the routine events of Emily's days. No one, however, can doubt that somehow Emily bathed in more sparkling waters than moved in the currents of Dickinson life. No discussion of "influences" will ever explain Emily Dickinson, but it is foolish to suppose that her intellectual and spiritual being was Melchizedekian.

The first person to stir Emily's mind was her tutor, Leonard Humphrey, and Miss Pollitt has sought with diligence and ingenuity to reconstruct that long-forgotten personality. Then came the trip southward and meetings with Dr. Wadsworth and Lieutenant Hunt. Miss Pollitt has exhumed and examined the writings of these men, and we see what each might have given to an eager pupil. Finally, and fortunately at a time when Emily's mind was too fully developed to be seriously damaged, came the friendship with Colonel Higginson. Here, if Miss Pollitt has done nothing else, she has made us understand how Emily could so deeply have admired that pallid Victorian.

Each devoted reader of Emily Dickinson's poems has his own conception of the mind in which those poems originated. Miss Pollitt offers no substitute for that conception, but she does provide for it a useful framework of fact. Her biography is not an altogether polished piece of work. The results of her ingenious research are not always held together in an organic fashion, and at times she introduces material the relevance of which is not apparent. Her style is sometimes rough; for one thing her use of colloquialisms is questionable, and she speaks of "Reverend Dwight," and, God forgive her, "the Reverend Parsons, Jr."

There is one thing Miss Pollitt has not done that I hope someone will sometime take occasion to do: she has not paid special tribute to Lavinia Dickinson. In the subtitle of "Further Poems"—"Withheld from Publication by Her Sister Lavinia"—Lavinia appears in the role of villain. In Mrs. Bianchi's biography she not only plays Martha to Emily's Mary, but is also subordinated to the ubiquitous Sister Sue. In Miss Pollitt's book her presence is but vaguely felt. And yet, as Mrs. Todd's recent article in Harper's makes clear, we owe our possession of Emily's poems more to Lavinia than to any other single person. She insisted on publication, she enlisted Mrs. Todd's assistance, she overcame Colonel Higginson's hesitation, and she was right in every dispute with that immaculate arbiter litterarum. Even if blind loyalty was the moving force one would admire her, but I suspect that Lavinia was not wholly unconscious of the importance of what she was doing.

Six More War Novels

Retreat: A Novel of 1918. By C. R. Benstead. The Century Company. $2.50.

Gray Dawn—Red Night. By James Lansdale Hodson. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Loretto: Sketches of a German War Volunteer. By Max Heinz. Horace Liveright. $2.50.

Ten Thousand Shall Fall. By David King. Duffield and Company. $2.50.

Return of the Brute. By Liam O'Flaherty. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

Down in Flames. By Ben Ray Redman. Brewer and Warren. $2.

BY this time it is perhaps only right that we should expect a little less war and a little more novel among the ingredients that make up our war novels. At any rate, that is what we are beginning to get; we find here two war novels in which the war experience itself is secondary. "Retreat" by C. R. Benstead and "Grey Dawn—Red Night" by James Lansdale Hodson are both English books and belong more or less in the regular tradition of the English novel. In the first the war provides a continuous and often obtrusive background for a psychological drama; in the second it enters only as a part of the chief character's life story.

In "Retreat" we find a realistic picture of one of Professor Irving Babbitt's "Rousseauist" types—in this case, a coward who sees himself as a potential savior of the world, a simon-pure example of a fanatical religious reformer. He is an Anglican priest who goes to the front with perfect confidence that he can save the entire British army, and perhaps win the war in the bargain. When he finds not only that he cannot save the army, but that he cannot save himself and is considered perfectly useless, the result is considerable pain, ending in madness.

Psychologically the story stands foursquare; it is written with a fine penetration, an emotional honesty, and an insight that are most unusual. It is marred by the inclusion of too many war scenes, but the main story is hard and clear. It is free of any compromise with ordinary conceptions of religion or of the priest; in short, it is an exceptionally good, readable English novel.

If in "Retreat" we have Professor Babbitt's "Rousseauist" treated realistically, in "Gray Dawn—Red Night" we have a "Rousseauist's" picture of himself in action. This is the story of a journalist's life, love, and death—a life in which circumstances just shape themselves so that he begins to "write," a love which is at once speechless and dispassionate, and a death which is quite without significance further than the fact that it is purely accidental. The story is remarkable in that Hardcastle never knows why he volunteered, in that he thinks of Stella in terms of clothes rather than of character or personality or sex, and in that, when he says goodby to her, he feels —as always—that "this was the greatest, the most dramatic moment in his career, and it was slipping past him." A great deal slips past Hardcastle, so that the novel makes not easy but positively fluent reading.

Next we have two war books which are not war novels in any sense, but simply war records—"Loretto" by Max Heinz and "Ten Thousand Shall Fall" by David King (the latter was originally published as "L. M. 8046," of which this is a reissue). Of the German book, the impression that remains with me, as in the case of Jünger's "Storm of Steel," is one of a great deal of violence and bloodshed described very vividly for no apparent reason. A purpose, indeed, is indicated—on the last page the author is threatened by a mob of revolutionaries and remarks: "So this is the gratitude of my native country." But that seems scarcely enough to justify 316 pages of closely packed horrors, particularly when the author is a graduate of several universities and a frightful snob in the bargain.

David King's book, on the other hand, remains one of the most readable factual accounts we have had of war experiences. A purely personal record, written by a Harvard boy in the Foreign Legion (a friend, incidentally, of Alan Seeger), it is vivid, racy, quite sufficiently realistic in its "action scenes," and full of sometimes bitter humor. It is evidently the work of a "natural" writer, or at least of one without any special literary aims or pretensions; but like Cummings's "The Enormous Room," which it distantly resembles, it makes good use of American slang, which we miss in English books and translations.

The first two books on our list were war books that tended at least in part to become pure fiction; the last two are books of fiction that use the war, somewhat incidentally, for locale and material. O'Flaherty's "Return of the Brute" is half a turgid psychoanalytical probing into the instincts and images released by war, half a brilliant account of the psychological factors that lead to nine men's annihilation. The genius of the writer is nowhere more evident than in this story of growing madness and death, but it is a capricious genius, at home only in the dark caves of passion, and the result is here, as in much of O'Flaherty's work, decidedly uneven.

Most of the stories in Ben Ray Redman's "Down in Flames" can be classed immediately with those printed in our popular magazines. The fact that they concern aviators and aviation gives them a journalistic value. A quick start, a sudden twist, a surprise ending—they follow all the tried-and-true regulations of handbooks in composition. "Aftermath" has real irony, and "The Sausage" a relentless line. It is undeniable that the descriptions of flights and fights in the air are extremely graphic and exciting.

CLINTON SIMPSON

Christian Science Examined

Our New Religion: An Examination of Christian Science. By H. A. L. Fisher. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

CHRISTIAN Science, like Ibsen's Boyg, can always escape mere sword thrusts, for the reason that it is so uncontained, so shifting and shifty, so unconfined where it should be limited, and yet quite precise in matters which can be intelligibly discussed only in terms of intuition. All of this is of course explained by the philosophy on which this religion is formed. For it must always be remembered that the basis of Christian Science is the denial of the usual standards of truth. For the average man truth must be arrived at by a comparison of the idea with objective reality. Christian Science, denying objective reality, wipes away all standards by which truth may be ascertained. Truth becomes, for each individual, a matter of wish fulfilment.

This explains, of course, a great deal about Mrs. Eddy and her church members alike. Their words are never to be taken as meaning what the same words would mean in your mouth or mine. Hence, few persons of scholarship have had the courage to penetrate into the voids of Christian Science to discover what really lies there. The explorer will be overwhelmed by the great Boyg, which, if he gets out again into the open, will follow him in the form of penumbrous tentacles which take the shape of publication committees seeking constantly to enmesh and smother him.

That Mark Twain survived the experience in his "Christian Science" may be explained by the fact that his sharp sword thrusts were in the end so ineffective. He was not a scholar; his was not a particularly analytical mind; he never became really entangled because he hardly penetrated. That no scholar of real eminence has previously ever undertaken the combat may be explained by the general conviction among informed people that Christian Science is so unimportant as a movement that there is no reward adequate to compensate for the slime one must always be overwhelmed by in any real exploration into its depths.

A glimmering of understanding on such matters is needed properly to estimate the value of H. A. L. Fisher's critical treatise, "Our New Religion," which is the first attempt by a scholar of note to appraise this American phenomenon. Dr. Fisher, who is warden of New College, Oxford, and president of the British Academy, is hardly to be blamed if some of the Boyg escapes in his attempts to nail it down; his achievement lies primarily in the fact that he has risked his scholarly standing to dare. If his book, which was published last year in England and was recently also reprinted as a serial in the London Daily Dispatch, manages to attain a general circulation in this country, the achievement will be particularly gratifying. It will not only be a sure sign that the Messrs. Scribner have managed to chop off a good many of the tentacles weaving out from Boston, so that future explorers can have a freer path; it will also act as encouragement to other minds trained for such a survey to join in the task.

To simplify his work Dr. Fisher divides his subject into

MOUNTAIN CITY

BY UPTON SINCLAIR

Mountain City is a swift and gripping tale of an impoverished youth's determination to annihilate the great obstacles which stand in his way to an ultimate and magnificent success. His methods are sometimes ingenuous, often cruel—and invariably they attain their questionable ends. The novel is devastating in its implications; it is an indictment of the 'go-getter' which will win many readers.

ALBERT & CHARLES BONI, 66 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

three parts—The Prophetess, The Creed, The Church. To the prophetess he grants no more than have her other informed biographers; for him she remains a neurotic, sentimental, inhibited woman with a driving ego, who succeeded in extending her sphere of personal influence beyond her immediate family largely because of the current mood of the American people themselves. Typically English in his viewpoint, Dr. Fisher is always inclined to explain Christian Science by national ignorance in a land where "no belief is too wild, too crude, or too fantastic to prevent its acceptance by some section or other of the vast, miscellaneous, and mobile population." For him Mrs. Eddy succeeded, despite the fact that she was "entirely unchastened by converse with the intellectual world," largely because:

> In the leadership of a religious movement sentiment counts for much, and Mary Baker's commonplace but genuine vein of gushing sentiment about the ocean and the sunset and the cuckoo was of the exact quality to commend her message to that simple audience. . . .

The gullibility of the audience, its suggestibility, and the fact that Mrs. Eddy's limitations before this audience became real virtues, for him explain the woman's rise to eminence.

For her creed he displays small sympathy. "A theory of the universe which ignores the greater part of the universe is no theory at all. Had Mrs. Eddy contented herself with saying that spiritual life is the ultimate basis of reality, or that all happenings are to the percipient facts of consciousness, she would have stood within the grounds of philosophical sanity; but she went much further." Of "Science and Health" Dr. Fisher declares that "the true nature of the problem of knowledge is not even dimly apprehended." Denying it any single literary virtue, he can accord it only "the tribute which belongs to sheer bulk." "Even by the standards of her own country . . . Mrs. Eddy is generally adjudged to have had a very imperfect command of the English language."

That despite such extraordinary limitations the book brought Mrs. Eddy to fame and fortune, once she established a church to act as its advertising and selling agent, Dr. Fisher considers quite understandable in view of the limitations of the average human mind, and, specifically, of the American mind. He says:

> We are at once prepared to concede the authenticity of a certain proportion of the healings ascribed to the operation of Christian Science. . . . The patient who has paid three dollars for a talisman is predisposed to think he has got value for his purchase. In many cases the talisman will work for no other reason than that it is expected to work. . . . Post hoc, ergo propter hoc. "After reading Mrs. Eddy I am cured, therefore Mrs. Eddy has cured me."

In the end, Dr. Fisher sees a grain of real truth in that part of the doctrine which Mrs. Eddy took over from Quimby, once it is stripped of her errant philosophy and ignorances. "The doctrine of mind-cure, so far from being peculiar to Mrs. Eddy, has always, and in every generation, entered as an element into the wisdom of the wise."

For the church which promotes this creed the author has few kind words. He sees its appeal as being made primarily to neurotics; its audience largely emotionally unstable women, that "vast tribe of female neurasthenics, nowhere so numerous as in the United States." Yet he does not doubt that it will continue to add recruits to that "half illiterate population who constitute the rank and file of the Christian Science church," if only because of the phenomenal material power the church has amassed.

The Christian Science corporation is as little likely to founder as the Standard Oil trust. "It commands vast material resources; it directs influential newspapers . . . has patented a cure for all ills, and advertises its patent by a continuous exhibition of miracles. No corporation, no trust, no Church has gone down into the common mind with wares more attractive or more profusely commended."

Dr. Fisher regards tolerance of the Boston church as a virtue only so long as the organization is an impotent force. Let this church once attain the power of numbers that could be translated into political effect, and the American republic "would in a very short time be a vast cemetery." Without health laws or even drainage systems, impossible if Mrs. Eddy's pronunciamentos were enforced literally; without even the material aspects of civilization such as houses to protect us from cold, the nation would soon founder. Admitting that "a religion can rarely afford to practice all that it preaches," Dr. Fisher would nevertheless hold Christian Science in strict check, and is not in sympathy with its recent success in having certain laws in various States modified to suit its liking. Thus:

> If Christian Scientists are enabled to sustain existence today, it is because they are members of a society which is regulated by principles the opposite of their own. The Christian Scientist, like the inmate of the lunatic asylum, is a social parasite. He can only exist as one of a community which thinks otherwise than he.

If this book can survive to win an American group of readers, this circumstance alone should indicate that the influence and power of the organization, so long successful in preventing adverse criticism, is on the wane, and should be one of the best indications that Dr. Fisher's pessimism is not wholly warranted.

EDWIN FRANDEN DAKIN

Old Man Victory

Clemenceau. By Jean Martet. Longmans, Green and Company. $5.

CLEMENCEAU was a man of hates, and this is a book of the bitter snarlings of a disappointed old man. Clemenceau never forgave France for having refused to elect him president; he never forgave Briand and Poincaré and Millerand for modifying the treaty which he had signed. France, having deserted him, was "like a kind of sponge. You squeeze it and muddy water runs out."

Jean Martet was Clemenceau's secretary during and after the war and saw him frequently to the end. He was one of the two men to whom Clemenceau confided his precious papers, including a bitter retort to Foch. And for the last year of their conversations (1927-28) Martet kept careful records of Clemenceau's monologues, debates, and diatribes, and sometimes questioned him to bring out the stories of his lifetime of battles. This book is the product of those records. It contributes little that is new to history, but it gives an intensely vivid picture of the lonely old man. It is Clemenceau, and whatever Clemenceau was, he was seldom dull.

"Jaurès," Clemenceau said to Martet one day, "had none of the qualities which bestow the true love of humanity on a man—neither the smile, nor the tolerance, nor self-doubt, nor skepticism—nothing." By his own tests Clemenceau ranked low. A smile he had, but it was a wry smile and bitter; not, except when he was thinking of his beloved Greece, or of Claude Monet's painting, a friendly smile. Tolerance he never had; nor self-doubt. "I was very wrong to be eighty years old in 1920," he told Martet. "If I had been twenty years younger they would have thought twice before going on in that way." "They" were Millerand and Briand, who had consented to modifications of his precious, and ferocious, treaty. Another time he was as sure that if he had been the head of the government instead of Poincaré the cost of living would never have gone up. He would have stopped it by taking out a few profiteers and shooting them! Skepticism he did have—skepticism of everybody and everything but himself; but skepticism alone does not make a lover of humanity.

Skepticism, indeed, except for his war-time fanatic faith in France, was the outstanding characteristic of this man who gloried in being called the Tiger. He had no faith in God or man, and could make bitter jests of both. If he had faith in anything in those bitter days after his France had refused to elect him president, it was in the eternal bellicosity of the Germans. That roused him to his bitterest irony. It was in 1927 that he grumbled:

> M. Briand believes in peace, so that's all right. . . . Mark well what I'm telling you: in six months, a year, five years, ten years, when they like, as they like, the Boches will invade us. I don't know if you recently saw in the Journal that extraordinary picture—it represented all the ministers in the park at Rambouillet, at a meeting of the Cabinet, frolicking with a swan. That picture reassured me. We are well defended.

He wanted to go on fighting the war forever.

Though there is much of the story of Clemenceau's equivocal role in the Commune in this book, there is singularly little of his part in the Dreyfus Affair. There is a great deal about his controversies with Foch and Poincaré, little of his difficulties with Woodrow Wilson. Perhaps Clemenceau, in those last years, forgot all but his wars with the Germans, and with a few Frenchmen.

Martet is utterly guiltless of criticism of his chief. He is no Brousson, biting the hand that he had licked. But in his uncritical adoration, setting down all, or almost all, that the old man said, he builds up through haphazard conversations a full-contoured, flesh-and-blood portrait of one of the strangest and most savage, and most powerful, animals of our day.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

Fascism as a Religion

Making Fascists. By Herbert W. Schneider and Shepard B. Clough. University of Chicago Press. $3.

MR. SCHNEIDER, who in "Making the Fascist State" wrote the best book yet published on the development of Fascist ideas and purposes, here writes, with Mr. Clough, the best handbook of the apparatus by which the regime is attempting to mold all Italians into obedient servants. Not of the entire vast apparatus which Mussolini has constructed—for it mentions only incidentally the Fascist regimentation of finance, industry, and trade—but of the educational organs which the present government has taken over or created to serve its purpose. After diagraming succinctly the various group cleavages—economic, regional, racial, and religious—which Fascism is attempting to iron out, the authors outline the multifarious instruments by which it is injecting its doctrine of disciplined nationalism into the schools, the army, the civil service, the press, and, most important of all, its own party organization. With keen insight they point out that Fascism is busy erecting itself into a religion, with a good deal of Roman paganism in its inspiration, which may become a not inconsiderable counterpoise to the new temporal power of the Roman church.

The system here described with academic precision, although by no means without humor, strikes one as astonishingly similar in outline to that of the Bolsheviks in Russia, after which it was unquestionably imitated. With this fundamental difference, however: whereas the Bolsheviks insist on their discipline for the unification of the world of labor, the Fascists insist on theirs for the conquering of other nations. Both systems of political education are at the moment conspicuously successful, and equally regardless of individual rights. The one, however, commits its atrocities in the name of ultimate peace, the other in the name of ultimate war.

HIRAM MOTHERWELL

Closing Hour. By Norah Hoult. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Norah Hoult, whose volume of short stories, "Poor Women," was so favorably received in England last year, has now written a very fine first novel. It is the study of a drunkard, a man of the professional class, and his family, beginning at the point where the family fortunes have practically touched bottom. The clients are gone; the proud, stiff, cold, little English wife is at her wits' end; the puzzled and pathetic children wonder what it is all about; and the once rollicking goodfellow of an Irish husband and father, now far gone in dipsomania, spends most of his few and meager little fees on drinks, cadging for them when his pockets are empty. There is neither beginning nor end to this brilliantly worked-out study. It gets nowhere. But it is very much worth while for the powerful illumination which it throws on the mediocre souls of its characters, as well as for the keen observation which supports its extraordinary descriptions.

The Missing Masterpiece. By Hilaire Belloc. With Forty-one Drawings by G. K. Chesterton. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

The mystery story is only a peg on which Mr. Belloc hangs certain opinions and ideas, but this happens to be a rather good mystery story in itself—an essential element for first-rate satire. Mr. Belloc's satire, however, is not very subtle; indeed, it is extremely broad, not to say ill-tempered. Modern art and artists, art dealers and art experts, the new plutocratic aristocracy in England and America, lawyers and judges and juries, journalism and great journalistic combines, big business generally—all come in for a sound belaboring done with considerable wit but more spleen. Mr. Chesterton, who does this sort of thing even more successfully, has reproduced nearly all of the many characters in drawings which, though quite undistinguished, faithfully reflect the spirit of the book.

His Own People. By Leon W. Rogers. Laidlaw Brothers. $2.

Everyone is said to have one novel in him, the implication being that that one is autobiographical. Mr. Rogers has written his. Paul Wesley Polk is the oldest son of a Methodist preacher in Texas. His father has dedicated him to the Lord's service, but Paul, after a struggle, chooses to become a lawyer, though he loves and reveres his father. The feelings of a normal boy who suffers under the affliction of being a minister's son and the hard life of a circuit rider and his family, saddled with poverty and constantly on the move, are described with a crude effectiveness that makes this story better worth reading than many more carefully written ones.

Alexander Pope as Critic and Humanist. By Austin Warren. Princeton University Press. $3.

Mr. Warren has done Pope the great service of demonstrating that in his critical theories, his literary attitude, and his whole method of thought he was far more liberal, humane, and wise than several recent generations have given him credit for being. The "Essay on Criticism," the scattered remarks on the art of poetry, the notes to the "Homer," as well as to the "Shakespeare," the "Dunciad," and the evidences of Pope's reading both in foreign and in native authors are examined with intelligent care with a view to arriving at an understanding of this much-maligned genius; and the result is worthy of the effort. Pope is usually put down as desiccated, authority-ridden, and mean. He emerges here as an original critic who added to the best counsel he could find among his predecessors in Greece, Rome, France, and England much that was valuable from his own distinguished store of common sense. It now remains for someone to demonstrate in the same manner that Pope's poetry, even more than his prose, was broad and sound as well as sharp and fine. The more enlightened modern critics have been suggesting it; someone yet will say it fully and movingly.

Adventurous America: A Study of Contemporary Life and Thought. By Edwin Mims. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

In this book Professor Mims has set himself the worthy task of counteracting the views of those who despair for America. Among the phenomena which inspire him with hope are Gutzon Borglum's Colossi, the orientation courses for freshmen at Columbia, the election of Robert M. Hutchins as president of the University of Chicago, the directorship of Owen Young in Phi Beta Kappa, the enlightenment of the late Judge Gary, "Julius Rosenwald's success in establishing the mail-order business upon a sounder financial basis," the Anglo-Catholicism of Chauncey B. Tinker, the addition of William McDougall to the faculty of Duke University, the large attendance at the concerts of the Nashville Symphony Orchestra, "the prophetic words of Dr. Fosdick and Dr. Cadman," and the formulation by Robert A. Millikan of "a statement that has done more to clarify the long dispute between religion and science than any other utterance of the day."

The Best Poems of 1929. Edited by Thomas Moult. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

Mr. Moult's annual selection of poems from American and English magazines has for several years been one of the best résumés of published poetry. Again this year the editor has given more room to American poets and thereby indicated the fact that today American poetry is, on the whole, more interesting than English poetry. But the 1929 volume is less impressive than earlier volumes: America is too copiously represented by the late and less worthy work of such poets as Frost, Masters, and Lindsay, and too little represented by moderns; England, too, is unfairly represented by pallid poems from Noyes, Wolfe, Blunden, and others. There is no single poem in the entire book so important as was Hart Crane's Brooklyn Bridge, published last year in the same anthology. Such a selection for 1929 would seem to indicate a slackening in poetic ability, but it must be remembered that Mr. Moult begins where the stupidity of magazine editors in general leaves off.

I Was Sent to Athens. By Henry Morgenthau in Collaboration with French Strother. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $4.

Mr. Morgenthau, unlike Julius Caesar, loves to place emphasis on the "ego" of his exploits, this time as chairman of the League of Nations Commission which aided in the settlement in Greece of the million and a quarter refugees from Asia Minor. He continually thrills with his own important role and the contacts it afforded him with important personages on the European stage. The second part of the book, probably the work of his collaborator, gives a very much more modest and more interesting account of how this epic of refugee colonization was actually carried out. One wishes that this portion of the book had been considerably expanded at the expense of the rather verbose and often prattly section fathered by Mr. Morgenthau.

Films

Color

IT has been frequently maintained that the screen has no need of color, in fact, that the use of color in the motion picture is a step backward from the goal of artistic perfection. On the other hand, in the whole range of problems which have occupied the minds of the film producers during the past twenty years, none has aroused greater interest or has been pursued with greater deliberation than the problem of color. Today the technical goal has been practically reached. Color has been captured for the screen. It is true that the hues reproduced are not always faithful to nature and, what is even more important, are not always pleasant to the eye. But even with these shortcomings, the technicolor, the process that has been the most successful in the field, may be said to have solved the problem within a measurable distance of the ideal. There remains the question: Do we need color in the movies? Does it add anything to their powers of artistic expression? The answer may be profitably sought in some of the recent color pictures, of which "The Vagabond King" (Criterion) and "Song of the West" (Warner Brothers) are the latest on Broadway.

The evidence in this matter supplied by "Song of the West" can be easily disposed of, since it merely demonstrates the fact that bad color does not improve an otherwise bad picture. Indeed, it is very doubtful if any color, no matter how good, could have saved this insipid and poorly acted operetta, which manages to squeeze a modern revue chorus into a story of the days of "the covered wagon." As it is, smudgy color, glaring lights, and feeble composition, relieved only by one or two rather delicate close-ups, contribute neither to the illusion of real life nor to the enhancement of the dramatic or the decorative effect.

To pass from "Song of the West" to "The Vagabond King" is to realize the enormous possibilities which are latent in the use of color. Even if we concede considerable merit to the story, dialogue, and acting in "The Vagabond King" (in spite of the incongruity of the conventions which it borrows from the stage), it is its color that makes this picture so different from others and so vibrant with dramatic sentiment and pictorial loveliness. The romantic fantasy of François Villon's seven-day adventure as the king of France called for an emotional atmosphere that would combine purity and lust, serenity and frenzy. In the picture this is suggested mostly by the play of color. Not only is the quality of color in many single scenes most appealing to the eye, but it also succeeds in charging some of the scenes with a greatly enhanced dramatic significance. The naive enthusiasts who have been denouncing color in favor of black and white as the only "art" form of the movies must be either color-blind or simply ignorant of the art quality that distinguishes one visual sensation from another. There can be no question that color is one of the most important means of cinematic expression. The irony of the situation is that it is derided by those who profess to be concerned with the art of the cinema, while it is brought into practical use and developed by those to whom "art," like hypocrisy, is only a tribute which vice pays to virtue.

So much of the Hollywood output is banal and trivial that any picture showing serious interest in human life is assured of attracting general attention. "Men Without Women," a Fox picture shown at the Roxy and the Film Guild, reveals this commendable concern with real life and does so in a series of tensely dramatic and largely convincing scenes. A picture decidedly worth seeing.

Drama

The Impenitent Shaw

A FEW years ago critics were commenting with glee upon the conversion of Bernard Shaw. His "Saint Joan" not only moved forward in a fashion more conventionally theatrical than it was his wont to permit, but for once the feeling was so much more important than the thought that the play was hailed as the first work in a new manner, and England's oldest bad boy was said to have seen the error of his dramaturgical ways. Once more, however, the critics have been confounded, for "The Apple Cart" (Martin Beck Theater) reveals only an impenitent Shaw, who is writing as he always wrote, and who has learned nothing except how to be more unreservedly himself. Many will maintain that for such an argumentative and actionless play there is no possible justification, but I must confess that it held me delighted to the end, and if I were pressed to explain the fact I should probably insist that I was charmed by something which must be pure art of some kind, for I applauded, not anything which was said, but the suppleness and dexterity of the man who said it.

The scene, as everyone knows by now, is England some fifty years hence, and the theme is the place of the king in a society by that time completely dominated by the Labor Party. Farce occasionally interrupts the argument, and satiric shafts directed at a diversity of objects fly in all directions. Thus, for example, the members of the Cabinet are still British enough to grow sentimental and to show a disposition to sing "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow" when they think that they have the King beaten. Thus, also, the American Ambassador (who comes to announce that the United States is applying for admission into the British Empire) talks distressingly like General Dawes, and claims to be really English in feeling because he was brought up in the shadow of Ely Cathedral—"which, as you will remember, was taken down stone by stone in 1940 and reerected in New Jersey." But despite all this diverting by-play, and despite a highly characteristic interlude in which the King comes to refresh himself with the company of a purely platonic mistress, the play sticks closely to its theme, and reaches its intellectual climax with the scene in which the monarch, the last representative of irresponsible power, sits surrounded by the elected representatives of the people and explains to the assembled republicans why he should not be abolished.

They have (and it is well) won their victory over the selfishness of his ancestors and the power is in their hands; but now that the battle is won it would be wise to look at the other side before the enemy is annihilated, for there are moments when only an irresponsible power can dare to act or to do the things which they themselves would have done. They are the slaves of a public which cannot have their knowledge. They must do only what that public in its ignorance and its instability would have them do. But they are lucky to have in him one who not only wills good but can do it without having to justify himself to others less intelligent or less well meaning. I am, he says, the last person alive who can speak for both the past and the future against the present, the last remaining representative of "the evolutionary appetite against the gluttony of the moment." They, republicans that they are, must be officially his enemies. To denounce him is, of course, a necessary part of the technique by which their position is maintained. But in their hearts they must know that they need him, if only to protect themselves against that public whose creatures they are.

Social Forces in Social Work

The trained social worker regards the individual, family and community he serves as centers of convergence of racial, religious, economic and other social forces which hark back to the past and must be utilized to fashion the future. This view is especially important if the worker's field lies in such a highly distinctive group as the Jews.

College graduates should examine carefully the advantages, both tangible and intangible, of

This speech, marked as it is by a touch of Shavian mysticism, is far from simple. Considered merely as an argument for monarchy it obviously begs the question quite shamelessly, for the simple reason that it assumes that the person who happens to be king will be born with all those excellent qualities of both head and heart which are as rare in royal families as anywhere else; and the whole argument is answered if one substitutes the real George the Fifth for the King Magnus of the play. But Shaw has never given a simple argument for anything whatever, and if he believes now in kings it is only because he cannot believe as unreservedly as he would like in the democracy which he sees triumphing. Under the same circumstances another temperament would be content with skepticism, but Shaw is emotionally a man of faith—and he cannot doubt democracy without seeking to escape from the dilemma of that doubt through the aid of a mystical faith that "the evolutionary appetite" must of necessity find itself somewhere embodied; even though he can find for this representative of the something which transcends mere individual humanity no symbol less shabby than that of royal authority.

"The Apple Cart" is a remarkable play if judged only as a part of contemporary literature, but if the time ever comes when the wit and satire of Shaw's plays are no longer enough by themselves to justify their claim upon the attention of an audience, then I suspect that this play will be found wanting along with the rest, and that its defect will be the same as the defect of the others. In each there comes a moment when the author must transcend in a mystical flight the logic which he has seemed to follow; a moment when, as in the scene described above, a vision and a faith are necessary to supply a link that is not there in the chain of reason; but the enraptured eloquence which would enable him to leave common sense behind never quite breaks free. The thing which he wants most to say is something which no prose, not even his, can communicate, and thus there is always one point in every play where he fails of complete success simply because he is not a poet.

The whole cast of "The Apple Cart" is excellent, and Philip Moeller has given another of those well-nigh perfect productions which we have come to expect after his long experience with Shaw.

Fresh Hope for Haiti

By HELENA HILL WEED

Port au Prince, March 10

(By Cable to THE NATION)

AN agreement has been made between the Hoover Commission, the Opposition—represented by Seymour Pradel, head of the League for Constitutional Action; Antoine Régal, president of the Union Patriotique and federated societies; Justin Sam, president of the League of Youth; Pierre Hudicourt, international lawyer; and Georges Léger, Haitian advocate before the commission—and the supporters and followers of Borno that these societies shall send delegates immediately to a convention in the capital to select a neutral candidate for provisional president, this candidate to be agreed upon by the three groups. The Council of State has agreed to elect this person, knowing that any other candidate will not be recognized by the United States. The provisional president will immediately call for a popular election in the method prescribed by the constitution. The chambers will then resign so that the new assembly can elect a president. The United States is a party to this agreement, since President Hoover has already wired his approval, which the Opposition is free to use politically. The following are the possibilities under this agreement: The new president will dissolve the Council of State. A regular minister will replace General Russell. A new treaty will be negotiated with the constitutional government.

The work of the commission has been superlative. The commissioners themselves have been earnest, intelligent, thorough, unbiased, fearless, determined. By their tact and sympathy they have won the confidence and cooperation of the Opposition. Mr. White is the most influential member of the commission. Haitians urge his appointment as minister to conclude the readjustment and negotiate the new treaty. Kerney and Vezina are next in popular favor for the important part they played in securing the support to the agreement which brought about Borno's capitulation. The agreement is wholly satisfactory. The masses have been overwhelmingly represented before the commission. Public confidence has been restored.

(By Mail)

All Haiti—native and foreign—was in a subdued, uncertain, but tense state of mind as it awaited the arrival of the steamship Rochester bearing the Hoover Commission.

Eight years ago, as the McCormick Committee drew near, the atmosphere was wholly different. Haitians were then divided into three general groups. There was the small group which supported the Occupation—a group which included those who were actively working with the Occupation forces and those who accepted it either because they honestly believed it was established for the welfare of Haiti or because, for personal reasons, they believed it was safer and more comfortable to submit. Another somewhat larger group rebelled from the first against the invading forces and fearless of personal consequences that might result from their opposition, were loudly crying defiance or asking for justice and humanity from their oppressors.

Between these two groups stood the great mass of the Haitian people, as yet unaligned with either side, waiting, hoping, fearing, praying. Except for rare instances no one in the civil or military Occupation could be found who was not openly and arrogantly supporting the Occupation. All Haitians were lumped by them as "niggers," mentally incompetent, physically inefficient, chronically dishonest, and wholly unfit for political or social responsibility.

Today everything is different. All Haiti, except for the office-holders of the Borno group, is solidly aligned against the Occupation and is speaking, in voices not to be misunderstood, though in differing tones, the same language. Immediate withdrawal of the military forces from the soil of the sovereign state of Haiti; immediate restitution of constitutional government, with the free election of a president by the votes of the people—these are the demands of Haiti today. There is no desire to complain to the commission of illegalities of conduct on the part of either civil or military officials, of waste, inefficiency, or nepotism in administration, or even of the brutal and insulting treatment of the Haitian people of all classes, though there is, of course, a mass of evidence on all these points. The day is long past when an amelioration of these grievances would satisfy any Haitian.

To one who saw and felt the spirit of the days of the McCormick investigation the most amazing thing today is the attitude of the foreigners here in civil life, particularly of many American civil and military officials. In private conversations, with the request that they be not quoted personally, many of these officials frankly admit that the whole business is a miserable mistake and a practical failure, a tragedy and an outrage from the human standpoint. There is a widespread and genuine spirit of sorrow and outspoken indignation for the national disaster that has befallen the Haitian people, and this point of view is openly held by many highly placed American men and women of the Occupation.

The sessions of the commission began under a slight cloud. The message of President Hoover had raised great hope in the hearts and minds of the Haitian people; but unfortunately they were misled by it into believing that the commission had executive powers to bring about the ends sought by the President. There was skepticism as to whether the commission would see its way clear to carry out the desire of the President, but of the power of the commission to right their wrongs the Haitians had no doubt. Above all, they felt certain that the commission would have some authority over the presidential elections scheduled to take place during the commission's visit to the island.

When, therefore, the commission announced on their arrival that they had only the power of recommendation and that their report would not be made and acted upon for some weeks or even months after their return home, such a wave of bitterness spread over the island that it seemed for a day as if a political tragedy was imminent. Distrust of the commission was greatly increased, moreover, by reason of a brutal display of force by the Garde d'Haïti on the night before the commission arrived, when it had dispersed an absolutely quiet and orderly crowd gathered before the legislative chambers. A more effective exhibition of unfitness for the job of governing a country could scarcely have been planned by the opponents of the military Occupation than that staged on this occasion by the marine officers in ordering the Garde to charge upon and beat up a perfectly orderly crowd. The well-grounded fear of a coup d'etat and the immediate installation of a new president for six more years, before the commission could establish plans to secure a constitutional election by an elected legislature, had brought large crowds to the vicinity of the legislative chambers. There was absolutely no disorder. They were merely waiting to see if the Council of State was going to convene. There is no doubt that trouble would have occurred if an attempt had been made to hold a presidential election, for Haiti is in no mood to accept a continuation of her subjugation. But there was no need for a charge on the crowd even when it reached the number of around 3,000. It was not compact, it was not blocking traffic in the great Champs de Mars. The people were walking about, waiting, when suddenly the Garde appeared, led by marine officers, and without even giving an order to disperse or to clear the streets and park, began to beat the heads of men and women alike with their cocomacaque sticks, inflicting deep cuts and terrible bruises. About forty Haitians are known to have received medical treatment, and no one knows how many more fled to their homes for treatment there.

It was inevitable that the Haitians should feel that such a display of brute force on the eve of the arrival of the commission would not have been ordered if the Occupation had not felt sure of support from the commission, and this fact made it doubly difficult for the commission to secure the confidence and cooperation of the Haitians for its work. Early morning conferences on the day after the commission's arrival, and especially the sympathetic understanding of Commissioner William Allen White, served to clear the air of misunderstandings on both sides and opened the way for frank discussions of possible lines of procedure that would obviate a tragic failure at the outset.

This brute force of which I have given an example and which has characterized the whole history of the Occupation is not the crowning stupidity—to use no stronger term—of the fifteen years of blundering in Haiti. The great issue—and it is the issue that pervades every phase of every American intervention—is the racial attitude of every American official in every department of the Occupation. For an American to be seen speaking on friendly terms to a Haitian, unless in a strictly business or official capacity, is to invite ostracism and insult from the lowest to the highest of those who, under the terms of the treaty, are here to "assist" the Haitians. Thus, while French, German, English, and Canadian residents maintain social relations with Haitians of their own degree of culture and education, Americans, from the highest official to the toughest leatherneck, treat all Haitians with the utmost contumely and ridicule.

In view of this racial condescension, an incident which occurred in connection with the arrival of the commissioners is especially amusing and significant. General Russell, in an effort to save his face, invited the elite of Haiti to his residence to meet the members of the commission. The local press carried the replies to his invitation of several distinguished Haitians. I reprint three of them here.

> I am a part of that national community which "has the mentality of a child of seven years," and my country undergoes . . . oppression for which you, and yours, are the responsible agents. > The "nigger" Jacques Roumain does not condescend to associate with whites. JACQUES ROUMAIN

In line with the policy of racial suppression of the Haitians, the civil branches of the Occupation have been practically filled by Americans, with Haitians tolerated only in the lowest grades. There seems to have been not the slightest effort to use capable and trained Haitians in the middle or upper grades. One is reminded forcibly of the warning of Senator Caraway, made years ago in Congress, that if Americans were authorized to serve here at double pay at the expense of the Haitian government, the time would never come when any Haitian would be found "capable of serving." The country is teeming with merry young striplings, "technical experts," who are receiving double and treble the amount their qualifications would ever bring them at home, while the real work is being done by underpaid Haitians. There is the established fact that an American official had an apartment made from storage quarters in a Haitian government building, at the expense of Haiti, and is today occupying it without paying any rent, in violation of the laws we ourselves have made for Haiti. It is said that there are many such cases, and that they are all known to the authorities.

It is known facts like these which have brought the situation to the breaking-point—and no one who has eyes to see and ears to hear will challenge the fact that the breaking-point has now been reached. The Haitians have abandoned any hope of carrying out the purposes of the treaty which we imposed on them by force. They realize that it is a policy of economic and financial domination in the interest of the United States and its nationals.

Yet the will to cooperate peacefully still exists here. And now that the first misunderstandings are cleared away the power of the commission to undo the great wrongs of the past years is complete. While all the members of the commission are liked and trusted it is unquestionably true that the sympathetic understanding and great-heartedness of Commissioners White and Vezina have done more in the few days they have been here than could be expressed in words. They have won the hearts and minds of the people. On every side one hears it said: "If Commissioner White could only be sent here to replace General Russell and guide the work, we would be patient and hopeful, for he has shown us that he understands us and that he has the true spirit of honest cooperation in our national interests. Already we love and trust him, and we would work faithfully with him. He has found our soul."

A nature so passionate and a gift for expression so striking could hardly fail to exert some influence upon contemporary fiction-writing, but because of the idiosyncrasies of his interests and of his temperament that influence was more general than specific. He encouraged frankness, he helped popularize the use of psychoanalysis in fiction, and even more conspicuously still he was in part responsible for the free discussion of the sexual problems of characters; yet it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that he was more concerned with using the novel for his own purposes than with developing it as a definite art form and that by his example he thus contributed to the forces which were disintegrating it. Each of his novels was less a novel than a treatment of some new aspect of his personal problem and an addition to the record of his perpetually unsuccessful struggle to make peace either with life or with the wildly discordant desires of his own stormy nature.

In an interview given recently to a correspondent of the Evening Post Lawrence said: "I consider 'Sons and Lovers' to have been the best novel of my first phase, 'Women in Love' the best of my second phase, and 'Lady Chatterly's Lover' the best to date, because in each case the vision embodied in the book seems complete for that world into which it is set." There is, to be sure, an obvious reality about this division, for the second of the works mentioned gives free rein to the forces which disintegrated the form of the first, while the third represents an effort to achieve again a simple and unified pattern. Yet it is difficult to think of Lawrence as working through any orderly course of development toward any settled method. One never knew what to expect next and for him the composition of a book seemed always to be some kind of explosion. Periodically he erupted into verse or prose and always, so it seemed to an outsider, at the moment when the internal pressure of his feelings reached a point which made a release of some kind inevitable.

Personally he was said to be shy and very gentle in his manner despite the violence with which upon occasion he would break out. Certainly he wrote less like a man who was savage by nature than like one suffering continually from some frustration so agonizing as to make it impossible to bear with equanimity the additional irritation occasioned by even the most ordinary of human stupidities. Yet it cannot be said that he ever defined very clearly the exact nature of that frustration, for it is primarily the effects of it, the disgust with life as it is lived, and the occasionally passionate mystical utterances concerning the "dark," anarchical God who is to liberate us which he so vividly describes.

Sex was, of course, the most obvious of his perplexities and the one of which he spoke with the greatest clarity, persistently analyzing not only the complexities of its normal manifestations but devoting much space in book after book to the picture of this or that perversion of the normal instincts. For this reason the temptation is strong to seek in sex the key to his own mystery and to assume that some derangement of the instinct was the source of his own maladjustment to life. Yet it is not quite certain that one can escape from the challenge of his pessimism quite so easily or that his concern with sex was actually more than a concern with something which was important chiefly because it symbolizes the most plainly irrational aspects of the lust for life which cannot justify its own desires. He dreamed sometimes of frank and pagan love. He spoke sometimes as though he thought that life best which was most completely absorbed in the practice of the sexual act. But his own feelings were distinctly ambivalent and for that reason troublesome.

Lawrence not infrequently seemed to despise his own preoccupation and to center upon creatures in love the whole of his irritation at beings which could not escape from their bondage to desire. Perhaps, then, it was not sex which led him to question the universe but the universe which led him to question sex, for the simple reason that sex presents in a concrete and complicated form much of the problem of the relation of sentient man to the blind forces of nature. And if we take this view of Lawrence's preoccupation it leaves us with no simple or mechanical key to the meaning of his profound and unending quarrel with the conditions of human existence.

Yet this quarrel of his was certainly an idiosyncratic one. Even in the midst of a generation remarkable for the number and variety of its protests he was set apart not only by the extraordinary violence of his dissatisfaction but also by the fact that its nature was enough different from that of his fellows to make it as obviously unsuitable to class him with Aldous Huxley as with social critics like Wells. His emphasis was his own; he had his particular vision of the evil in nature; or, if you prefer, his own private grievance. And it is just a clear or wholly comprehensible description of the exact nature of that grievance which he never gives. One feels that some clue is necessary before one can completely understand him and that that clue, despite the nature and extent of his writing, is never supplied.

Perhaps this fact more than any other will be responsible for his failure if it should happen, as seems not unlikely, that Lawrence's work is finally judged to be extraordinarily interesting rather than absolutely great. Probably no other English writer of his generation equaled him in the sheer talent for writing, but one can seldom forget for long the riddle which his temperament propounds or read many pages of his writing without beginning to speculate, not about the work itself, but about the possible genesis of the mood which inspired it. And when this is true of a novelist it is proof that his novels are not absolutely of the first rank.

Your artist may be with impunity even "queerer" than the ordinary mortal. He may suffer from all sorts of complexes, fixations, and inhibitions. Indeed, if the Freudians are right he cannot very well get along without them, for they supply him with both the need to create and the materials for creation. But art at its most significant certainly detaches itself from the personality of the creator. It contains within itself everything necessary for the comprehension of any particular work, and we do not need to know any more about the character of the writer than the pages of his own work give. Thus, though Dostoevski may have been epileptic and Poe impotent, we can understand the works of both in the sense in which they were intended to be understood without reference to either fact. But in the case of Lawrence it is not quite so. We feel the need to understand him more thoroughly before we can understand the meaning of some of the most passionate of his outbursts, and to say that is to admit a defect in his work. He was a fascinating personality and an extraordinarily vivid writer, but he was not quite a novelist of the first rank.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

> The naval conference is now back where it started two months ago. Private talks are going on but no formal business is being transacted. There was one meeting today, that of a subcommittee formed to decide how to scrap ships, but none of the participants has yet agreed to scrap. This subcommittee had tea and adjourned. . . .

THIS IS THE REPORT from London to the New York World as we go to press. Not unnaturally there broke out on the same day violent protests in the House of Commons. Commander Kenworthy, himself a naval officer of distinction, who has for years been earnestly working for disarmament, spoke right out in meeting, calling the conference "a terrible failure," and saying that the failure should be admitted so that the delegates might "part friends" and try over again. Commander Kenworthy's suggestion for saving the conference at the last moment was a five-year building holiday all around. That would redeem it a little, but what a ghastly mess it all is. If some miracle does not take place, everybody connected with it must equally share the disgrace of this absolute breakdown in statesmanship. But to our minds Mr. Hoover and Mr. Stimson are particularly guilty, because of their lack of vigor, courage, and readiness to abandon parity and really disarm.

THE GREAT DAY OF PRAYER for the embattled Christians and Jews in Russia has come and gone in our American churches with Bishop Manning unctuously declaring that the church is not intending a bitter attack upon the Soviet leaders—"they know not what they do." It is a fortunate thing, we fancy, that one does not have to prove positive results from a day of prayer like this. We are ourselves not quite clear whether the appeal was to a recreant Deity to stop what is going on in Russia or whether it was intended solely to soften the heart of the commissars in Moscow. If it was the latter then the day of prayer went wrong, for its first effect was to produce an Associated Press cable from Moscow announcing that there will be "a more intensive assault against God and the churches during the approaching Easter period." Stalin himself, on the other hand, has issued orders that any Communist party-worker found guilty of using violent methods in the fight against religion will be severely punished. It was characteristically stupid of the Soviet leadership, from their point of view, to speed up that campaign just at this time. While we sincerely hope that the Soviets will permit to all the religious freedom guaranteed by their constitution, we cannot deny that it would be extremely enlightening to see if a country can be made prosperous, decent, and law-abiding without the aid of a powerful church. Does Bishop Manning fear the outcome of such an experiment?

IN STILL ANOTHER DIRECTION, the collectivization of Russian agriculture, Stalin has given orders to go more slowly. Here again he is wise. There was certainly no reasonable excuse for proceeding with such tremendous speed as was reported, with increasing peasant resistance and ever-present bloodshed. A year in the life of a country is but a minute; to create great opposition and produce unrest by a given reform is never wise. Private letters from Moscow report increasing food straits and mounting prices for the necessaries of life. There is a tremendous lack of soap, butter, sugar, eggs. Clothing remains extremely dear and inadequate in supply. But that does not deter the leaders from carrying on at full speed in their desire to outstrip America industrially within a few years. All of which gives point to the following story, which has just reached us from Moscow:

> . . . It is the year after the Five-Year Plan is completed. The sky is black with airplanes. One man riding in last year's airplane is overtaken by a friend in a new model and hails him by radio.
> "I see you have the new motor from our superfactory."
> "Yes, in this model we have at last surpassed America! Two hundred miles an hour. Cost minimum; operation fool-proof. Want to show it to you, but not now. I'm in a rush."
> "What's your hurry?"
> "I hear they're selling eggs in Kiev!"
> The other friend would like to follow, but doesn't. His airplane is a slower model and it is impossible to get there before the eggs are gone.

THE PRESIDENT'S COMMISSION on Haiti has done an astonishingly quick and effective piece of work, for which the people of Haiti and the United States alike have cause to be grateful; for it promises at once to restore freedom to Haiti and to reestablish the honor of the United States. The uprising of the early winter and the Aux Cayes slaughter of December 6 were immediately responsible for the appointment of the commission by calling public attention to conditions in the island. The United Press at once sent a special correspondent by airplane to Haiti to supplement the work of its regular correspondents, and the Associated Press also made special and commendable efforts to cover the situation. (We regret that the article appearing in our issue of March 12 has been misinterpreted as implying a criticism of the handling of the Aux Cayes incident by these news agencies.) Increasing knowledge caused increasing public restiveness and led to appointment of the commission. Under the present arrangement, fully described in our International Relations Section by Mrs. Helena Hill Weed, special correspondent of The Nation in Haiti, M. Eugène Roy, a business man who has never been in politics, will become provisional president when President Borno's term expires on May 15 and will have the task of carrying out the agreement made by the commissioners and the Opposition leaders, to which the reluctant Borno finally assented on March 15. If, as there is every reason to hope, the arrangement is carried out in good faith on both sides and the American Occupation is withdrawn as rapidly as possible, President Hoover will have performed an act of statesmanship for which he should be given unstinted credit.

ALIEN REGISTRATION, we rejoice to say, is dead so far as this session of Congress goes. On March 12 the Senate Committee on Immigration held a hearing on the Blease bill providing for voluntary registration, so called, and the measure was deservedly buried under an avalanche of hostile criticism. Amos Pinchot pointed out that in effect the registration requirement would become compulsory because employers would inevitably discriminate against unregistered aliens, while Joseph Schlossberg, secretary-treasurer of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, showed that registration would materially increase the difficulty of organizing aliens. Representatives of the American Jewish Committee, the National Council of Episcopal Churches, and other organizations declared that the measure would hurt Americanization work and would furnish endless opportunities of graft and corruption, to say nothing of being the beginning of a universal system of identification cards. Interestingly enough, the only persons to speak in behalf of the measure were Captain Trevor, representing the New York Chamber of Commerce, and Assistant Secretary of Labor Husband, speaking for Secretary Davis. It is a striking commentary on the intelligence and sympathies of the Secretary of Labor that he finds himself in such company on this issue.

THE JULIAN PETROLEUM SCANDAL, whose corrupt ramifications were found far and wide in Los Angeles and southern California a year and more ago, entered its final stage on March 11 when Asa Keyes, twenty-five years the public prosecutor, left Los Angeles to serve a term of from one to fourteen years as a prisoner at San Quentin prison. Keyes was found guilty in February, 1929, of conspiracy and bribe-taking in connection with the prosecution of persons who wrecked the Julian Petroleum Company, a $35,000,000 corporation. The Julian company case was not the only one in which bribery was charged; Keyes went in for that kind of plunder wholesale, and according to one estimate succeeded in gathering in as much as $140,000. Even so, and with the losses of the stock swindle still keenly remembered, the last day of his stay in the county jail, where he had been for thirteen months, was marked, according to the Associated Press, "by farewell visits of many of his friends. Judges, lawyers, newspapermen, and others came for a final word with the convicted man." Crime, if only it be in the grand manner, appears to confer distinction in the City of the Angels. A novel feature of the case is the fact that Keyes, in the five years in which he was a district attorney, sent more than 4,000 persons to San Quentin, and so bitter is the feeling against him there that the warden was reported at the time of his conviction to have considered giving him a cell in the condemned row to keep him from possible attack.

FREE SPEECH AND A FREE PRESS had their day in court on March 6 when Louis B. Seltzer, editor, and Carlton K. Matson, editorial writer, of the Cleveland Press, were purged of contempt of court by the Appellate Court of Cuyahoga County. The contempt with which Seltzer and Matson were charged consisted in a published criticism of an injunction, issued by Judge Frederick P. Walther of the Court of Common Pleas, forbidding the sheriff to interfere with races at the Thistledown track and the betting which accompanied them. The Appellate Court not only tore the injunction order in pieces, arraigned the motives of the lower court in issuing it, and declared that even if the accused had been guilty the thirty-day sentence was excessive, but frankly stated that "we live in an age when freedom of speech and freedom of press are paramount issues," and that "people should be allowed to say what they please and newspapers should be allowed to print what they please, always making themselves liable under the law of slander or the law of libel." We should like to be able to record that Judge Walther was in process of being removed from the bench.

MERGERS AND MORE MERGERS, with the usual opposition of stockholders who think that their interests have not been properly considered, and with rumors of war between one merger-creation and another, have become the order of the day in the industrial and financial world. Close upon the heels of the proposed consolidation of the Standard Oil Company of New York and the Vacuum Oil Company and the reported plans for merging the Chase National Bank, the Equitable Trust Company, and the Interstate Trust Company, all of New York, have come announcements of plans for a billion-dollar merger of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation and the Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company and of the acquisition by the Van Sweringen brothers of Cleveland of financial control of the Missouri Pacific railway system. The legality of the Standard-Vacuum merger, it is believed, will be first tested in the courts to determine whether or not it violates the order which in 1911 dissolved the old Standard Oil organization. The Bethlehem-Youngstown merger, if it is consummated, will offer a formidable challenge to the supremacy of the United States Steel Corporation, while the new control of the Missouri Pacific may open the way to a coast-to-coast railway system under a unified financial and administrative authority.

RAMSAY MACDONALD weathered the storm on March 13 when the Government, with an adventitious majority of seventy-three votes, defeated a motion of censure moved by the former Conservative Prime Minister, Stanley Baldwin. The circumstances of the vote were interesting and, in a way, dramatic. Two days before, a Conservative amendment of the coal bill had been carried by a majority of eight, but when Mr. Baldwin asked if the Government, in view of its defeat, intended to proceed with the bill, Mr. MacDonald defied the Opposition by inviting Mr. Baldwin to move a vote of general censure, and announced that "we will accept the decision." The victory on March 13 was actually due to the Liberals, who refused to join with the Conservatives in turning the Government out, although the full Labor strength, if it could have been mustered, would have been sufficient to insure success. The victory should not be misinterpreted either way. It does not mean that the Liberals will certainly support Labor when a vote is taken on the coal bill as a whole instead of on some minor provision; it means only that the Liberals are not ready to play the Conservative game by helping to unseat the Government at this stage. Mr. Baldwin himself seems not to have expected that his motion would be carried.

THE YOUNG PLAN is law as far as Germany is concerned, the bill giving effect to it having been passed by the Reichstag and signed by President von Hindenburg. With this has gone also the approval of the agreement regulating the payment of German reparations to the United States. The final vote on the Young plan, 270 to 192 with 3 abstentions, indicates the numerical strength of the opposition, but there is little doubt that the plan, now it has been accepted after full debate and in the face of violent attack from the Nationalists, will be carried out to the extent of Germany's ability. President von Hindenburg, in a proclamation, declared that he had put his name to the Young-plan law "with a heavy but resolute heart and after long and conscientious deliberation," believing that in comparison with the Dawes plan it "marks a bettering of our economic lot and an advance along the road toward Germany's freedom and reconstruction," and that a refusal "could but bring unforeseeable difficulties to our industry and finance and to our Fatherland grave crises with all their attendant menaces." President von Hindenburg's patriotic action does him honor and his words put the situation in a nutshell. Grievous as are the burdens which it imposes, the Young plan is less burdensome than a continuing Dawes plan would have been, and there was nothing sensible for Germany to do but to accept it.

THE MAN WITH THE HOE still survives in spite of the poem of Mr. Markham, but the Man with the Machete is doomed if the machine invented by C. G. Muench for cutting, topping, and stripping sugar cane proves as successful in practice as it proved in a demonstration the other day at Clewiston, Florida. Ex-Governor Smith of New York, who was one of the spectators, was quoted as expressing unstinted admiration for the new machine. When one considers how long ago the harvesting machine appeared in the grain fields of this country, and how many years before that the reaper was in use, it seems almost incomprehensible that to this day every bit of the labor in connection with gathering sugar cane is performed by hand up to the time it is carted away to the central, or grinding mill. The machinery of the central has been greatly improved in recent years, and the cane is squeezed and resqueezed until scarcely a drop of sweet is left. So perfect has the process of extraction become, in fact, that the molasses which once was a toothsome by-product is now so poor that in the West Indies much of it can no longer be sold and is piped away as waste. To bring similar efficiency into the process of harvesting sugar cane will be a boon to the industry, but it will bring little joy to thousands of men who now do the work with the machete.

THE DEATH of Mary E. Wilkins Freeman and of Arthur Sherburne Hardy removes from the American literary scene two figures who began their careers in that great decade of the 'eighties when Mark Twain, Howells, and Henry James were at their most flourishing, when thousands of readers were eagerly devouring Edward Bellamy's "Looking Backward," when Henry George's "Progress and Poverty" was just becoming known. Into this sturdier fare, Hardy poured a gentle, fragrant stream of romance. "Passe Rose" and "But Yet a Woman," among others of his novels, are vague but pleasant memories to those who read them. Mrs. Freeman was made of sterner stuff. The New England scene, which Sarah Orne Jewett had pictured with all the minor, negative virtues of charity and kindness and resignation, she saw in a light that would appear surprisingly modern to readers of today, coming to her for the first time. She was aware that unselfishness can be unhealthy, that martyrdom warps the human soul, that kindness does not come freshly from resignation. Young persons who are sure that the American novel is only just attaining eminence might do well to look up the novels of an earlier day, and to regret the passing of their creators. They will regret even more the death of one of the most distinguished of translators into English, Mr. C. K. Scott-Moncrieff, who died in Rome on March 1. If only for his incomparable rendering of one of the greatest of contemporary authors, Marcel Proust, whose "A la Recherche du Temps Perdu" he has brilliantly interpreted for English readers—on the last volume of which he was engaged when he died—he will inspire gratitude for his work and sorrow for an untimely death.

OUR WARMEST GREETINGS go out to the New Freeman, edited by Suzanne La Follette, the first issue of which has just appeared. If this new liberal weekly approximates the old Freeman under the editorship of Albert J. Nock it will be of great value indeed, for the Freeman remains in our memory as the best written and most carefully edited of all the American weeklies of our time. This new venture, we learn, is guaranteed for at least three years. That it may have established itself permanently by that time is our earnest wish. There can never be too many liberal weeklies to suit us, and since it will favor the taxation of land above all else, it will be particularly welcomed by the Single-Taxers who were such ardent supporters of the Freeman and are surely entitled to an organ of their own. That the editor is a woman makes us all the more eager for its and her success.

Whalenism

WHAT is Whalenism? It is nothing new and is not confined to the city of New York nor to the police commissioner whose name it bears. It is that combination of official ignorance and stupidity, coupled with the belief that all officials are above and beyond the laws, which has come grievously to menace civil liberty in America. It is that phase of lawlessness which the Hoover Commission on Law Enforcement should study above all other, for more than anything else it explains the difference between the law-abiding character of the English people—just now closing twenty-one prisons for lack of prisoners—and the disgraceful lawlessness of the American nation. It is that official lawlessness which makes possible the third degree in almost every police station in the country; which daily results in the violation of personal rights guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and the hourly breaching of that document itself by city and police officials. These men believe that their possession of authority not only sets them above the laws; they reserve the right to say to whom the laws shall apply, when they shall be enforced, and how.

Their ignorance is so great that if you describe them as lawbreakers they are either infuriated or rendered dumb with amazement. Mr. Whalen has been one of the dullest and most ignorant. When he took office he defended and encouraged the use of the third degree. On January 3, 1929, he reiterated the statement he made on taking office that "there's a lot of law at the end of a nightstick." At that moment he was vowing eternal war upon gangsters, gunmen, and dispensers of bad liquor. To the reporters he said "nightstick law" would be applied to this gentry, but that it would be applied "intelligently" albeit "vigorously." "They'll be knocked out cold and left to lie, Commissioner?" he was asked. "They'll be cleaned up," he replied. He had previously, according to the New York Times, declared that "the policemen are being sent out not necessarily to make arrests—we do not wish to clutter up the courts—but to do their duty in seeing that the known hang-outs for gunmen and the like are put out of business." Of course it never occurred to Mr. Whalen that in issuing these orders he was placing himself on the exact level of the gunmen and gangsters he was denouncing, except that he was a greater menace to society because he was a lawbreaker in high office. As William Bolitho has put it in the World: "Here is an honest, brave, quite unsophisticated man, with one of the finest and most complete sets of undeveloped ideas on government, law, and social ideals who has ever emerged into a position of great public trust." In no other country, we are convinced, could a public official make such a statement as Mr. Whalen's and remain in office an hour. That there was not a rising against him throughout the city shows how little understanding the public has of what are the fundamentals of civil liberty, and what are the responsibilities of a public official.

This same combination of naivete, childish ignorance, and lack of moral responsibility has also marked Mr. Whalen's dealing with the Communists. As we pointed out last week, he started out well in dealing with the demonstration of March 6. He saw to it that the Communists were given complete freedom of speech, and he had the wisdom and good sense to invite the Communist leaders to ride down with him to the City Hall and lay their complaints about unemployment before the Mayor in person. He was then living up to the best traditions of American official life. That the Communists refused to accept his invitation proved convincingly the insincerity of their intentions. When, however, the Communists illegally started their march and his police fell upon them with extraordinary brutality, Mr. Whalen was unable to see any of the wrongdoing by his officials. It was again the law at the end of the nightstick.

That, however, was by no means as bad as the Commissioner's announcement that he had called into his office the heads of various large corporations and given to them the names of 300 Communist employees so that these might be discharged—"watched" he put it later. Before he got through with this activity, he hinted, the number of those placed upon the "proscription lists" might run to thousands. Similarly amazing was his exuberance of pride in his announcement that he had sent members of the police force into the Communist demonstration who carried placards demanding the overthrow of the government and made as much noise as genuine reds, and that he had "cracked his sides with laughter" to see the uniformed police beating up their brothers in Communist guise. Here again the man's lack of an ordinary education is the trouble. He does not know that sending stool pigeons and agents provocateurs into the ranks of men whose ideas and ideals he does not like is one of the basest and most contemptible devices to which an official can resort; that it has been the trick of dictators and despots and tyrants from time immemorial, and that it never works, but only lowers the rest of the police in public estimation. That is what's wrong with Mr. Whalen. He does not know that the procedure of trying to persecute men for their beliefs is utterly un-American; he would be surprised to hear that it goes contrary to fundamental American principles, because he gives no evidence of knowing what those principles are. It is no wonder that a storm of protest has arisen; that seventeen members of the Columbia University law faculty have pointed out his lawlessness to him; that a mass meeting will be held in the Community Church to deal directly with him on March 21; and that Norman Thomas has handed in a petition to the Mayor signed by ninety-six prominent persons asking for Mr. Whalen's removal. The difficulty is that this petition must needs go to a mayor who is as ignorant of American rights and liberties as is his police commissioner; otherwise Mr. Walker would have hauled Whalen up or dismissed him long ago. And perhaps the most amazing thing about it all is the failure of either of these gentlemen to realize that this effort to proscribe Communists in legitimate employment, with the lawless refusal of one magistrate to give bail to the Communist leaders and the piling up of charges against them, is directly playing into the hands of the Communists themselves. They have no greater desire in the world than to be made the victims of official lawlessness and persecution.

Uncle Sam, Plunger

THE Federal Farm Board has found a first-class way of throwing good money into a bottomless pit, and Congress is on the point of giving it another $100,000,000 to follow the method farther. In a letter to Governor Shafer of North Dakota on March 11, Chairman Legge made this ominous statement:

> The present operations of the Stabilization Corporation will undoubtedly result in their having upwards of 100,000,000 bushels of wheat on hand at the close of the present season, and if farmers are going ahead trying to produce an additional surplus on the basis that some way will be found to take care of it on a fair price level another year, they are going to be mistaken.
> If they will cooperate, the Stabilization Corporation will be justified in paying storage charges and carrying this wheat for a time in the hope that a crop shortage somewhere in the world will give them an opportunity to unload it, but if, on the other hand, the farmers' attitude is to let George do it all, the natural procedure would seem to be to dispose of this wheat the best they could and write off the loss, but doing this would probably adversely affect the price of the 1930 crop.

As a farm reliever Mr. Legge is an incomparable machinery manufacturer. The present statement shows clearly that instead of giving him an additional $100,000,000 to squander, Uncle Sam could well afford to pay him an enormous salary to go back and work for the International Harvester Company while we get any one of a hundred educated economists to run the Farm Board at say $10,000.

Three weeks ago we pointed out that despite the invincible popular superstition about the power of speculation, the price of world commodities like wheat, cotton, rubber, and sugar, to mention only a few, is determined by world conditions of production and consumption, and except as they affect those conditions other forces are only temporarily effective. Every effort at fundamental control of that price through market manipulation has ultimately resulted in disaster to the controller. Even governmental schemes that reached back toward the control of production, like British rubber-export restriction, Brazilian coffee valorization, and Cuban sugar sale, have sooner or later broken down because of inability to control production all over the world. What big business men like Mr. Legge, apparently knowing no history or economics, cannot get into their heads is that you cannot control production and prices among millions of farmers all over the world in the same way as among a half-dozen big machinery manufacturers.

The wheat crop of the world since 1923 has averaged rather more than 4,000,000,000 bushels a year, of which the United States has produced a little better than one-fifth. During the same years our exports of wheat and flour have accounted for an average of something like 200,000,000 bushels, or say one-fourth of our crop. Does Mr. Legge really imagine that the Farm Board by a wave of the wand can cut down our wheat-growing and milling industry by a quarter and keep it cut? Does not Mr. Legge know that the farmer grows wheat instead of other crops because he thinks that it pays him better? If the farmer believes that Mr. Legge is going to keep up the price, he will think that it is going to pay him relatively better yet, and he will certainly let George do it when it comes to cutting wheat acreage.

But the existing case is even worse. The wheat carry-over of the world from one crop season to the next (August 1 being taken as the date) is normally something like 300,000,000 bushels. During recent years there have been persistent attempts to hold up the price, Canadian, Hungarian, and Polish efforts being worthy of special mention. The price has apparently not been low enough to carry off the crop completely, and the carry-over, which was figured at 284,000,000 bushels in 1926, has increased each year since to 598,000,000 bushels, or twice the normal amount, on August 1 last. In the face of these facts and the resulting sharp break in wheat prices of last spring Mr. Legge now announces the purpose of the Farm Board to buy up and hold over into the next season more than 100,000,000 bushels on the chance that a crop failure somewhere may bring a fortunate outcome to this desperate gamble.

Even if the American farmer would and could restrict wheat acreage, it would do him no good; for he would simply increase the output of the other products to which he turned and therefore drive down their price, while the eager wheat growers of Argentina and Canada and Australia and India and now Russia, with its growing export capacity, would rush in and fill the void in the wheat market. What sense, then, or indeed what common honesty is there in trying to make the farmer believe that a desperate government speculation can really help him? By the very nature of his business he is unable to establish and maintain monopoly conditions, so he must make his industry profitable under world prices. He need not try to get artificial prices for what he sells, because he cannot do it, and any farm board that makes him think he can is a fake. By intelligent politics he can, however, break down artificial prices for what he buys. The Farm Board is turning his attention in the wrong direction.

THE NATION takes pleasure in announcing that the weekly Liberty is offering $1,000 each for the best solution of each of ten famous murder mysteries. There is the "Mystery of Arnold Rothstein," the "Mystery of the Typhoid Oyster," the "Mystery of the Wall Street Explosion," and, first and third respectively on the list of ten, the "Mystery of Sacco-Vanzetti" and the "Mystery of Thomas J. Mooney."

It is possible that even among the two million odd readers of Liberty, inclusion of these cases among the well-known murder "mysteries" of our time may cause some astonishment. For Thomas J. Mooney is at present serving his fourteenth year in San Quentin prison for the murder that Liberty lists, and Sacco and Vanzetti, the cobbler and the fish-peddler, are, for the other, dead and at peace. The Baltimore Sun is unkind enough to suggest that Messrs. Lowell, Stratton, Grant, and Thayer, not to mention former Governor Fuller of Massachusetts, themselves are the obvious contestants for the first prize and that Mr. Lowell of Harvard could use his share of it—$200—to raise the wages of the Harvard scrubwomen. Two years ago these gentlemen had not a single shadow of doubt about the guilt of Sacco and Vanzetti. They knew, beyond peradventure, beyond any qualm, as surely as though their own eyes had seen the Braintree paymaster murdered, that Sacco and Vanzetti had killed the man for whose death they were to be executed. They read the evidence that was presented to them, they heard the witnesses, they listened to what Vanzetti, the fish-peddler, said and wrote from his cell in Charlestown prison where he had spent seven years, and what Sacco, the cobbler, less articulate but not less forthright, said from his. They considered the offered alibis, the protests of respectable and disinterested persons, among them men and women of the highest standing in public life; four of them read every word of the court records, which the fifth did not read because he was present and could hear. And after they had read or heard every word and examined and sifted every fact, solemnly, advisedly, with the full knowledge that the lives of two men hung on their decision, they announced their verdict: "Guilty as charged. No doubt of it. Let them die."

It is unfortunate, if all these things happened as they must have happened, that only two years later a weekly which has never in its most reckless moments been called even faintly liberal should put these worthy gentlemen of Massachusetts in a position so truly horrible. For if doubts as to the guilt of Sacco and Vanzetti have permeated through the masses and reached a level which makes the editor of Liberty think these doubts news for his readers, the case is perhaps less iron-bound and copper-riveted than Messrs. Lowell, Stratton, Grant, Thayer, and Fuller knew it to be. And if this is so, what then? How can the fish-peddler and the cobbler profit by these doubts? Who can bring the dead to life and allow them to be confronted by their judges who will tell them: "We really were not quite sure after all!"

These, of course, are very unhappy considerations, and the gentlemen from Massachusetts will not be envied by any person who ponders them. But there is one man in these United States more fortunate than they. He is Governor Young of California. Tom Mooney—and Warren K. Billings, whom Liberty evidently overlooked—are still alive. Governor Young can still pardon them. And by doing so he can save himself bad dreams, a bad conscience, the weight on his mind and his heart of the lives of two men whom thousands of persons believe to be innocent of the crime for which they are in prison. By its "mystery" contest, Liberty may have done an inestimable public service.

Celluloid Aesthetics

A FEW weeks ago we had occasion to discuss the talkies with a writer attached to a very important producing company and himself the author of one of the most successful of what Variety calls "the articulate flickers." We propounded to him a problem in the aesthetics of the cinema and we received an answer so astonishing in its general implication that we have decided to pass it on for the benefit of those who, like ourselves, have wondered that certain things could be.

As to the problem itself, it dealt, perhaps, with matters a little overrefined, but we had just returned from seeing the talkie version of the musical comedy "Hit the Deck," and we had been struck with what seemed to us an obvious and easily remediable defect of style. Operetta, we pointed out, is, after all, a highly artificial form of art and it involves absurdities which are tolerable only because they are part of a consistent convention. Thus, in the case of the piece in question we have a story which is about not real, but musical-comedy sailors, and musical-comedy sailors are credible only when they are seen against a background equally unreal. Any theatrical producer would instinctively recognize the fact and put them in "a painted ship upon a painted ocean." But in the film everything except the story was as perversely actual as possible. The ship was literally exact; the sailors—recruited in a real recruiting office—embarked at a real navy yard; and the inevitable result was that, when they suddenly broke into a song and dance on the sidewalks of a real street, one shuddered at a crudity which might have been easily avoided by the exercise of elementary aesthetic judgment.

Now, when we propounded this opinion we expected to have it brushed aside as academic and to be told that the great public was hardly interested in considerations like these; but our friend, instead of being contemptuous, agreed perfectly. "You are right," he said. "The director who made the picture is probably just as aware as you are of the principle involved. Moreover, even audiences would, without knowing why, find pictures produced in a consistent style more enjoyable than a hodge-podge like 'Hit the Deck.' But there is one serious difficulty. Harmonious stylization—what you call a 'painted ship upon a painted ocean'—would not cost enough."

"You see," he continued, "there are three grades of pictures called respectively 'programmers,' 'features,' and 'super-features.' The last rent for the highest price, but in order to get it we must convince the exhibitor that the picture was expensive to make and, of course, the more conspicuous the expenditure the more easily he is convinced. We need to be able to say to him that we took the company to Shanghai, that we rented a fleet, or that we reconstructed a battleship in all its details right on the lot. He knows that things like that cost money and he is willing to pay his share, but he can't be fooled. Perhaps there is no artistic reason for going to Shanghai, perhaps a simpler setting would be better, and perhaps a picture produced less elaborately would please the audience more. But the exhibitor will not pay the price unless he knows that we have paid our part."

And so, like another ancient mariner, we were left sadder but wiser as the result of our experience with painted ships and painted oceans. We had supposed that perhaps the producers of talkies need only to learn, but we had discovered that they know already. Many are men of talent and refinement. A few at least would be glad to find some way to escape from the thousand and one limitations imposed upon their work. But every individual is lost in the huge organization, and the organization itself is controlled by social and economic factors which make impossible any effort to do anything except what has always been done. Individuals engaged in it may dream of something different, but they know that they must conform or get out. Experimentation? Unconventionality? Special pictures for the few? As one magnate is said to have said to his art director, "I can give you the answer in two words: im—possible."

PEOPLE who say that communism can never succeed in America have forgotten about the Elks and about Skull and Bones at Yale. In fact, it may well be that communism has already succeeded in its principal objective here. I am not denying that it may never be a very big fraternal order, but possibly that is precisely the reason why it affords its followers so much fun. One black ball is sufficient to keep an applicant out and there is no end of satisfaction in being a genuine blown-in-the-bottle Communist entirely surrounded by masses of the bourgeoisie. The paraphernalia is not unfamiliar. There are secret passwords and grips of the usual sort to be given to the initiated. This summer I understand that the club is going to go in for a hatband in addition to the fraternity pin which is worn upon the undershirt and must never be parted from the wearer. Some Communists, I assume, use the flap of flesh across the clavicle instead.

To those in good standing all sorts of jolly parties are furnished. One gets the opportunity to sing the "Internationale" twenty or thirty times a day. There are fish fries, clambakes, and gatherings at local ball parks where the good Communist may sit for several hours and listen to denunciations of God and Norman Thomas. In this I catch a slight lack of logic. According to the Communist philosophy, as I understand it, the club is against God because he doesn't exist and against Norman Thomas because he does.

The chief danger for the Communists lies not in Whalens or any outside adversaries but within the ranks of the cause itself. Palpably it is true that when three or four Communists are gathered together you have five major parties and six heresies. I know one ambitious red who is tearing himself to bits in an effort to belong to every one of the irreconcilable groups in the movement at the same time. God's children are not the only ones to have wings. Among the revolutionaries there is the left, the right, the north southwest, and the west northeast. And not one of these is on speaking terms with the rest. Orthodoxy among the Communists is far more difficult than that which obtains in the ranks of fundamentalists.

Such scary folks as actually believe that wild disorder and barricades are just around the corner overlook the fact that the Communists are much too busy to get on with the proletarian revolution of which they speak upon occasion. After all they have to save most of their time for heresy trials. In fact a truly orthodox Muscovite would rather have no upheaval at all than tolerate one sponsored under irregular auspices. If it isn't red it isn't a revolution, they say, and must be thrown back into the creek.

But what is red? Ah, there's the rub. Some part of the drive against religion is probably based on a not unnatural envy of the Catholic church and its system of government. Of course the Communists have taken over the idea of a Pope, but through their tendency to excess they have set up a round half-dozen, which throws everything completely into confusion.

Being a proletarian in good standing is no bed of roses. Probably it can't be done. There lives today in all America not one Communist whose position is unassailable. Inevitably he is a counter-revolutionist in the eyes of some comrade or other. Indeed, the rule of the order differs somewhat from that of the Boy Scouts. It is laid down that each and every one must do a daily denunciation. Of course the drive against religion has been a godsend. Here at last the club has found One to assail who cannot or will not answer back. To me a field day devoted wholly to picnic lunch and atheism sounds a little dull. After you have heard one denunciation of God it seems to me that you have heard them all. For my own part I'd a great deal rather sit and watch sparrows fall to earth.

But possibly at forty I have lost something of youthful enthusiasm. The whole movement leaves me a little wistful. Not even Princeton itself has produced so many perpetual sophomores as the Communist Party. Yet I cannot deny an occasional flash of irritation at the snobbery of this small and exclusive club. Only last night I was reading a new book by Mike Gold called "Jews Without Money," and a fascinating and spirited book at that. Mike has been called "the playboy of the Communists," but that is hardly a complete characterizer. Mr. Foster's faith that the world can be made over through his swapping wisecracks with Jimmy Walker seems to me an equally youthful concept. And if Bob Minor had remained in the newspaper business he would by now be only a sedate cartoonist drawing endless strings of fat men with dollar marks upon their clothing. To how many of us is it given to rag and wrestle with the cops after the age of forty-five?

But as I was saying, there are times when the reds seem inclined to claim too much. In Mike's "Jews Without Money" I came across a chapter called Did God Make Bedbugs? and here I found: "Bedbugs are what people mean when they say: poverty. There are enough pleasant superficial liars writing in America. I will write a truthful book of poverty; I will mention bedbugs."

As a liberal, I have not the slightest desire to limit Mike's freedom of speech, but I am a shade annoyed to find him behaving as if he had hit upon something brand-new. It is a little as if a writer said: "I am going to talk about a great actor whom nobody has ever mentioned before. I have discovered him all by myself. His name is Charlie Chaplin." Just what has Mike been doing with himself during the last twenty years of the realistic movement in American literature? I can hardly remember five native novels in all that time which did not manifest a deal of preoccupation with insect life. Nor am I pleased to have one species held out as belonging to the proletariat alone. I can assure Mike that the mascot which he mentions is by no means unheard of in the homes of the bourgeoisie. Even in the great Park Avenue apartments of the rich who oppress the poor the gentleman from the exterminator's has been known to call upon a Tuesday morning.

And in addition I accuse Mike of superficial observation. "They crawl slowly and pompously," he writes. Not in the homes of the middle class, I can assure him.

HEYWOOD BROUN

"My Dear Senator"*

On a Certain Betrayal in Washington

My dear Senator: To say that I am appalled by your letter of March 7 defending your action in changing your vote on the sugar tariff is to put it as politely as I can. You have been, since you were first elected, one of the truly progressive Senators in Washington. On most questions that have come before you you have taken a stand which seemed to indicate that you were conscious not merely that you were the representative of your State, but that you had a duty to the public as a whole. Yet here you are defending yourself on the ground that there are tremendous areas in the Western part of the United States available for raising sugar beets, that the sugar growers of the West are "in dire distress," and that "the industry is almost ruined." You also tell me that you promised the farmers and beet-sugar growers that if you were reelected, and the high-tariff bill should be presented, you would vote for high tariffs on products of your State even though you were opposed on principle to them. You repeat that the sugar-beet industry is highly important in your State, and that the existing tariff does not enable the sugar-beet farmers to make a living.

In other words, your argument is that although you feel there should be no tariff trough, or at least no deep and extensive one, your clients are entitled to get their feet into the swill as long as any trough exists and anybody else is feeding therein. The second Charles Francis Adams once called himself a thief because he profited by the looting of the purses of all the people of the United States through a protected industry in which he was a shareholder. If he was correct in this characterization of himself and his associates, then by your stand you are encouraging others to rob the public on behalf of an industry in your State which you admit cannot stand upon its own feet, partly because of competition in other areas under the United States flag, and partly because of the coming in of Cuban sugar. Why should you, or anybody else, seek to bolster up at the expense of all the people an industry which has no valid economic excuse for its existence? Nobody asked the citizens of your State who have gone into beet-sugar growing to put their money into that enterprise. No one guaranteed that they would make a profit out of it. They took exactly the same risks that anybody else took who established a carpet factory, or set up a brokerage house, or sought to serve his fellow-Americans by running an unpopular newspaper.

In not a single one of these cases was there any guaranty that if the investors lost their money through taking up an economically unsound venture, or through their incompetence or poor business methods, or through creating a product which no one needed, Uncle Sam would come to their rescue and guarantee them satisfactory profits. Had those who have gone into beet-sugar growing in your State since 1916 consulted a report published by the Department of Agriculture they would have found that its chemists certify that there are only three limited areas in the United States in which beets can be grown with sufficient sugar content to be commercially profitable. As for competition from other sections of the United States, would anybody listen to the boot-and-shoe manufacturers of Massachusetts if they asked for government aid against the competition of Missouri, the greatest boot-and-shoe-producing State in the Union, and California? As for Cuba, why should the mere fact that it flies a foreign flag—although its independence is severely limited by the Platt Amendment permitting us to intervene in its affairs when we see fit—deprive the American people of the opportunity to obtain cheap sugar from the richest sugar-producing territory in the world? Any sensible country would rejoice in the nearness of this island to enable it to obtain cheap sugar for its every citizen, and would be glad to include it in a customs union beneficial to both sides of the bargain. And what would happen to your beet-sugar growers if we should annex the island as so many Americans think we eventually will?

Why should you, or anyone else, seek to protect the beet growers of your own and other States from the consequences of their mistaken business judgment at the expense of every consumer in this country? They had plenty of other opportunities to invest their money, there were plenty of other crops they could raise. The world did not need an increase in sugar-producing acreage. There was plenty of cane sugar available in the world when sugar beets first began to be grown within the United States. But, I hear you ask, granted that the enterprise was a mistake, should we not protect these men from the results of their own folly and shortsightedness? My answer is emphatically no. Not a day goes by but that men lose their investments because of errors of judgment, or because of the ever-shifting stream of economic life and the progress of invention. The government was never asked by anybody outside of an insane asylum to reimburse the livery-stable keepers, the harness and carriage manufacturers who were put out of business when the arrival of the automobile completely changed transportation in the United States. Not a day goes by that does not witness the abandonment of some trolley tracks made financially unprofitable by the coming in of the motor bus. What would happen to the owners of worthless interurban trolley securities if they turned up in Washington and demanded that the government subsidize their lines lest they lose their capital, or reimburse them in the event that economic disaster should completely overtake them?

Can you not see that when you ask Uncle Sam to go down into his pocket to keep your particular group of sugar growers alive you are asking for special privilege at the expense of the rest of the country? Can you not see that you are creating for them a vested right, establishing a precedent which enables them to say that the government owes them a living, thus echoing the words of every worthless tramp who will not lend himself to an honest industrial task? Do you not see that in letting your vote be influenced solely by local considerations you are forgetting your duty to legislate as a representative not merely of your State, but of the entire Union? Why is it that you, usually a genuine Progressive, cannot see that when you are supporting this protective system you are committing an immoral act; that it is grossly immoral for a man to lend himself to a system which is steadily corrupting our political and economic life on the ground that as long as other people are getting graft his clients are also entitled to it? The very fact that you are dependent on these men for the votes necessary for your reelection ought forever to keep you from placing yourself in a position where you can be accused of advocating special favors for people without whose suffrages you cannot remain in public life. The very fact that you say that you are opposed on principle to high tariffs should have barred you from the position you have taken. That so many of our legislators and statesmen are willing to violate their principles in order to help out some good fellows at home explains in high degree why our political life has sunk so low as it has. That you made this a pledge when you were elected does not avail to excuse you; for in your letter to me you explain your change of vote by saying that as long as you stay in the Senate you expect to change your vote when your judgment teaches you that you owe it to the people you represent to do so. Your willingness to lay yourself open to suspicion and misconstruction by your recent switch shows that you have the moral courage to change your position under fire. You could have done so after reaching Washington and seeing all the rotten mess of crookedness and corruption, of log-rolling, wire-pulling, and vote-buying that has disgraced the Senate throughout a year of tariff-making. I cannot, with all respect, but feel that if you had been true to yourself, to the statesmanship which you have displayed heretofore, you would have resigned from the Senate rather than put yourself in so equivocal a position and lend yourself to this whole business of tariff robbery into which the Congress has plunged itself, only to fall lower than ever before in the history of tariff-making.

* This is the first of a series of articles on the national political situation and the issues involved in it. The next will appear in an early issue.—Editor The Nation.

The very fact that you are a Progressive ought to enable you to see clearly that the forces which are behind this tariff swinery are the same forces which menace democracy at every other turn. The high-tariff protectionists are also our imperialists, our big-army people, our big-navy people, our shipbuilding people who hire the Shearers to thwart the desire of the American people for disarmament and peace. They are the same persons who are buying up water powers by hook and by crook, overcharging the American people through their utilities, padding their capital accounts, and poisoning the well-springs of our national life by their dishonest and under-cover propaganda in our schools and colleges. They are the same people who by fair means and foul—usually foul—are seeking to emasculate the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Power Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, all the State and federal regulatory commissions by packing them with their own creatures—as has again just been brought out beyond question or doubt by any honest citizen because of the inquiries which have been going on under your eyes in Washington. These are the same powers that are sworn foes of liberalism and progressivism—the same progressivism for which you have stood and fought so bravely. They are the ones responsible for the packing of the Supreme Court by conservatives, for the tremendous cliques in this country by which all the wealth of the country is being concentrated more and more in the hands of a few. They are the ones who figured in the oil scandals, who debauched one Cabinet, if not one President of the United States.

Wherever they move in their pursuit of special privilege they leave behind them a sinister trail of corruption. They employ the Grundys. They finance the Vares and the Smiths and the other men who have sought to buy their way into the Senate of the United States. There is the enemy! Yet you who have fought them so often have now lowered your lance and struck hands with them. Can you not see that in doing so you have debarred yourself from speaking out again effectively against their other raids upon the Treasury, their unceasing efforts to secure for themselves the natural resources, the birthright of the American people? Why are you so blind now? Can you complain if people ask whether it is merely because you wish to get a few thousand dollars for the lumber men and the beet growers of your State? It is, of course, impossible for you not to know the outright corruption going on under your own eyes in this tariff-making. The swapping of votes in order to obtain favors for both sides is none the less corruption even though no money changes hands. It is corruption for the party leaders to award tariff favors to men who contributed to their campaign funds, because that makes the transaction merely one of bargain and sale. It is corruption, as well as pure folly, to permit interested persons to frame the nation's tariff policy. Yet, viewing all this, you, too, are willing to enter this shameful scramble to get something for your State. This is not service, but a grave disservice to your people.

I am certain, knowing you as I do, that the motive in your case has not been fear for your political future, but kindness of heart. But kindness of heart can never be an excuse for going over to the powers that prey and demanding your State's share of the loot. Kindness of heart cannot free you from the duty of going to the bottom of these economic problems that are obviously menacing not merely the prosperity and the happiness of our people, but their freedom of opportunity, their spiritual and economic equality, their right to the heritage of their fathers. What hope can there be for the growth of the Progressive movement when a man like you lends himself to such folly and such error?

For thirty-three years I have been observing and writing on public affairs and what has been happening in Washington. Never has there been such a moral debacle, never such base selfishness, and never such cowardly opportunism as are to be found today in the headless Washington of which you are so distinguished a part. Never in these thirty-three years has there been a greater opportunity for a man to stand forth, to burn his bridges behind him, to forget his clients and their narrow State interests, and to declare that he is taking his stand, come what may, for the welfare of all the people, for the advancement of his country, for its protection against the flood of slimy corruption which appears to have touched nearly every institution that we hold dear. When such a man appears the country will acclaim him. It will recognize his righteousness. Yes, it will receive him with open arms if he declares that no power on earth, much less the plight of some farmers and lumber men in his State, can swerve him from his beliefs or make him legislate for anyone else than the entire people of the United States. For such a one there will be no office too high, and no gratitude too great.

Yours very truly,

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

The Miners' Rebellion

By LOUIS STANLEY

Springfield, March 17

FROM the picks came some 450 miners to Springfield, Illinois, on March 10 to reorganize the United Mine Workers of America. Over in Indianapolis John L. Lewis, still claiming to be president of the union, presided over what he called "the thirty-first consecutive constitutional convention." The "All-High," as the miners like to call Lewis, had been defied. The men had at last broken out in open rebellion.

The immediate causes of the revolt are not such as to arouse the deep interest of a progressive, nor did they play the most important part at the Springfield convention. The basic reasons were continually heard, however: the tyranny of John L. Lewis and his callousness to, if not collusion in, the running down of the union. The direct reasons for the present outbreak concern the feud that has existed for years between the officials of Illinois District 12, the richest district in the United Mine Workers of America, and the International administration headed by Lewis. The conflict existed during the regime of Lewis's most formidable rival, Frank Farrington, former president of District 12, whom Lewis eliminated four years ago when he revealed that Farrington had signed a three-year contract, while he was still holding office in the union, to serve as labor adviser to the Peabody Coal Company at $25,000 a year. The antagonism between Illinois and Indianapolis continued under the presidency of Harry Fishwick, who succeeded Farrington.

Last year Lewis seized the opportunity to obtain a foothold in Illinois. His investigators discovered irregularities in the transfer of real estate belonging to two local unions in Franklin County in southern Illinois. The officials of Subdistrict 9 were implicated but defied the International office. Thereupon Lewis revoked the charter of the subdistrict on June 8, 1929, and appointed "provisional officers." Inquiry revealed that the accused officials had also misappropriated $10,500 out of $50,000 intended for groceries to relieve members during the strike of 1927. In the meantime another incident took place. George Stouffer, of Peoria, was declared elected a member of the district board by the official tellers. His opponent claimed the election stolen from him, appealed in vain to the district board, and finally obtained a decision unseating Stouffer from the International executive board.

Charges and counter-charges were flying about and matters had been made worse by the refusal of the district officials to support Denny Lewis, brother of John L. Lewis, for reappointment as State Director of Mines and Minerals, when Lewis struck another blow. The United Mine Workers' Journal of October 1 published a memorandum signed by the International officers giving the details of a confession made by two of the deposed officials of Subdistrict 9. Among other interesting items were included charges of corruption against district officers and their leading attorney and the proof that the administration of District 12 had materially supported the fight of the accused men against Lewis. A. C. Lewis, chief counsel for the district, filed suit for $250,000. Later Harry Madden, a district-executive-board member, did likewise.

The district board met in session at Springfield on October 5 and threw down the gauntlet. They refused to recognize the provisional government set up in Subdistrict 9, and instead parceled out the territory among adjoining subdistricts. They refused to abide by the decision in the Stouffer case. They refused to disavow the libel suit of A. C. Lewis. As a consequence, on October 10 President Lewis revoked the charter of District 12 and established a provisional government. The victory was short-lived. The Illinois officials were prepared for this contingency and obtained an injunction the same day they received the order from Lewis. On January 23 the plea of the International to have the injunction dissolved was denied. The case will be heard on appeal next month.

In all this the officials of District 12 had not been placed in the most favorable light. It is true that they argued that provisional governments were unconstitutional, that their decision in the Stouffer case was founded on formal considerations, and that Lewis had no right to dictate to them as to libel suits. It is also true that their battle was against Lewis; this was their strongest point. Nevertheless, the squabbling seemed to be factional. The membership of District 12 was dissatified with corruption. The rank and file in other districts could be only mildly aroused. Something had to be done to turn the struggle into one over principles rather than office; something had to be done to make the fight national rather than local in scope. For the sake of self-preservation District 12 took the next step. Quick action was needed. A conference took place in Chicago in February. The constitution of the United Mine Workers, we were reminded, had lapsed by its own limitation on March 31, 1929. The referendum extending it, taken in November, 1928, had no validity. Therefore the conferees, as an "organization committee," issued a ringing call for a convention of the United Mine Workers to be held at Springfield, Illinois, on March 10 at twelve o'clock noon.

The promise of reorganization that the call held forth lay in the names attached to it. There were Alexander Howat, president, and August Dorchy, vice-president of the Kansas District. Both had fought the industrial-court law of that State and had been expelled from the union by Lewis for their pains. There was John H. Walker, president of the Illinois State Federation of Labor, a substantial, respectable addition to the ranks, who had had his tiffs with Lewis years before. There was John Brophy, incorrigible idealist, driven from the union by Lewis and now a salesman for the Columbia Preserve Company, noted for its liberal labor policy. There was also Adolph Germer, secretary of the Socialist Party during the war, supposed to have had his election as president of District 12 taken from him at one time by Farrington and Lewis. More recently he has been a real-estate agent, though his membership in the union has never lapsed. The other signatures to the call were chiefly those of officials of District 12. Conspicuous for its absence was the name of Frank Farrington, recently reinstated to membership and in the forefront of the anti-Lewis campaign. This was a concession to the progressives and the sentiment of the rank and file. Behind all this maneuvering was Oscar Ameringer, genius of the Oklahoma Leader and the Illinois Miner, known to the miners as "Adam Coaldigger," his nom de plume. It was he who through his papers stirred the workers to open rebellion. It was he who achieved the national progressive front.

The Springfield convention did not open at noon on March 10, for Lewis had decided to call a convention also at ten o'clock of the same day. Upon the advice of lawyers the Springfield group met at nine o'clock. At 11:21 the portions of the constitution providing for the name and jurisdiction of the union were adopted. At 12:01 the Indianapolis convention legalized the extension of the constitution. The insurgents might now call the others dual by virtue of a forty-minute margin. The courts, however, will have the final word.

The gathering at Springfield was in the main a rank-and-file convention. The delegates drove President Fishwick of District 12 from the chair immediately after he had opened the convention. By acclamation they chose their "Alec" Howat to take his place. Throughout the entire proceedings parliamentary rules were given but the most casual attention; the rank and file had its say. At the beginning the officials of District 12 were denounced, but the chief target was, of course, John L. Lewis himself. Man after man told stories of his arrogance, his high-handedness, his neglect of the unorganized, and his sympathy for the operators. His henchmen, the organizers and the International-board members, were proved guilty of extravagance, corruption, indifference to the needs of the workers, and the expenditure of time on political work for their chief.

The big issue of the convention was the seating of Frank Farrington. "I made the contract," he asserted in his defense, "to save the miners' union." Delegates laughed out loud. He tried to explain that Lewis would not agree to the wage reduction needed to halt the disintegration of the union unless he, Farrington, had eliminated himself from the organization. He signed the Peabody contract with that in view. Very few, indeed, believed his story, but he was seated nevertheless by a vote of 225 to 145. The majority argued that his credential was correct in form and that if he wanted to rehabilitate his honor, he should be allowed to do it. Anyway, both John Brophy and Powers Hapgood, Harvard graduate who had shown his fearlessness in fighting both Lewis and the operators, were at the moment not even members of the union and represented unorganized groups, yet they opposed the seating of Farrington. The victory of Farrington was a deep disappointment to the progressives, who had hoped that the "reorganization convention" would be more sensitive to ethical considerations.

The election of officers was another test of the progressive character of the convention. It was a foregone conclusion that "Alec" would be elected president and "Jack" Walker secretary-treasurer. The former lacked the vigor of his earlier years; the latter, a conservative, might lack driving power in the trying months ahead. Much might devolve upon the vice-president. Hapgood and Germer were the contestants. The progressives pinned their hope on the younger man. They were disappointed again. His youth, his attack on Farrington, and his advanced ideas were against him. He was defeated by a vote of 299 to 95, but a moment later he was again the hero, when he shook hands with Germer and moved the delegates by his appeal for solidarity. Afterwards Hapgood was given a personal tribute, when the convention voted for a substitute motion of his, less because of its merits than to please him.

Was the convention encouraging? It was. A housecleaning is probable in District 12 and Farrington may be kept out of the picture. The constitution adopted makes the officials more responsive to the rank and file. The salaries of officials are comparatively low. If Hapgood was not elected vice-president, still the officials chosen are of the highest caliber. Besides, Hapgood and Bill Deak, rebel in John L. Lewis's local, were elected to the important policy committee. Almost all of Illinois, Kansas, and the Southwest are with the "reorganized" union, and that means most of the bituminous coal miners in the United Mine Workers. If the American Federation of Labor recognizes the Springfield United Mine Workers, the union will throw its influence to the side of militant struggle against the employers and in favor of progressive policies. The constitution commits the union to advocate the six-hour day, the five-day week, unemployment insurance, and "the full social value of their [the workers'] product." If the American Federation of Labor bans the new union, it may, with the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, become the nucleus of a new trade-union center.

Much depends upon "Adam Coaldigger." As editor of the official organ which will succeed the Illinois Miner he will have a tremendous educational job to fulfil. As the generalissimo of the national progressive front he can do much to preserve and strengthen it. The extent to which progressives, militants, and rebels are permitted to function in the affairs of the "reorganized" United Mine Workers will determine whether we shall have just another business union or a fighting machine run by practical idealists—unless, of course, a peace is patched up between the old and the new unions.

Two Swans I Watched at Twilight

By DAVID MORTON

These slow and silver images of peace
Might well be pictures that the mind had wrought
Out of some tortured labor at release
From the dark chambers of tormented thought;
So tranquil and so dim and cool they are,
Here in the gathering darkness they would seem
Part of this dusk that gazes, star by star,
Out of its own reflection in the stream.

The twilight thickens, now—the deeper dark
Will settle here, and silver ghosts will stir
So slightly that no mortal eye could mark
Their going or the silver shape they were,
That came in beauty and in beauty went,
For one who knew the thing their passing meant.

Old Joe's Senate

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, March 15

NOT since the Harding days has Washington been permeated by such an atmosphere of scandal and impending scandal. Administration leaders have the furtive and uneasy look of men who fear their enemies and distrust each other. Dreadful rumors fill the air. Many of them concern the methods by which the tariff bill is being revised skyward under the practiced and unscrupulous hand of "Old Joe" Grundy, and an equal number concern the real or suspected relations between public personages and the power and chemical interests. Already it has been disclosed that immediately prior to his election as national chairman of the Republican Party, the delectable Claudius H. ("Deuce-in-the-Hole") Huston participated in a lobby that aimed to grab Muscle Shoals for the American Cyanamid and Union Carbide companies; that he collected, from sources that he cannot entirely recall, and disbursed, in ways that he cannot always remember, very large sums of money without keeping any record except in a check book, which he now seems to have mislaid; and that he sought to effect an arrangement whereby the power and chemical companies would quit quarreling over the anticipated plunder and agree to divide it like honest pirates. Moreover, he solicited and received for the lobby contributions totaling $36,000 from the Union Carbide, and deposited the money to his private account with a brokerage firm, subsequently forwarding it to the lobby organization in amounts and on dates that have now escaped his mind. In fact, the condition of Mr. Huston's memory on these matters provokes one to wonder whether he is a sleepwalker.

* * * * *

IN this connection the Senate Lobby Investigating Committee, which already has performed invaluable services, is being urged to examine the records of the Cyanamid and Carbide companies and to scan their lists of stockholders. In connection with proposals to dispose of Boulder Dam power, it might well inspect the books and correspondence of the Southern California Edison and affiliated companies. In respect to the inexplicable increase in the tariff on rayon, it certainly should ascertain the names of American stockholders in the favored companies, especially those controlled by Courtaulds, Ltd., of London. Senator Blaine of Wisconsin has publicly asked for an inquiry into the activities of the Mormon hierarchy in connection with the sugar vote in the Senate. In short, if events were to justify one-half the whispers now generally current in the capital, we might look back on the Fall-Daugherty-Forbes regime as the Age of Honest Government.

* * * * *

WHEN news dispatches relating the progress of the tariff fight will not stand up between editions of the afternoon papers, any attempt to indicate events three or four days ahead is wholly futile. As this is written, the Senate Old Guard is in the saddle again, as the result of an audacious vote-trading conspiracy hatched by Grundy and his private lobby. Employing the style of attack made famous by Chinese generals, the Pennsylvania statesman and his aides have inspired enough desertions to reduce the coalition from a majority to a minority. It now appears that this might have been accomplished long ago if the Old Guard leaders had only known that so many votes were for sale, and at such reasonable prices. It may sound ridiculous to attribute any form of innocence to Jim Watson, Reed Smoot, or George Moses, but actually I do not believe they realized that Dill and Jones could be reached with promises of a duty on lumber, or Pine and Thomas with pledges of a duty on oil, or that Ashurst and Hayden could be lined up with a few kind words about hides. Evidently they did not detect the rubber in the convictions of Wagner, Copeland, and Tydings. It took a realist like "Old Joe" to size up the condition and devise the proper measures. Assisted by Warren F. Doane, a professional lobbyist on the joint pay roll of Grundy, the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, and the State of Pennsylvania, who occupies an office in the Senate Office Building, "Old Joe" soon had the situation well in hand. Since then he has made but two mistakes: the first, when he fell into a panic and attempted to deceive the Senate about Doane's status; the second, when he essayed publicly to lead the fight for a higher duty on pig iron. In the latter instance he discovered that Senators who were quite willing to go along with him when the connection was not too obvious were unwilling to commit political suicide by openly accepting his leadership. Next time "Old Joe" will let someone else wear the sword and epaulets while he directs the battle from the cloakroom. A Progressive Senator remarked ruefully the other day: "The worst mistake we ever made was to exclude Bill Vare."

* * * * *

NEVERTHELESS, brilliant careers are sometimes short, and the convening of the next Congress might easily find "Old Joe" again paying rent for himself and his lobby in a private office building, and conducting his operations from the corridors instead of the cloakrooms. When the Honorable Jim Davis was first suggested (by himself) as a candidate for the Senatorial nomination against Grundy, there was a general disposition to smile—perhaps because people have always smiled at the spectacle of Jim as Secretary of Labor. The smile vanished instantly when Vare declared for him. Even the mighty Mellons have learned that it is folly to laugh at any Pennsylvania candidate who has the support of the Philadelphia machine. In this instance the folly would be fatuity, because the consequences of the last Senatorial primary in that State will prevent any more orgies of spending in the near future, and when money is scarce organization support is doubly effective. As a matter of fact, genial Jim has many of the attributes of a successful campaigner. Not only is he the greatest Moose known to natural history, but he is also a Mason, an Odd Fellow, an Elk, a Knight of Pythias, and a dues-paying member of the American Federation of Labor.

He is a tireless and accomplished handshaker, and the only living Cabinet member who ever told the British Ambassador that the Embassy victuals would go down better with a scoop of beer. He radiates energy and good nature, and if an idea ever entered his head it perished there of loneliness. In other words, he is a perfect candidate, and I should be neither surprised nor disappointed to see him give "Old Joe" a noble licking. To be sure, he would add nothing to the Senate, but he would supplant an evil influence that never should have been admitted.

WHERE the tariff is concerned, it begins to appear that Mr. Hoover's failure to indicate by word or sign the kind of bill he desired may not have been so amateurish after all. Throughout the various stages of the fight —when the House was adopting the most piratical rates in history, when the Senate coalition was weeding out some of the grosser larcenies, and now when Grundy's Gang is restoring most of them—there have been two equally authoritative groups of Hoover spokesmen, one declaring that the President wanted the sort of bill the coalition sought, and the other declaring he desired the sort of bill that Grundy is writing. Mr. Hoover's refusal to settle the issue between them may now bear fruit. I venture to forecast that no matter what form the bill finally takes, it will prove to be the very bill that he wanted all along, and that its enactment in the form in which it is enacted will be hailed as vindicating his leadership. Calvin knew a thing or two.

SENATOR COUZENS, as bland and guileless as when he induced an unsuspecting Old Guard last year to authorize his sweeping investigation of the communications and power industries, has now introduced a bill to regulate the interstate power industry. He will not succeed in slipping this one through: it has too much dynamite—and the Power Trust has too many eyes. In addition to creating a permanent Federal Power Commission, the bill would provide for regulation of interstate power on such a scale, and with such powers, as the Interstate Commerce Commission rightly seeks in connection with railroad regulation. It would extend this regulation not only to the producers, transmitters, and distributors of interstate power, but also to holding and management companies of all kinds and their affiliated companies. It would compel all of them to submit their books to regular inspection. In brief, it would enable the federal government at last to ascertain the full extent of the partially hidden profits of the power industry, in so far as it engages in interstate commerce, and to restrict them to decent limits, a thing no government authority now has the power to do. The necessity of such legislation needs no argument, but the bill will pass, if it passes at all, only after a terrific battle, because it is designed to end what Senator Howell has called "the fattest form of public-utility graft that ever existed in this country." The undisturbed enjoyment of such a graft will not be surrendered without fighting—in both the Chinese and American styles.

Being Right with Babson

By RALPH WEST ROBEY

MONDAY is proverbially blue and Friday notoriously unlucky. Thursday, however, is the worst day for Wall Street. On that day too many financial data are given out to make it comfortable for those interested in stock prices. Thursday afternoon the figures on brokers' loans and the condition statement of the Federal Reserve Bank are made public. It is also on that day that any change in the rediscount rate is announced. It is, in other words, a day when the stock market is in no mood for jesting and a time when one should be careful of what he says, especially if his words may be interpreted in any unfavorable light.

Despite these considerations, it was on a Thursday that Roger W. Babson made his most famous prediction. On Thursday, September 5, 1929, he foretold a drop in stock prices of sixty to eighty points. It was not, of course, Babson's first prophecy, for his principal business for many years has been to read the future for business men. It was not, by some hundreds, his first statement on the future of stock prices. In fact, it was not, by some scores, even his first prediction that stock prices were going to decline. For some reason, however, the statement was given a most unusual amount of publicity for a Babson prediction. The telegraphic news services rushed it all over the country, and the newspapers shortly were giving it even more space than they normally accorded a statement by Secretary Mellon on the fundamental soundness of American business. Even the stock market supposedly took notice of the forecast and stopped its tiresome upward movement to pay Babson a rare compliment by being very weak for a day or two, thus attracting further attention to the prediction.

Actually, the market never did get back into its old swing, and two weeks later, to the day, it reached its high for all time. On this latter date, Thursday, September 19, the twenty-five securities used by the New York Times as its index of industrial stock prices reached the astounding average of $469 a share. From this level there began a recession which in five weeks carried prices down to almost $400 a share. After this all orderliness in the decline disappeared and in three weeks industrial shares dropped in value almost 50 per cent, or to $221 on November 13. At this point it was only natural that many individuals should recall Babson's prophecy of a few weeks earlier. The difficulty was that he had not supported his prediction by arguments sufficiently strong to make one take him seriously. Dozens of people had been preaching lower stock prices for some years.

Many of them had given far better reasons than the one vouchsafed by Babson: "Thus far there have been few deaths among those with very large stock holdings. Before long these men will begin to die and their holdings will be put on the market." After the panic one might maintain that he had not followed Babson because he had not believed that Babson possessed any special information on the death-rate of large security owners, but that kind of rationalization could provide only limited consolation. The fact remained that anyone who had adopted his point of view and had got out of the market was much better off than many of the rest of us. In any event, Babson soon became the lion among stock-market prognosticators. It was only a matter of days until he was writing for one of the New York evening papers, which placarded the subways with the slogan "Be Right with Babson." This latter was a distinct victory for him, and since he likes to include in his business-forecasting service a substantial amount of religious sentiment, it must have been a source of regret that the slogan was not joined with the old hymn "Get Right with God."

Most of those who thus adopted Babson as their guiding light probably were not more than casually familiar with the method followed by him in his prognostications. As so-called scientific methods of forecasting go, however, it is relatively simple. In his words:

> Our forecast of future events is based on the assumption that the law of action and reaction applies to economics and human relations, en masse, as it applies to mechanics. Thus we assume that abnormal depression must follow abnormal activity; that lower prices must follow higher prices or vice versa; and that we as classes or nations must ourselves get what we give and must prosper as we serve.

The "law of action and reaction" is the thing. And, as understood by Babson, it has a delightful universality. For example:

> Don't try to force yourself to "love God." Just accept the great truth that God loves you and is anxious to have you well, useful, and happy. Leave the rest to the law of action and reaction.

Or, in discussing the changing styles in women's dresses:

> . . . we have concluded that women will accept the longer skirt, due to the fundamental law of action and reaction.

That there is a certain basic accuracy in this "law" goes without saying. Even small boys playing in the streets frequently refer to it, although among them it is stated in less technical language, such as, "What goes up must come down." Nevertheless, it all amounts to the same thing, except in the breadth of its applicability. Many people believe that when it is applied to economic phenomena, the points when business or prices will start up or down and how far they will go in either direction are much more difficult to determine than if one is swinging a pendulum in a physics laboratory or throwing pebbles into the air. Doubtless Babson himself thinks of this from time to time, for he has not always during the years that are past been so fortunate in his predictions as he was with that of September 5.

Babson's predictions on general business, however, are of no interest for the present. Here we are concerned only with his forecasts on stock prices or, more accurately, with his prophecies since 1926. By so limiting the discussion it is possible to compare his statements and advice with actual events and thereby furnish a possible explanation for the general skepticism with which his September prognostication was received. For this purpose it is well to recall that stock prices made a substantial advance between the latter part of 1921 and the first of 1926. For the twenty-five industrials of the Times index the increase was from $67 a share on August 24, 1921, to $184 a share on February 10, 1926. During the rest of February of the latter year and throughout March prices receded until on March 30 the average was only $139 a share. This decline, obviously, was extremely severe when considered on a percentage basis. In fact, until the recent panic the March, 1926, break was frequently referred to as the worst thing that had happened to the market in many years.

Babson, however, did not think that the decline had gone far enough to create any real stock bargains. Thus, after stocks floundered between $140 and $150 a share during April and May, 1926, we find him praising in the following words those of his clients who were following his "system":

> . . . those who are using their funds according to the long-swing-area method are now holding their capital in liquid form in order to have it intact when the right buying period arrives. The Babson chart now indicates that this is the correct policy.

On the date of this statement, June 8, 1926, the average price of the twenty-five industrials was $151. The following day they held steady and then started upon an upward movement. But this could not fool Babson and a week later he explained the rise as being "due to short covering and so-called 'investment' buying." He also went ahead in the same letter to advise his clients to "continue to hold their funds in good liquid condition to the extent that they wish to participate in the next major stock-market movement." The market still continued to move slightly upward and Babson strengthened his advice by telling his followers on June 29 that they "should take advantage of the strong spots" for getting out of the market. Within a week after this the market made its little courtesy to the 150's and moved on to better levels.

For the rest of the year the rate of increase in stock prices was not rapid, but gradually they climbed until by the middle of December, 1926, the average was $180. Babson, in the meantime, continued to advise his clients to stay out of the market. At times, in fact, he became almost insulting to those who might have differed with him, as, for example, on September 7 when he said "no sane investor" would "be loaded up with stocks at such a time." By May, 1927, the average of the industrials was more than $200, or some 25 per cent above their level at the time of the first advice noted above. Babson thought there would be "wonderful opportunities later" and that it was no time to buy. From May to September prices continued their advance. In October there was a slight reaction but by the end of November the industrials were up to $241 a share. It was at this time that Babson issued a letter giving Twelve Points in 1928 Business. The fourth among these referred to the stock market and said that "any major movement should be on the downward side." This, it will be noted, was his blanket forecast for the whole of 1928. As the year progressed he continuously bombarded his subscribers with the gospel that they must keep out of the market, that they should buy bonds, that "the writing is on the wall," that it was the "time for even the most thoughtless to stop, look, and listen," and that it was "only common sense to be prepared for a reaction." In the meantime the market boiled, and on January 2, 1929, the twenty-five industrials closed at $338 a share.

Obviously, it is not worth while going ahead. Babson continued to issue his bearish statements and the market continued upward, finally reaching $469 a share. Babson followers enjoyed none of this general average advance of 330 points, for they had been out of the market since early in 1926, except for the stocks especially recommended by Babson from time to time. It is only fair to give Babson credit for these special recommendations, for they constituted exceptions to his general bearish position. Babson himself appears to have been rather proud of the selections. Evidence of this pride is provided by a special circular issued December 3, 1928, giving the list of such recommendations as "a summary of what the Babson Statistical Organization has done for its clients." The list is too long to be given in full but a sample may be of interest, for, as was stated, "the list speaks for itself."

During the period July to November, 1928, seven securities were recommended, as follows: Anaconda Common at $67.75; Beacon Oil Common at $20; Louisville Gas and Electric, Class A, at $38; Pacific Gas and Electric Common at $47.75; Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron at $30; Pierce Petroleum Common at $4; and White Eagle Oil at $30. Had one bought one hundred shares of each of these at the price suggested they would have cost a total of $23,750. Had the whole lot been sold at the time of the general low of the stock market, November 13, 1929, they would have brought $19,412, or 18 per cent below what they had cost. On the other hand, if instead of following these special recommendations an investor on July 2, 1928, had purchased an equal number of shares of each of the twenty-five industrials used by the Times and had sold them at the bottom of the market, November 13, 1929, he would have lost only 13 per cent of his capital. Theoretically, therefore, since the twenty-five industrials were presumably selected because they are representative of the whole market and not because they offered any special investment or speculative opportunities, the Babson follower was more than 25 per cent worse off than the foolish speculator who tossed a coin to see what he should buy.

It is very probable that Babson would contest the fairness of this comparison on the basis that his followers bought their securities outright and consequently did not sell at the low of the market. This is a thoroughly legitimate point of view. Unfortunately for Babson it does not help much in the present instance, for if our hypothetical Babson investor was still holding the seven securities on March 11, 1930, they were worth then $25,025, or 5 per cent more than they had cost. Contrasted with this is the position of the one who theoretically tossed a coin. His stocks on March 11 were worth 29 per cent more than he had paid for them.

Such are the facts. Yet they should not cause Babson any embarrassment, for as he said in his letter of July 3, 1928: "For profits made we give ourselves credit; for losses we blame circumstances." Perhaps this frankness is sufficient solace for his more faithful followers. Others may wonder if he was not really serious back in June, 1928, when he advised: "Clients who own farms with good green pasture which is idle should consider goose-raising."

How Digging Began

By ANNE KIMBALL TUELL

THE sound conservative who prefers to think of a world finished once for all, warranted not to move or to develop, might find satisfaction in exhuming a forgotten Eden tale of the early sixteenth century, innocently known, or rather unknown, as Barclay's "Fifth Eclogue." Here is to be recovered an account of creation at least as static as the one in the narrative of Holy Writ, with additional reassurance concerning the final and divine ordinance for existing classes. There is in the rugged lines no notion at all of irony, but they present with naive and unconscious daring a theory of social origins as diverting as the mind of Anatole France could contrive for the race of penguins, a comfortable creed for the easier centuries before the voice of Demos was heard in the land. Shorn of rough spelling and uncouth word the story sounds still with the simplicity of days "when Adam delved and Eve span." There is no moral issue, no subtle serpent, no fall from obedience. At least one version of the universe, we are happy to find, has made no attempt to justify the ways of God to man. The earning of bread by hard means is but the result of a mistake. Eve of course was to blame.

The beginning reads like the story as we know it:

> First when the world was formed in creation,
> And Adam and Eve were set in their station,
> Our Lord conjoined them both as man and wife,
> To live in accord the season of their life.

By this genial version our Father Adam had in Eden a very happy family, for God

> Commanded mankind to multiply,
> By generation to get them progeny.

And the generation of a healthy race was no curse, no hard doom for the multiplication of sorrow. It was the joyous business of Eden. Eve did not shrink from her responsibilities. She liked her children well. Nor is there more than hint of a tragic apple. (We might all be united today as far as the apple was concerned.) Moreover, labor was pleasant in Eden till the fatal visit of the Lord of Creation, which turned quite accidentally into a visitation:

> The while that Adam was pitching of the fold,
> Eve was at home and sat on the threshold,
> With all her babies and children her about,
> Either in her lap within or else without.
> Now had she pleasure them hugging and kissing,
> And then was she busy them cleaning and combing.

All was joy till the coming of the Creator and the division of the children of men:

> At last our Lord upon the fifteenth year,
> To Eve, our mother, did on a time appear.

Misfortune struck, as it always does, on a pleasant day. Eve had just been especially happy with her babies—busy, by a custom which one can bear to find obsolete, "with butter to anoint their necks," but alas!

> In the meantime, while she was occupied,
> Our Lord drawing near she suddenly espied.

Eve was very naturally in a flutter. And here, too, as in Genesis, she was ashamed, but only at the size of her family. Hence her scramble and ill-advised concealment. For it must be confessed that there was in the mother of all women a certain disingenuousness about her children:

> And all ashamed, as fast as ever she might,
> She hasted and hid some of them out of sight,
> Some under hay, some under straw and chaff,
> Some in the chimney, some in a tub of draff. /
> But such as were fair and of their stature right,
> As wise and subtle reserved she in sight.

We cannot wonder at her nervousness. "The Father and Lord omnipotent" appeared to be a variable and arbitrary God, a combination of Caliban and Cheeryble brothers. One could not be sure of suiting Him. But He came this day in a mood wholly benevolent—just to see the children and, as is the wont of visitors, to give them something. And He said:

> "Woman, let me thy children see.
> I come to promote each in his degree."

Eve was not unnaturally "amazed," but hurried forward her most presentable.

> God on them smiled and them comforted so,
> As we with birds and dogs used to do.

He is a God who likes pretty children; and the gifts are forthcoming straightway, no less than "the honors belonging to mankind":

> At last to the most old of all
> He said, "Have thou the scepter of Rome imperial.
> Thou art the eldest. Thou shalt have most honor.
> Justice requireth that thou be emperor."
> Then to the second He said, "It is seeming
> That thou be exalted to the honor of a king."
> And unto the third He gave such dignity
> To guide an army and noble duke to be.

And so forth to the others as they were in degree. According to the original divine plan, apparently, everybody was to lord it in some fashion over everybody else.

Eve, delighted at the unlimited shower of benefactions, grieved as well she might for the unlucky children tucked away—a whole troupe of little Esaus. Was there to be no blessing for them? Without stopping to consider their appearance, she made haste to drag them from their hiding places. If they had not been prepossessing to begin with, they were not improved by their late experience:

> Their hair was rugged and powdered all with chaff,
> Some full of straws, some others full of draff,
> Some with cobwebs and dust were so arrayed
> That one beholding them might be afraid.

And the temper of the Lord was changed as He beheld them:

> Our Lord smiled not on them to show His pleasure,
> But said to them with troubled countenance,
> "Ye smell all smoky, of stubble and of chaff, > Ye smell of the ground, of weeds, and of draff."

There are no gifts for such dirty children as these. The Lord has a daintier sense for the fitness of things, though He is as anxious as Milton's God about His reputation for omnipotence:

> "I shall not, although I well can,
> Of a foul villein make a gentleman."

And so the curse descended—the curse at last, though only upon a limited number of the children of men:

> "Ye shall be ploughmen and tillers of the ground;
> To pain and labor shall ye always be bound.
> Some shall keep oxen, and some shall hogs keep,
> To dig and to delve, to hedge and to dyke,
> Take this for your lot and other labor like.
> To drudge and to drivel in works vile and rude,
> This wise shall ye live in endless servitude.
> To stoop and to sweat and subject to become,
> And never to be rid of bondage and thraldom."

There was to be no nonsense, no compounding with strikes:

> Then bade He them be tough,
> And never to grudge at labor or at pain,
> For if they did so, it should be thing in vain.

Alas for the digger and delver!

> Thus said the Lord and Father omnipotent,
> And then He ascended up into the firmament.

In the Driftway

SNAKE stories are circulated by the Florida press in winter with the same avidity and gusto with which tales of sea serpents are printed by newspapers in the North in summer. It might seem that in this age of unbelief both sets of yarns would gradually die of anemia and malnutrition, but fortunately for the amusement of the human race there seems to be no immediate danger of such a catastrophe. At least the 1930 crop seems to be without blight or blemish, for in spite of the presence in the orange groves of what Florida newspapers call for short the "Medfly," the St. Petersburg Evening Independent reports that the snake-story season has opened on the east coast of the State both auspiciously and conspicuously. "One night last week," it says, "a snake, which apparently was out making whoopee, climbed a power company's pole, got tangled up with the wires, caused a short circuit, and left everything on the east coast from West Palm Beach to Fort Lauderdale in the dark." One recognizes at once all the makings of a good snake story, and there is no let-down or sad ending to spoil what follows. It was a blacksnake, one learns further, which accounts for its ability to climb a smooth pole—all blacksnakes and "blue racers" are proficient in that art. The skilled reptile wriggled itself to the top of the pole, possibly thinking it was a wireless system. Or maybe it was just that the snake's early education in electricity had been defective. Anyhow, when the snake reached the top of the pole it carelessly allowed its head to come in contact with a high-voltage line at the same moment that it undertook to get a tail-hold on another wire. In less than a second, cafeterias, hotels, night clubs, amusement parks, theaters, and homes had to fall back on lamps, candles, electric flashlights, or just matches.

* * * * *

THE snake had evidently abstained from alcohol and tobacco in its youth and so was able to put up a game fight for its life when the crisis arrived. Sixty thousand volts of the best electricity the Florida Power Company had to offer flowed through the snake's body, but though "cooked to a crisp brown," the Evening Independent avers, "it remained in one piece." The newspaper fails to state whether or not the doughty reptile lived through the process, but that is a detail of little interest to anyone except, perhaps, the snake. The newspaper does say, though, that the east-coast manager of the power company was rather flabbergasted, remarking that in his experience whenever a cocoanut palm fell on a wire the current invariably burned the tree in two. Not so, it appears, with Florida blacksnakes.

* * * * *

THE story seems almost flawless as it stands, but the Evening Independent complains that one important point was not explained. Why, it wants to know, did the snake climb the pole? Speculating on this point, the journal suggests that the reptile may have found a still and after slaking its thirst, obeyed the impulse which has been known to cause humans in a similar situation to try to climb lamp posts or other poles. Or the snake may have gone up the pole to hunt woodpeckers, a variety of game much esteemed in snakedom. Again, hazards the newspaper, the reptile may have made the ascent to take electric treatment for its rheumatism. And, finally, it may have gone up the pole just for the fun of the trip. "Certainly," the newspaper concludes plaintively, "there should have been some explanation of why the snake went up the pole." The Drifter raises his hand eagerly, confident that he can supply the explanation. Recalling the answer to the classic conundrum "Why does the old hen cross the road?" the Drifter replies that the snake had been reading the success stories in the popular magazines and climbed the pole because it wanted to get to the top.

Police Brutality

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The sheer brutality of the police in Union Square on March 6 makes one ill. I am not in sympathy with the Communist movement, but the beating of defenseless men and women by armed men is a disgrace to our alleged civilization. Can you not raise your voice in protest against this disgusting condition? Can you not find words that will bite into the consciousness of the authorities so that they will desist from such disgraceful exhibitions of brute force?

There Is a Conspiracy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your suspicion, expressed editorially in the issue of March 12, that there is a wicked conspiracy against buying books is more than half right. There is one, and a lot of us are in it; and moreover we're going to stay in it until the publishers get on their mark in the matter of reasonable prices for their output.

About one book in a hundred published is worth keeping; I say this in the face of an unprecedented, and not unbiased, claque. Books are made to pass an idle hour and be thrown away. We used to pay a dollar to a dollar and a quarter for them; now we have to pay two to two and a half dollars; yet during the same period we have seen the price of automobiles go from $1,500 down to $600 for an infinitely better machine. Moreover, by waiting six months we can buy our book in perfectly good format for seventy-five cents a copy.

I get books from a library for two reasons aside from the above, namely, to pass the time pleasantly, and to see whether the book is worth buying to keep. Libraries are making readers; readers will pay for good books; but they will not be mulcted, though the publishers weep. We don't get Mr. Ford's autos, nor Mr. Gillette's razors from a "library," because we can buy them at a reasonable price.

"Noble in Motive"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the last paragraph on page 231 of your issue of February 26, in referring to the "so-called Hoover reforms," you use the phrase "noble experiment." In your edition of March 5 the very first editorial repeats this inaccuracy. Permit me to quote to you the correct version of the statement of President Hoover in his speech of acceptance at Palo Alto: "Our country has deliberately undertaken a great social and economic experiment, noble in motive and far-reaching in purpose."

It is disheartening to the loyal readers of The Nation to be obliged to question its truthfulness because of repeated inaccuracies of statement.

Economics and Ethics

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Henry Raymond Mussey's review of John A. Hobson's book, "Economics and Ethics," had a peculiar attraction for me. Something over forty years ago I made the acquaintance of a printer in New York who had written a book on a subject connected with both economics and ethics. My friend's book had a considerable circulation, and he later wrote others, one of which especially should be carefully read or read again by both Mr. Hobson and Mr. Mussey.

It appears that my printer friend had very definite ideas about political economy, and it comes to my mind that he cautioned his readers to be carefully on guard when dealing with utterances of those who undertook to label their subject "economics" rather than "political economy," because, he said, the term economics had been used to make what is not really political economy pass for political economy. In his last book, he argued that a true political economy had nothing whatever to do with ethics, and he went on to say about political economy this pregnant sentence:

> Although it will be found incidentally to throw a most powerful light upon, and to give a most powerful support to, the teachings of moral or ethical science, its proper business is neither to explain the difference between right and wrong nor to persuade to one in preference to the other.

If my printer friend was an able man, well informed, and remarkable for his power of analysis, arrangement, and illustration, and if his views were evidently greatly at variance with those of Mr. Hobson and Mr. Mussey, the question may be asked which views are the most worthy of being referred to and explained in the columns of The Nation.

Our own John Dewey not long ago wrote of my printer friend as follows:

> It would require less than the fingers of the two hands to enumerate those who, from Plato down, rank with this man among the world's social philosophers. No man, no graduate of a higher educational institution, has a right to regard himself as an educated man in social thought unless he has some first-hand acquaintance with the theoretical contribution of this great American thinker.

His name was Henry George.

In Defense of Henry P. Fletcher

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I do not know, of course, the source of the information upon which The Nation based its statement, in the issue of February 19, that "as for Henry P. Fletcher, his discouraging record as Ambassador to Mexico, where he stood with the interventionists, is clearly on record." But I do know this: it is not so. This is not entirely a personal expression of fact and opinion, although I was a constant and close observer, on the ground, of Fletcher's official conduct during all of his diplomatic career in Mexico. For if we choose to stand by the record we find that Fletcher was certainly in hot water with, and covertly and overtly criticized by, the outstanding interventionists of his time. You know who they were.

For proof, vide the attacks upon him which were permitted to go into the record of the notoriously interventionist activities of the committee of the Senate which investigated Mexico, as well as Fletcher's conservative and judicial statements regarding conditions in Mexico, which he had made previously as a witness before a similar investigating committee of the House. These are matters of accurate record.

Very distinctly, also, I recall a certain occasion upon which I heard Fall, who was famously head devil among all the thirty-third-degree interventionists, criticize Fletcher bitterly for not handling his job as Ambassador to Mexico in the manner in which Fall thought it should be handled.

Czecho-Slovak Minorities

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In The Nation of March 5 Mr. S. Klíma takes exception to your statement in an editorial of December 25 that Czecho-Slovakia has "treated the minorities treaties very much like scraps of paper." The December, 1929, issue of Nation und Staat, a Viennese journal devoted to the interests of minorities, fully substantiates your editorial. From a review of the progress—and retrogression—of the rights of minorities during 1929, I note the following, which, for the sake of brevity, I translate into abstract form:

> In Czecho-Slovakia the year began with the inauguration of the administrative reforms of 1927. In the provinces and government districts, it will be remembered, one-third of the representatives are appointed; and not only the "minorities" but also the Slovaks are disregarded in these appointments. Not a single German has been appointed as provincial president or vice-president. The same discrimination was exercised in the formulation of the law providing for representation in the Chamber of Commerce. As regards foreign affairs, we need only to call attention to the fact that Minister Benes, in the League of Nations, made himself leader of the enemies of the minorities. Within the Czecho-Slovak state there was no advance whatever in the rights of minorities in 1929.

In general, it may be said that in all the newly created states except Esthonia and Rumania there was not only no advance in the rights of minorities, but an actual retrogression; and, one may add, if in the two old states that acquired a large number of unwilling subjects, namely, Italy and France, minorities suffered no more last year than they had before, it is because the governments of these states started at the nadir of injustice and could not, therefore, have retrograded. The student who has followed the policy of these two states, together with those of Poland and Jugoslavia, in their attitude toward minorities has given up all hope of generosity or justice on their part; but those who associate the new state of Czecho-Slovakia with its founder and first President, Masaryk, the liberal scholar and philosopher, are keenly disappointed at finding that the rights for which he fought to create a new state are so disregarded, now that he rules over it.

Boy Scouts and Peace

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Nation for February 19 contained a letter from Abraham A. Conan relating to the bill introduced into the New York Assembly by Assemblyman Coughlin, proposing to institute training under the Boy Scout program in the public schools.

While this measure was introduced by Mr. Coughlin with the very best intentions in the world because he believes that the Boy Scout program is bringing something to the boyhood of America, yet I join with Mr. Conan in holding that such a law would be out of harmony with the democratic ideals and the best traditions of our Republic, and just as sincerely as you could possibly wish it I hope that it may not receive serious consideration at the hands of the legislature.

I would, however, most certainly disagree with him that this measure would have any unfavorable bearing upon the cause of international peace. If he might have seen the great international jamboree of Boy Scouts at Birkenhead, England, last summer, where between fifty and sixty thousand boys from forty-two nations and seventy-three lands were gathered together for two weeks in the greatest comradeship and friendship, he would feel, I am certain, that the Boy Scout movement is making its contribution to settlement of world differences. To be sure there is discipline in the Boy Scout organization, but there is no such thing as a military discipline.

The main point which I should like to establish with you, however, is that under no circumstances nor conditions are boys forced into the Boy Scout movement. The whole genius of the movement consists in presenting a program which shall be so attractive that boys will want to be Scouts.

Mountain Background

By GLENN WARD DRESBACH

This is the background for the silver plunge
Of waterfalls, for wings like petals blown
Across infinity, and for the lunge
Of fiery swords against the shields of stone.
Here cedars from contention in the dark
Affirm the nearness of the stars, and here
Age-carved designs remain unchanged by mark
Of pageants fading down another year.

Plows cannot bite this soil to tenderness,
Or fences leap the gorge and grip the ledge.
A man is one more shadow here, to press
Against the stone or face across the edge
Infinity that answers—if he calls—
With echoes hurled back by a thousand walls.

An Unrepentant Naturalist

Montaigne. By André Gide. Translated by Stephen H. Guest and Trevor E. Blewitt. Horace Liveright. Autographed Limited Edition. $5.

I FIND the style and structure of this volume irritating. The reaction in France against the grace and fluency of Anatole France and his school has gone in some instances to absurd lengths, and leading French writers seem now to be seeking a reputation for depth and subtlety by the process of endlessly qualifying their sentences, ripping them open and stuffing them full of involved parentheses. I offer a brief example from M. Gide's present essay:

> One of the most surprising passages in Montaigne is that wherein, after having defended himself against the accusation of obscurity (an accusation doubtless leveled in his day against any writer who broke with conventional sentiment by attempting a stricter sincerity) and protested against the insupportable confounding of obscurity with depth that already certain "precious" writers were delighting in ("they will conclude the mystery and depth of my sense by the obscuritie" III, 245), he declares: "which" (obscurity) "I hate" (subsequently he added "extreemely") "and would shun if I could disguise myselfe" (later on he substituted "avoide myselfe").

M. Gide is not satisfied with wedging these qualifications and parentheses into nearly all his sentences; he sprinkles them with asterisks that refer us to notes in the back, and the notes are frequently further modifications. He is capable of writing, for example, that Goethe is superior to Montaigne by virtue of his "interior demon," then of referring us to a note in the appendix in which he finds that "on maturer consideration, this remark about Goethe no longer seems to me quite justified"—and so on. I hope I am not too naive in asking why, in that case, he did not alter his original remark.

The irritation produced by all this is aggravated by several other factors. The book puts forward no clear single thesis, moves in no particular direction, and has no continuity or flow. It is simply a series of footnotes, often not more than a page or two in length, on various passages from Montaigne. The notes are separated by blank lines, and strung along apparently in random fashion. The general effect is almost as if M. Gide had once planned a substantial book on Montaigne, had begun taking notes on it, and then, despairing of ever being able to weave them into an integral whole, had simply sent them off to the printer as they were.

Add further that the translators, in transcribing the passages from Montaigne, have used the Florio translation. Now Florio has a salty Elizabethan flavor of his own, but he is not very accurate (he made such elementary blunders, for example, as translating poisson into poison), and it is often with difficulty that one finds one's way through his antiquated syntax and diction. The result is that many of the quotations as they stand are unintelligible, particularly as they are torn out of their explanatory context; and one is forced to turn either directly to the Florio or to the admirable modern translation of Trechmann to squeeze the meaning out of them.

I need hardly say that as a result of all this M. Gide's book lacks the independent charm that first-rate criticism ought to have; one cannot enjoy it for its own sake in the way that one can the essays on Montaigne by Emerson and Sainte-Beuve. M. Gide thinks that Montaigne would forgive him "for treating him in the desultory fashion that is his own," but there is a vast difference between the desultoriness of Montaigne and that of his critic. Montaigne's writing, indeed, has the informality of conversation, but few writers carry you along so swiftly and easily as he does; his transitions and digressions, too, are as natural as those of fine talk. In M. Gide's present volume there are no transitions; the reader is simply bumped abruptly from one idea to the next.

Taken separately, however, M. Gide's observations are remarkably just and shrewd, and, in the end, rather thorough. Few comments are happier than that in which Gide regrets Montaigne's death a few years before the appearance of "Don Quixote": "The book was written for him. . . . It was at the expense of Don Quixote that, little by little, Sancho Panza came to great stature in him." And the concluding section of Part I is so admirable that I cannot forbear quoting it at length:

> To those who may accuse me of presenting Montaigne's ideas edge foremost I would reply that too many of his commentators have busied themselves with supplying buttons for his foils. . . . The chief preoccupation of the pundits, in the face of daring authors who nevertheless have become classics, is to make them inoffensive. The mere passage of time works also, admirably, and quite naturally, toward this end. After a brief interval it is as if the blade of new thought had become blunt; familiarity allows us to handle it without fear of being wounded.

One more point, which M. Gide merely hints at in passing, but which, in view of the present vogue of humanism, is worth explicit statement. Montaigne, a century and a half before Rousseau came into the world, and when even Francis Bacon was no more than an infant, was already a confirmed "naturalist." The passages in which he reveals this are too numerous for quotation. I confine myself to three:

> Philosophy appears to me very childish when she rides the high horse, and preaches to us that it is a barbarous alliance to marry the divine with the earthly . . . that sensual pleasure is a brutish thing, unworthy to be enjoyed by the sage. . . .
> Nature has, with motherly care, observed this rule, that the actions she has laid upon us for our need should give us pleasure; and she invites us to them, not only through our reason, but through our desire. It is wrong to infringe her rules.
> As I have said elsewhere, I have for my part adopted, very simply and crudely, this ancient rule, "that we cannot go wrong if we follow Nature," and that the sovereign precept is "to conform to her."

These sentiments, no doubt, are somewhat embarrassing to Mr. Babbitt's theory that all such heresy stems from Rousseau, but it is rather late for anything to be done about it.

Froude Rehabilitated

Froude and Carlyle: A Study of the Froude-Carlyle Controversy. By Waldo H. Dunn. Longmans, Green and Company. $5.

IT is idle to regret that there ever was any quarrel over Froude's handling of the Carlyle documents and his personal portrait of Carlyle. The controversy, which still persists after fifty years, had the good effect of bringing out all the facts, however muddled by useless bickerings and adventitious and irrelevant interests. Now Professor Dunn seems to have settled the main questions once and for all in a volume which is a model of scholarship in its careful examination of evidence and its clear, dispassionate interpretation of the evidence. Though in the nature of the case some of the details are vexatiously minute, they are all essential, and the whole book can be read with pleasure both by those who are especially interested in Carlyle and by those who have only a general liking for any good specimen of biographical study. A brief review cannot even hint a summary of this complicated matter, the involvements of which are due primarily to the perplexing, many-sided Carlyle, the scarcely less multiple character of his wife, and the intricate difficulties of the task which Carlyle placed upon the shoulders of Froude. It should be said at once, however, that the upshot of it all is wholly satisfactory so far as the really important persons are concerned, that Thomas and Jane Carlyle and Froude emerge without a serious blemish on their extraordinarily fine characters, that they are seen more clearly than ever as what they indubitably were—salient, admirable, remarkable persons. The shortcomings of such persons are noteworthy simply because the persons are in every way noteworthy, because they stand up under temperamental failings and harassments of circumstance by virtue of their superb courage and intellectual power.

Two or three persons do not come out altogether well: Carlyle's niece, Mary, who, more than anybody else, started the argument; Mary's husband and cousin, Alexander Carlyle, who naturally carries on his wife's spirit; James Crichton-Browne and David Wilson, to whom the muses seem to have issued no valid license to write biography at all; and, most important of the outside contributors to the stewing caldron, Charles Eliot Norton, who quite honestly got on the wrong side in spite of the plain rebuke administered to him by an inside and loyal authority, Ruskin. Norton's eminence gave great weight to his opinions, which were unfavorable to Froude and prevailed unquestioned among American students who were brought up to regard Norton as the grand old man of Harvard. Younger instructors under Norton's influence taught us that Froude had blackened his master and that Norton had come to the rescue, corrected Froude's editing, removed the smirches, and cleaned everything up beautifully. This simply never happened, because Froude never blackened Carlyle, never misrepresented him, was never guilty of anything but minor inaccuracies which no more disfigure his magnificent portrait than a speck of dust on a great painting, never underpraised Thomas or overpraised Jane, never did anything but adore and celebrate his hero and his heroine, but like the honest man and excellent artist that he was, drew them in the spirit of Cromwell's injunction to the portrait painter, "wart and all."

When, in accordance with the unequivocal and complete discretion given to Froude by Carlyle and confirmed by many years of intimate association and discussion, Froude published the "Reminiscences," Mary Carlyle immediately, in letters to the Times and the Daily Telegraph, accused him of having published the book against her uncle's wishes. This was a false charge, by any reasonable interpretation of Carlyle's written will or of Froude's understanding of his master's spoken instructions. The young lady wanted the commercially valuable literary remains of Carlyle for herself, and that was all that really ailed her. But she was not the only mischief-maker. For years Froude's other work had entangled him in controversy, and his enemies were lying in wait for him. Here was a chance to strike him and discredit him. But they made a mistake. Froude was legally right and morally right, and though he was very patient he was a good fighter and naturally sensitive when his honor and good faith were attacked. He left with his children, to defend his reputation after his death, the pamphlet "My Relations with Carlyle," which the Froudes published in 1903 (Froude died in 1894).

The pamphlet revealed what hitherto Froude had delicately suppressed, that Carlyle once in a fit of violence had left "blue marks" on Jane's wrists, and that, as the inner circle of the Carlyle acquaintance already knew, Carlyle was sexually incapable. This set going a fresh controversy, in medical and lay journals, as to Mrs. Carlyle's condition and physical competence. The net conclusion from that discussion is that these two passionate, high-strung people were not ultimately happy together, and that they went through a nerve-racking experience for many years with great bravery and undeviating devotion to their ideas of duty. They were largely saved, no doubt, by their infallible pawky humor. Perhaps between them they had too much genius for one small house to hold. But the genius was there, and that is what really matters for literature. Something else matters immensely, the genius of Froude, who has given us one of the supreme masterpieces of literary biography, rivaled only by Boswell's "Johnson," Lockhart's "Scott," and Forster's "Dickens." Something may still be added to our understanding of Carlyle, but no biography can supersede Froude's. Professor Dunn says: "On the foundation of Froude's work there will some day be constructed a short and properly proportioned interpretation of Carlyle." Well, who in the world is better qualified to write it than Professor Dunn himself?

Why We Fought

Why We Fought. By C. Hartley Grattan. The Vanguard Press. $3.50.

IN the front of this book the author quotes Randolph Bourne as saying: "There is work to be done to prevent this war of ours from passing into mythology as a holy crusade." Mr. Grattan here does his part of the job with competence and spirit. He deals with the propaganda, the economics, and the diplomacy that sent us into the war with Germany. The effect is terrifying—terrifying because of its revelations of the weakness of a democracy whose virtue can be so readily taken by such clumsy suitors as the Allies and their friends this side the water.

To be sure, it was no great trick for the jingoes, as Mr. Grattan abundantly proves, to win over such incorrigible Anglophiles as Walter Hines Page and Colonel E. M. House. Our Ambassador to Great Britain and Mr. Wilson's Man Friday both show themselves to have been as easy pickings for the Allied diplomats prior to our entrance into the war as was Mr. Wilson at Versailles. Even little Jimmy Gerard (perhaps it was his Tammany training) comes off better than these inflated two. And Bryan, by comparison, was the stern realist.

But what happened to 100,000,000 people, irritated perhaps but by no means in a hot fighting mood, between November 7, 1916, when they reelected Wilson because "he kept us out of war" and April 6, 1917, when they cheered Wilson because he put us in?

Mr. Grattan's book is more a masterly compilation of the "revisionist" documents and the post-war memoirs than any new contribution to the perplexed matter of our amazing war entrance. It serves the useful purpose of reminding us once more that democracy's Achilles's heel is its foreign relations; and that any little group of weak and wilful men, uninformed and irresponsible to a real public desire, can set the war drums beating at the command of that powerful minority which likes its music martial. McALISTER COLEMAN

From the French

"— & Co." By Jean-Richard Bloch. Translated by C. K. Scott-Moncrieff. With an Introduction by Romain Rolland. Simon and Schuster. $3.

IN a somewhat windy introduction to this very interesting novel Romain Rolland compares it to the work of Balzac. If one is thinking of style, the comparison is inept enough, since the tales of Balzac belong, despite all his grandiose ideas concerning the possibilities of fiction, to the careless youth of the art when one aimed high, wrote fast, and trusted that any defects of structural detail would be forgotten amidst the rush of creative energy; whereas Jean-Richard Bloch composes words into sentences, sentences into paragraphs, and paragraphs into chapters with all the meticulous care of a man who knows that his later compatriots from Flaubert to Gide have delighted to scan a novel as narrowly as though it were a lyric. But if, on the other hand, one is thinking not of style but of theme, then the comparison is not unfitting, for "— & Co." is concerned with Balzac's favorite subject, which is money, and tells a Balzacian tale of a Jewish family mastered and destroyed by its love of honest gain.

The Simlers, weavers of Alsace, fled from their native province when it was annexed by the Prussians. They settled farther south, beginning again from the beginning, and continuing with dogged perseverance until they alone survived in the region, while their more graceful and easy-going neighbors went down one by one in an industrial upheaval. But their success—if success it was—was made possible only by the fact that they allowed themselves to become merely the creatures of the mill, which became in its turn the one justification of their existence. They were Jews with all a Jew's fidelity to the traditions of his race, but these very traditions lent themselves to the habits of which they were the victims. Family loyalty expressed itself as loyalty to the company which had absorbed the family, and the individual's obligation to sacrifice himself to duty meant primarily that the individual must sacrifice himself to that group prosperity which it was one's chief duty to maintain.

Alone in a Catholic society, the Simlers were equally untouched by the contempt with which they were first received and the respect which their success earned them, for despite the fact that they thought themselves too French to remain in a conquered province they permitted themselves little community with any group except their own. Once a year their factory, whose wheels on no other occasion could stop, ceased turning on the day of their religious holiday. Once a year the Simlers, with shawls about their shoulders, passed twenty-four hours in fasting and prayer. Yet even the son did not know what the father believed, for religion itself had no implications outside the circle of interests bounded by the walls of the mill, and it meant only that once a year one must tell God that He was somehow the reason why one sacrificed everything to the institution which, by being handed down from father to son, had become the sacred trust of every Simler. One member of the family escapes—runs away to America and returns years later with fabulous tales of more efficient factories. But he is the only one who can do so, and he has earned the reproof which is so quietly expressed because it seems to the man who utters it so crushingly unanswerable:

> He has run away. I call that cowardice. We have no right, Chosef, no right. There are certain things which we do not leave behind us, like an empty barrel: the business to which we have pledged ourselves and which bears our name, our parents, wife, children. We are all bound up with what we have done, and today is bound up with yesterday and tomorrow, and so on, like . . . the links in a chain. He thought he was setting himself free. He will live and learn. . . . And that was forbidden him, to him more than to anyone.

Bloch's style, self-conscious to the last degree, occasionally forgets such admirable simplicity as this and falls into the strained, over-intense metaphors which are the characteristic defects of the writer too anxious to keep the emotional tension through every paragraph—as it does, for example, in a passage like the following, which is, after all, merely intended to describe a hot day: "The white heat of two o'clock in the afternoon is as vertical as a flagstaff. The cry of the grasshoppers shoots its shrill points up at the sky and supports the motionless weight of the zenith. The firmament opens with the colorless misery of a blind man's eyeball." But there is no denying either the extraordinary effectiveness of the novel as a whole or the striking fashion in which it illustrates the possible effectiveness of the intellectualist treatment of the passions. Bloch, himself a Jew, has succeeded in two remarkable feats: in the first place he has comprehended through the mind the tradition which he has set out to record, and in the second place he has managed to record it in a manner which communicates the emotion without ever ceasing to seem in itself calm, detached, and almost cold. The passion of the Simlers is real, stupendous, and, because of its intensity, almost noble, but it has come to one through the understanding alone.

John Merrill's Pleasant Life. By Alice Beal Parsons. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

MRS. PARSONS is above all else intelligent, and she demands intelligence in return from her readers. For a novelist this is probably a limitation. I confess to reading to the very end of her latest book and then being obliged to turn back to the title before I thought I knew what the story was about. Mrs. Parsons disdains signposts along the way. She will not say: "This is a novel about love or about ambition or about ingratitude." She merely tells her tale quietly, competently, matter-of-factly. You must take it or leave it; you may understand it or be puzzled by it; be moved or left cold—Mrs. Parsons refuses to help you out. But I believe this is the story of John Merrill upon whom the impacts of experience made no mark; who was either so hard as to be impervious or so soft as to be completely resilient to the stings of unrequited love, to the boredom of a stupid, nagging wife, to whatever pangs of conscience might result from ingratitude to his benefactor and unfaithfulness to his wife. Things happen to John Merrill: he is in love with a heartless flirt who jilts him time and again; he marries a lovely, dumb girl who can offer him no companionship except that of the

IT IS NOT MERE CHANCE

When a magazine more than doubles its circulation in a few years, it is not a matter of luck. It simply proves that modern minded readers have come to depend upon HARPERS MAGAZINE because of its dauntless honesty, its lively variety, and the unfailing importance of its contributors and the subjects they write about.

Features in the April Number Are:

Two Unpopular Laws of Nature

We try to ignore the law that returns increase up to a certain point, and then decrease; also the law that when too many people strive after the same good, that good disappears. In "Diminishing Returns in Modern Life," James Truslow Adams shows the inexorable working of both laws in our social and political life.

"Booze in Business"

Big Business, according to the Drys, is back of Prohibition solidly. Jesse Rainsford Sprague explains that many firms do not allow these principles to blind them to the obvious advantages of the use of Scotch and gin in making sales.

Are the French Immoral?

Mary Borden, wise and witty woman of the world, explains in her "Defense of French Morals" a code that is based on common sense, that protects the community, that recognizes only one unit—the family, that is rigorously observed, and that actually works.

"The Mad Hatter's Dirty Tea Cup"

You may not realize that our country which boasts of 18 million bath tubs has the dirtiest streets and parks in the world, that it abandons on its country roads 2 million wrecks of automobiles yearly, and poisons its rivers with waste. Stuart Chase tells you why.

bed, which she withholds whenever she is offended at some trifle or other; he is offered a career and a fortune by a rich eccentric who, without an heir, is in search of someone to succeed him in his business. All these things John Merrill lives through, and at the end he is the same slightly bald, smooth-faced, smooth-minded, rather dull man he was when he started. He accepts good fortune as easily as he shakes off bad. He is, in a sense, without pride. He lives a day at a time; he is sometimes miserable, but as a child is miserable, because something he wants very badly is denied him. After a while he contents himself with wanting something else.

As in Mrs. Parsons's earlier novel, "The Insider," here is a clearly recognizable aspect of the American scene. Material success, a kind of literacy but no real intellectual attainments, an easy assimilation of what is the correct mode in literature as in house furnishings, emotions that are quick enough to respond to stimulus but that are fundamentally without passion, above all, a complete absence of generosity—not the easy generosity of giving away what you do not especially want, but the generosity of a free-flowing spirit. I think of John Merrill as a sort of snail, snug in the shell that his lack of imagination made of the world. He is completely protected —from pain and from joy. Mrs. Parsons has made him thoroughly convincing. Incidentally she has drawn extraordinarily clear portraits of three women: Anne, who could be ardent only when her lover was not near her; Mrs. Daggett, whose "being seemed relaxed and open," all of whose "nerves were untied"; and Mary, Merrill's wife, eager, trivial, manually competent, and quite without a mind. But these are only parts of John Merrill's pleasant life. Mrs. Parsons has told it with irony, with clarity—and without pity. The result may be a book that moves the mind more than the heart, but it is a book worth reading in spite of that. DOROTHY VAN DOREN

The Pueblo Artist

The Pueblo Potter. By Ruth L. Bunzel. Columbia University Press. $10.

THIS is one of an increasing number of books which excite question. What, in the flood of publications designed to interest the reader anxious for information and dubious of technical patter, is the moral responsibility of the publisher who puts a book forth under titles and descriptions which have little relation to its real worth? Here is a volume presented by a title with a misleading finality and a descriptive misrepresentation which by disappointing the expectation of the reader might do great injustice to the writer. Miss Bunzel's book is modestly written, and every item of its information carefully accounted for, but it is by no means an exhaustive study of the subject, nor even the fruit of a two years' contact as the publisher advertises. The author, by her own account, spent two summers in the pueblo country, mainly at the three pueblos of Zuñi, Acoma, and San Ildefonso, and at the Hopi group. She has also read widely on the subject, and for this preparation, her material is creditable in amount and interestingly set down. It is, indeed, excellent as far as it goes. Probably nothing will have to be retracted even in view of the great mass of material on the subject soon to burst upon the reading world. I question the dates of several of the pots selected for illustration, but that is a minor detail. Had the work been put forth as a short modern contact with a few of the existing pueblos, from which two of the most interesting are omitted—Sia, almost as rich as Zuñi in design, and Cochití, unique among the more than two score villages—there would have been little to criticize. This is undoubtedly the way a few potters in a few pueblos are making and decorating pots.

The fact is that the Amerind tribesman cannot competently be studied in any one aspect of his close-woven life without more than a little knowledge of some of the others. Many of the questions as to the source and implications of designs, which Miss Bunzel frankly admits her inability to answer, never can be answered without reference to the earlier art of Amerind poetry. If, for instance, it had occurred to her to ask of those designers who told her that they "dreamed" their patterns whether they dreamed them asleep or awake, she might have put her hand upon the key, for to the Indian a dream-vision or "dream-seeing," as I have heard them call it, is in reality the result of that intense inner concentration known to all creative artists. In the primitive it comes closer to genuine sleep-dreaming than with us, but it is the state of mind in which the outer consciousness becomes momentarily receptive to the inner activity from which all art proceeds. Miss Bunzel notes that what an Indian calls a design is not what we call a design, but she fails to realize that it is, in fact, a figure of speech. Familiarity with the poetry of the puebleños would have supplied her with explicit phrasing of what her informants tried to give in prose. I suggest that the reader compare the following quotations with the descriptions of pottery designs such as she records. The quotations are from rain songs.

"Let the sky be covered with clouds as the earth with flowers."

"White blossom-clouds."

"Dark cloud, over the waiting corn, let the rain down."

This is merely by way of suggesting the treasures of Indian thought which escape the most conscientious student who attempts to unlock them with only one key. Or a knowledge of sign-writing might have cleared up Miss Bunzel's confusion as to the distinctions between expressive design and symbolic pattern as these appear on ceremonial objects. Or again, the realization that the paucity of significance in design which she reports from Acoma corresponds to a like meagerness of poetic content in their songs might have suggested that Acoma is the point at which to begin a study of design separating itself from ideation and continuing on its own.

It is the lack of this wider acquaintance with the way of art in the Indian mind that makes Miss Bunzel's concluding chapter less valuable than the preceding descriptive matter. One feels that much of it might have been written from the stereotypes about primitive art in the general mind without reference to the pueblos. One wishes, indeed, that the technical student would refrain from attempted explanations of art processes in any medium. What Miss Bunzel saw and handled and heard has the stamp of authenticity. What she infers and concludes lacks the validity of the completed inquiry.

A Cattleman's Life Story

A Vaquero of the Brush Country. By J. Frank Dobie. Dallas: The Southwest Press. $3.50.

JOHN YOUNG, the veteran cattleman, tells the story of his life, and Mr. Dobie, with a practiced hand, puts it into form. It is a story of the Texas cattle country from the days of the open range to the days of barbed-wire inclosures, and it brings in adventures with Indians, cattle thieves, horse thieves, and all-round bad men. It is, however, something more than a biography, for into the personal reminiscence has been skilfully woven a historical sketch of the period, with much description and other informative material.

Young's venturesome spirit once led him into close contact with Billy the Kid. It is a common-sense appraisal that is here made of the man. For all the romantic yarns that have been spun about him, Young portrays him as a professional cheat, gambler, thief, and gunman, without loyalty to his friends and without respect for any of the decencies of life. The cattleman had many thrilling encounters with bad men, and one may well believe in the aptness of the tribute paid him by George W. Saunders, president of the Old Time Trail Drivers' Association, that he "would charge hell with a bucket of water." But there is no vaunting in the recital, and some of the incidents of his courage the author-editor has had to get from other men.

One may doubt if any more intimate and authentic depiction of the range has ever been given. Certainly there is nothing on the subject more delightfully written, or more handsomely put into print. W. J. GHENT

When News Was Young

Some Forerunners of the Newspaper in England, 1476-1622. By Matthias A. Shaaber. University of Pennsylvania Press. $4.

MR. SHAABER has shown much enterprise in examining a deal of dull matter, along with some that is sensational, to demonstrate how the people of England satisfied their curiosity for news in the one hundred and fifty years after the introduction of the printing-press. The term "newspaper" does not occur until after the Restoration, and what is usually set down as the first newspaper, a weekly which appeared irregularly in the decade 1622-32, was in reality a pamphlet known in those days as a "newsbook." It was almost entirely a translation of news reports from abroad. As the author himself, toward the end of his volume, says:

> We have now arrived at the grand anticlimax of the early history of journalism in England—all the printed news discussed above had nothing to do, directly, with the origin or form of the first newspaper. Indirectly it doubtless did much to prepare the way by creating a body of news-readers and, more importantly, by leading certain publishers into the purveying of news as a specialty of their trade. But the first English newspaper was . . . not a native growth; its ancestors were the same as those of the earliest Continental periodicals.

In his survey of all this antecedent matter Mr. Shaaber examines official proclamations and state papers, political and religious propaganda, official accounts of wars and rebellions, ballads and broadsides and the like. The most spirited chapter has to do with popular news, which usually in ballad form described the doings at court, murders and other crimes, miracles, prodigies, and wonders, monstrous births and strange beasts, witchcraft, the plague, and acts of God such as flood and fire and the weather—all accompanied by much moralizing. Murders, then as now, excited enormous interest, that of Sir Thomas Overbury, friend of Ben Jonson, the most celebrated case, calling forth reams of wild accounts. Of all this material it can only be said that it created an appetite for news among the people and gradually showed the publishers where a great opportunity lay.

In a final chapter Mr. Shaaber discloses the fact that something like a systematic publication of the news, at least of foreign news, had for a long time been going on in the Netherlands and in Germany. Budgets embracing a year, a half-year, or a month had been appearing from early in the sixteenth century. But in both countries there were also compilations dealing with much shorter periods, usually not more than a week, and often appearing on a single sheet; in these, rather than in any of the other documents discussed in the preceding chapters, he finds the direct progenitor of the newspaper. These Continental "corantoes," as the smaller budgets were called, were translated into English from 1590 on, and six corantoes originating in England appeared in 1621. They differ not a little from the newsbooks to which the genesis of the newspaper has usually been ascribed. "The earmarks of the coranto are a colorless, matter-of-fact tone and the arrangement of the news under rubrics indicating the place and date of origin ('From Venice, the 13. of Ianuarie')." With some of the groundwork thus done, the newspaper might have made steady progress in England except for the disturbances caused by the approaching civil wars.

HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Books in Brief

Cardinal Newman. By J. Lewis May. The Dial Press. $3.50.

Inasmuch as Cardinal Newman recognized with unusual clarity the direction in which the nineteenth century was moving and was less deceived than his contemporaries by the generalizations of liberalism and the blithe efforts to reconcile science and religion, there might be considerable value in a reconsideration of his writings. Mr. May, however, has failed to bring out the importance of Newman's thought and he has been only moderately successful in the presentation of his character. Moreover, Mr. May deprives us of whatever pleasure there might be in reading his book by introducing irrelevant and platitudinous discourses, by dotting his pages with back-of-the-dictionary Latin, by ostentatiously representing himself as a profound student of artistic prose, by betraying a partisan spirit, and by repeating sage reflections and favored phrases. Cardinal Newman still remains available if anyone cares to write an interpretative study of a major Victorian prophet.

The Revolt of the Fishermen. By Anna Seghers. Translated from the German by Margaret Goldsmith. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.

Frau Segher's short novel of a young agitator who tries to organize the fishermen of Saint Barbara and fails is a story of the broadest realism conveyed in the simplest, briefest language. The effect is one of hushed restraint. The luminous bits of color in the setting and in the strife are quiet and not garish, and this gentleness of style strangely intensifies our sense of the desperation of the inarticulate peasants. The book has many elements of greatness—firm character studies, fine narration, and a sentiment of beauty—but it lacks a special time element which would bring it closer to common experience, make it applicable, as the theme warrants, to human experience in general. A sense of remoteness dulls the force of the picture.

Three Strange Lovers. By V. F. Calverton. The Macaulay Company. $2.50.

The apparent simplicity of these three stories rather disarms one's critical estimate of them. One reads easily, almost fluently, through experiences which seem increasingly "strange" and which are certainly not simple at all. The various manifestations of love which Calverton examines would be well worth the talents, in one respect, of, say, a Dostoevski and, in another, a Schnitzler. They are stories that require the greatest subtlety of understanding and expression to be successful; they are concerned not only with love but with religion and with various kinks of psychology that are thoroughly abnormal. If Calverton's stories are not wholly satisfactory, the fault lies in their execution rather than their conception—the last story is particularly well planned and dramatically effective. One feels in all of them an acute, highly sensitive intelligence and a fertile imagination at work upon the material. However, one does not feel the pulsing fulness of creation which calls

Music

The Pioneering Playhouse

FOR fifteen years the Misses Lewisohn have provided a workshop for talent, and I doubt if it is possible to exaggerate the creative value of what they have done. Much of this season's dance renaissance might be traced to the doors of the Neighborhood Playhouse, and the organization's recent program of "Symphonic Music with Stage and Orchestra," under the direction of Miss Irene Lewisohn and the Cleveland Symphony, proved one of the winter's most significant performances in this field.

Like all vital experiments, it was interesting as much for attempt as achievement. If the attempt was to create a single aesthetic whole from the elements of orchestra and dance, it was for me not successful, for reasons too elaborate to be more than touched on here. Both music and dance have so expanded since the remote time when they blended in the archaic Greek orchesis, a single melodic line and a single gesture embodying the same impulse, that the observer can no longer synthesize them. Each has become a full-bodied, autonomous art demanding his full response, and he oscillates between them. But if, as the program indicated, the conception was that of symphonic music with the stage as an adjunct, it must be judged differently. Three pieces were given: Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," and Janssen's "New Year's Eve in New York." The last two were unfamiliar to me, but seemed well and sensitively read. Mr. Sokoloff conducted the first with the vigor and finesse that have made this score his finest performance, and with Harold Bauer illuminating the difficult piano part it was a joy to hear. The choreography, worked out upon pyramidal steps leading to an altar, with a chorus of priestesses, and Martha Graham and Charles Weidman in the leading roles of enchantress and pastoral god, was original, clear, and splendidly executed. It summoned to the eye the mixture of austerity and voluptuousness, the haunting far-off quality, the dramatic intensity of the score. Indeed, there were moments of such startling beauty—the first encounter of the principals and the ultimate capitulation of the god—that music and movement seemed to flash into one entity, flooding eye and ear as through a new sense.

The quiet religious tableau following was less originally conceived, though it would perhaps be difficult to deal otherwise with Rabaud's sweet and insipid music, plaintively misquoting the Liebestod and Morales.

As to the third, it seemed to this writer, here venturing humbly upon alien ground, that music and stage rendering were grievously at odds. The undernote of Janssen's powerful score, for all its fox-trots and simulated midnight whistles, is one of spiritual exultation. It is largely abstract, and as modern as its title. Would it not have fared better with a much more simple and stylized staging—something of tilted levels upon which corps of dancers could have symbolized the varying moods of the city and built a climax of masses in motion against suggested masses of architecture? Whatever its intent, the setting employed managed to recall, it is to be feared, nothing so much as the pseudo-realism of the old Metropolitan Opera sets, with Kundry suddenly lighted up inside those pasteboard rocks. The chorus of dancers was lost in the obscurity of a street scene; the soloists were cramped for space; and Miss Graham, pinned by a spotlight to an inexplicable platform in mid-air, made what she could, I suppose, of her predicament. Altogether, this experiment seemed entirely unsuccessful.

But the point is that it was an experiment. Its makers were looking for new concepts, new methods. The mistakes of innovators will always be more apparent than the mouse-like errors of those content to nibble fixed formulas. So will their achievements. The extraordinary freshness and arresting beauty of the "Pagan Poem" amply proved it.

Hubbard Hutchinson

Drama

Miracle

A PLAY based upon the Bible and profoundly religious in its spirit is one of the biggest hits on Broadway. Nothing could seem more improbable than that, but nothing is, on the other hand, more obviously true, for every scene of "The Green Pastures" (Mansfield Theater) is suffused with a touching piety and (let us join the incongruous facts) seats are already selling many weeks in advance. Marc Connelly, to whom the play was suggested by a series of stories in Negro dialect—Roark Bradford's "Ol' Man Adam and His Chillun"—is the person most immediately responsible for the extraordinary performance, but neither he, the original author, nor even the fine cast of black actors can claim the largest share of the credit, since the fundamental creative work was done by the anonymous geniuses who composed the spirituals upon which the whole is based. Mr. Connelly and the rest have cooperated with great skill and delicacy; they seem, one and all, to have been gifted with a remarkable imaginative insight into the mood of the materials at hand; but neither they nor any other white men of the twentieth century could possibly have invented a mythology as rich and simple and satisfying as that which the Negroes evolved when they made the heroes of the Old Testament over into their own image.

The corpus of these spirituals constitutes, of course, the finest expression of the religious emotion achieved anywhere since the seventeenth century. That fact has been recognized for some time past, but no one seems to have suspected that it was possible to do more than perform and admire them until the makers of this piece translated the songs into pictorial form and made their ideology as well as their imagery the basis of an epic drama in the course of which a black God creates a world, saves a Noah, and leads the black children of Israel out of their Egyptian bondage. The effect is, moreover, so surprisingly fine that I can hardly help feeling that the authors and producers must have been themselves surprised at the perfection of the harmony which they have achieved and at the depth of the emotions aroused. One would expect something grotesque at its worst and quaintly charming at its best, but charm is a word in no sense appropriate to anything so deeply moving. The imagination which conceived God in the guise of a Negro preacher, and Gabriel in the guise of an amiable giant fingering his trumpet with nervous eagerness because he is anxious to put an end to the race which profoundly annoys his God, was an imagination so richly concrete as to leave no room for question, and hence capable of creating a world in which everything seems both inevitable and right. One laughs, of course, but there is no condescension in the laughter, which dies away as quickly as it should and gives place to something describable only as reverent attention.

These are not, to be sure, the Bible stories as the ancient Hebrews told them. Here the familiar tales are suffused with the spirit of a gentler race and given the setting, dress, manners, and psychology imagined to be appropriate by minds more ardent than instructed in Biblical antiquities. But the result is as genuine as that achieved when the Middle Ages lovingly reworked the same material, and this Negro version of Christian mythology is the only one now living enough to touch us as "The Green Pastures" does. After all, the true test of faith is its ability to deal intimately with the things which it professes to believe, and this is the test which the faith of the authors of the spirituals so triumphantly meets. The fact that they saw Moses as a gray-bearded "darky" is the one thing which proves to us that they saw him at all; the fact that they conceived of God as a man and of Heaven as a place is the one convincing evidence that they really believed in the existence of either. The delicacy of sophisticated religions, the strange finicalness which leads theologians to shrink from giving any features to divine personages or any scenery to divine places, is merely the result of a skepticism unwilling to confess that it is forced to doubt anything which it allows itself definitely to conceive; and though such "delicacy" may serve to keep churches open it will not serve as a basis for art—for art must have faith strong enough to embody itself in concrete images. That modern audiences are still capable of feeling—poetically at least—the religious emotions, the enthusiasm aroused by "The Green Pastures" is sufficient to prove, but the Negro mythology may quite possibly be the last thing left which can call them forth, for we certainly cannot generate them for ourselves, and we have long ago worn thin most of the other bodies of legend that have come down to us from a simpler past.

I have not read the text of "The Green Pastures," and I do not know how much of its beauty would be evident when detached from the singing of the spirituals (which makes up a part of the performance) and when deprived of the simple dignity lent to the lines by the voices and gestures of a most extraordinary company of actors. I do know, however, that the thing which becomes a living whole on the stage of the Mansfield is one of the most moving creations I have ever seen in the theater.

Victory in Haiti

By HELENA HILL WEED

Special Representative of The Nation in Haiti

Port au Prince, March 11

THE President's Commission for the Study and Review of Conditions in the Republic of Haiti—to give the official title under which it works—has accomplished more work of reconciliation in one short week than would have seemed humanly possible at the outset. Under the necessity of preserving the diplomatic courtesies of the occasion, and thus making their first and formal contact with the despised Borno and his functionaries of the Council of State, they turned to face a disillusioned and justifiably suspicious nation. Owing to a wholly unintentional vagueness in defining their work in the statement given to the local press on their arrival, they faced a practical boycott from the Nationalists.

Only by the quick work of a few extraordinarily level-headed Haitians assisted by a few Americans in whom they reposed complete confidence was the mist of cynicism and distrust dispelled and a beginning made. Once the barriers were broken, the commission itself by its frank efforts to know the truth won the complete faith of all groups.

As day after day passed, each bringing before the commission individuals and delegated representatives from every walk of life, ranging from learned Supreme Court judges and scholarly educators to hard-handed workmen and simple peasants, and all bringing the same plea from every section of the republic, it was not long before the most casual observer could see what the outcome of it all must be. One witness after another told why Haiti would rather die as a nation than longer submit to the tyranny and suffering crushing the people. After a peculiarly shameful story of the way in which absolute power had developed into brutal domination and degradation, Commissioner White sat in thoughtful mood for a few moments, then penciled the following words and passed them to a friend. With Mr. White's permission I quote them:

> In that twilight zone wherein the desire to help one's fellow-men passes from fraternal association to paternal control, despotism begins to rot the heart of benevolence. And here is a curious thing: I am satisfied, by talking for hours with many Americans here, that they are honest—as men go in politics—and are sincerely imbued with a desire to help the Haitians. They feel that we who oppose them are undoing a great work. Yet so inexorably does the possession of power disintegrate the spirit that benevolence is destroyed by tyranny. There can never be a benevolent despot.

What was promised, and accepted in good faith by many Haitians, as friendly aid to reconstruct a weak and admittedly backward nation has become a complete, selfish, illegal, and in many instances brutal domination over a helpless people, who are kept in financial, economic, and racial subjection in their own country by foreign armed forces. Worse than that, their national wealth, in the hands of the invader, is used to pay the price of their degradation and to bring ease, comfort, and even luxury to their oppressors. Comparatively few instances of specific wrongs have been brought before the commission, but they can be verified on every hand by any passing stranger who can see and read. A mechanic, stranded in Haiti through the failure of the company with which he came here, was installed as a high official in the customs office at $350 a month, though Haitians of years of experience and admitted ability are kept in minor positions at pitiful salaries; there was an annual item of $40,000 a year for remount horses for the gendarmerie, which is not a mounted service, the horses being constantly used by the American officers and their wives for riding and polo; there are endless instances of racial abuses on the part of unlettered minor officials toward cultured Haitian scholars and professional men and toward women of refinement, education, and culture, while American officers live openly with Haitian girls and bring illegitimate half-breed children into the world only to abandon them at will—one could go on indefinitely. The one ray of light in the long story is the spirit of revolt among Americans themselves, in both civil and military positions, against the conditions which have developed.

The end of the first week, which began in a fog, saw earnest conferences between the commission and the committee of five Haitians representing the patriotic organizations, led by Georges Léger, son of the late J. J. Léger, former minister to the United States and for some time dean of the foreign ministers at Washington, who was called by the late Sir Julian Pauncefote, British Ambassador at Washington, "the most brilliant diplomat I have ever known." The work of young Léger in presenting the cause of Haiti has been gracious, dignified, fearless, and technically superb. One of the commissioners, in complimenting Léger upon the ability with which he had presented the case and the aid which his presentation had been to the commission, told him, in the hearing of all, that his work had equaled that of Judge Brandeis in his greatest moments. Faced by the united, determined demand of the men of Haiti, to which was added the organized and fiery demand of the League of Haitian Women, who had made such an enormous and convincing demonstration of patriotic religious fervor the Sunday after the commission arrived, and following upon these by the open support of the Nationalist cause by the Catholic church in Haiti, President Borno capitulated. Just one week after the arrival of the commission the happy solution which all had feared was weeks away, and perhaps not to be found even then, was reached by an informal agreement to which not only the commission and the Nationalists, but the Borno group also, were parties.

The plan was that the patriotic societies should send their delegates from all over the republic to Port au Prince as soon as possible and in conference with the Borno group should select, as a candidate for provisional president, to take office on the expiration of President Borno's term on May 15, a neutral, non-political man, acceptable to the commission, who would make the following agreement with the Haitian people: He would be formally elected by the Council of State on April 14 and as soon as he took office would call for an election to the national chambers. As soon as they could convene and organize, he would present to them his resignation as president of the republic so that they could elect a president under the constitutional forms. The plan provided that this provisional president on assuming his temporary office should abolish the Council of State, and that he should not be a candidate for the regular election by the assembly. The readjustment of all other questions was to be left to the new constitutional government, which would be a truly legal government chosen by the Haitian people. Sunday brought the official agreement of President Hoover to this plan and his promise that the government of the United States would not recognize the election of any other candidate by the Council of State than the one agreed upon under this plan by the Nationalists, the Borno group, and the commissioners. It was a happy solution of the difficulties that faced all groups. The United States, which had recognized Borno and the powers conferred on his Council of State to elect a new president on April 14, was relieved of the necessity of using further force to undo the things it had effected by force; the Nationalists had won their supreme aim of having the new president elected by a National Assembly chosen by popular vote; and the Borno group would be allowed to end their terms in peace. Haiti was throbbing with prayer and thanksgiving, and the commissioners, as they left the capital on Sunday morning for their trip of inspection through the country, were happy in the thought that their work had been fruitful of results so satisfactory to all.

But mixed with the joy of the Haitian people, as the Sunday crowds congregated in the parks and groups gathered on the spacious verandas of the homes of the elite, was a note of fear. It was not lack of confidence in the commission. They had won the absolute trust of the people. It was not suspicion of rival political groups in the Nationalist League; for though there were many aspirants for election by the chambers, all had agreed to accept the result and cooperate with the winner. But would Borno keep faith? That was the question. There were many disquieting signs. Someone had sent a cablegram to the United States declaring that a revolution had been suppressed by military force in Port au Prince the night before, when everyone knew that the perfect peace of a tropical moonlight night had reigned in every quarter of the city. All civil and military Occupation officials had been warned not to leave their homes on Saturday evening unless armed, and upon one sound of the military siren to barricade themselves in their homes and on two blasts to rush to the American Legation. What possible reason could be assigned for this real fear which seemed to grip the Occupation?

The answer soon came. Telegrams and telephone messages began to pour in from the provinces repeating the telegram that Borno had sent on Saturday, through his Minister of the Interior, to all prefects. It read:

> It is false that a provisional government will be formed, as the agitators would have the people believe. The presidential election by the Council of State will take place on April 14 and President Borno will remain in After War, What Is the World's Greatest Menace?

"A gigantic and deadly narcotic menace is upon our country and the world. It is estimated that 75,000 girls from all walks of life disappeared last year, an increase of 50% in the estimate for the previous year. Boy drug addicts recruit robber gangs and create our crime wave with its daring hold-ups and unnatural murders. Half of the prisoners in turpitude cases are drug addicts. A 'dope ring' in Chicago revealed 18,000 drug addicts among the customers, involving yearly payments of $39,000,000. This is but one ring in one city.* The yearly economic burden laid upon our people exceeds $5,000,000,000. There are about 1,000,000 addicts in the United States."

> office until May 15. This is the exact truth which you must make known to the people. As for the legislative elections, they cannot take place before the constitutional date, the nearest one being January 10, 1932.

Other personal telegrams from Borno quoted him as sayin that this agreement had been made by him with the commi sioners and that he was the complete master of the situatio Consternation reigned, but through it all there was no lac of confidence in the commission. It was only a proof to a that Borno was faithless and that his Council of State coul not even be trusted to keep their agreement with the com mission and the Nationalists to elect the provisional presiden selected by them all. The meaning of the Occupation warr ings became clear. Its officials knew of this Borno telegrar and expected an outbreak when the people learned of it. S sure were they that the fury of the people would expres itself in disorder that a revolution which never occurre was reported in advance!

Instead of fomenting disorder, the leaders immediatel established telephone connections with Hinche, in the interior, where the commission was spending the night, reporting the treachery of Borno, and spread among the peopl wise counsels of patience and confidence in the commissior Their unanimous demand that the United States preven any election by the Council of State had been more tha justified. They could well afford to await action by th commission. They had feared that part of the agreemen which gave the Council of State the right formally to ratif the nominee agreed upon by the three groups, but ha yielded the point when they were promised that the Unite States would recognize no other election by the counci Yet here was treachery, an attempt at the first moment t undo the work of the commission.

Monday morning found President Borno confronted first, by an angry Council of State demanding the meanin of his telegram to the prefects, and, second, by the proo given out from commission headquarters on Sunday afternoon that the contents of the telegram were false. Afte keeping the council waiting for four hours (it afterward developed that Borno himself was on the carpet before American officials during that time) he appeared before them an told them that General Russell had deceived him in the matter, in spite of the fact that the commission had stated tha Borno in person had given them his assent to the plan at th palace on Friday. Rumors flew through the city all day Monday that a cabinet crisis was impending, but late in th afternoon the official Moniteur came out with a final gestur of defiance toward the commission. It read:

> As his term expires on May 15 next, he [President Borno] can consider the political plan set forth above [the commission's plan] only in that single part whose execution he has the constitutional duty to assure, namely, the election of his successor by the Council of State on April 14 next. He has given his approval to the above plan only on the formal condition that the plan shall be carried out in conformity with the constitution of Haiti and the treaty which binds the government of Haiti and the government of the United States of America.

Tonight Haiti interprets this last blast to mean that th Borno Government, rather than retreat from its position o broken faith, will resign. The country awaits the quick return of the commissioners to handle the crisis.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

AFTER SIX MONTHS and eighteen days of weary discussion the Senate has completed its revision of the pending tariff bill. It has achieved the incredible in making it a more flagrant robbery of the American people on behalf of the privileged classes than has yet been voted by Congress. Senator Harrison declared that its rates are "the most obnoxious and indefensible ever passed." Senator Norris pointed out that in its administrative features it goes beyond anything ever before essayed in our history. The rates, he said, "are unjust, unfair, and indefensible, and some of them are almost criminal." We believe that there has been only one gain out of the whole twelve months of legislation since the special session met—the frank revelation of the way tariffs are made, the deliberate log-rolling, swapping of votes, and bargain and sale of tariff privileges at the expense of the American people so that certain manufacturers may be further enriched. As for the pretense that this bill helps the farmer, that is at best a delusion. That the bill will not in the slightest degree accomplish what he asked from Congress, that it blindly disregards his wishes to legislate only for the farmer and to avoid a general revision will not keep Mr. Hoover from signing the bill. There has never been any danger of a veto, no matter what the monstrosity to which the Congress might give birth.

THE LONDON CONFERENCE lingers on, but in so feeble and obviously hopeless a state that any day may bring news of its demise. Secretary Stimson still feels called upon to deny that the conference has been a failure and to censure the London press for saying that it is dead, but his official optimism does not deceive anybody and we doubt if he takes any stock in it himself. Even if, by some miracle, the conference should contrive to pull itself together and patch up an agreement of some kind that could be christened limitation of armaments, everybody would know that it was only a compromise designed to save the faces of Mr. Hoover and Mr. MacDonald and that its moral value would be nil. The probability is that any other conference called as this one was called and set at a similar task would also go to pieces. It is futile to expect that juggling the tonnage figures of cruisers and submarines so as to make the totals somewhat less or the distribution by classes of vessels different will increase the likelihood of peace while each of the jugglers is still bent upon being prepared for war. The calamity that has overtaken the London conference has, indeed, gone far to discredit the whole idea of an international conference which seeks peace by such methods. There is need of deeper and broader foundations in international good-will and cooperation.

IN APPOINTING JUDGE JOHN J. PARKER, of Charlotte, North Carolina, to the Supreme Court of the United States, President Hoover has plainly had political and sectional rather than judicial considerations in mind. Born in 1885, Judge Parker is one of the youngest men ever appointed to the Supreme Bench. A North Carolinian by birth and education, at the age of twenty-four he was Republican nominee for Congress from the seventh district of North Carolina. Six years later he was the party candidate for attorney general and in 1917 for governor of the State. In 1924 he was North Carolina delegate at large to the Republican National Convention. Appointed United States judge for the Fourth Circuit by President Coolidge in 1925, for reasons fairly evident from the above record, he has had an undistinguished career during his four years on the bench, and he will bring to the Supreme Court neither notable legal learning nor any reputation for understanding of the great issues on which he is likely to have to pass judgment. Faced with a second great opportunity to appoint a real and comprehending jurist, Mr. Hoover has indicated his respect for the Court by naming a political judge to whom there will apparently be no opposition for the good reason that there is nothing in particular to object to.

THE HOOVER-HUSTON COMBINATION is a choice spectacle for the gods. Claudius H. Huston, as everybody knows, is chairman of the Republican National Committee. He is also, it appears, president of the Tennessee River Improvement Association, an organization which has favored acceptance of the bid of the American Cyanamid Company for Muscle Shoals. For the benefit of this association, the Senate lobby committee has discovered, the Union

Carbide Company turned over to Huston two checks totaling $36,100, which amount Huston promptly deposited to the credit of his margin account with a New York broker, where it was used to buy and sell several hundred shares of stock out of which Huston made a profit, which profit he kept. The first effect of this disclosure was to make some of the party leaders at Washington feel that the only decent thing for Huston to do was to resign his chairmanship of the Republican National Committee, and something was even said about ousting him if he refused. Mr. Hoover, however, has a tough hide, and Senator Watson of Indiana, Republican leader in the Senate, after lunching with the President announced that he did not believe Mr. Hoover should ask for Huston's resignation and did not believe that he would do so. "Some persons may disagree with Mr. Huston's judgment," declared this apostle of purity, "but certainly I do not think his intrinsic honesty has been successfully attacked." Of course not. The Hon. Claudius didn't steal anything; he simply used some money that wasn't his and took a little private rake-off. The Republican gang ought to be able to stomach that.

KEEP YOUR EYE on the Federal Reserve Board and the stock market. Stock sales on the New York exchange during the week ending March 22 totaled no fewer than 23,108,870 shares, the largest dealings of any week since the crash of last fall, while bond sales amounting to $115,372,500 were the heaviest since June, 1924. The fifty representative stocks of the New York Times list showed an average gain of $6.31 for the week; they have already recovered between 35 and 40 per cent of their losses in the smash. Call money has been down to 2 per cent, and the Federal Reserve Bank rediscount rate is only 3½ per cent. As the "happiness boys" in Washington have not succeeded in getting business to going by cheerful talk, it is reported that a reasonable inflation of credit is on the cards, and the stock market feels the first impulse, brokers' loans having increased by half a billion dollars during the past sixty days. The comment in our issue of November 13 last blaming the feeble policy of the Federal Reserve Board in failing to check the speculative mania has just been officially verified by the annual report of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, revealing the attempts of the directors of that bank to raise rates at various times between February and May of last year, which attempts were vetoed by the board. Nothing short of omniscience could run the powerful Federal Reserve machine perfectly; ordinary sound business judgment could keep it from aiding wild speculation.

THE ACQUITTAL of Edward L. Doheny on the charge of giving a bribe to Secretary of the Interior Albert B. Fall in connection with the lease of the Elk Hills naval oil reserve, following the conviction of Mr. Fall for accepting that bribe, will not greatly surprise those who are familiar with the intricacies of our legal procedure and the vagaries of our juries. Nor does the fact that Mr. Doheny will go free make any great difference except as it tends to shake confidence in the operation of our law. He wept successfully before the jury, and now he will doubtless get his wish to be allowed to spend the evening of his life in peace. But the great body of intelligent Americans have needed to learn no more about the Elk Hills oil lease since February 28, 1927, when the Supreme Court of the United States declared it to be a "transaction not authorized by law and consummated by conspiracy, corruption, and fraud," or about the Teapot Dome transaction since October 11 of that same year, when the Court stated that "the lease and agreement were made fraudulently by means of collusion and conspiracy between them [Fall and Sinclair]."

WHILE MR. WHALEN is making up his mind if and when he will send his resignation to Mayor Walker, The Nation does not mind offering him a little free advice. It is to resign now. As a police commissioner, he is an excellent impresario. He is without peer in his ability to invent new uniforms for policemen and taxi drivers, to appear smartly dressed to the last gardenia at the scene of the more important crimes, to welcome famous visitors to New York City. But on the whole his talents seem better suited to a large and flourishing department store like Wanamaker's than to the problems presented by the pursuit of crime in New York. We are glad to give Commissioner Whalen credit for having improved the traffic system in the city; a kind word also might be said for his having won increased wages for the higher grades of policemen. Beyond that we confess to finding ourselves at a loss. The unemployed demonstration on March 6, which he handled well for two hours and a half, he permitted to degenerate into a melee during the last twenty minutes. Since then his utterances on Communists and the methods he employs to detect and defeat them have been unlawful and dangerous. The American Civil Liberties Union announces that it will take legal steps to force Mr. Whalen's dismissal. Mayor Walker is reported as not too cast down at the prospect of losing his police commissioner, on whom the limelight shines so effulgently. Resign, then, Mr. Commissioner; don't wait till May Day. Wanamaker's needs you—New York does not.

THE LAST QUAKER DELEGATION that went to Governor Young of California to plead for a pardon for Tom Mooney and Warren Billings received, according to Arthur Heeb, member of the delegation, assurances that the Governor still believes the two men guilty and does not propose to be swayed by public opinion to think otherwise. Governor Young subsequently denied that he had said exactly this, but he was not clear as to what he had said. The Quakers were quite sure. The Governor, according to the delegation, explained that he had read all the documents in the case and that although some of the evidence seemed to have been perjured plenty of unquestioned evidence led him to believe the men guilty. Moreover, he said Mooney was not "repentant." The latter point is interesting; it indicates that, in Mr. Young's opinion, the best way to make a man repentant is to keep him in jail for thirteen years for a crime which he persists in declaring he did not commit and of which many thousands of his fellow-citizens also believe him innocent. The Pardon Board has yet to act and the State Supreme Court must render its decision on Billings's application for pardon. Mooney and Billings may still hope.

BEFORE CONSIGNING THE INCIDENT of the Harvard scrubwomen to a well-deserved oblivion, we wish to record with gratitude, as expressing the true Harvard tradition and the social conscience that we know is not dead in Cambridge itself, the protest of fifty-two alumni requesting payment of the back wages due the women under the minimum-wage decree. After calling attention to the variant explanations of President Lowell, Controller Endicott, and Treasurer Shattuck, they point out that the university authorities had full notice from the beginning, a representative of the Widener Library having appeared at the hearing of December 29, 1920, and protested inability to pay the added two cents an hour during the succeeding half-year, the budget being already made up. With nine years delay in compliance following, neither the commission nor the university appears in an enviable light. The protesting alumni characterize the university's attitude throughout the affair as "harsh, stingy, socially insensitive, and considerably short of the highest ethical standards of the time." The university answers the protestants in a formal statement of March 17: "The college authorities are now fully informed, and they believe that at all times in the past the cleaning women in Widener Library have been paid at least those wages required by the minimum-wage law and the decrees of the commission." There is nothing so consoling as faith.

OF GREAT SIGNIFICANCE is the fifty-year working arrangement entered into by the Hamburg-American and North German Lloyd lines for the joint operation of their two fleets, while preserving their individualities and their house flags. This practically means that the entire merchant marine of Germany will be under one management, thus eliminating the needless competition of the two lines, coordinating the services, and, presumably, cutting out a great deal of waste due to duplication of effort. Thus it is already suggested that all traffic to the North American Atlantic coast will be concentrated at Bremen, and that Hamburg will specialize in the Asiatic, South American, African, and Australian services. Recalling the extraordinary re-creation of the German merchant fleet in the twelve post-war years it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that this pool means that Germany may in a short time wrest the mercantile supremacy of the seas from England. Germany already has the two fastest passenger liners, and it will be years before they will be surpassed by either British or American ships. It would not be surprising if the British should answer the creation of this German monopoly by a combination of their own companies.

MAHATMA GANDHI'S twenty-day march from Ahmedabad to Jalalpur on the Gulf of Cambay, on the west coast of India north of Bombay, where he and his followers will undertake to make salt from sea water in defiance of the British monopoly, is reported only scantily in our newspapers. The departure from Ahmedabad naturally drew a great crowd, but while the reception accorded to Gandhi and his few score companions in the villages through which they have passed appears to have been cordial, the great popular response to this spectacular challenge to British rule that was looked for and feared has not yet been reported, if it exists. Gandhi's speeches have sought to impress upon his adherents the need of devotion to the cause of independence, even to the point of death if that should prove necessary, but it is perfectly evident that he has not abandoned in the least his policy of nonviolence or encouraged his followers to use force. The British authorities, while doubtless prepared for eventualities, have as yet taken no public steps to interfere with the march. A special dispatch to the New York World by S. A. Brelvi, president of the Indian Journalists' Association, reports that extensive plans are being laid by the various Nationalist provincial congresses for mass civil disobedience in support of Gandhi's movement.

LET US HOPE that Lord Balfour, whose career Lord Ponsonby describes on another page of this issue, has left full diaries and that his memoirs will in time be published. For they might throw light upon one of the strangest mysteries of history. President Wilson, readers of The Nation will recall, solemnly and explicitly informed a Senatorial committee in 1919 that he had no knowledge of the inter-Allied secret treaties until he went to Europe for the Peace Conference. They had, to be sure, been published in this country by the New York Evening Post and other newspapers; Colonel House knew of them; President Wilson's own utterances had at times suggested knowledge of them. Balfour, in the House of Commons on March 4, had said that President Wilson was "kept informed" of the negotiations, and at the end of June, just returned from his triumphal tour of America, he said again: "By these treaties we stand; our national honor is bound up in them." It is hardly possible to believe that he said nothing in his long conversations with Mr. Wilson of the treaties to which Britain's honor was bound. Yet we have Mr. Wilson's word that just this happened. We are forced to conclude either that Mr. Wilson did not tell the truth, or that Lord Balfour, representing a government that was bending all its energies to win a war, did not hesitate to conceal something that might, by antagonizing an ally he wished to keep at all costs, endanger that all-important victory.

BORN TO GREAT WEALTH, the late V. Everit Macy never forgot the responsibility for public service which rightly goes with the possession of riches. Because of his ability and charm he could rightly have aspired to serve his country in high positions. Instead he chose to become Superintendent of the Poor in Westchester County, resigning from no less than twenty-three committees and governing boards to free himself for the task. At once he set himself to making over the entire method of handling the county's poor, sick, and criminal. The county "poorhouse," full of drunken loafers, itself dirty, disreputable, and wretchedly managed, disappeared. In its place there rose a modern, clean, comfortable, orderly "hospital for the aged"—the mere changing of the name itself working wonders for the self-respect of the occupants. Reelected as Commissioner of Charities and Correction and of Public Welfare by both parties as long as he would take office, Mr. Macy gave freely of his private means as well as of his time. His finest achievement was the construction of a model county jail, wherein was instituted an advanced and scientific system of handling the prisoners. As head of the county parks he developed a chain of parks of enormous value to Westchester and to the city of New York. In other words, Mr. Macy found complete opportunity for the use of his business talents and the expression of his admirable humanitarian ideals.

The Virtue of Reed Smoot

DIOGENES looked, with his lantern, for an honest man. We, in modest imitation, have for some time sought a virtuous one in the purlieus of the national Capitol. Now we have found him through his own confession. It is Reed Smoot, Senator from Utah. Here are his words uttered in the Senate of the United States on March 18: "If I should lose my virtue the first thing I would do would be to leave the Mormon church." Of the Mormons he had just said: "I know they are as industrious as any people in all the world; I know that the men and the women of the Mormon church are virtuous. . . ." Hence it is as an apostle of virtue that he has stood in the Senate combating that gallant, but mistaken, young Senator, Bronson M. Cutting of New Mexico, in his effort to "throw open wide the gates of this nation to a flood of obscene literature." We record this heroic admission because Senator Smoot confessed to his own virtue after having perused a great pile of, to him, obscene books, the basis of his exhilarating demand that every customs and postal inspector be given full censorship power. "If a customs inspector," said he once, "at the port of New York, with his knowledge of the world, regards on his own initiative a book as obscene it is about the nearest approach to a jury trial that can be had." Many of these inspectors, he explained, are "men of education, legal training, and broad information."

The New Mexican toreador, Mr. Cutting, was unkind enough to refer to D. H. Lawrence's "Lady Chatterley's Lover" as Mr. Smoot's "favorite work." The Senator from Utah rose to the defense of his impugned virtue:

> MR. SMOOT. I resent the statement the Senator has just made that "Lady Chatterley's Lover" is my favorite work.
> MR. CUTTING. Then I withdraw the remark. I thought it must be, because the Senator has been reading it, apparently, since the Christmas holidays.
> MR. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have not read it. I did not mark these books. They were so disgusting, so dirty and vile that the reading of one page was enough for me.
> MR. CUTTING. Ah, yes, Mr. President; but the courts of the United States say that the reading of one page is not sufficient, and that the book must be read as a whole. I am sure that between Christmas and the present time the Senator must have had occasion to read the book from cover to cover. I know that he has been quoting it to Senators.
> MR. SMOOT. I have not read it and I have not quoted it. Not only that, but I would not read the stuff. . . .
> MR. CUTTING. If the Senator has only spent ten minutes on the book I cannot see how he can tell whether or not there is anything elevating in it.
> MR. SMOOT. I could tell from the very beginning of the book; that is enough to indicate what the book is; it is enough to indicate that it is written by a man with a diseased mind and a soul so black that he would even obscure the darkness of hell. Nobody would write a book like that unless his heart was just as rotten and as black as it could possibly be. . . .
> MR. GLASS. That being so, why does the Senator from Utah calmly stand there and permit one of his associates to peruse that book?

Not even the ribald laughter which followed Senator Glass's interruption could swerve the Mormon from Utah from his noble purpose. Senator Cutting pointed out that as a schoolboy he was required to read passages of "King Lear," "Hamlet," and "Romeo and Juliet" that "might have seemed just as indecent when they were published as the books to which the Senator from Utah has been referring." "Therefore there is no reason to think, after the publicity which the Senator has given to this book, that a hundred years from now 'Lady Chatterley's Lover' may not be compulsory reading, perhaps in the kindergarten classes." To this also Mr. Smoot was deaf. Nor could he be trapped by Senator Cutting's quotation from Emerson's works, "Every suppressed or expunged word reverberates through the earth from side to side." Ralph Waldo Emerson is dead; besides, what was he in contrast to our own Reed Smoot?

And so the fight went on. Not, alas, to the complete triumph of virtue, for the Senate proved not to have all of Senator Smoot's faith in the knowledge of the world of New York customs inspectors; they are not to be the final protectors of our youth hereafter. But as to the main issue, there a majority of the Senate stood firm. Mr. Heflin of Alabama put it well: "My God, the idea of saying that foreigners who write this vile literature, the perverted minds that bring forth this filthy stuff and put it on the printed page, should have the right to send it into the United States to be circulated among the people of our country, is something I cannot understand." He next scorned those who would stop the coming into this country on "a little peach-tree bush" of parasites which injure our country's peach orchards and would "then permit this devilish foreign literature, vile and corrupt, to come in to poison the little plants of the American household, the boys and girls in the American home." Viciously he attacked the president of Columbia for taking the other side, calling him "Nicholas Murray, the butler of Columbia University." "He," roared Mr. Heflin, "is not loyal to the Constitution. He believes in social equality and teaches a school that admits both Negroes and whites on equal terms."

Well, victory comes in the main to the just. Senator Smoot and his cohorts have saved the little plants of the American household. In general no book "advocating treason or insurrection against the United States or forcible resistance to any law of the United States," or threatening the life of any person here, and no book which is obscene or immoral shall be admitted into this country. Classics or books of established literary or scientific merit, even though judged obscene, may be admitted at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, but only when imported for non-commercial purposes. Books seized as obscene by customs inspectors must be held by the collector to await the judgment of the nearest District Court—this a magnanimous yielding to Senator Cutting that there may be a court review of a collector's judgment. Thus is our country saved again! Let no one underestimate the glory of Senator Smoot, and above all let no one fear that the country will read some day that Mr. Smoot has resigned from the Mormon church. He is beyond seduction.

Time to Act

THE unemployment situation is grave. Frances Perkins, Industrial Commissioner for New York, and John B. Andrews, secretary of the American Association for Labor Legislation, testifying before the Senate Committee on Commerce, declare that conditions in New York City are the worst that they have been since 1914, and that they have been growing rapidly worse since October, when distress first appeared. Professor Benjamin M. Squires, of the University of Chicago, director of the Illinois State employment agency, testifies similarly that suffering from unemployment in Chicago is the most acute that it has been in ten years, and that Chicago is just like other industrial centers. The Family Welfare Association of America, a federation of 234 charity and welfare associations in more than 60 cities, reports an increase of 100 per cent in their expenditures for relief in January, 1930, as compared with those of January, 1929, and an increase of 200 per cent in the number of families in distress because of lack of work. Bread lines are crowded in the leading cities. The National Urban League estimates that there are at the least 330,000 Negroes with no work. The American Federation of Labor, on the basis of figures from twenty-four cities, announces 22 per cent of reporting members unemployed in February, against 20 per cent in January. The employment figures of the New York State Department of Labor, probably the best series in the country, in January stood at the lowest point in their fifteen-year history, except for three months in 1921, and February showed a further drop of nearly one-half of 1 per cent, although February ordinarily brings a gain of more than 1 per cent.

The shocking disingenuousness of the Administration in treating this situation was the subject of comment in our issue of February 26. Since that time its pronouncements have become, if possible, even more discreditable. It has juggled the monthly figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, a useful series now running back over fifteen years, and its weekly figures, hastily called into existence in December and consequently quite worthless, to show that everything is growing better day by day in every way. When weekly figures could be used, as in January and early February, to show increasing employment, they were blazoned abroad, though the January monthly figures showed a drop of 2.6 per cent from December. When the weekly figures turned the wrong way, attention was centered on the February monthly figure for manufactures, showing a gain of one-tenth of 1 per cent—about one-fifteenth of the normal February increase, by the way. The tricks of the Administration have already been quite thoroughly exposed, and it is scarcely too much to say that no informed person longer believes anything that the President, the Secretary of Commerce, or the Secretary of Labor says on the subject.

The importance of this last fact lies in the need for action and the desire of the Administration to prevent action—and, indeed, to prevent people from believing that there is any need for action. For years the American Association for Labor Legislation and other experts have urged the need of legislation to prevent unemployment. For years the party medicine men have drowned their requests by beating the prosperity tom-toms, and Congress has not lifted a finger. It is an interesting and little-known fact that President Coolidge personally blocked the measure for establishing a prosperity reserve when it was under consideration two years ago. Senator Wagner of New York has taken a commendable interest in the whole question, and following earlier efforts in the same field, on January 9 he introduced three bills—S. 3059 to provide for the advance planning of public work and the stabilization of industry, S. 3060 to provide for the establishment of a national employment system and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such systems, and S. 3061 to provide for the proper collection and publication of employment statistics. Each of them deals with an essential part of a reasoned employment plan, and all of them together, combined with a measure of unemployment insurance, would constitute a reasonable fighting program. Senator Johnson promises that the Committee on Commerce will take action. No legislation now, of course, can be of any use in the present crisis; we must muddle through as best we can. Some cities, like Cincinnati, however, deserve credit for making real preparation. But we can use this crisis to get the beginnings of an intelligent national policy for preventing unemployment. The President, either through ignorance or through a mistaken notion of how to advance his own political fortunes, refuses to offer any leadership toward such a policy; but he has discredited himself so thoroughly in this respect that Congress can scarcely do less than disregard him and go forward with legislation. It is time to act.

The People's Power

DURING the campaign of 1928 Mr. Hoover made abundantly clear his intention to prevent as far as possible any extension of public enterprise. That purpose extends to the exploitation of natural resources still under federal control, which the President seems determined to turn over to private enterprise for "development" if he can. The ill-received—and, we may add, ill-conceived—land policy announced last summer was one part of such a program. The handling of the Boulder Dam affair is a second highly important case.

The protagonists of the Boulder Dam power project during the many years when the measure was pending were the cities and people of southern California that were friendly to municipal enterprise. They got the bill through, after many compromises, only against the most strenuous opposition of the power companies, among others. "The Boulder Dam law," says Judge George W. Woodruff of Pennsylvania, "is an arrow aimed directly at the heart of the power trust. It not only hurts the trust by freeing municipalities in California, Nevada, and Arizona from its domination, but it will be an example leading gradually to nation-wide freedom." The law, it will be remembered, requires the Secretary of the Interior in making contracts for Boulder Dam power to give preference to States and municipalities—a perfectly clear declaration of principle. But the Secretary of the Interior got an opinion from the complaisant Solicitor Finney that the law does not mean what it says and what the men who drafted it and put it through Congress say it means. Thereupon, though the States and cities applied for all the power, the secretary allocated to the Southern California Edison Company a certain part of that available for southern California.

Secretary Wilbur's representative recently took to Los Angeles the actual contract that the department wants the city and the company to sign. The friends of public enterprise were startled and greatly disturbed; for according to information given out by Senator Johnson, if the contract had been actually made the private companies might have got not only the power originally allocated to them, but also a part or all of that reserved for Nevada and Arizona, some of that assigned to the Metropolitan Water District, and finally the share of Los Angeles itself.

The legal situation is highly complex, but the following were among the leading grounds of criticism: First, the allocation is changed. Second, the contracts give certain distinct advantages to the States, which cannot now utilize their power, over the cities, which can, thus increasing the opportunity of the power companies, which look forward hopefully to gobbling up the 36 per cent of the power on which Nevada and Arizona have an option. Third, the Edison Company is required under the contract to put up half the money for the machinery at the dam and will thus apparently get equal control with the city of Los Angeles. The danger of power-company control is increased by a provision for a joint board of control in which the city and the company each name two members, the fifth being appointed by the Department of the Interior. Los Angeles has not forgotten that Secretary Wilbur made Mr. Bonner secretary of the Federal Power Commission on the recommendation of California utility executives. Fourth, the city is required to enter, along with the company, into a joint and several contract with the federal government to carry out the provisions of the agreement, and if either of the parties fails to fulfil its contract, its power falls to the other. But it is pointed out that the city of Los Angeles cannot legally enter into a joint and several contract with a private company, and that if it undertakes to do so an obliging taxpayer's suit at the appropriate time would oblige the city to default, and thus throw its power into the hands of the company. Fifth, and in some ways most important of all, under the default provision mentioned above the company, it will be observed, is given every motive during the entire fifty years of the contract to spend in city politics any money necessary to defeat bond issues or any other legislative or administrative measure requisite to the carrying out of the city's contract. No surer means could be found of corrupting the politics of Los Angeles and wrecking its successful municipal light-and-power plant.

Faced by these criticisms, Secretary Wilbur, as we go to press, is reported to have announced a wholly new scheme. The allocations have been changed, and the federal government itself will now construct and equip the power plant, which will be operated by the city and the private company under supervision of a government representative. All users of power will contract directly with the government, and the Federal Power Commission will determine the price of power. It is a hard struggle, but the battle must be fought through to its end if the purpose of Congress, clearly expressed in the Boulder Dam Act, is not to be frustrated by the Executive.

The Ninth Planet

DESPITE the doubts voiced by a few British astronomers, the confirmation by the Harvard Observatory seems to establish definitely that the body discovered at the Lowell Observatory is a major planet. The new planet is the third discovered in historic times, as the other five, being visible to the naked eye, were known to the ancients. The manner of discovery of the new planet is curiously like that of Neptune in 1846. In 1820, when tables were constructed of the motions of Jupiter, Saturn, and Uranus, the motions of Uranus could not be satisfactorily accounted for by existing theory. The vagaries in the observed motion of Uranus were finally attributed to the gravitational pull of an exterior planet, and John Couch Adams, a young English astronomer, and the Frenchman U. J. J. Leverrier almost simultaneously ascertained by intricate mathematical calculations just where the new planet should be looked for and found.

This discovery was one of the great triumphs of the human mind; it was a striking example of the precision reached by the theory of the celestial motions, and it added enormously to the prestige of scientific method. For the discovery of the latest planet emphasizes once more that "science" is not a mere body of verified knowledge; it is also, and more importantly, a method of discovery. The new planet has been found by applying the same methods which revealed Neptune. It has been impossible in this instance to know all the perturbations there may be in the orbit of Neptune, for that planet has made little more than one-third of the circuit of its orbit in the eighty-four years since its discovery. But small, still unexplained peculiarities in the motion of Uranus, which has completed nearly two and a half revolutions since its discovery, led the late Percival Lowell and others to make observations and calculations based on the possibility that this motion was being influenced by another planet in addition to Neptune. In 1914 Mr. Lowell calculated in a memoir the probable orbit of such a planet. Its dramatic discovery on January 21 of this year, when a photographer at Lowell Observatory, at Flagstaff, Arizona, came upon a tiny spot on one of his plates, marked the culmination of a masterly piece of detective work.

All that remains is further data and an appropriate name. "Percival," for Professor Lowell, would be deplorable, and "Cronos," suggested by Professor Shapley, lacks beauty. "Minerva" has everything that euphony could desire, with the added advantage of giving the goddesses a little more recognition than they have hitherto been accorded in planetary names. But whatever the name adopted for the new planet, we welcome it to the solar system. New and larger telescopes had assured us that we should increase our acquaintance with the stars, but a new planet is an unexpected pleasure. Its discovery, we are told, may even be followed by that of one or two others. Nor is the newcomer, as pessimists may suppose, merely another place where something is going wrong. It appears to be unusually decorous. "I have been informed from Lowell Observatory," remarks Dr. Shapley, "that their continued observations of the new planet show that it is behaving the way a trans-Neptunian planet should behave."

"UGH!" says the genius. "Why, the man is just a hack!" Accordingly, "ugh!" and "hack" get tossed about quite frequently because everybody who is not a genius right at this moment intends to qualify by tomorrow afternoon if he happens to get the time. The results are unfortunate. An honest label and a useful trade have come into disrepute. Always there is much commotion about the genius who consents to be a hack. This is called "artistic prostitution" and is generally identified with the sin against the Holy Ghost. I will agree that it is generally a pity for God's gifted to waste their time upon pot-boilers and best sellers, though I must admit that sometimes genius manages to be quite charming when casual and commercial.

But after all, the sins of genius, although important, can never be numerous. I mean that even when a liberal allowance of transgressions is permitted to each genius the sum total of sinning will hardly bulk up into a crime wave. Even in America the supply of authentic masters is not terrific. According to the last official census, there were only two geniuses in the whole State of Texas and but one in Nevada, who has since died without progeny.

The tragedy of the hack, then, is inevitably a more common occurrence in the daily life of us all. He has his tragedy. The genius turning hack is a rare spectacle, but on every hand we see the heartrending phenomenon of the hack consenting to turn genius. Naturally he never achieves the goal he has set for himself and the effort quite ruins him for his ordinary and useful occupation. The world can live, in sorrow of course, but still live without geniuses. But without hacks we can't go on at all. Somebody must hew the wood and draw the water. Hacks serve as footstools and stepping-stones for the aristocracy of high talent. Helotry there must be if genius is to survive. Shakespeare wrote plays in letters of living fire and carried them around to the theater where they were played by hack actors. Suppose the Globe (correct me if I'm wrong) had been stocked wholly with players each certain of his own personal dedication and inspiration! In such a case "Hamlet" might never have been played, nor yet "Othello." The gentleman of genius assigned to the role might conceivably have said: "Oh no! The part is not for me. It stifles my personality." And consider his fellow in greatness upon first reading the part of the Moor. "Me in burnt cork!" he might well have exclaimed. "Does this Shakespeare fellow think I'm Jolson?" And the poor bard would without doubt have been sent about his business.

And around every great painter from the beginning of time there was necessarily an attendant following of hacks. Somebody had to clean the brushes and do the dirty work. Always there must be one to play the concerto and another to turn the music. An orchestra, even a jazz one, is none too well off when the trap drummer is seized with delusions of grandeur. Perhaps the argument may be advanced that genius can humble itself in minor roles and do the hard and useful work of the world until such time as opportunity comes. It can't. Arrogance is the mark of true genius. And a little more arrogance is the mark of the pretender. When a man or woman is seized with the idea that he's a genius, he becomes useful in nothing but his niche—if there. The general assumption is that experimental theaters, radical magazines, and modern music societies go to pot because there is not enough talent to go round. That's a mistake. Such organizations perish through a dearth of hacks. The place is always cluttered up with geniuses and there is nobody to answer the telephone.

From full-page advertisements throughout the country thunders the admonition that each one of us must be up and on his way to far Olympus. You do not play or sing or draw comic cartoons? Very well, you may learn by mail and become, if not a brother, at least first cousin to Beethoven or Rembrandt. Even the art of conversation has been made obligatory. Oh the pity of it! In days of old there used to be at every party one pleasant guest who took no part in the conversation. He was a genial fellow and because he knew himself for a social hack it was his custom to sit a little apart and mix the drinks. Now each one must mix his own. Every guest at every party is a lion.

The genial pleasant hack is not that way any longer. He's read the Five Foot Shelf and will insist on giving you the date of Emerson's birth together with extracts from his more important essays. He speaks French and plays the piano according to expeditious methods. "Allez," he says and sits down to warm up Chopin. In the middle of a selection he may pause, his attention attracted by some chance remark, and say with severity: "Why no, madam, you are wrong; it was not Poe but Walt Whitman whose line you have just been quoting. He wrote it in the late spring of sixty-five."

In halcyon days all journalists were hacks and unashamed. Indeed "journalist" was practically a synonym for "hack." And, being hacks, the boys and girls worked hard and dug for news. They often found out who it was who committed the murder several days before the police had heard that anyone was injured. If the day's assignment was to type the weather reports, that was all right, too. Copy readers were accepted as friends and comrades by the writing men. There was no feeling that any great damage had been done to English literature if several paragraphs came out of the lead and a little more was snipped off at the end. Today there is a scene whenever the blue pencil rises. The man who wrote the story is no longer a reporter—he's Theodore Dreiser serving a brief apprenticeship before proceeding to occupy a place among the planets.

And, after all, just what does it matter as to the form in which the copy goes upstairs to the composing room? It will be jumbled there because the linotyper is serving as a printer at night in order to complete his course at the Art Students' League. "And how is your second act?" says the foreman of the press room. "Some little trouble with the peripetia and the motivation of Blanche in the bedroom scene," replies his assistant. And in the city room the hacks put on their coats and go home to finish that novel. They too belong among the geniuses.

HEYWOOD BROUN

A New Deal for the Red Man

By RUBY A. BLACK

Washington, March 18

THE forces fighting for reform in Indian affairs have gone through their first major struggle and have come out only partly victorious against a formidable and stubborn foe. Their adversary—and in fairness it must be said that he fought only part of their program—was Representative Louis C. Cramton of Michigan, chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations which handles the appropriations for the Department of the Interior. The gentleman from Michigan, who since 1921 has practically controlled Indian administration, is responsible for cutting down the appropriations asked by President Hoover to stop the slow starvation of Indian children in government boarding-schools. Fortunately the Senate, backed by public opinion, forced him in the end to allow twice as much money for food as he at first approved.

It is something to have won any concession from this wilful and frequently obdurate man. He announced as soon as the question was made public that he would not "allow himself to be stampeded by any talk of starving Indian children." There are no starving Indian children in the Indian boarding-schools, he says, unless it is those who "have just come in from the sticks." This contradicts the report made by the group appointed by President Hoover to study the question, who reported that the children may continue to live on their present diet, but are unable to resist disease.

Chronologically, the story of the battle for food and clothing is as follows: Experts made a study of the proper diet needed for Indian children. They found that an adequate diet would cost 39.1 cents a day for each child, as against 20 cents a day provided in 1929, the last year of the Burke-Meritt regime. The Bureau of Indian Affairs estimated that its purchasing and warehouse facilities would allow the proper standard to be bought for 37.8 cents a day. Commissioner C. J. Rhoads and Assistant Commissioner J. Henry Scattergood asked the Bureau of the Budget to approve estimates which would allow this standard to be attained in the fiscal year 1931. The bureau refused to do so.

The Indian commissioners then took the question back to the Secretary of the Interior, Ray Lyman Wilbur, and the three decided that the project of feeding Indian children properly was sufficiently important to be placed directly before the President. At the same time they determined to ask for appropriations which would bring the annual allotment for clothing in the Indian schools to $42 per capita instead of the 1929 figure of $22. President Hoover promptly directed the Bureau of the Budget to approve these estimates, and further suggested that the new standards be put into effect immediately. Accordingly, in December he sent to Congress a request for a deficiency appropriation of $1,100,000 for food and clothing and $400,000 for health work during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930.

When Commissioner Rhoads and Assistant Commissioner Scattergood appeared before the appropriations committee of the House of Representatives to justify this request, Representative Cramton refused to allow the full allotments for food and clothing on the ground that so much of the fiscal year 1930 had passed that the money could not all be used. He therefore required that the allotments be shifted so that $585,000 would go for equipment, furniture, and live stock; $300,000 for an enlarged program of study requiring additional personnel; $30,000 for additional clothing; $50,000 for noonday lunches in day schools; $40,000 for subsistence of pupils retained in boarding-schools during the summer; and $95,000 additional for subsistence in boarding-schools in the fiscal year 1931. President Hoover had asked for $555,156 for food, $14,000 for day-school lunches, $40,000 for summer subsistence, $252,000 for clothing, $189,000 for additional personnel, and $63,000 for equipment, the rest to go for miscellaneous items mainly connected with health and education.

Commissioners Rhoads and Scattergood submitted to Representative Cramton's demands, and the bill was passed by the House of Representatives without any notice of the Michigan Congressman's diversion of the items. His purpose in asking the changes, he said, was to allow the schools to buy electric dish-washing machines, laundry equipment, and such labor-saving devices, and to hire operators for them, thus releasing the Indian children from part of the half-day of labor which they now perform, and allowing the employment of teachers to give the children a full day's instruction instead of only a half-day's. This is a wholly admirable aim, but it would seem that the Indian children would scarcely be able to take the proper advantage of their half-day of leisure or study if they are undernourished.

The American Indian Defense Association made the whole situation public on February 27 at a hearing before the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs. It was very discouraging at that time to see Messrs. Rhoads and Scattergood defending the action of Representative Cramton and praising the House committee for its desire to cooperate in aiding the Indians. On March 8, however, when Rhoads and Scattergood appeared before the Senate Committee on Appropriations, they reversed their stand of February 27 and reiterated their original requests for food and clothing. The Senate committee reported amendments to the bill allocating the $1,100,000 as follows: $480,000 for additional subsistence; $40,000 for summer-school subsistence; $50,000 for noonday lunches in day schools; $30,000 for clothing; $150,000 for additional personnel; $350,000 for equipment, furniture, and live stock. This allocation, while taking care of the food needs, would have hampered somewhat the program for reducing child labor in the schools and would scarcely have touched the clothing problem.

On March 10 the Senate adopted amendments, proposed by Senator Hayden of Arizona, which without reducing the food appropriation increased the clothing appropriation to $200,000 and the personnel appropriation to $250,000, a total increase of $270,000. Of course, all these funds are in addition to the regular appropriation already made for the year. According to Assistant Commissioner Scattergood, this would allow the bureau to carry out its plan for 37.8 cents a day for food from the date the money should be available to the end of the fiscal year 1931, but it would bring the clothing allotment to only about $31 a year for each child instead of $42, as he and Rhoads had wished. The slight reduction from the House allocation in personnel appropriation and the larger reduction in equipment would not, he felt, hamper greatly the program for reducing child labor. Besides, the provision of proper food had priority, he believed.

The bill then went to conference, the conference committee consisting of Senators Wesley L. Jones of Washington, Frederick Hale of Maine, Lawrence C. Phipps of Colorado—the same Phipps who said in the Senate-committee hearings that Indian children need not be taught beyond the sixth grade, anyhow—Carter Glass of Virginia, and Lee S. Overman of North Carolina, and Representatives William R. Wood of Indiana, Cramton, Edward H. Wason of New Hampshire, Joseph W. Byrns of Tennessee, and James P. Buchanan of Texas. These conferees, after about forty-five minutes of discussion, agreed to cut out entirely the $270,000 increase granted by the Senate, and to reallocate the $1,100,000 as follows: additional food, $195,000; summer-school food, $40,000; noonday lunches in day schools, $50,000; clothing, $50,000; additional personnel for enlarged program of study, $200,000; equipment, $175,000; furniture, $240,000; live stock, $150,000. Both Houses agreed to the conference report without discussion of the Indian question, and Senator McMaster was later jockeyed out of his motion to reconsider these items.

This allocation provides $360,156 less than President Hoover requested for food, but $100,000 more than Representative Cramton first allowed. It allows three and one-half times as much as the President requested for day-school lunches. The allotment for additional personnel is $11,000 more than he asked, but $100,000 less than Representative Cramton first allowed. The allowance for equipment, furniture, and live stock is $20,000 less than Representative Cramton first insisted upon, but $502,000 more than President Hoover asked for these "permanent utilities" which are so dear to Representative Cramton's heart.

All these things are seriously needed by the Indian schools, but providing them now means that raising the food standard up to what was established as the minimum need for good nourishment must wait until the fiscal year 1932—unless Representative Cramton has a change of heart. Bureau officials said this lay-out would make possible the expenditure of about 28 cents a day for each child up to July 1 this year, and about 35 to 36 cents a day during the year beginning July 1. Thus the Indian children will get more to eat than they have had for years. Figuring on a different basis, John Collier, of the American Indian Defense Association, estimates that the allocations made by the conference committee would permit the Hoover food standard to be put into effect for 47 of the remaining 80 days of this fiscal year and would allow only 32.78 cents a day per child during the fiscal year 1931, even taking the most optimistic view of the money available for food.

So far, President Hoover has not been heard from in the storm which followed Representative Cramton's rejection of his request. Neither has Secretary Wilbur, although on November 19 he told the House appropriations committee that "our sharpest obligation, particularly if we are going to try to get the Indian children really to take care of themselves, is to give them enough to eat and get enough clothes for them to wear and give them reasonable health protection."

The enormity of postponing even for a day the proposed increase in the food allowance is revealed all the more strikingly when one notes that the allowances for food and clothing in 1929 bought much less than even the 1914 allowances. The United States Public Health Service reported in 1915, after a two-year study, that it was marvelous that the Indian children did not suffer more from tuberculosis than they did, in view of the food provided for them. Assistant Commissioner Scattergood showed, on the basis of the purchasing power of the 1914 dollar, that only $23.52 worth of food was bought for each child in 1929, as compared with $38.52 in 1914; that only $13 worth of clothes was bought in 1929 as compared with $21.81 in 1914; fuel expenditures were in 1929 equivalent to $14.95 on the 1914 basis as against $17.42 in 1914; while salaries of the Indian Bureau employees in the schools in 1929 were equivalent to $69.97 per child on the 1914 basis as compared with $75.37 in 1914.

Even the actual per capita expenditures for food and clothing in 1929, before Rhoads and Scattergood came into office, were lower than in 1914—namely, $36.64 for food in 1929 as against $38.52 in 1914, and $21.04 for clothing in 1929 as against $21.81 in 1914—while actual expenditures for salaries for Indian-school employees increased from $75.37 per child in 1914 to $119.86 in 1929. All estimates of food costs include the value of milk and produce raised on the school farms. Thus the 1929 food values were only 61.1 per cent of the 1914 values, and the 1929 values for clothing were only 59.6 per cent of the 1914 values, while the salaries were 92.8 per cent of the 1914 salaries and the fuel values were 85.9 per cent of the 1914 values.

The allotments for food began to drop in 1921. That was the year in which Representative Cramton became chairman of the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations which passes upon appropriations for the Department of the Interior. He says that it is a lie to say that he has reduced the food appropriations. Congress, he explains, merely appropriates for maintenance of the schools, and the Bureau of Indian Affairs decides how to allocate the funds. But since Representative Cramton warmly praised the former commissioner and assistant commissioner, Charles H. Burke and Edgar B. Meritt, and in November placed in the record of the appropriations-committee hearings a defense, signed by Meritt, of conditions in Indian schools, he cannot with fairness be said to have disapproved of the allotments made by the bureau during those nine years. Certainly, Cramton, Burke, and Meritt understood one another and worked together. Indeed, Representative Cramton is willing to boast that he has had much to do with framing Indian policy during these years and points with pride to increased appropriations for Indian administration. He controls the purse strings of the bureau and exercises the power this confers upon him. It is true, however, that President Hoover is the head of the Republican Party and is responsible for carrying out the new Indian policy he advocated when he appointed the Quaker business men and philanthropists, Rhoads and Scattergood, as trustees of the property and welfare of the Indians. In this capacity, the President should be able at any moment to prevent any stubborn and domineering person, inside or outside the bureau, from crippling the plans made at his direction by Rhoads and Scattergood. That the President did not choose to exercise his power seems to be indicated by the fate of the Senate amendments providing food and clothing.

Those intimate with the workings of the Bureau of Indian Affairs say that Representative Cramton interferes with matters of personnel in the bureau. It is true that Rhoads and Scattergood have not "cleaned out" the bureau, as was heartily desired by friends of the Indian. Practically no changes have been made. The director of Indian education, for example, is the same man who on November 22, shortly before President Hoover asked that food standards be immediately raised, told the committee: "We do not subscribe to the allegation that pupils in our schools are in a starving condition," and who, if Representative Cramton is right, is directly responsible for allocations of lump sums appropriated in recent years for Indian schools. Rhoads and Scattergood are kindly and trusting men who believe that anybody can be redeemed. They are seeking to reform the bureau by converting rather than discharging those identified with the old policy. It is a dangerous although generous procedure. Judas remained among the apostles because Christ was like that. Commissioners Rhoads and Scattergood have also permitted Representative Cramton to override the announced policy of Secretary Wilbur to transfer Indian irrigation and reclamation projects to the Bureau of Reclamation. They have allowed the Congressman to revive debt-laden projects and sink further money in them, the funds appropriated for such projects amounting to $1,000,000, or one-third of the boasted increase in appropriations and equivalent to the increase asked for food and clothing.

In other matters, Rhoads and Scattergood are proceeding steadily and admirably. Results are naturally slow, because, as Commissioner Rhoads said on December 11 in letters to the chairmen of the two Congressional committees on Indian Affairs, they found themselves in "a wilderness of past misadventures" when they took charge of the bureau last May. Much must be done by legislation, and the Senate and House committees on Indian Affairs will be found to be sympathetic. To settle the old claims of the various Indian tribes against the government, which have in some cases demoralized the Indians into thinking they need not work today because they may get a fortune from Uncle Sam tomorrow, Rhoads and Scattergood are seeking the establishment of a court of Indian claims. When the details are ready, Congress will probably expedite the measure. To prevent the dissipation of income-bearing funds, they are asking that Congress make it possible for Indians to establish trust estates. This measure appeals to Rhoads and Scattergood because it may take from the Bureau of Indian Affairs some of the complicated and burdensome work of looking after those funds and preventing designing persons from stealing them from the Indians. The new commissioners would, of course, prefer to concentrate on health, education, the development of Indian leaders, and the advancement of the Indian toward independence of government restriction, but they have to spend most of their time protecting property.

To prevent the dissipation of allotted lands and the consequent homelessness and landlessness of the children of Indians whose allotments have been so dissipated, they have tentatively suggested that allotted lands revert to the tribal estate to be reallotted when conditions warrant it. They are convinced that the entire allotment system must be revised by legislation. To enable the Indians to become independent of the bureau without losing their property, Rhoads and Scattergood are inclined to favor steps to incorporate Indian tribes for the handling of the property, an advisory board to be created in each case in addition to the Indian board of directors. The advisory group would, under the bill being considered, consist of three members, one appointed by the President, one by the federal district judge, and one by the tribal stockholders.

They know that these ideas are not panaceas and they are proceeding warily. They remember that the allotment of Indian lands was designed to make the Indian independent, and they have not forgotten that indiscreet allotments of lands resulted in conflicts with State and local governments over taxes and the impoverishment of many Indians who did not have the property sense of the capitalistic white man with whom they had to deal. Solution of the shameful matter of "reimbursable charges," which amount to $40,549,686, probably involves action by the courts and by the Congress. There is hope that a test may be made in the courts of the validity of the acts of Congress charging Indians for expensive bridges and irrigation projects of value chiefly to white settlers in their vicinity. Allotted land held under government trust is now burdened with liens of more than $25,000,000. In some cases, the government is thus in the curious position of holding mortgages on property probably in excess of the value of the property. The House Committee on Indian Affairs has just reported favorably a bill directing an investigation of the whole question with a view to scaling down or wiping out such of these "debts" as are found to be illegal or unjust.

As yet the commissioners have made no progress toward providing vocational education for Indian boys and girls. They have given notice that they will ask for a supplemental appropriation for this purpose during the fiscal year 1931, beginning July 1, 1930, including equipment for print- and machine-shops and for agricultural directors. They have the idea that the Indian is particularly suited for skilled mechanical work, not necessarily high-speed factory work. They are placing upon district superintendents the duty of helping to find jobs for Indian boys and girls who do not wish to return to the reservation when they leave school. They are seeking a basis for advising the individual Indian how to make a living in competition with the white man.

There is no doubt whatever that Rhoads and Scattergood will administer honestly and as greatly to the advantage of the Indians as possible the red man's resources of power, timber, oil, minerals, and lands. A policy on water power is to be made public soon, it is indicated. Their big job is to find a way to clear out "the wilderness of past misadventures," compensate for the injustices of the past, clear up chaotic legislation, and combat the residue of the "old policy." It is a long, hard job.

It is indeed fortunate that the first issue raised in their struggle to bring the bureau out of the morass was one which drew the support of people everywhere—the starvation of Indian children. Even though they did not win a full victory, the public support they received in this fight may strengthen them against the temptation to waver, even temporarily, when more complex and less human and comprehensible issues arise. They must refuse to yield to such temptations if the "new Indian policy" is not to be abandoned.

Arthur James Balfour

By LORD PONSONBY

THE Earl of Balfour, or, as he was better known, Arthur Balfour, whose death at the age of eighty-one was announced on March 19, was the last of a type of leader in British politics which the rise of democracy in the second quarter of the twentieth century seems to have swept aside—the last aristocrat to be Prime Minister, the last aristocrat indeed to be leader of the Conservative Party. His mother, Lady Blanche Cecil, was Lord Salisbury's sister, so he belonged to the Cecil clan and had Cecil characteristics. His brilliance and subtlety of mind were recognized early. He mastered the technique of the House of Commons by watching it in silence for a couple of years after his first election in 1874, when he was returned as member for Hertford. He gained experience in the art of parliamentary sharp-shooting when with Lord Randolph Churchill and Drummond Wolff he formed the little band of relentless critics which came to be known as the "Fourth Party." His rise on the ladder of promotion was assured. After holding office in the Local Government Board, the Scottish Office, and as Chief Secretary for Ireland, he became leader of the Conservative Party in the House of Commons in 1891, and after eleven years, only three of which were spent in opposition, he succeeded his uncle, Lord Salisbury, as Prime Minister in 1902. Three years later his administration fell, and on the formation of the Liberal Government with its huge majority he led his party in opposition until he was superseded in 1913. During the war he served as First Lord of the Admiralty, Foreign Secretary, and Lord President of the Council, became one of the very select few who received the Order of Merit, and was created an Earl in 1922.

This is only the bare outline of his career of public service. When one comes to read the impressive list of this statesman's offices, from the days of his assistant private secretaryship to his uncle to the day when full of age and honor he was made a Knight of the Garter and an Earl, one might conceive the idea that he must have been the biggest figure in British politics in the last half-century. But he was not. While his success was undoubtedly due to his own conspicuous merits, his failure—failure in achievement, failure to impress his personality on his fellow-countrymen—was due to his equally conspicuous defects.

His dialectical skill was unrivaled, his originality of thought was captivating, his indifference to applause was attractive. As he stood up in the House of Commons, never with any preparation, thinking aloud in halting tones with no high flights of eloquence, he could arrest attention more completely by what was known as his "elevated conversation" than the trained rhetorician could by eloquence and oratory. When he returned to an intensely hostile House in 1906 after his defeat at the polls, the uproarious Liberal majority howled him down. But he mildly assured an indignant colleague who was anxious to protest that it would be all right in a week or two; and sure enough a fortnight later the same hostile mass of opponents was listening to him with rapt attention. He could fence with deadly thrusts, his banter was in the highest degree entertaining, and his sarcasm had a deadly sting. Only when he lost his temper did he lose his balance and miss his mark. On the platform he was never a success. The cheers which greeted him as he rose to speak were often vociferous. The cheers which followed as he resumed his seat were always meager. He felt he was wasting himself on the common herd. They knew his feeling, and frequently they could not follow the workings of his over-subtle mind nor grasp any policy for which he stood. They understood Joseph Chamberlain, who had not half his intellect but spoke in their own language. They expected a lead from Balfour, but they never got it. They hoped for a message, but he could not give it. King Edward was shy of Balfour because of inability to understand him. Thinking Balfour "very clever" he suspected that the latter thought him stupid. His Majesty, like his people, rather resented that and was greatly relieved when the time came for him to deal with a plain man like Campbell-Bannerman.

At last in 1913 his party came to recognize that Balfour's leadership was fatal to their fortunes. His curious lack of judgment and foresight in clinging to office in 1904-5 contributed largely to the hopeless defeat of his party in the subsequent election; and in opposition he had no power to rally his supporters or inspire them with new hopes.

His rivals and successors were all men of very different caliber. He found Campbell-Bannerman, for whom he had never hesitated to express his contempt, the supreme and dearly beloved leader of a vast triumphant party. He would regard him night after night with a puzzled expression of amazement, which one day turned to indignation when, after one of Balfour's favorite exhibitions of dialectic juggling, C.-B. brushed him aside with "Enough of this fooling; let us get on with the business," and the House roared approval. Similarly, when Balfour opposed the Liberal Prime Minister's gift of self-government to South Africa, they loudly applauded C.-B.'s single sentence which condemned him as a mischief-maker. For so clever a man, Balfour's lack of statesmanship in the larger political issues was amazing.

No aristocrat was ever to follow him in Downing Street. Asquith was his friend and his equal intellectually, but terse in expression and more human. Nevertheless, the friendship of the two men who would sometimes dine together before fulminating against one another in debate had no good effect on either of their parties, which regarded politics seriously as a clash of fundamental principles and outlook—not as a mere intellectual disputation and therefore somewhat of a sham fight. Some may wonder whether the Balfourian influence in trusting to the skill of brain power and disregarding the driving convictions of heart and soul had not a good deal to do with the compromising attitude and loss of hold over his followers on Asquith's part which became so apparent toward the end of that statesman's career. Lloyd George, curiously enough, Balfour admired. Detecting, as he thought, an illusive genius and power of leadership which attracted him, he forgave the magnetic Welshman his ignorance. Bonar Law, who took his own place as leader of the Tory Party, Balfour considered a man of little account, and he was utterly mystified that Baldwin, a humble man who had never arrested his attention for a single moment, should actually be chosen as leader of his party. Balfour was quite unable to master the fact that character in the long run tells more than brains. His standard was intellectual, and he had a fastidious dislike of what he judged crude or common. Epigrammatic brilliance interested him; ill-expressed sincerity bored him.

After he was dethroned he kept away from Parliament, but when the war came and the Coalition was formed he was ready to put his services at the disposal of the government in a subordinate position, for he had a high sense of public duty. He greatly fancied himself as a military strategist, but he was not a man who could make swift decisions, and the course which clear conviction could make plain was blurred for him by hesitant doubts. He was interested in the war, again from an intellectual point of view, but of course never penetrated beneath the surface to examine its inner meaning or to discover the tragedy not of its barbarity but of its calamitous futility. In the hideous tangle of the peace negotiations, his want of directness and his inability to recognize the great fundamental principles upon which alone recovery could proceed undoubtedly increased the misunderstandings which produced friction among the Allies. If President Wilson was misled Balfour was largely responsible for it. The cross-purposes and confusion of the Peace Conference amused him. "We seem," he said one day in an aside to his neighbor at the council table, "we seem to be occupied in presenting places we have never seen to people we have never heard of."

Disraeli remarked when he first noticed Balfour in the House of Commons in early days that he could not believe in a man who sat on his shoulder-blades. His physical postures were indeed indicative of his moral attitude.

A. J. B. would lounge back with a look of ineffable boredom, but the position of his body and the expression of his face were often an excellent index of the abilities of the M. P. who happened to be addressing the House at the moment. Generally his eyes were shut and he appeared to be taking little notice; occasionally he would adjust his pince-nez and listen, and on rare occasions he would sit up and watch the speaker with careful attention. In this connection his judgment was sound, and it is interesting to remember that he invariably paid the compliment of careful attention when Ramsay MacDonald, the present Prime Minister, addressed the House. Balfour loved the House of Commons; he enjoyed the conflict of keen debate because of his own admirable equipment. But he never seemed to see beyond the fray of words. He was impatient of any moral argument and had a contemptuous disregard for humanitarian sentiments. He was aloof from the life of the common people. His associates were the "Souls," a band of aristocratic intellectuals in the sun of whose appreciation he loved to bask. His apparent indolence, however, was a pose, for there were subjects about which he cared deeply. He may have been right in his distrust of emotion, but he was wrong in his contempt for sentiment. His dislike of publicity and utter disregard of press criticism were greatly to his credit. One spark of political idealism might have given illumination and purpose to his great talents.

Did he understand democracy? It is very doubtful. He seemed rather vaguely aware that a different type of man was forcing his way into Parliament. He resented them. He regarded them individually and did not see that they were symptomatic of a great change that would grow with surprising rapidity even in his lifetime. The movement in the country against privilege and in favor of better conditions and social justice undoubtedly made him apprehensive; and his greatest vigor as a political fighter was always displayed in defense of the old order. No one could find more ingenious arguments, no one on the spur of the moment could more dexterously open a new line of attack; but it would always be against a cause, more especially if that cause grew out of moral indignation. His outstanding powers in fact were crippled by a certain innate cynicism, so that he invariably chilled the warmth of blundering enthusiasm.

Politically speaking he cannot occur again. That mold has been broken; not that he was one of a pattern, for he was very individual and there has been no one quite like him. The aristocrats have thrown up the sponge and with very few exceptions have retired into a backwater. They are reluctant to compete with the commercials and the plutocrats. They have lost their old undisputed authority and with it, curiously enough, to a large degree they have lost their old distinction. Balfour, if not a great man, was a very distinguished one.

Just as in politics with all his gifts he somehow failed to grip the popular imagination or command that deeper respect among his colleagues or opponents which far humbler figures have somehow managed to gain, so in philosophy he was no more than an attractive amateur. His "Defence of Philosophic Doubt" and "Foundations of Belief," the best-known of his books, brought him in close contact with the best minds of his day, who thought it interesting that an active politician could dabble so intelligently in philosophy. But on these books as on his other works on the shelf the dust is already fast accumulating, while Dizzy's novels are going into new editions.

He was a great appreciator of art and music—he sought the best and found it. His culture and enlightenment were his great assets. We are proud in England, and rightly so, that our statesmen should recognize the supreme value of these intangible and imponderable elements without which politics, as we have reason to know, become materialistic and slip quickly into being sordid. It certainly was not fineness of mind but infirmity of purpose which prevented him from ranking high in our hierarchy of statesmen. He sat on his shoulder-blades morally, and on occasions he came dangerously near to being condemned as a political trifler.

The Balfour land policy for Ireland, the Balfour note with its scheme of debts and reparations, the Balfour policy for the settlement of Jews in Palestine are not achievements of sufficient magnitude long to be remembered. While many friends and associates will remember with affection as long as they live the charm of his attractive personality, no home in Britain as time passes will be able to register or recollect how this prominent statesman contributed to the well-being of their land by his action or added to their own hopes for the future by his sympathy. Neither in the field of industrial and economic politics, nor in connection with progressive measures of social welfare, nor in the serious constitutional problems which occurred in his time, nor yet in relation to the complexities of international relations, will any attainment of lasting value be placed by historians to the credit of Arthur James, Earl of Balfour.

TWO PERSONAL NARRATIVES

V. Divorce with Arbitration

I HAVE been divorced for only a year. For that reason my conclusions as to the benefits or injuries of divorce must be regarded as merely tentative. Our marriage had a formal duration of six years, but during its last two years the arrangement was one of separation by mutual consent. My first conclusion is that the past twelve months of divorce have been a period of far more calm and happiness for my ex-wife, our one child, and myself than those twenty-four months of separation that preceded the divorce. I attribute the comparative peacefulness of the past year not to the fact that my wife and I were divorced, but to the fact that we got a divorce with arbitration.

Since my wife has independent means, the only question for argument in the divorce proceedings was the matter of the custody of our six-year-old child. Declaring that she considered me too irresponsible to be intrusted with any share of this custody my wife sought the complete custody of our son. I was determined to have custody at least to the extent of an equal right to determine matters relating to his health, education, and future—although I was quite willing he should spend the major part of every year with his mother.

For two years I tried to gain this point without divorce. Lawyer after lawyer told me it could not be done. "The marriage status is so nebulous that the only way to end this quarreling over your son and have the matter of his custody definitely determined is to get a divorce." This, in substance, was what I was told by the men of law.

Finally, my wife went to Reno. There she got a divorce on terms suitable to me. Briefly they are these: The custody of our son is considered as shared equally between my ex-wife and me, that is, we have equal power in determining how he shall be brought up, although he actually lives ten months of the year with her and two with me (two summer months). During the ten months that he is with her he visits me every other week-end, from Friday afternoon to Sunday afternoon. This equal division of authority would probably have led to a continuance of quarreling had not my wife's lawyer and my own attorney arranged in the separation agreement for the appointment of an arbitrator to settle whatever differences might arise between us. This arbitrator was to be a neutral, selected by the two lawyers, but at my suggestion the person actually chosen for this job was a relative of my wife's, a man older than either of us, who knows us both well and in whose judgment and ability to be impartial we both have great confidence.

So far this arrangement has worked beautifully. Any threatened disagreement about Ted (our son), which would once have brought about a furious clash accompanied by recriminations covering the whole term of our marriage, is automatically submitted to Jim (the arbitrator). So far Jim's decisions have pleased both my ex-wife and me, and Jim himself seems rather to enjoy his curious duties.

As to the effect of divorce on my son, that is a matter which time alone can determine. I think he is better off than he would have been as a continual spectator of a marriage-with-bickering, but of course I cannot know. At first under the new arrangement he was a good bit upset by the transferences from his mother's house to mine and back again. There were some pretty trying scenes when he was forced to part with one parent to visit the other, and more than once he said emphatically: "I wish you two people would live together." But he seems to be getting used to the situation, and for several months now there have been no tears at leave-takings. The fact that his parents are becoming much more amicable on such occasions as they have to meet is, of course, making the situation easier for him to bear.

Soon after the divorce his mother married again. Ted likes his stepfather and his stepfather seems to like him, and that is all to the good. Of course, Ted does not know yet what marriage is. When, to test him out, I said the other day: "Ted, I think I'll get married again," he replied: "That's all right; that will be all right with me, Daddy." And just after his mother's marriage he said to me: "Daddy, why don't you get married, but not to anyone in particular."

So far as I can see, if there is anything which other persons contemplating or practicing marriage or divorce might learn from my case it is the value of disinterested arbitration, which ought to be available in marriage as well as in divorce.

VI. A Child of Divorce

MY parents were divorced when I was four years old. Both remarried within four years, and until I was twenty-one my home alternated between them. I am now twenty-eight years old. I am impelled to write this account because it seems to me that much of the literature on divorce has been based on surmise and sentiment, and very little on fact.

For about three years after the divorce I lived with my mother. Apparently I had skipped the "Mother, where is Daddy?" stage, and took it for granted that one lived with one's mother and saw one's father every few months. He was a cold man, who took me upon his knee, said a few things which meant nothing to a child, and then went away. I had noticed that the fathers of other children lived with them, but I never missed my father. Since he was always rather impersonal, he created a tension when I saw him, and it was something of a relief when he kissed me and went away. When I was seven my mother explained that Daddy wanted me to stay with him for a while. I rebelled, cried, and even screamed, but I went with him to his home in a city about forty miles away. In his home I found a woman about the age of my mother, who seemed friendly, but who could not understand my homesickness. I spent two months there, rather miserably, and was then taken back again to my mother.

* These articles are the fifth and sixth of a series on divorce. A seventh will appear shortly.—EDITOR THE NATION.

I returned to find that my mother also had a companion, whom I was told to call Uncle. He was rather cold, but kind when occasion demanded, and my joy at being again with my mother almost obliterated the feeling of novelty at having a man in the house. Sometime during the following year my mother gave birth to a child, and when she had regained her strength she and my stepfather decided to move to a city about a thousand miles away. My father came to visit me and say goodby. As usual I was glad to see him go. We moved, and for two years I didn't see him, although occasionally I received a typewritten letter which inquired into the state of my health and gave the state of his.

When I was ten I was informed that I was to live with my father "for a while." Again I rebelled, but again I went. I lived with him for two years. These years were quite miserable; he had had two children by his second wife, who resented my presence in the family; her treatment of me infuriated my father and there were many quarrels. I was anxious to be sent back to my mother, but my father apparently thought that I needed a man's care. At the end of the two years, however, he surrendered and sent me back. I traveled alone, and probably the happiest moment of my life came when I ran up the stairs of the depot and found my mother waiting for me. I continued to live with my mother until I was sixteen. My relations with her husband were not particularly pleasant, but compared to my experience with my father's wife, they were quite all right. When I was sixteen we moved back to the city from which we had originally come, and thereafter I saw my father about three or four times a year. When I was nineteen, having received the benefit of a high-school education, I went to work.

I have gone rather carefully into the causes of the divorce of my parents. My mother was eighteen when she married, and my father twenty-four. For a year they were happy. But my father, it seems, was inordinately jealous and suspicious. My mother was of a sunny nature, free and open. There were long quarrels. My father accused her of being too friendly with other men. Once she left him and returned to her relatives. She was induced to return to him but within a month there were more quarrels. Shortly before they separated, he accused her of infidelity and struck her to the ground. She took me and left. At the present time my father is wealthy. My mother and her husband are poor. They have the bare necessities of life and little else. Since the divorce my mother's curve of fortune has gone steadily downwards with but few fluctuations. Poor health and poverty have conspired to make her life something of a ghastly joke. Recently I asked my mother if she ever regretted the divorce. "If I could know," she answered, "that your life had not been harmed during childhood, I would say that I have no regrets. For myself I have none. Obviously, I could not live with a man who thought I was unfaithful to him. It is only when I think of you that I have any doubts."

Probably more than the average son, I love my mother. Had she continued to live with my father, bearing his suspicions and his insults, I could not love her now; I could only pity her. My love is in great part admiration for her courage and independence of mind. Before she married her second husband, my father, already on the road to wealth, begged her to return to him. She refused, and married a man earning eighteen dollars a week. I have truthfully told her that I should feel very bitter toward her today if she had lived a life of humiliation with a man she did not love, merely because of me.

I do not wish to fall, as others have done, into the error of generalizing about divorce, but let those who weep over the "child of divorce" remember that that child some day will grow up. If he loves his parents, and can keep from pitying himself, he will accept his childhood with a shrug of the shoulder and be thankful that his parents did not live together in misery in order to provide him with "a good home."

In the Driftway

TO a considerable extent Tampa, Florida, lives in order that America may smoke. The city has risen from the ashes of billions of cigars. A billion is a big number, but Tampa makes half a billion cigars a year, and somebody, somewhere, must smoke them. The industry is an exotic one, transplanted from Havana, and the workers are mostly Cubans or Spaniards or their native sons and daughters. The district known as Ibor City, once a separate municipality, is almost wholly Latin, and in many ways has the appearance of a little Havana. Take a walk through Ibor City on a Saturday night, when the streets are gay and pulsating with life, and you will hear hardly a word in any language except Spanish. But address almost anybody in English and you will get an immediate and fluent reply. Ibor City seems to be as truly bilingual as any spot the Drifter has visited. The street signs are a jumble of Spanish and English, and one inhales an oddly cosmopolitan atmosphere as he follows the laughing, talkative crowds. At a corner one sees a swinging sign on one side of which is the announcement: "Tickets on sale here for Kid Chocolate vs. Benny Hall"; and on the reverse: "Tiquetas de venta aquí para la pelea de Kid Chocolate vs. Benny Hall." On a newsstand one sees cheek by jowl La Semana, Film Fun, the Diario de la Marina, the Quick-Trigger Western Magazine (published in Springfield, Massachusetts), the Love Story Magazine, La Política Cómica, Photoplay, and the Diario Español.

* * * * *

THROUGH the swinging doors of the Centro Español [Spanish Club] one enters with the crowd. One's ears are filled with fervid, noisy chatter, one's nose is smitten with the odor of countless cigars, and one's eyes take in scores of tables about which sit groups of dark-haired, dark-eyed, dark-skinned men playing dominoes or cards or shaking dice for the drinks. Waiters scurry around among the tables bearing bottles and glasses, while from part of the great room comes the click, click, click of billiard balls on a dozen tables. Go outside and walk on through the street. The glaring scarlet fronts of Woolworth and Kress leap out at you, while nearby you encounter the Madrid Hotel, advertising "Cuartos furnidos," the Chicago Bargain House (M. Cohen and Son), and Juan Baamonde, furniture. Across the street, side by side, are the Hub Pool Room, the Tom Lee Laundry, and La America Restaurant. One raises his eyes and they encounter a sign: "Los Dos Hermanos, Barbería y Perfumería—Ladies' Bob, 50c." Inside the shop one espies a notice: "El sábado no se fia (We do not trust on Saturday)."

OWING perhaps to the Latin tradition among the citizens of Tampa, the city owns an auditorium. It also owns a hotel. The Tampa Bay Hotel was built more than forty years ago by Henry B. Plant. He and Henry M. Flagler were the pioneer builders of Florida. Flagler was interested in the east coast, and finally pushed to completion the dream that many persons thought the pinnacle of folly—a railway along the Atlantic seaboard of the State clear out over the keys to the southernmost point. Plant, on the other hand, undertook to develop Tampa and the west coast. He built the Tampa Bay Hotel after the old model for resort structures. Like the Royal Poinciana at Palm Beach, it is long and narrow, stretching out in hall after hall, salon after salon, so that it is a quarter-mile walk from one end to the other. Plant used the hotel as a repository for a large amount of the valuable European furniture and bric-a-brac which it was his hobby to collect, and much of it is still there. After Plant's death the city of Tampa bought for a song the hotel and its lovely wooded grounds stretching back to the banks of the Hillsborough River.

WHEN Plant opened the Tampa Bay Hotel he invited Flagler to attend the ceremonies. "Where is Tampa?" Flagler is said to have telegraphed. "Follow the crowd," was Plant's retort.

A Protest

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I am not a Communist and I never was one. Furthermore, I am not in sympathy with the alleged "red" movement. The aim of this letter is to protest. The action taken by Commissioner Whalen in sending lists of Communists to employers and thereby violating—according to J. McKeen Cattell—Section 19 of the Federal Penal Code is atrocious enough, but to deprive a boy of his high-school education because he has some communistic ideas is worse beyond words. As a steady reader of The Nation I am asking you to lead the fight to have Saul Wellman reinstated in the Brooklyn Boys' High School, of which Dr. Eugene A. Colligan is principal.

Tabulation Cannot Help

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Morris Ernst ends his article on Children and Property in your issue of February 12 as follows:

> At present each person unhappily mated must learn everything for himself as if he were the first to break away from the family hearth. Somehow, for the benefit of those who have become involved and will continue to become involved in marital difficulties, we must find a way of collecting and organizing for use the enormous accumulating body of experience.

The collection and organization for use of such information would be very humanly interesting. The information might even be valuable. But valuable to whom? Certainly not to particular Marys and Johns in the midst of separating and faced with the immediate problem of division of children and property. The problem of each couple is, and will always be, peculiar to themselves. The experience of others cannot help them. The emotional content of the two, their temperaments, their characters, their common experiences, the nature of their past relations, the particular reason for separation—all these and many other purely personal elements make each particular case sui generis.

In the nature of things, each person unhappily mated must learn everything for himself as if he were the first to break away from the family hearth, because he is the first to break away from that particular family hearth. Tabulation cannot help him.

Cheering if True

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I wish to lessen the worries of those who contemplate darning their own socks again, and who may have been misled by Mr. Ernst's references to alimony. It may be a source of great relief to those who wish to prove that married life is "not what it's cracked up to be" to know that once a divorce is granted and the parasite takes up with another "meal ticket," the previous worm is at once, upon application to a court of competent jurisdiction, relieved of "taxation without representation."

I hope my criticism will not be misconstrued and that I will not be regarded as one who glories in wrecking the American home. It is merely that I see no need of scaring people into such fits of delirium that they will let themselves be choked by the bonds of matrimony.

Navies Are Expensive

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Allow me to thank you for your article in The Nation of March 19, Parity the Enemy. Remembering clearly conditions in the eighties and early nineties, when we had no navy and no one was afraid, I find difficulty in comprehending the wave of terror that swept the country ten years ago and as yet has not receded. Having, according to our own proclamation, "won the war," we found ourselves scared to death. Thereupon we discovered that we must be "prepared." For what we must be prepared no one knew then or knows now, but we were convinced that we must be prepared for something and that the only way to be prepared was to build a navy at least the equal of Great Britain's.

A reversal of national attitude so sudden and so silly necessarily must have back of it at least a bit of substance. This is easy to find. It is essentially the recent and present frame of mind of the Middle West, which dominates the country, that we are going to do what we like in this world and that no one is going to stop us. We are going to send our merchandise whenever we please and wherever we please. We are going to recognize no blockade except the blockades that we maintain. We are going to dominate the earth. This attitude, of course, is intelligible; it is the attitude of imperialism through the ages. It is, of necessity, utterly opposed to peace and certain to cause war.

Our naval preparations in the late nineties, limited though they were, brought enough evil. They had not a little to do with that truculent and shameless aggression of ours known as the Spanish-American War. For this we have paid heavily and are likely to pay more. It brought us the Philippines and they, sooner or later, promise to bring us war—war not alone with Japan, but with Japan united with others. Such a war is likely to cost us, in addition to countless loss of life and treasure, the end of our national government as now constituted; perhaps, joined with other active causes, the end of our present union of States.

Navies are expensive.

Absolutes and Progress

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: One does not look for logic in an extravaganza such as Mr. Rorty's The Inventor Enters Heaven, but the central idea follows fashion so closely that the effect on one reader at least is not satisfactory. It would seem, after all, that blackness and whiteness are the fundamental tests, only we have been mistaken as to which is which. Are there no cases of arrested development in the orthodox hell?

When I defended the present generation to one of its members he finally conceded: "Well, I suppose, after all, my generation is more honest and sincere than yours was." My answer was: "My generation was addicted to the hypocrisy of virtue but sometimes it seems that yours is seeking the hypocrisy of vice." After all, does not the girl of today use rouge and the lipstick for much the same reason her great grandmother did not?

On Sundays in Boston we have over the radio Catholic truth, Christian Science truth, fundamentalist truth (twice a day), and occasionally one fears that he is listening to modernist truth! If The Nation's pluralism were in vogue we should no doubt have a Soviet hour giving us atheistic truth. Fortunately paradoxes occur—in one home Dr. Fosdick is admired but the ladies are High Church, so the seats are arranged for convenience in bowing toward the east, while incense gives the proper atmosphere. It is through such cross-fertilizations of the absolutes that part of our progress comes.

Marigold

By ROBERT HUNT

Let the flower be gently shriven
Now the frivolous gold is shed.
Let a mass of winds be said
For the leaf and petal riven
And the stem untenanted.

Let the garden be forgotten
While this creature of the sun
Fadeth fast and is undone,
Whose essential root was rotten,
Flourishing ephemeron.

O the flower was deeply bitten.
Let the stricken pollen be Lost in larger botany,
That in scent and flame had written
Its deciduous history.

An Apology for the Present

An Argument to Prove that its Abolition may be Attended with Some Inconveniences, and Perhaps not Produce those Many Good Effects Proposed thereby.

IT has been frequently charged by some of the critics of the sect called humanism that its doctrines have no relation whatever to the present time. I have myself hitherto refrained from making this charge, for fear that it might be slightly unjust. Its truth, however, has now been freely confessed from within the humanist order, by that new but surely ardent disciple, Mr. Seward Collins, editor of the Bookman. "The humanists," writes Mr. Collins to Mr. Harry Hansen, "do not claim the present. They claim the best literature of the past and the best of the future. The contemporary they will dispose of to American naturalists and aesthetes at a very low figure."

While many will think it a pity to gild this lily, I cannot refrain from raising a question or two about it. It seems unwise, to begin with, to accept anything from the humanists, at however low a figure, without first carefully examining their own title to it. This applies particularly to contemporary literature, of which, many suspect, they own next to nothing. Any title search, too, should go into the question of boundaries. When did the past end, and when does the future begin? Did the past end with Sophocles? Or with Rousseau? Or with W. C. Brownell? Or last Wednesday? Or a few minutes ago? Does the future begin tomorrow, or not till 2030, when we present pigmies shall all be dead? For the present, strictly speaking, is but a moving point in time, without extension; all behind it is the past and all before it the future. One would suspect Mr. Collins of deliberately trying to sell the naturalists a mere infinitesimal point, did not knowledge of his writings assure one that he is too innocent to think of such a thing, and that all attempts, indeed, to give precision to his ideas are resented by him as metaphysical quibbling.

Yet even if we waive these perhaps technical considerations, certain other questions occur. How can the present be so vile, when it is but the child of the brilliant past? And how can we expect anything of the future, when it will be but the child of the miserable present? And why, above all, does the Bookman, Mr. Collins's publication, waste its time, month after month, in reviewing contemporary books—all of which are, by definition, worthless?

Mr. Collins and his masters may not credit it, but there are people so benighted as to believe, with Mr. A. N. Whitehead, that "the only use of a knowledge of the past is to equip us for the present. No more deadly harm can be done . . . than by depreciation of the present. The present contains all that there is. It is holy ground; for it is the past, and it is the future." And I have myself sometimes ventured to think that an age that can cradle such important figures as Mr. Irving Babbitt, Mr. Paul Elmer More, Mr. Gorham B. Munson, and Mr. Seward Collins cannot be so unworthy as all four unite in declaring it to be.

But I must concede that Mr. Collins's statement does settle one question. If the humanists are not interested in the present, then there is surely no reason why the present should be interested in the humanists. And with this solution, which is apparently satisfactory all around, why should not the controversy close?

HENRY HAZLITT

England

England. By Wilhelm Dibelius. Translated from the German by Mary Agnes Hamilton, M.P. Harper and Brothers. $5.

IT is a little more than ten years since the World War ended. During this period many books have been written dealing either with the war or with the nations involved in it, most of them by nationals, a few by foreigners. It is probably no exaggeration to say that Professor Dibelius's book on England is not only far the most important work of the kind produced during this period, but that it is one of the few books of enduring importance written by a foreigner about another nation.

Professor Dibelius wrote in the years immediately following the war, when Germany lay crushed beneath the heels of its victorious opponents and when feeling between the recent enemies was at its bitterest. It is therefore conclusive evidence of his elevation of soul, the breadth and depth of his scholarship, and the soundness of his critical judgment that in the very first lines of his Preface he could say: "The idea of writing this book came to me in the war. It forced itself on me from my overwhelming sense of a people giving its best in fighting an enemy which it did not know." To this noble purpose Professor Dibelius remains constant throughout the book. With amazing objectivity and absolute fairness he describes, appreciates, interprets, and criticizes English institutions, customs, ideals, and achievements.

In the first instance, Professor Dibelius is addressing his own countrymen. He is a cultivated, intelligent, and patriotic German, but he is not therefore blind to the virtues any more than he is blind to the defects of his country's great adversary in the war. He proceeds on the sound assumption that an important contribution toward international understanding can be made only as disinterested scholars bring their minds objectively to play upon the achievements, the aspirations, the faults, the virtues of other nations. One feels certain that, as Professor Dibelius has written a fearless, scholarly, and appreciative book about England, so he would be the first to welcome a similar book written by an Englishman about Germany. There is indeed no place for stupid and uncritical national sensitiveness if anything like mutual sympathy, tolerance, and comprehension is to be brought about among nations. Describing England for the purpose of enlightening Germany, Dibelius holds the mirror before England so that no Englishman who reads the book in the spirit in which it is written will fail to understand himself better.

The reduction of armies and navies, the perfection of transportation, the weaving of peaceful and beneficial international relations may all be aids to civilization and lasting peace; but although all these things had been in process during the fifty years preceding 1914, they did not prevent the war. At the crucial moment nations were willing to sacrifice everything —civilization, intercourse, wealth, life—in order that they might blindly dash themselves against one another for the purpose of achieving ends which ten years after the event no one is able to define and no participant has even remotely achieved—victor or vanquished. Will mutual comprehension weave still another and stronger bond? Dibelius is hopeful; at any rate, the two nations may now at last understand one another. The catch-phrases with which England has been characterized have here been analyzed and explained; henceforth the English may know how these catch-phrases came into vogue; the Germans, the limitations within which they possess meaning.

But the interest of the book is by no means confined to Englishman and German. There is perhaps no nation in the world with so little insight and knowledge as America. Only in the most restricted fashion do we know foreign languages, foreign literatures, foreign history, foreign culture, foreign aspirations, foreign difficulties and problems. However much it may benefit an Englishman or a German to ponder thoughtfully the pages of Professor Dibelius's book, it will benefit neither of them more than it will benefit an American, anxious, as all forward-looking Americans should be, to understand the significance and role of the two great nations with which directly or by implication this volume deals, for Dibelius shows a clear perception of the extent to which the war loaded upon us increased responsibilities at a time when we were hardly competent as a nation to bear the responsibilities we were already carrying. The translator and the publishers have therefore rendered a signal service to the American public by making this volume accessible at a time when the comprehension of foreign nations has become of overwhelming practical and cultural importance. The book was written clearly, vigorously, and concisely in the original German; Mrs. Hamilton has done her work so skilfully that the reader is unaware of the fact that he is reading a translation.

The Subjection of India

India in Bondage. By Jabez T. Sunderland. Lewis Copeland Company. $4.

IT was Sir John Seeley who said long ago about India in his remarkably wise book, "The Expansion of England": "Prolonged subjection to a foreign rule is one of the most potent causes of national deterioration." This passage may be taken as the text of Dr. Sunderland's new volume. He writes as the advocate of India's freedom from the foreign yoke of Great Britain, and his words come from the depth of a very warm and noble heart. He cannot write dispassionately, for his whole soul is stirred by the subject he has chosen, and when he remembers all that India's subjection has meant of humiliation and injustice in the past to the Indian people, his emotion is roused and he pours forth a stream of passionate protest. Yet his spirit remains kindly and generous throughout, and he seeks in every way to be fair-minded and true to the evidence which he has laboriously collected. At the opening of his book he gives the following explanation of his motive:

> I very earnestly desire not to be misunderstood as to my motive in writing this book. Let no one say, or for a moment believe, that the book means enmity to Great Britain. It means nothing of the kind, any more than pleas for freedom of the slave in the old days of American slavery. I speak plainly; but as already said, in everything I endeavor to be fair and just, and to treat with respect and courtesy those who hold views different from my own. I am in no sense whatever England's ill-wisher. What I advocate for India I believe to be for England's good as well as for India's. I want no wrong done to England, in connection with India or anywhere else. But I also want England to do no wrong to India, or through India to the world.

The fact that this book of Dr. Sunderland's has been proscribed by the Indian government is itself a justification of the title "India in Bondage." Such a proscription obviously means a denial of essential freedom. The matter has not ended even there. A singularly upright and sincere Indian editor, Mr. Ramananada Chatterjee, was recently prosecuted for sedition and convicted because he had published the book in India. There are few men in India whose goodness I personally admire more and whose friendship I value more highly than Mr. Ramananada Chatterjee's, and it was a very great shock to me indeed when his prosecution and conviction were announced. It brought home to me how helpless India is.

If Dr. Sunderland is challenged, as an American, with living in a glass house owing to America's retention of the Philippines against the will of the people, he makes a splendid reply: "Whether we like your question or not, it is just and entirely proper on your part; and even if for the time being it makes us mad, as it will be likely to, in the end it will do us good." He also quotes Bishop Brent's words: "Moral questions have no boundaries. The world of today is steadily revealing itself to be a world of identical moral interests. If we exploit abroad, the downfall of the exploited will eventually become our own downfall."

The indictment which Dr. Sunderland makes is one that cannot be easily answered. The truth is that in earlier days there was much to be said for the continuance of British rule in India because it remained acceptable to the great majority of thinking Indian people, but today when it has become unacceptable the saying of Sir John Seeley about the evil of prolonged foreign rule comes true. Autocracy has gone on far too long, and it has brought with it an inevitable chain of evils which make India feel her bondage more and more acutely.

Dr. Sunderland's own solution for the Indian problem is a remarkably moderate one. He would himself be perfectly content to see India free and self-governing in the same way that Canada and Australia are free. He has not set forward in this volume as his own solution of the present deadlock anything further than this dominion status:

> As a result of a pretty wide acquaintance in England and a residence of some years in Canada, I am disposed to believe that nowhere in the world can be found governments that are more free, that more fully embody the intelligent will of their people, or that better serve their people's many-sided interests and wants than those of the self-ruling colonies, or "dominions," of Great Britain. I do not see but that these are in every essential way as free as if they were full republics. Probably they are not any more free than the people of the United States, but it is no exaggeration to say that they are essentially as free. The connection of most of them with England, their mother-country, is not one of coercion but of choice; it is one of reverence and affection. That the British government assures such liberty in even a part of its colonies is a matter for congratulation and honorable pride. To this extent it stands on a moral elevation equal, if not superior, to that of any government in the world.

With this idea of Canada in his mind he welcomes dominion status, and he would be glad if the people of India could be satisfied with that position. But at the same time he fully recognizes that the choice must rest with India herself; and if her choice were finally to be complete independence, he himself would accept that verdict as the will of the Indian people. Just as slavery had to be abolished because it was an infringement of sacred human rights, so the foreign rule of Britain over India must come to an end for the same reason. This is Dr. Sunderland's main thesis, and the facts he brings forward uphold it in a convincing manner.

Critic as Poet; Poet as Critic

Poets, Farewell! By Edmund Wilson. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

Gold Coast Customs. By Edith Sitwell. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

EDMUND WILSON disarms any reviewer when, with a gesture of farewell, he leaves the field of poetry to those who are indeed poets and betakes himself again to his own field of prose and criticism, a field where his name is already emblazoned. This farewell is indicated in his title. Since, however, Mr. Wilson has chosen to publish a book of poems, he has offered himself for criticism concerning his poetry.

The present reviewer has always been much puzzled as to just how the difference between an excellent imitation of poetry—such as is written frequently by men of letters—and real poetry may be defined. Such imitations have the manners, the garments, the poses of real poetry, but in some subtle way they betray themselves as imitations. Strangely enough, any acute literary analyst can imitate poetic images, poetic language, poetic ideas; what betrays him usually is his rhythm, for in real poetry the rhythm is the emotion and the emotion is the rhythm. This is not true of poetry written by the literary analyst.

Now it is not quite fair to put Mr. Wilson in the latter class: his poems spring from completely authentic experience, but in them the intellect rather than the emotion determines the rhythm. Only once or twice does the emotion dictate, and on these occasions, as in A Young Girl Indicted for Murder, the rhythm springs from the emotion. In general, Mr. Wilson's rhythms are not inevitable. His use of language is expert, his imagery subtle; he is a far better writer of verse than hundreds who proclaim themselves poets in the flesh, but he is not essentially a poet and he is acute enough to understand this fact himself.

As for Edith Sitwell—here we have the opposite side of the picture, the poet attempting to be critic of her age, and failing whenever she loses sight of her art in order to stamp down her ideas. The world for Miss Sitwell is like a sampler on the wall: woven figures—romantic, pudgy, and wooden-faced, like a child's dream of maturity—figures seeming to move yet utterly incapable of motion! Miss Sitwell is very tired indeed, very completely lost—and she knows it. She remembers a childish and romantic past as delightful, but in this past she has no faith; the reality of the present she abhors. Life is a living death and death is an uncertainty which may be even worse. Hers is the dilemma of so many moderns. And so like a modern Lady of Shalott, a little angular, Miss Sitwell weaves her samplers, and the legend running underneath—whether it be "God Bless Our Happy Home" or something else—is always interpreted ironically. And while she weaves she sings her nursery songs, which, although they have nursery rhythms, are in idea very sophisticated and disillusioned. And she gazes into the mirror, already cracked from side to side and very old, because even its distortions are preferable to the view out the window.

The long poem with which this book begins, Gold Coast Customs, is a superimposition of African savagery and cannibalism upon modern savagery and cannibalism as seen at one of Mrs. Bamburgher's parties. The criticism inherent in the situation is not new: that as a whole African savagery is more decent than is modern. I have deliberately oversimplified the poem in order to make my point, for Miss Sitwell's criticism fails, and what is valid as poetry is her emotion of horror at the sordidness of modern life and her yearning after faith:

> I have seen the murdered God look through the eyes
> Of the drunkard's smirched
> Mask as he lurched
> O'er the half of my heart that lies in the street
> 'Neath the dancing fleas and the foul news-sheet.

Her six lyrics, which were to be a part of a longer poem never written concerning Bluebeard, add little to Miss Sitwell's ideas and are written with her usual amazing transposition of imagery from one sense to another; here again we see what we smell, taste what we see, touch what we smell. All poets use this trick, but with Miss Sitwell it becomes a definite technique of distortion, and the result achieved through it is always that of the superimposition of the actual world upon the romantic world—and disillusionment concerning both.

Mr. Callaghan's Medium

It's Never Over. By Morley Callaghan. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

IN some respects Morley Callaghan is by far the most interesting member of the contemporary hard-boiled school of fiction. Under the surfaces of a prose style that runs in deadly parallel to the familiar technique of Ernest Hemingway, he uncovers a warm, vibrant, boyish personality. He exhibits a curiosity about human behavior that seems to be at war with the very method he has chosen as his medium. His short stories and novels are actually concerned with the subtle, often tender, sometimes downright sentimental phases of human relationship. As evidence of his vitality he displays a wholesome sense of humor in his very short story about a young priest facing a problem in practical theology as he tries to expel a drunkard from a confessional. Even in the hands of Ernest Hemingway, the hard-boiled manner is suspect—behind a brightly polished exterior you discern a soft, almost tearful admission that the world is no place for sweet young lovers—and in the case of Morley Callaghan you half expect the apparition of another Booth Tarkington, gifted with the naive curiosity of a Sherwood Anderson.

In his latest novel Callaghan throws the shadow of a man who died upon the gallows across the life of his protagonist, John Hughes. The story is told in the usual detached, simple, straightforward manner, but the situation that creates the story carries with it a world of complex interrelationships, depending largely upon the fact that the human organism is something more than a given assortment of sexual reflexes. John Hughes is a rationally ambitious young man, bewildered for the time being by an emotional attachment to two young women, Lillian and Isabelle. He is a thoroughly likable young fellow, a bit slow-witted and inarticulate. His particular ambition is a successful career as a concert baritone. He earns his living by clerking in a department store and singing in church choirs. Just before the novel opens he breaks his engagement to Isabelle (quite at her suggestion) because of possible scandal arising from her brother's death upon the gallows. By avoiding an obvious emotional complication, he steps into another that has all the elusive characteristics of a messy love affair. He acquires Lillian, Isabelle's closest friend, as his mistress. Helplessly, hopelessly, he tries to forget Isabelle by immersing himself in his affair with Lillian; meanwhile, Lillian, always easily stirred by a romantic appeal to her emotions, imagines that she is in love with Isabelle's dead brother. Isabelle, frustrated in her love for John, becomes reckless in her favors to other men. Both girls are in a fair way to go to the dogs and John is halted in the progress of his career. Putting it mildly, the situation becomes intolerable; you feel desperately sorry for these three young people, even at the expense of your own emotions going a little bit soft and sentimental.

Callaghan never fails to excite your sympathy for his characters; even the minor figures (there is an excellent portrait of Father Mason, a Catholic priest) are clearly outlined and convincing. Yet here as always there is a possibility of Callaghan creating something far more important than his self-imposed limitations allow, something well beyond the professional novel patterned in the style of 1930.

HORACE GREGORY

A Philosophical Vagabond

A Landlubber's Log. By Arthur Warner. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

RUNNING away to sea when one is young is the oldest and most romantic of adventures. No Wanderlust that halts at the sea's rim can ever find full and satisfying expression; for the inland voyage, or even the voyage in the air, is tame compared to the majesty and mystery of the sea and the hallowed traditions of a thousand years that surround all ocean-going ships. Many generations of men have grown old haunted by an unfulfilled dream of youth to follow the gipsy trail to the far corners of the earth. A voyage such as Arthur Warner has recorded in "A Landlubber's Log" would leave the old age of most men with few regrets. Mr. Warner's book is an absorbing account of a youthful voyage in a tramp steamer to Australia and New Zealand some twenty-five years ago. After an interlude spent in wandering—as a "bindle-stiff" through New Zealand, as a beach-comber in Australia, and as a sailor on a windjammer—he returns to England in the hellish stokehole of a passenger ship. The narrative is realistic, but as in all good realism there hovers over it the mystery of the unseen, the spirit of romance.

Mr. Warner's yarn has something of the hard fidelity to fact which one associates with a ship's log. There is not the remotest suggestion of deliberate dramatic heightening or fictitious falsification for the sake of a better story. Without the use of any gestures or obtrusive devices he has told his story quietly and simply. His veracity is the veracity of cool restraint, even of understatement, and he is as skilful in this respect as is William H. Davies in "The Autobiography of a Super-Tramp." But he is more charming than Davies in his commentaries upon his experiences—upon men and things. He has the ability to turn informal essayist at a moment's notice, but he does it with fine artistic tact and an understanding of the requirements of effective narrative. These essays in little are always illuminating, and reflect in quizzical humor or in flashes of insight a man who enjoys the wonders and roaring paradoxes of creation. While rambling through New Zealand he expounds a bit of beggar's philosophy the wisdom of which I as an ex-hobo can heartily indorse. I quote it as a valuable bit of advice to the fraternity:

> When traveling as a tramp, as I have hinted before, one must be bold, insistent, and immediate. One cannot trifle or dally with people's generosity; it's an unstable quality that may ooze away or grow cool. Give people an inch and they'll take an ell. Let them off from giving you supper and they'll want to deny you breakfast too. You mustn't give them a chance to be ungenerous; if necessary, be generous for them. Keep their hearts bleeding; the flow clots all too readily.

The incidents in this narrative are not sensational. There is no mutiny, no fire at sea, no encounter with Malay pirates. Several fights occur, a man falls overboard, the author has a narrow escape from death as a stoker—but the events for the most part are casual enough. All, however, are made to seem important and unique as transcribed by Mr. Warner. His is the art that fashions interest out of experiences which to a writer less alive and less skilful would yield little. His sojourn with the Salvation Army in Newcastle, Australia, is most amusingly presented, and his long trek alone across New Zealand is an excellent illustration of how the trivial can be made exciting. But most entertaining of all is the voyage on the tramp steamer, the Lethington, to Australia. The members of the crew are vividly delineated, each speaking a delightfully convincing idiom whether he be Cockney, Irishman, Norwegian, or Scotsman. As the Lethington plows the desolate seas from the Cape of Good Hope to Australia six thousand miles away, one learns of the sailor's peculiar insularity, of his language and preoccupations, his songs and chanteys, the motives that underlie his allegiance to the sea. Mr. Warner says in the opening pages of his book that he became a sailor in order to find reality. "A Landlubber's Log" is ample evidence that he found it; and what is no less important, he has written a book that belongs with the best of the vagabond travel narratives.

Boswell and Johnson

Dr. Johnson and Mr. Boswell. By Harry Salpeter. Coward-McCann. $3.50.

THIS volume has the pleasantly casual, conversational tone proper to a book about Johnson and Boswell, no matter how much industrious reading and research may have preceded the writing of it. Mr. Salpeter refers in the postscript to the more than sixty volumes he read, reread, perused, and dipped into during three years, and to his good fortune in having access to the first six volumes of the privately printed Boswell papers. As the publication of these papers goes on, Boswell emerges more and more as a vivid and various personality, in whose life Johnson was a golden incident, but an incident, "as Boswell was an incident in Johnson's."

They met in 1763, and Mr. Salpeter tells all about that meeting, and what each man was like then and what he had done; and how after this first act of the friendship Boswell went off on his grand tour, became interested in Corsica, and Paoli, and Voltaire, and Wilkes, and presently established for himself a reputation on the Continent as considerable as that enjoyed by Johnson in England. Had Johnson rebuffed him when he decided to write his life, Boswell might have immortalized some other celebrity, such as Wilkes, for he was "quite promiscuous in his biographical affections." That year 1763, central in the lives of Johnson and Boswell, can be regarded as central in the Johnsonian epoch; and Mr. Salpeter fills a dozen pages or so with facts about the rise of Methodism, inventions in industry, the progress of the novel, the beginning of the Romantic movement—facts that help the reader with a rich background to fill in the story, but offer a somewhat disconcerting challenge to the weak memories of most of us. Suppose Crabbe was then nine, and Mozart seven, and Blake six, and Handel peacefully at rest for four years in Westminster Abbey? They might have made the age interesting poetically and musically if they had been older or younger, but they weren't; and Mr. Salpeter sums it all up as an age that would have left indifferent wracks behind if Boswell hadn't made it the golden age of biography.

After this crossroads encounter in 1763, how did Boswell influence Johnson and Johnson Boswell? Johnson's best writing had been done but his best talking was to come, and it might not have come at all in its rich profusion if Boswell had not helped to create it by his persistent questioning. He displayed great ingenuity in thinking up questions: what would Johnson do if shut up in a tower with a baby, for instance—questions that once made Johnson say, "Would not such talk make a man hang himself?" As for Johnson's influence, perhaps he stiffened Boswell's moral spine, though the results were not striking except from the standpoint of how much worse Boswell would have been without Johnson. That Johnson became his model was "to the greater ultimate advantage of the preceptor than the student." The later chapters contain sketches of Johnson's friends, an account of the club, a brief systematic narrative of his life, and a discussion of the always interesting contradictions and virtues and oddities of his character. The best things have already been said of him, and Mr. Salpeter puts down nothing new that is any better than Mrs. Thrale's "all he did was gentle, if all he said was rough."

DOROTHY BREWSTER

Books in Brief

The Virginia Plutarch. By Philip Alexander Bruce. Two volumes. The University of North Carolina Press. $9.

These volumes contain biographical sketches of thirty-three persons, from Powhatan to Woodrow Wilson and Dr. Walter Reed, whose careers seem to Mr. Bruce to entitle them to remembrance and praise as Virginians. The Virginia connection in some cases is rather incidental; most people do not think of John Sevier of Tennessee fame as a Virginian, nor of George Rogers Clark, Sam Houston, or Edgar Allan Poe as belonging primarily to the Old Dominion. Mr. Bruce's choice, however, has been determined more by what men did than by what they were, and while in the cases of the colonial and Revolutionary leaders, the first Presidents, and John Marshall the two standards merge, something of reflected light shines from others who sought or found distinction afield. The sketches do not add anything important to what was already known about their subjects, nor does Mr. Bruce trouble himself to explain—if it can be satisfactorily explained—why Virginia has been so preeminently rich in distinguished names. The omission at this point is the more remarkable because Mr. Bruce knows the plantation system and the early social life of Virginia extremely well, and could, if he had chosen, have illumined his chapters with more than incidental references to the social and economic background. The volumes may be commended to readers who like to take their history in the form of biography.

Elizabeth Gaskell. By Gerald DeWitt Sanders, Ph.D. With a Bibliography by Clark S. Northup, Ph.D. Published for Cornell University. Yale University Press. $3.50.

This book is an excellent example of the depths to which professional American scholarship can fall. It fills all the requirements of method without exhibiting any intellectual distinction except perseverance. Footnotes, bibliographies, and indexes are in perfect order; chronology and punctuation are faultless. WAR FOR PROFITS

OTTO LEHMANN-RUSSBÜLDT

Translated and edited by Pierre Loving

Here are laid bare the far-reaching activities of the most unscrupulous group of men in the world—the international armament ring. Krupp, Schneider, Skoda, Vickers, Zaharoff—all these sinister, almost fabulous figures are depicted in their true colors . . . cold, ruthless, without loyalty to man or country. The sensational matter this book contains, now told for the first time, and supported by unimpeachable documentary evidence, is of vital concern to all interested in the problems of armaments and international relations. $1.75

tory facts under convenient headings and called it a day, or, to be exact, a study of Mrs. Gaskell's works. Yet "The Life of Charlotte Brontë" is dismissed with some gossipy anecdotes. There is no attempt made to discuss its merits or to relate it to the history of English biography. The generalities concerning Mrs. Gaskell's use of dialect are as trivial as the remarks about "Cranford." Such a performance, aside from the reflection it casts on scholarship, is especially regrettable in view of the absence of any current appreciation of the subject in American literary criticism.

Edward Coke. By Hastings Lyon and Herman Block. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

This biography of the oracle of the common law, though written by lawyers, is evidently addressed not primarily to lawyers but to the reading public at large. The authors devote less space to Coke's legal writings than to an account of negotiations for the marriage of his daughter and the accompanying quarrels between himself and his wife. They rarely give any indication of their sources of information and never refer to earlier writings on Coke. They pay much attention to historical backgrounds and to creating atmosphere, but with the best of intentions they do not give us a convincing portrait of the tough old lawyer in all his strength and weakness. To do so would be, indeed, a remarkable achievement. Even Mr. Lytton Strachey, in his "Elizabeth and Essex," was not moved to attempt a vignette of Coke.

Love's Illusion. By J. D. Beresford. The Viking Press. $2.50.

First love—romantic love—comes to the youthful hero of this charming and delicate story of remembered youth during a holiday at home, after his Cambridge days are over and while he delays for a brief three months before entering on his career. He is an inexperienced youth; so he falls in love with an illusion—a dream of perfection. But Brenda is a realist, as earthly as she is beautiful. Her he never sees and is quite incapable of knowing. Nor does he realize that it is she who subtly encourages him step by step as he presses his love-making, that she deliberately brings about all that happens between them. And then, inevitably, comes disillusion. The story glides by smoothly, and long before it is over one has succumbed to the spell cast by its well-sustained, idyllic mood.

On Virgin Soil. By Balder Olden. The Macaulay Company. $2.50.

The war as it was carried on in Africa gave this German writer material for an excellent book of sketches. Here are primitive characters—black and white—treated without the usual regard for their picturesque qualities; here are bare, sometimes mean conflicts; here are sharp, brutal scenes and brilliant descriptive passages. The author has an admirably objective manner in his treatment of simple souls and does nothing to soften—or, apparently, to heighten—the somewhat acrid atmosphere of existence in the tropics. Gall and bitterness are here, with just a modicum of war's heroic aspects.

Pomp and Circumstance. By E. de Gramont, Ex-Duchesse de Clermont-Tonnerre. Translated by Brian W. Downs. Introduction by Louis Bromfield. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.

There have been better memoirs, Mr. Bromfield to the contrary, and there probably will be better ones of the very period of which Mme de Gramont writes. The best part of these, and by best is meant the most illuminating and best written, is that devoted to the Rothschild family. These accounts have the intimate enthusiasm the rest of the book lacks. But Mme de Gramont admits the never-failing allure that the Orient has for her; so perhaps the other people she knew, in spite of their wit and mannerisms, never attained quite the same importance in her eyes—certainly they never have in the world's estimate. Yet distinguished memoirs have been made with far less international figures. The fault lies not in the matter but in the manner, which lacks both imagination and discernment and, what is most important, animation.

Drama

An Alien Art

MEI LAN-FANG, called the greatest of Chinese actors, has been performing at the National Theater while a company of Japanese players has been appearing at the Booth. The coincidence is, I presume, no more than a coincidence, but it affords an unusual opportunity to compare the austere and highly formalized art of the former with the facilely graceful dance-pantomimes of the latter.

Mei Lan-Fang is enigmatically interesting, but the danger is, I think, that the Occidental critic will speak with a too easy enthusiasm concerning the subtle beauty of his performance. For the purpose of analogy let us suppose that a Chinese, totally ignorant of English literature, is taken to see Forbes-Robertson in "Hamlet," and let us suppose still further that he comes away full of volubly enthusiastic opinions about Shakespeare. Would we not feel that his criticism was more than absurd? Would we not, as a matter of fact, consider it impertinent? And yet such an opinion would be hardly more absurd or more impertinent than any which the average New Yorker is likely to express concerning Mei Lan-Fang. That he is excellent in some fashion is obvious enough, but the plays which he plays are part of an ancient and totally alien tradition, while the style of his acting is as strange to us as the style of Duse would be to the laborer in the rice fields of a distant province. An American who had spent his life in China from childhood on might possibly have a pertinent critical opinion. Any other, no matter how much he was intrigued or how many glimpses he thought he had got into the real meaning of the performance, would be pretty certain to miss the point.

When Mr. Mei first enters the stage, singing in a high falsetto and waving the long sleeves which completely cover his hands, the impression which he gives is of something purely grotesque. The language of his gestures and the language of his intonations are as foreign as that which is articulated by his lips. They mean nothing because they suggest nothing in our experience and because they awaken nothing in our memories. Moreover, though one gradually begins to perceive that here is some kind of skill and some kind of eloquence; though one begins, in consequence, to watch with interest and a kind of wondering admiration, one never ceases to find even the gestures as unexpected as the intervals of the Oriental music which accompany them. Thus at the end of one little play a man and wife who have just learned of the death of their only son break into a song and dance. And though the program obligingly informs us that the characters in such a play usually sing and dance at emotional crises, it is not information concerning the conventions of a form of art which we need in order to appreciate it. What we need is the understanding, the habitual acceptance, which comes only with long familiarity, and to attempt to appreciate Mei Lan-Fang through the aid of a program note is all too much like trying to read Homer with a dictionary. The only meaning we get is the meaning which does not really matter.

Nor is this, indeed, all, for the intention of the plays is hardly less obscure than that of the acting. They are legendary in character, and they deal, some of them at least, with violent and bloody deeds. Yet I confess that I am not sure even how much of primary dramatic emotion they are supposed to contain, though I am inclined to suspect that, despite occasional scenes which seem tragic in our sense, they are not intended to move us much with "pity and terror." I suspect that through the course of time and endless re-treatment they have come to be no more than the materials used for formal decorative effects, that we are, for example, not expected to be frightened by the bandit king whom Mr. Mei, as a sort of Chinese Judith, finally kills any more than we are supposed to be frightened by the purely decorative dragon which St. George is slaying in a piece of Gobelin tapestry. I suspect, moreover, that such art may be very beautiful, and I know that our own opera—in which, for example, the death of the heroine is less an occasion for sorrow than an excuse for an aria—represents a less complete development in a similar direction; but after all I can only guess at the intention of "Vengeance on the Bandit General" and feel only obscurely its beauty.

I should not like to convey the impression that there are no moments in Mr. Mei's performance which are clearly and comprehensibly effective, for there are a number of such. Neither should I like to seem to imply that the performance as a whole is not very much worth seeing and studying. But I should rather give either of these false impressions than to pose as having a really intelligent appreciation of something too alien to be judged by a person like myself. I believe that Mei Lan-Fang is great, but I have only a very confused idea of the nature of his greatness.

The Japanese are, by comparison at least, relatively simple and understandable. Their dancing and acrobatic pantomime is extraordinarily supple, but it is not so very different in kind from that with which we are familiar in ballets, and the rather facilely sentimental stories which they tell are not unlike the stories of Western ballets. No audience is likely to be much puzzled; neither, I think, is it likely to be rewarded by anything more than an excellent performance in an essentially familiar manner.

The "all-star" revival of "The Rivals" (Erlanger's Theater) has Mrs. Fiske and a number of other well-known performers, but they do not succeed in arousing more than an antiquarian's interest in the play. "This Man's Town" (Ritz Theater) is a fairly good example of the "hard-boiled" melodrama; "Love, Honor, and Betray" (Eltinge Theater) is quite the worst of all the bad plays in which Alice Brady has recently appeared.

Small Mercies

IN Soviet Russia the cinematic artist, like any other artist, is supposed to be concerned only with the cause of communism. Very often he will deny that he is an artist at all, claiming as Eisenstein does that he is merely an engineer, a technician. It is something of a paradox, therefore, that outside of Russia Soviet films have been acclaimed as masterpieces of cinematic art, superior to anything produced in other countries, whereas their preoccupation with communism has been regarded as their least important feature. But paradox or not, Soviet directors continue to surprise foreign audiences by the vigor and resourcefulness of their imagination. "The China Express" (Cameo) fully maintains this reputation for high imaginative quality. Treated as a dramatic poem it unfolds its story with a tremendous power of imagery and movement, ending in a breath-taking climax of a rushing train which no powers on earth seem to be able to stop. This apotheosis of a rebellion as the symbol of the Chinese revolution, together with the sustained dramatic movement of the picture and the rich variety of its characteristic human material, speaks highly for the art of its director, Ilya Trauberg. They prove not quite sufficient, however, to make the picture wholly convincing. The obstacle is chiefly in the scenario, which treats its social theme in a way that is too conventional to impart to the picture the quality of a fresh and independent approach to life which was so notable a feature of some of the earlier Russian films. "The China Express" is not merely a story of some passengers on a train. It is an attempt to show a cross-section of China with all the conflicting interests of its different classes. Here we have the downtrodden coolies, the babbling liberal merchants, the ruthless representative of the ruling European capitalists, and the native military who are the capitalists' obedient tools. The story is set in motion by means of an attempted rape of a Chinese child by a white overseer, which leads to a rising of the coolies and their seizure of the train by victory over the troops and their European masters. Now this may be good communism, but the schematic relationship of characters according to formula and their automatic falling into groups of heroes and villains can scarcely be described as a fresh and independent view of life.

The Soviet films represent the highest development of the silent cinema. The advance made by the Hollywood talkies has been chiefly technical; artistically the talkies are still in the nursery. The high praises bestowed on some of the recent pictures leave this opinion unshaken. One finds very little that oversteps the Hollywood convention in the much-lauded "Sarah and Son" (Paramount), although one may admit that Ruth Chatterton acts her part with sincerity and splendid restraint, and that the general treatment of the picture is skilful. Nor can "Anna Christie" (Capitol), with Greta Garbo in the principal role, be accepted as a notable achievement in cinematic art. Again, it may be admitted that Greta Garbo acquits herself quite creditably, particularly in some scenes, as for example the opening one. On the other hand even her performance is rather uneven, failing pitifully in the big scene at the end, while the picture as a whole, largely through poor direction, fails to maintain dramatic unity and suspense.

Ramsay MacDonald and the I. L. P.

RAMSAY MACDONALD recently ended his membership in the Independent Labor Party, Left-wing organization of the labor movement in Great Britain, by announcing that he did not intend to continue his annual subscription to the party funds. The I.L.P. members of Parliament, particularly the Clydesiders, have been among Mr. MacDonald's most vociferous and stinging critics during his present term as Prime Minister. In the light of this fact the editorial comment of the New Leader, weekly organ of the Left wing, on what might be considered Mr. MacDonald's defection is surprising and interesting. The editorial is called The End of a Chapter, and is signed by Ernest E. Hunter, who has only recently resigned his post as editor of the New Leader. We reprint it in full:

Ramsay MacDonald's break with the Independent Labor Party after thirty-six years' membership, most of it spent in the active life of the organization, marks the end of an important chapter. That for some time past it has seemed inevitable did not prevent the feeling of emptiness which many of us experienced when we saw the posters: Premier Leaves the I.L.P.

The fact is that until the last few years the personality of Ramsay MacDonald was inseparable from the I.L.P. At conferences the discussion would storm around his policies and views. In the corridors and committee rooms the fight raged on. One would hear, "Mac said this," or "Mac did that," or "What will Mac do?"—in nearly any conversation he would be the King Charles's head.

He was not a foundation member, but he joined the party in 1894, and up to the eve of the general election in 1922 his life story would be unrecognizable unless written in the light of his association with the I.L.P. As far back as 1895 he stood as I.L.P. candidate for Southampton, polling 867 votes, and in the years of stern fighting which followed before the Labor Party became a real force in Parliament, he, the chosen champion of the I.L.P., was one of the master-builders. In those years of preparation three men stood out: Keir Hardie, the prophet, Ramsay MacDonald, the executive head and strategist, Arthur Henderson, the organizer. The I.L.P. can never forget that two of these came from its own ranks. All through those years Ramsay MacDonald towered up in the ranks of the I.L.P., and however much his colleagues found themselves—and it was many times and oft—in disagreement with his views, they were always proud of his company. Was it not Keir Hardie who in 1910 said that Ramsay MacDonald was the biggest intellectual asset which the Socialist movement had?

Then came 1914. In that testing time the ties that bound Ramsay MacDonald to the I.L.P. were drawn tighter than ever. On the eve of the war he made the historic speech against the Grey policy which for so long cut him off from the main body of the Labor Party. He lost his leadership of the Parliamentary party, but the overwhelming majority of the I.L.P. rallied behind him. Rarely was a party so united and vigorous as the I.L.P. during those war years. At first it was only a handful of men and women standing out against the rest of the country. For a time its propaganda was difficult, but not for long. Soon it gathered momentum until throughout the length and breadth of the country the leaders of the I.L.P. could be assured of gigantic audiences to hear the case against the war, and, after 1918, against the peace.

Never has the press of this country given such a false reflection of public opinion as during those tragic years. The historian of the future turning back the old files between 1914 and 1922 will get no indication whatever of the steady rise in Britain of the party which was so soon destined to assume the leadership of the nation. In this upward struggle the figure of Ramsay MacDonald stands out in bold relief. In 1922 the tide turned. I remember—it seems like yesterday—standing in a Welsh mining village. Ramsay MacDonald, after four years in the wilderness, had been returned for Aberavon the night before. We had left his headquarters to tour the constituency before the papers arrived containing the results for the rest of the country. As we stood in this village the miners came running up with the morning papers and the moment when we read of the marvelous victories crowned with the Clydeside results, the return of Maxton, Wheatley, and others, stands out as one of those unforgettable experiences the memory of which still brings a lump in one's throat.

And then we came back to London. I remember sitting in the I.L.P. meeting when it was decided to nominate Ramsay MacDonald as the leader of the Opposition. I remember the joy of victory, the feeling that justice was done when the man who had been down and out with us once again took his place as Labor's leader. But I remember that even then there were the still, small voices which warned the Clydesiders that they would be disappointed. It was in the nature of things that this should happen. All the differences which had been discussed and reviewed and fought about in the days of propaganda were bound to be intensified when responsibility and government came.

And in 1924 when Ramsay MacDonald became Prime Minister for the first time it soon became evident that the division, temperamental and theoretical, between Ramsay MacDonald and his old colleagues was already beginning to assume formidable proportions. When the I.L.P. inscribed upon its banners: Socialism in Our Time, the rumbling of the storm became louder and louder.

The fact is that the whole conception of the Socialism in Our Time program is alien to Ramsay MacDonald's mind and mood. It is stupid to say that he has changed. Few public men in this country have over a long period of time preserved a more consistent body of principle than has the present Prime Minister. His view of politics as a biological process in which by a series of gradual transformations and adaptations, society moves on step by step, stage by stage, to a more perfect form is in sharp antithesis to the present I.L.P. view. All his tradition, training, and thought were bound sooner or later to lead him to take his present step.

Nothing would be gained by useless repinings. Without fuss or demonstration the Premier has decided to make a clean break. All the I.L.P. can do is to pay glad tribute to the work he did to build up this party, and to turn to the work of today and tomorrow. The past is behind. Only the future matters. But it will not be easy for the I.L.P. to escape from the shadow of this man's personality. He was not an easy man to live with. He is not likely to change. But he remains, and is likely to remain, the unchallenged leader of the Labor Party. Within that party the I.L.P. will have to fight, as it has always done, for its own point of view. In the day-to-day battle of ideas it will have to cross swords with its old colleague, but that it will do so with a vivid remembrance of the old days of intimate comradeship will be the deepest wish of all to whom the triumph of the common cause is the compelling motive.

OPPOSITION TO JOHN J. PARKER as an associate justice of the Supreme Court, for which position he has been nominated by President Hoover, is gathering headway. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, has given notice that the federation will oppose the confirmation of Judge Parker on the ground of his hostile attitude toward organized labor as shown particularly in the so-called Red Jacket case. In this case Judge Parker, sitting as a member of the United States Circuit Court for the Fourth District, sustained an application for an injunction restraining the United Mine Workers' organization from soliciting members among miners who had signed "yellow-dog" contracts. A "yellow-dog" contract, it may be explained, is one in which the employee agrees not to join a union. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has also called Judge Parker to account for his alleged hostility to Negro voters. In his campaign for the governorship of North Carolina, in 1920, he was reported by the Greensboro Daily News as saying that "the Negro as a class does not desire to enter politics," that "the Republican Party of North Carolina does not desire him to do so," and that "the participation of the Negro in politics is a source of evil and danger to both races." It will be interesting to see how Judge Parker meets such serious attacks upon his fitness for a place one of whose requirements is an open and impartial mind.

THE TARIFF BILL IS FINISHED, so far as the Senate is concerned, but the mischief that it will do abroad is only just beginning to make itself felt. So high are the duties that have been placed upon lace that the entire lace industry of France is in despair. About four million dollars' worth of lace has been imported into this country every year. The cutting off of this market means misery, if not starvation, to the French lace workers. What does your hard-boiled, log-rolling legislator in Washington care for the sufferings of other people? Unfortunately for this cold-hearted attitude the protest of the French lace-makers has already so stirred the French government that it is again planning extreme tariff duties on American automobiles and parts of automobiles, against which American manufacturers have been protesting on the ground that it would absolutely shut them out of the French market. In Spain, too, they are studying the situation to see what action they shall take to discriminate against American goods. European manufacturers everywhere are trying to ascertain how much they must further reduce wages and standards of living so that their goods may leap over our tariff walls, and European statesmen are once more wondering how in the world they are going to pay the debts they owe us when we have made it so much harder for them to produce the goods. As a creator of ill-will against the United States our tariff legislation is unsurpassed.

THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE on March 24 began suit in the United States District Court at St. Louis to prevent the proposed merger of the Standard Oil Company of New York and the Vacuum Oil Company announced in our issue of March 5. This action, contemplated by the companies, raises again the primary issue of the meaning of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. The Supreme Court in the Standard Oil cases in 1911 decided that the act prohibited only "unreasonable" restraint of trade, but held that the union of the Standard companies constituted an unreasonable restraint and ordered the union dissolved. Two of these great companies now bring the issue again up to the bar of the Supreme Court, practically calling upon it to decide whether a union illegal in 1911 is still illegal in 1930. Public opinion has changed greatly during the intervening decades, and it would not be surprising if the court found some ground for a practical, though not an avowed, reversal of its earlier decision. The old trust-busting days are gone, and we are faced with the problem whether or not we can devise effective methods of controlling these monsters in the public interest, since we cannot prevent their growth. We have repeatedly pointed out the impossibility of effective control by competition; again and again we have seen the failure of control by commission. What alternative remains but actual public ownership and operation with all its difficulties?

ALIEN REGISTRATION is threatening us once more. We are advised by the American Civil Liberties Union that contrary to earlier reports the Blease bill for "voluntary" registration, which appeared dead when we went to press two weeks ago, may be reported out at any time by the Senate committee. We earnestly urge upon our readers the continuance of every effort to express opposition to this vicious measure and to every other proposal calling for registration of our alien residents. Protests should be addressed to Senator Arthur R. Gould, chairman of the Senate Immigration Committee. This is an issue of importance to all friends of our traditional American liberties, and they must not let themselves be caught napping. The enemy is forever at the gates.

AS A HAPPY FAMILY the Pennsylvania Republicans take the prize. The campaign there for the Senatorial and gubernatorial nominations now in full swing bids fair to be as exciting and bloody as any prize-ring contest could possibly be. One candidate for Governor, Samuel E. Lewis, has already retired and run to cover. Mr. Lewis was on the Grundy ticket, but Grundy himself refuses to say die. Indeed, miraculous as it seems, Grundy is denouncing that power in Pennsylvania politics, General W. W. Atterbury, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, in terms unequaled since Theodore Roosevelt described the national Republican leaders as a set of thieves and robbers. For the moment Mr. Grundy talks just like a Progressive. Declaring that the most corrupt period in our history was that in which the big railroads dominated our political life, Mr. Grundy says that General Atterbury is seeking to put the railroads again in control of politics; that the General was made Republican chairman by grace of Messrs. Cunningham, Hall, and Salus, "with all the political mismanagement and corruption they represent." Meanwhile Gifford Pinchot is dancing around the ring getting in body blows on all of them when they are not looking and calling this same trio representatives of the "very worst in politics." The Democrats are now after Secretary Davis's scalp, charging him with being illegally a candidate since he is no longer a resident of the State, and Secretary Davis, conscious of his own sublime virtue, has struck hands with Vare. Meanwhile Mr. Cunningham charges Senator Grundy with having unloaded upon the State at "fabulous prices" pieces of land at Valley Forge upon which Washington never camped. This is Pennsylvania—the State which Mr. Grundy declares is one of the few fitted to rule the Union!

FREE SPEECH reared its provocative head in the Massachusetts legislature recently and was promptly suppressed, but the fight which preceded the suppression revealed strange enemies and stranger friends. Francis G. Goodale introduced a bill in the House designed to set aside certain portions of Boston Common and other public parks throughout the State in which speeches might be made without license or permit, though with certain other restrictions and subject to the existing statutes. The bill, which had as its sponsor the Civil Liberties Committee of Massachusetts, provided for a relatively mild form of free speech. It was favorably reported from committee, where William G. Thompson, among others, spoke for it. On the floor of the House, Joseph Finnegan, a new member from a Boston district, led the fight for free speech. He was assisted by another Irish Catholic member, John P. Connolly. The opposition came mainly from Mayor Curley's supporters in the House. Lewis R. Sullivan, Jr., said it was "a Communist bill" and clinched his point by identifying Mr. Goodale as a law partner of Arthur D. Hill, "who, we remember, was last counsel for Sacco and Vanzetti"; another protestant enlarged upon "the danger of having our daughters go down to Boston Common and hear birth-control speeches." When a standing vote was taken the score was 59 to 58 in favor of free speech. It was at this point that Leverett Saltonstall, Republican leader and Speaker of the House, through whose veins runs some of New England's bluest blood, went over to the Curley contingent, and, by creating a tie, forced a roll call. The corridors were canvassed and in the final vote free speech on Boston Common was beaten by 134 votes to 81.

NEW YORK, LOS ANGELES, and Buffalo win highest prizes for disorderly conduct in the unemployment riots on March 6. And of these three, New York is first, with fifty persons injured and five Communists charged with unlawful assembly and conspiracy to commit assault. A survey by the American Civil Liberties Union showed that in 38 cities demonstrations on that day took place; that 16 of these reported no trouble whatever; that in the remaining 22, 155 persons were injured enough to require medical attention; that 265 persons were arrested, of whom more than half were at once released, no charges having been made against them; that minor charges were made against 114 persons, and 22 convictions have already been reported, with small fines or jail sentences. After New York's fifty injured, came Pittsburgh with twenty-five, Cleveland with twenty, Detroit with fourteen, and Milwaukee with thirteen. Thus the great Communist demonstration, in which this government was to be threatened with overthrow by force and violence, petered out into a general disorder in which a good many thousands of men and women, inspired largely by idle curiosity, stood around and listened to fiery speeches and were presently turned into more or less fighting mobs by the night sticks of the policemen. We are willing, as we mentioned above, to give the booby prize to New York; but if there could be a medal for sanity, humor in dealing with a dangerous situation, justice to all classes, and plain ordinary horse sense, it ought to go to the Free City of Baltimore. A parade was held in Baltimore; police protected it to the number of thrice the marchers; when the embattled Communists refused to ask for a permit, the chief of police gave them one on a silver platter. There was not one broken head. New York police commissioners please copy.

GOVERNOR BILBO OF MISSISSIPPI has won the pardoning championship of the country by issuing to Carl Marshall, an attorney, two pardons, the first a couple of minutes after the State's House of Representatives had ordered the man's arrest, and both before he had been taken into custody. The House voted to put Marshall in jail for contempt, but when the sergeant-at-arms went after him he presented a pardon on which the ink was hardly dry. As the pardon was addressed to nobody in particular, the House instructed its deputy to present himself again before Marshall, whereupon the lawyer produced a second pardon, directed specifically to the sergeant-at-arms. Then the House voted that the Governor had no authority to issue a pardon in a case of contempt and ordered the sergeant-at-arms to arrest Marshall, even if he had a pardon in every pocket. But by that time the lawyer had fled, to appear later in New Orleans as a "political refugee." The House wanted to know from Marshall who got $80,000 which he received from Warren Brothers, a road-material firm of Boston, to stop an anti-trust suit. As an attorney Marshall may be within his rights in refusing information. As a governor Bilbo may or may not have the right of pardon in a contempt case—it is a disputed question. But certainly he was too much in a hurry.

THE BATTLE among the mine workers inaugurated by the insurgent convention at Springfield reported in our issue of March 26 goes merrily forward. The regular convention meeting at Indianapolis under President John L. Lewis listened to an address by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, denouncing dual unionism, declaring that "the United Mine Workers of America—this United Mine Workers of America here—is the only organization recognized by the American Federation of Labor," declaring that the federation would not take the initiative in a "family quarrel," but expressing a desire to bring about solidarity and union. Mr. Lewis was sustained in a tumultuous meeting and on March 26, in accordance with a resolution passed by the convention, he revoked the charter of District 14 of Kansas. This action automatically deposes Alexander Howat, district president, who was chosen to head the Springfield organization. It is noteworthy, however, that the Illinois union, which embraces about three-fourths of the dues-paying members of the bituminous branch of the organization, is not excommunicated. Mr. Lewis needs its money and its support against the Springfield organization, which now claims to be the real miners' union. The question where authority does actually lie will probably have to be settled in court. In any case, the Lewis leadership has been thoroughly discredited by the disasters of the years just past, and all friends of intelligent unionism must hope for a new deal.

"THE OUTBREAK was from the beginning an attack by Arabs on the Jews, for which no excuse in the form of earlier murders by Jews has been established," says the British commission of inquiry in fixing the immediate responsibility for the riots in Palestine last summer. Absolving the Arab executive as a body of deliberate incitement to disorder, but holding individual members of that group by no means guiltless, the commission likewise frees Mr. H. C. Luke, acting high commissioner, of blame for his much-criticized action, or rather inaction, at the outbreak of the disorders, but holds that the Palestine government should have suspended newspapers that published numerous intemperate articles previous to the riots. The charge that the Palestine government was weak and generally unsympathetic with the legitimate aspirations of the Zionists the commission meets by pointing to "the difficulties inherent in the mandate and the failure to appreciate the dual nature of the policy which the government has to administer." The commission wisely urges the issuance without delay of a clear-cut comprehensible statement of policy, and also makes recommendations regarding self-government, immigration, and land tenure which indicate an appreciation of the importance of those matters in any effort to work out a permanent solution of the problem.

A LABOR ULTIMATUM to the MacDonald Cabinet, giving the Government fourteen days from March 26 in which to show what it intended to do about unemployment, should bring matters to a head if the unemployment crisis, admittedly the worst since 1921 and getting more serious, can be met by legislation. The total number of British unemployed on March 25, according to official figures, was 1,621,800, an increase of 57,993 over the previous week and 439,346 more than a year before. Some of the increase, it is said, was due to the working of the new unemployment insurance act, but the main reason is the widespread industrial and business depression. In Lancashire, home of the cotton industry, 100,000 men and women have lost their jobs in the past three months, and notices of wage reductions in woolen establishments in the northern counties are imminent. The immediate response to the ultimatum was the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution increasing by about £10,000,000 the unemployment insurance fund, but even this sum, it was admitted, would last only until November unless trade conditions improved.

THE REPORT THAT Philip La Follette, older brother of the present Senator, will become the Progressive candidate for Governor in Wisconsin shows that the Progressives feel they must play their strongest card. It is a dangerous gamble, but well worth the risk, for defeat could not mean that Philip La Follette would not still have a career before him. The Progressive movement in that State needs new blood and bold aggressive leadership. It needs to eschew the old party methods, and above all it needs to map out a new economic program far in advance of that upon which the senior La Follette stood in his triumphant campaigns. We hear rumors of the coming of a labor party in Wisconsin with which the Socialists might become affiliated. We hope it may come to pass, and that the Progressives in that State will cooperate with it.

THE MILLENNIUM for ages five to twelve has arrived! Unfortunately, it came to as distant a place as Copenhagen, so that American young ones will not have much opportunity to benefit by it. But we recommend it to the attention of a benevolent government for possible imitation. It appears that on April 2 the children of Copenhagen were permitted to celebrate the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the birth of Hans Christian Andersen. And they celebrated, not by suffering dull speeches from their elders and themselves reciting selections from his works in the schoolroom, but in a proper way for the writer of childhood's fairy stories. The news dispatch describing the projected holiday says: "Lemonade and orangeade will gush forth from public fountains all day, while at all the schools and other public places free chocolate and candies of all sorts will be distributed. To enable them to do full justice to this treat, all the children will have a holiday." We repeat, the date on which this fete day was celebrated was April 2. If it had been April 1, we should not have believed a word of it, but should have considered it just another adult's idea of an April-fool joke to plague poor children. But April 2 is another matter. If it didn't happen, it should have, and we can think of nothing pleasanter to do on, say, the Fourth of July in the United States.

Roping America at London

A GREAT surrender has been preparing at London. Ever since France injected into the discussion of naval reduction and limitation the question of security, it has been increasingly plain that that issue would have to be settled before anything else was done. M. Tardieu, of course, can hardly have cherished any illusion about making the United States a party to a security pact. M. Tardieu knows American history and the American temper extremely well and, being a realist, does not waste time thinking of the impossible. He might be able, however, to induce the United States to consult, to lend the weight of its counsel and its moral influence if peace were threatened, and even to give an intimation of what it was likely to do if its advice were disregarded. Some time, he may have thought, might be needed to bring this about, but if France only stood pat on the ultimatum that unless it could have more security it must have a bigger navy, there was a good chance of extracting from the conference not only a security pact but a consultative pact as well.

M. Tardieu may well have been encouraged to wait by contemplating the attitude of Mr. Stimson and the so-called "policy" of Mr. Hoover. Mr. Stimson's diplomacy at London has been of a peculiar order. He began by marching bravely up to within sight of the enemy and announcing, in his best English, that the United States had nothing definite to say but would be pleased to receive communications. This done, he retired to observe the effect of his manifesto. When nothing happened he started skirmishing at the center and on both flanks, but without gaining any territory or capturing any guns. From the middle of February until well past the Ides of March he did little but twirl his thumbs while the French were busy fighting an important action in the rear. As for Mr. Hoover, it was a safe guess that, having allowed the American delegation to set out for London with no preparation for the campaign, there would be no quarrel between the President and his Secretary of State, and that whatever Mr. Stimson decided eventually to hand out would, after the customary hesitation, be accepted at Washington.

The extraordinary statement which Mr. Stimson gave out hurriedly in the early hours of March 26 showed how well M. Tardieu and M. Briand had played their cards. A security pact to which the United States should be a party, Mr. Stimson let it be known, was definitely out of the picture; on that point the American delegation, which only a few weeks before was reported to be much divided, had not changed its mind. The United States would never "enter into any treaty, whether consultative or otherwise, where there is danger of its obligation being misunderstood as involving a promise to render military assistance or guaranteeing protection by military force to another nation." Such a misunderstanding, it was pointed out, might arise "if the United States entered into such a treaty as a quid pro quo for the reduction of the naval forces of another Power"—the very thing, of course, which France had suggested. "If, however," and here the Secretary's logic took on what he doubtless regarded as convincing force, "this demand for security could be satisfied in some other way, then the danger of a misunderstanding of a consultative pact would be eliminated, and in such case the question would be approached from an entirely different standpoint."

The first reaction of Washington to this pronouncement was surprise and bewilderment. The correspondent of the New York Times reported "what amounted to utter confusion" as prevailing; the correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune found a "quagmire of contradiction." March 29, however, brought a statement from Mr. Cotton, Acting Secretary of State, issued with Mr. Hoover's approval, that "there are no differences of view between the President and our delegation at London," that the delegation was still working zealously for naval reduction and "the preservation of the peace of the world," and that "it is the high hope that a plan for so doing can be evolved which will meet the approval of the American people and will be consonant with our traditional policies and ideals." Had Mr. Hoover approved a consultative pact? Mr. Cotton did not say. Had such a pact been disavowed? Apparently not, for "there are no differences of view" between Mr. Hoover and the American delegation.

What is a consultative pact? Senator Borah promptly answered the question with his old-time clarity when he declared that it is "a security pact in disguise. In a security pact you state in the pact what you are going to do after you have consulted. In a consultative pact you conceal what you are going to do after you have consulted, but you will be forced by the logic of the hour to do precisely what you expressly agreed to do in the security pact." Is not the obligation, however, one that can be avoided? "A consultative pact," Senator Borah replied, "in which the parties would not go forward and do whatever would be necessary to be done in accordance with the realities of the situation would be a pious fraud."

Mr. Stimson's logic is as tawdry as the real nature of a consultative pact is clear. Great Britain, it is thought, may be persuaded to pledge something, if not actual military aid, that France will accept as security, or some general agreement may link security to the League of Nations. Does Mr. Stimson not know that the quid pro quo is not to be got rid of by dividing it, one Power or group of Powers promising force while America promises advice? Is anyone so blind as not also to see that more than advice is expected to come from a consultative pact? What France wants is American support in the next dispute that threatens war, and it may be relied on to do its utmost to maneuver America into granting such indirect but substantial aid as, for example, an embargo on commerce with the enemy.

Such is the tragic pass to which the United States has now been brought. America is in danger of being entangled in the politics of Europe by the device of getting it to consult. It is to be urged to take a hand in solving the problems of alliances, although alliances are a potent cause of war. As we go to press, a consultative pact is being looked to as a necessary sacrifice in order to save the conference. It is America that now needs security.

Hope for Haiti

THE report of the President's commission to study conditions in Haiti is probably as good as could be expected, and if its recommendations are carried out promptly in good faith Haiti will be a happier land than it has been for two decades. We could wish that the commissioners had been franker in expressing the criticism of the American Occupation which their program implies; we could wish, too, that they had demanded the immediate replacement of our High Commissioner, General Russell, by a civilian minister, for we regard his continuing control, even though it be temporary, as more than likely to obstruct the changes that the commission recommends.

Yet the commission dared to do, despite considerable pressure by his imperial-minded subordinates, what President Hoover asked it to do. "The primary question which is to be investigated," he told the commission, "is when and how we are to withdraw from Haiti." We wish it had done only that. The President did not ask the commission to study the responsibilities of the past; and we think it would have done an honester and decenter job if it had omitted its painful effort to whitewash General Russell's character and record at the moment that it was asking he be removed. Perhaps he was "whole-hearted, single-minded . . . patient and painstaking," but his single mind was working on the wrong track and he is responsible for a shameful blot on the American scutcheon.

However, the positive program of the commission is definitely pointed right. Having caused the removal of the dictator whom General Russell had installed and supported, and promoted an agreement to name a new President pledged to honest and early elections, it recommends that General Russell be replaced—unfortunately not until autumn—by a civilian Minister, and that the new Minister devote himself to the rapid Haitianization of the Haitian government services.

There is a certain irony in the commission's praise of an American administration which had dissolved parliament and forced Haitians out of control of one department after another of their government. There is a certain absurdity in the commission's legalistic ideal of returning to the limited basis of Haitian-American relationship outlined in the treaty, for that treaty was forced down Haiti's throat as ruthlessly as any of the subsequent extensions of it. But the treaty expires in 1936, and the commission definitely posited that date as the time when the present regime should end. That is progress in fact, for to quote the report, which puts the truth very mildly indeed, "the acts and attitude of the treaty officials gave your commission the impression that they had been based upon the assumption that the Occupation would continue indefinitely." The important thing now is that the recommendations of the commission actually be put into effect.

The most significant phrase in the outline of "sequent steps" proposed is that in which the commission urges that "whether or not a certain loss of efficiency is entailed the new Minister to Haiti be charged with the duty of carrying out the early Haitianization of the services." Any neutral observer would dispute the "efficiency" of some of the departments mismanaged by Yankees, but the mild phrase of the commission has a deep meaning.

Some significant suggestions are buried modestly in the commission's report. Especially important is its recommendation that Haiti be permitted to return to its century-old prohibition of foreign ownership of land. And Haitians will welcome the suggestion that they be relieved of the various internal taxes unnecessarily imposed so as to speed payment of the foreign debt. So, too, the commission's recognition of the part played by race prejudice in the American failure in Haiti is encouraging, though it might, since it felt called upon to criticize the Haitian elite, have been franker in recording the incredible blindness of certain Southern officials who imported their color consciousness into the Negro republic.

Yet it is almost impossible to induce an official commission to criticize government officials, and this commission, compared with its various predecessors, has done well, though we could wish it had done much better. Its recommendations for the future are, after all, what counts most, and by implication they indorse the long and often solitary campaign of The Nation to set the American record in Haiti straight. Everything now depends upon the spirit in which those recommendations are carried out. There will, of course, be more of the sort of efforts to sabotage the work of the commission which some American officials indulged in during its stay in Haiti, and powerful forces are operating in opposition to its recommendations. The Hoover Administration must devote itself earnestly and energetically to execution of the "sequent steps" recommended in the report if actual results are to be accomplished. All Latin America is wondering whether the recommendations will really be carried out.

The Ocean to the Swift

ALL hail to the Europa! If the margin by which she won the blue ribbon of the North Atlantic was slim it sufficed, and it will be added to beyond question. We welcome her, however, for more reasons than that. She, like the Bremen, is a thing of beauty, combining the aspect of tremendous power with exquisite lines; surely not even the dullest of landlubbers can regard the pictures taken as she was just arriving without a profound thrill. Here we have the machine at its best; the clearest demonstration that a great tool of commerce can be made a joy to the eye; the freshest proof of man's recurring capacity to triumph over nature and bend the seven seas to his will.

Let it be noted, too, that the Europa is an improvement upon her predecessor, the Bremen, in the taste of her decorations, in the refinements and greater efficiency of her engine-room, in the lessened vibration. Her German engineers and designers have set a high mark for their rivals here and in England to attain. The bulbous keel and forefoot, the anti-rolling devices, all prove that naval architecture has by no means reached the limits of its development. As for the speed of these German fliers, the public, of course, believes that they will in time be able to take ten hours off their existing records. The posted are not so sanguine. They know that each additional knot means higher fuel bills, and that there is no sense in speeding up your ship if thereby you arrive off the Ambrose Channel lightship at 3 or 4 a.m. or at Cherbourg hours before it is possible to land.

The interesting fact is that speed rivalry has returned. We remember well being solemnly told only a few years ago by the head of a rival line of the North German Lloyd that the large, fast ship was a thing of the past, that it was uneconomic, frightfully costly during the winter deficit season, and contrary to the trend toward moderate-priced cabin vessels and tourist-third-class ships. None the less, great fast ships are appearing again and the Bremen has carried such a large passenger list, even in mid-winter, as to give rise to the hope that the new racers will be fine moneymakers. So Americans are out to rival them. Under the terms of their agreement with the government, the purchasers of the United States Line are to build, with the aid of loans of taxpayers' money, two monster ships to outrank and outspeed the Bremen and Europa. Horrible are some of the features announced for them—vaudeville, moving pictures, cabaret, night-club life; the jazz age is to invade the ocean. Not even there are we to escape.

It is a tremendous task that has thus been given to the American designers. They—and in particular Theodore Ferris—have been turning out some very fine ships, but the largest of them, the Pennsylvania, of a greater tonnage than the combined tonnage of Dewey's fleet when he attacked Manila, is still far below the size of the Leviathan and the Majestic. When the new monsters are built and in service the question will then arise whether or not they can compete on equal terms with the German fleets. We are not surprised that the North German Lloyd has utilized the arrival of the Europa to emphasize again the fact that these two ships have been built without one dollar of subsidy, without loans from the government, without undue mail payments. This is a magnificent example of courageous business independence, especially noteworthy in a country which only seven years ago was in complete economic chaos. It is the sort of thing upon which the United States used to pride itself. In Germany it has been possible not only because of the courage of their shipping men and their invariable custom of upbuilding their fleets without subsidy, but because the companies have behind them three-quarters of a century of technical shipping experience.

In England it looked recently as if they had given up the competition. The keel laid for the proposed monster White Star liner is to be broken up and the material used for smaller vessels. This company has hauled down the flag. The Cunard, on the other hand, is reported ready to go ahead—in the nature of things it must soon replace the Aquitania and the Mauretania, remarkable as both those ships have been in service, ability, and longevity. But the financing of such a vessel is now an enormously difficult undertaking; and, in the present state of British finance, not so easy as in the past. That the merger of the North German Lloyd and the Hamburg-American Company, or better the pooling of their interests, will lead to similar action by the great British lines is now the belief in American shipping circles. Beyond question the English will not permit either Germany or the United States to usurp primacy on the ocean without a struggle. But through the Europa and the Bremen the German lines have at least three years of undisputed championship before them.

A Modest Proposal

IN the case of Mae West the mills of the gods seem to be grinding even more slowly than is supposed to be their wont. Some two years ago she was arrested as the producer of a dull and possibly obscene play called "Pleasure Man." The court proceedings still drag on, long after the alleged offense has been generally forgotten. A short while ago the case came up for trial at last, but since that time there have been three postponements, and we are wondering how much it will ultimately cost the State of New York to dispose of this play which, if left to itself, would soon have died of its own stupidity without costing the taxpayers a cent. But if money must be spent in order to demonstrate a devotion to virtue then we are inclined, when we consider the case of John Cleland, to suspect that they order these things better in England—or used to at least.

Cleland was the author of the most famous obscene classic in the English language, namely, "Fanny Hill, or the Memoirs of a Lady of Pleasure," but though the work assured him a kind of immortality it is not generally known either that he received a government pension as the result of the scandal which it caused or that the pension was granted him in the interests not of obscenity, but of respectability. Such, however, is indeed the case. The work was composed in the middle of the eighteenth century and sold for twenty guineas to a bookseller who is said to have made £10,000 off his property. So great was the uproar that the author was summoned before the privy council, but when he appeared he pleaded poverty in extenuation. He was a gentleman; he had served in the East India Company; he had fallen upon evil days. As a result of these excuses Lord Granville, president of the council, persuaded a most humane government to grant to Cleland a pension of £100 per annum on the understanding that he would compose no more works of this class, and to his honor be it recorded that he never did. Unfortunately, however, £100 a year is about as large a reward as virtue can hope for. Though Cleland subsequently composed several innocent works, including a treatise on philology, all of them have been completely forgotten, while "Fanny Hill" is continually in print and may usually be obtained from those booksellers who supply the cognoscenti. Thus his single fall from grace assured to the author both his only income and his only immortality.

The modest "Britannica," which devotes whole articles to men whose works are far less well known, has no mention of John Cleland's name, but those who wish to know more about him may consult the "Dictionary of National Biography." However, our present purpose is rather practical than historical. Could not the various societies for the suppression of vice raise a fund for the purpose of buying off the authors who offend them most persistently? Let them present to each offender a purse, proportionate in size to the gravity of his offense, and let them say to him, "Go and sin no more." It would certainly be more Christian than the effort to put him in jail, and it very well might work better. Certainly it would save the state some money and it would give the police a little more time to spend on such minor crimes as robbery, extortion, and murder.

IT is unfortunate, but perhaps inevitable, that when anybody writes a play or wins a battle there should be controversy about the credit. After every triumph there is generally a Sampson and a Schley. So it is in the case of "The Green Pastures." To be sure, the author of the book and the dramatist are wholly amicable, but here and there has come the shot of snipers from the sidelines. I've heard it charged by several that the critics of the New York press have tossed too many laurels in the direction of Marc Connelly and neglected Roark Bradford, who wrote "Ol' Man Adam an' His Chillun." Indeed Jay House of the Evening Post went to the length of declaring that all the credit should go to Mr. Bradford.

But such a statement, if made sincerely, could only come from a man ignorant of the gulf which lies between the dramatic and the narrative form. If "The Green Pastures" were a straight dramatization it would still be true that much of its success upon the stage would in justice be allotted to the theatrical collaborator. Nothing marches straight from the printed page and by a mere turn of the head changes itself from narrative to drama. At the very least there must be a shaping, a pruning, a speeding up.

And "The Green Pastures" is not a dramatization. Distinctly this is an adaptation. The book of Bradford's served as a springboard for the play of Connelly's. I am aware that there are a number of lines in the play which are taken literally from "Ol' Man Adam an' His Chillun," but there is a vast change in mood. Mr. Bradford seems to have been interested almost exclusively in the humorous potentialities of Bible folklore told from a Negro point of view in Negro dialect. The agonizing, heartbreaking moments of the play are wholly Connelly.

I do not hold that pathos is of necessity a higher artistic expression than the merely comic, but Connelly's contribution is better rounded. He has taken black loam and breathed upon it. There is nothing in the book which lays hands upon my spine as does the march of the Children in the scene which pictures the road to the Promised Land.

But whether the play or the book is better makes small difference for the purpose of this piece. It is enough to indicate that they are different. Of course, any successful play, whatever the source of the material and its treatment, must be in a sense a collaboration. When I speak of the march of Israel and its poignant effect upon one particular spectator I am introducing other factors which are neither directly Connelly nor Bradford. Something of the emotion comes from the scenic scheme designed by Robert Edmund Jones. Mr. Jones once explained in my hearing that his theory of a setting for a play lay in the conception of the mass coming in toward the individual. He seemed to say that man's true portrait can never be painted except when he is put under pressure. And that pressure, I suppose, may be of color, or design, or emotional circumstance.

The perfect studio, then, for a portrait painter should be set close by the shore of the eternal brimstone lake. In depicting the heads which bobbed above that surface the artist could not fail to find the true essentials of the characters which sat for him uneasily. And if, instead of a head, a mere succession of bubbles marked the presence of a lost soul, the painter would know that here was nothing sufficiently substantial to be worth recording on his canvas. Of course, it may be all as simple as the fact that Mr. Jones has picked precisely the right shade of blue to act as background for the dusky little children as they are raised high upon the shoulders of the marching men and women.

In the case of Marc Connelly it is well to bear in mind that he stems into "The Green Pastures" from several directions. I do not know just how well the play reads, for I have never seen the manuscript, but even if any portion of the printed words leaves you comparatively cold there is still the chance that the thing in action will effect your capture. And Connelly designed the action.

Few are there so wise as to be able to announce with certainty just where the playwright ends and the actor begins upon his own. It is certain that players, upon occasion, have made much of fairly tawdry material and certain other roles are actor-proof, so that whoever is assigned to the part invariably figures in the notices as a person of indubitably high talent. Yet there is much to be said for the man who picks the pegs. If Connelly had nothing else to his credit the New York theater would still owe him a great deal because of the extraordinarily successful bit of casting he has done in choosing Richard Harrison to play the Lord.

I should like to know just what inspiration lay behind that selection. In the beginning there was something to be said against it and I believe that Mr. Harrison did some of the saying. He was eager enough to accept the opportunity, but on account of his connection with various Negro colleges in the South he feared the criticism of fundamentalists with whom he came in contact. It was, according to the story, the late Bishop Shipman who convinced Mr. Harrison that the fundamental mood of the play was reverential and should not be offensive to the most orthodox. But over and beyond that I am puzzled as to how the playwright knew in advance that this was the precise and particular person to be Jehovah in the troupe. After all, here was a somewhat elderly dramatic reader without stage experience who was being just a little reluctant to perform.

I have never known an elocutionist who did not elocute even when one asked him "please." It is vital that the role of the Lord shall be played with the utmost simplicity. And that is the way Harrison plays it. Upon him rests a great responsibility. "The Green Pastures" stands or falls by one moment in the second scene. The sight of the heavenly fish fry amuses us and then suddenly through the laughter rings Gabriel's great line, "Gangway for the Lord God Jehovah!"

It is, I suppose, the most stupendous entrance ever arranged for any actor and if the audience laughs when the man appears the play is almost done for. And no one laughs. And this is what I call a collaboration. The playwright has conceived the scene with free and courageous imagination and then he has gone on to find someone able to play it in just that spirit. HEYWOOD BROUN

"My Dear Senator"[*]

II

MY DEAR SENATOR: Thank you for your letter. Yes, the natural economic tendency is toward greater and greater combinations. I am afraid you are right that we cannot stop them by prosecutions under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. You are correct, too, in saying that the commissions we create to control the several industries are usually filled either by the tools or the nominees of the industries to be regulated, or by weaklings without views upon economic problems, who too often seek employment from the combinations they are supposed to regulate. Effective regulation is, of course, further hampered by the fact that our Constitution prevents price control unless the companies involved are engaged in interstate commerce.

I agree with you that there is nothing in the suggestion that has been made to you that the government set up a railroad system of its own to compete with other railroads and develop its own power companies, and thus control prices and methods. The government corporation in each case would speedily find itself isolated and faced with a combination of private companies circumventing the Sherman anti-trust law by means of those private understandings within the trade which in some phases have appealed so much to Herbert Hoover. You then declare that the only alternative is outright government ownership. Next, you ask me: "How far could anyone get in this country with a real constructive program along these lines? So, after all, shouldn't your criticism of us Senators be directed also against the President, and against the whole people of the country who are at the present time enraptured with materialism?"

Your question reveals again the chief fault of the men who rule us at Washington. Rightly or wrongly, you believe that government ownership is the only way out, and yet you put aside your belief by the question: "How far could anyone get in this country along these lines?" There you have the expediency which makes of most of our legislation mere futile compromise. There you have the expediency which has reduced us to our present headlessness and leaves us without a constructive industrial or economic program. If you feel heart and soul that the time has come for the government to take over the key industries of the country, it is surely your duty to say so and pay no attention whatsoever to the consequences. If you did this, you would immediately stand out as one of the powerful and compelling personalities in American life. You would prove yourself a leader because you were willing to have it known exactly how you stand, and were ready to face the inevitable consequences which come to any man who pioneers or takes an unpopular political path. If you will let me be frank, by taking such a stand and thus being true to yourself you would instantly cross the line which divides the politician from the statesman. That you would be widely attacked, probably as a Bolshevik, goes without saying. If you, too, like one of your colleagues who wrote me the other day, can think of politics only as a game, if you think that you have got to compromise and be practical in order to remain in Washington and work for good causes, you will, of course, continue in your present course and will undoubtedly be reelected from your State for several terms to come.

It is, however, just because men like you will not formulate a program representing your real beliefs and stand by it, come what may, that the American people are losing their interest in politics. I deny your charge that they are "enraptured with materialism." Multitudes of them are hungering and thirsting for genuine leadership. They want courage; they want a program, and when it is offered to them they will rise to it, just as they responded to the Progressive program of Theodore Roosevelt, and to the idealism of the early Woodrow Wilson. They feel that they have a right to look to their public men for guidance and constructive economic proposals. That is what you men in our public life are paid for. You are our representatives, with time enough, despite the enormous pressure of your legislative work, to plan, to study, and to formulate. Many of your colleagues find plenty of leisure hours in which to have a good time; but they are the ones who are wholly unconcerned with the great economic problems that confront every capitalistic country in the world. They lie back complacently and say that all is well with us. They refuse to listen to warnings.

Many have forgotten the advanced character of the Roosevelt Progressive platform of 1912 and how far we are from realizing it. They do not even care to inquire what the Socialist program is, or any other program. They are intellectually on a par with the Daughters of the American Revolution, who wish to deport anybody who does not think our system of government and the results we are achieving 100 per cent perfect. It is impossible to get these legislators to think because they do not want to think, and because they are unaware how ignorant they are, and how far away from them the world has drifted since August 1, 1914. You can no more compel them to study what is going on in the world than you can compel a horse to drink, and so they see nothing inconsistent in the chaos into which our economic life has fallen. They applaud the creation of the greatest bank in the world in New York as a result of combinations, and at the same moment applaud the government's attack in the courts upon the proposed consolidation of the Standard Oil and the Vacuum Oil Companies. They see nothing significant in the government's complete reversal of its policy in the matter of the combination of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railroads. They actually believe that the present regrouping of the railroads into seventeen systems is the solution of the railroad problem, without in the least degree perceiving that this in no wise decreases the dangerous influence wielded by the great railroad corporations in the molding of our financial and economic policies.

But why go on? You understand these things, and this fact makes it all the more the duty of a thoughtful, progressive Senator like yourself not only to study and to think, but to plan and, most important of all, to take the lead. How far could you get? I presume you mean how far politically. Well, I think you might easily be defeated in your next contest for reelection, but I know that coming right out for your beliefs would more nearly assure you a permanent place in the history of our country than a dozen reelections from your mountain State. What does it avail a man to save his election and lose his soul if there burns within it the desire to strike out on new lines and his conscience tells him to do it? Must you always let "I dare not" wait upon "I would"? Is there a single moral or economic reform recorded in history that was not carried through by men who forgot entirely to ask themselves how far their perilous advocacy would get them, who cheerfully had their heads chopped off if necessary to advance their causes? Yours is a wonderful opportunity. You have a marvelous forum in which to speak. With you alone the decision rests.

Religion in Russia

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, March 15

"ON the motion of the Archbishop of Canterbury the Convocation of Canterbury, at Church House, Westminster, yesterday 'recorded its indignant protest against the persecution of all who professed any form of religion in Russia'" (London Daily Herald, February 13, 1930). The allegation contained in this resolution is simply untrue. Communists suspected of religious inclinations or engaging in religious ceremonies are expelled from the party. In Dayton, Tennessee, a young teacher was dismissed for holding the view that we are descended from monkeys. In Samara or Baku a teacher would be dismissed for holding any other view. But apart from these two classes—the Communists who run the socialist state and the teachers who mold the mind of the young—Soviet citizens, including officials, may believe as they please, observe religion, attend church, and contribute toward the upkeep of priests. The notion must have gained ground abroad that all churches, synagogues, and mosques in the Soviet Union are closed. This would be a preposterous impression. Every day services are held in thousands of houses of worship. These services are attended by thousands. Church weddings and funerals and baptisms suffer no interference from the authorities, absolutely none. It is probably safe to guess that as many Christian homes in Russia have ikons as not.

The Bishop of Norwich, England, referred in an address to "savage" and "organized" persecution. "Religious faith of any sort is being brutally attacked," writes the Bishop of Chester. One is free, from these statements, to summon up pictures of executions, torture, and torments. Nothing of the sort has happened or is happening. No priests or rabbis or mullahs have been killed or imprisoned for believing in God or ministering to the devout. General Higgins, in the Salvation Army's London paper, the War Cry, calls upon all religious bodies to pray against those "who may be brutally doing to death men and women who in Russia seek to worship Him." This is merely hysterical froth based on the concoctions of Riga correspondents in their wildest and most imaginative moments. "Some of the atrocities," Lord Ponsonby said in a debate on religion in Russia in the House of Lords on February 20, "bore a very great resemblance to the story of the Belgian baby without hands." The comparison is apt. Tales that receive wide circulation are not necessarily true, and when they are accompanied by outbursts of hate they may frequently be maliciously false.

The anti-Soviet campaign on the ground of alleged religious persecution has provoked a remarkable demonstration of unity in the bourgeois world. The Pope, between 1922 and 1924, sought to exploit the Bolsheviks' opposition to Greek Orthodoxy in order to undermine it and convert its members to Roman Catholicism. Now, when the Vatican no longer negotiates with the Kremlin for advantage, he appears as the champion of the Eastern church. Greek Catholic clergy, never so happy as when they vent their ancient traditional enmity against the Curia, today occupy a common platform with the Vatican. By the side of émigrés Ukrainian and Great Russian fathers who blessed pogromists stand liberal and free rabbis whose resentment against Soviet measures for Jewish economic rehabilitation preceded and equals the vigor of their recent anti-Bolshevik denunciations. Misguided lovers of freedom uphold the hands of the most reactionary Morning Post. Due allowance having been made for the sincere protests of persons really pained by reports of Soviet repressions of the church, the recent uncontrolled choral outburst of all the enemies of bolshevism nevertheless affords considerable ground for a suspicion of ulterior motives. In England, for instance, the Tories, who always worked for a rupture with Russia, fell on the religious issue as an unexpected lever to achieve that end, but the no less religious Liberals and Laborites either held their peace or launched counter-attacks. This sharp cleavage suggests that the religious smoke screen was intended to hide a political offensive, and that antagonisms rooted in the most varied soils attached themselves to the crop of persecution rumors in the hope of benefiting from popular sentiments so easily provoked by religious questions.

One piquant fact: Mr. Sabline is a Russian monarchist. He was among the most active leaders of the anti-Bolshevik intervention movement in 1917-20. He still styles himself Diplomatic Representative of the Russian Government in London. But on necessary occasions, as when he recently protested in the London Times against church persecutions, he signs himself Churchwarden of Saint Philip's, Buckingham Palace Road.

Unfortunately, the campaign abroad, the falsifications and exaggerations, have hidden and distorted the real status of religion in the Soviet Union. The present situation is without precedent and of great moment. In Russia a generation is growing up that does not know God. More, the old generation is forgetting God. There is a social pressure against religion. Public opinion is a powerful force driving people into the atheist camp. It requires a tremendous amount of courage for, say, a university student to go to church or assert his faith in the presence of his comrades. They would laugh him out of court; he would be subjected to a kind of political-social ostracism.

Our children's nurse is a peasant maid. About eighteen months ago she was promenading the streets with Yuri and Vitya, aged five and a half and four and a half. On passing a church she crossed herself. They laughed. I cannot imagine who told them or taught them, but they laughed, and she does not do it any more. Recently a priest carrying an ikon and accompanied by a deacon passed through our court to visit an aged janitor. She thought the scene extremely funny. A few years ago she would have been filled with awe. Yesterday I asked her whether she believed in God. She said "No" outright. "Do you go to church?" I asked. She does not. Her last visit was at Easter time. She wanted to see the crowd and hear the choral singing.

Some maintain that Russia was never Holy. The mujik is really a pagan frightened by the mystery of nature's power. The Greek Catholic church, wholly controlled by Czarist autocracy, traded on this primitive sentiment, encouraged black superstition, discouraged literacy, and scoffed at science. The Russian church was never distinguished by strong moral fiber or big spiritual caliber. The licentiousness of the monks is documented in prerevolutionary Russian literature. The white clergy or priests seldom earned the respect of the masses. The village "pope" engaged in drunken brawls with his mujiks; he rarely possessed any education; as a force for good his value was almost zero. I think the elements of religion in Russia were, roughly, physical fear of God, the very strong habit of religious observances, and the fact that the church was the only social center.

When the Bolsheviks came to power the Greek Catholic church, with its Pobedonostzev traditions, its financial dependence on Czarism, its real-estate wealth, and its conservatism, constituted perhaps the best-organized frankly anti-Bolshevik unit in Russia. To Tikhon, its patriarch, the Soviets were anathema and he gave his blessing to the armies of Denikin and Wrangel. Orthodoxy saw the menace of communism and fought fiercely to overthrow the "regime of the anti-Christ."

The Bolsheviks want to abolish all forms of religion. They have not done so because it was inexpedient and impossible. But one will readily understand how the Communists, intolerant of even mild dissenters in their own ranks, would aim to destroy an institution politically and ideologically hostile, psychologically foreign, and morally obnoxious to them. In the eyes of Bolsheviks the church and religion are an unscientific, useless vestige of bygone ages, preserved and harnessed by capitalism to serve its mundane purposes. The struggle commenced immediately after the Revolution, but when the Soviets had won the civil war and intrenched themselves internally, Greek Catholicism, characteristically docile and spineless in the face of established government, sought to make peace with the new state. The Bolsheviks, on the other hand, were apparently torn between their hatred of religion and all churches and their desire to weaken Greek Orthodoxy by schisms and by encouraging Roman Catholics, Baptists, and other sects to make inroads on the Eastern church. This was the period of the almost-still-born Living Church and Church of the Resurrection; of public debates—now unthinkable—between Lunacharsky and Bishop Vedjensky, both silver-tongued, evangelistic, and idealistic; of crude, vulgar, anti-religious street demonstrations; of offensive but some good "godless" posters; of pourparlers with the Vatican; and of the growth of sectarian groups. In general, the Bolsheviks' policy vis-a-vis religion was vacillating and indecisive: they harassed without destroying.

Gradually methods changed. Fewer effigies of Christ, Mohammed, Moses, and God were burned in public and more atheist study circles sprang into existence. Sometimes the "godless" journals looked more like catalogues of machine manufacturers or electrical-supply companies. They were combating religion with science. All the time propaganda for the closing of churches continued with undiminished vigor. I saw churches and synagogues sealed in 1923. At that time, of course, religious instruction to minors below the age of eighteen was proscribed; that proscription, as well as the disfranchisement of priests, dates back to 1918.

Then commenced the present period of augmented atheist pressure. It differs from the preceding years quantitatively, but very little in quality. The crusading force of the anti-religious movement has gained fresh momentum but acquired few if any strikingly new characteristics. The fresh momentum is a by-product of the higher revolutionary wave now dominating the Soviet Union. I venture to suggest that religion in Russia will stand and fall with private capitalism. Indeed, Stalin's article of March 2, 1930, urging moderation in the socialization of agriculture immediately reintroduced some slight possibilities of peasant private trade —the essential feature of NEP—and simultaneously, therefore, brought relief to the church and priests. (I spoke to a few priests on this matter just a few days ago.) The priest is the natural ally of the Nepman and kulak. They have been known to work together criminally to obstruct Soviet laws, but even in more ordinary circumstances the social and ideological tie between the merchant and the priest or between the Jewish petty trader and the rabbi is certainly stronger than that between religious leaders and workers or poor peasants.

Revolution and socialist construction have now been given freer rein than ever before in Russia; the result is more violent atheist propaganda and the closing of more churches. Because these two phases are so closely interlaced, the Bolsheviks logically, if somewhat too primitively, deduce that it is opposition to socialism and the Five-Year Plan that dictates the religious protest of foreign interests. This may be generally correct but not always correct. Fundamentally, however, the insistence that Moscow prohibit anti-church agitation will avail as little as the demand that it scrap socialism. The Pope can no more stop the conversion of Soviet youth to atheism than he can add to the length of women's skirts. The time to save the church of Russia was in 1917, 1918, and 1919. Greek Orthodoxy could have been redeemed at that time by the overthrow of the Soviet regime. Now it must pray for the persistence of the vestiges of an anemic private capitalism. The question remains whether a country can live without religion or, at least, without the organized forms of religion. The Communists, apparently, answer in the affirmative.

A Cross-Section of Washington

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, March 29

PERHAPS it is too soon after the Hughes affair to expect the Senate again to assert its power of scrutiny over an appointment to the Supreme Court. The average level of courage in that body is distinctly mercurial. Nevertheless, as information accumulates the belief grows that the nomination of John J. Parker for the vacancy created by Justice Sanford's death is one of the worst in a generation. In the first place, it is a purely political appointment, intended to strengthen the Republican Party in the South and particularly in North Carolina. The record of the nominee is the totally undistinguished one of the usual party hack. He served as Republican National Committeeman for his State, and as a delegate to Republican national conventions. He was a special Assistant Attorney General in the Department of Justice under Harry Daugherty. As a federal judge, he is known, if at all, chiefly for an opinion upholding the "yellow-dog contracts" which West Virginia coal-mine operators compelled their employees to sign. This medieval instrument of industrial coercion is prohibited by law in the enlightened State of Wisconsin. The circumstances which attended his failure as a special prosecutor in war-fraud cases were so unusual, and have provoked such comment among lawyers, as to demand a thorough investigation. They recall those surrounding the parallel career of that great orator and statesman, Guy Despard Goff, who is one of Judge Parker's sponsors. By the time Hoover gets through, the "liberal minority" of the court is likely to consist of the justices appointed by Harding and Coolidge.

* * * * *

RIGHT now Washington is suffering from a ghastly hangover. The worst tariff bill in the history of civilized nations has passed the Senate at last and is on its way to conference, where there will be an earnest and painstaking effort to make it still worse. But what a headache it leaves! A dozen Democratic and Progressive Senators have recovered their wits sufficiently to wonder what they took that caused them publicly to kiss and embrace the Old Guard in the closing orgy of rate-raising, and as they wonder their bitterness increases against "Old Joe" Grundy, who gave them the stuff. Oddly, "Old Joe" is no happier than his dupes. While the trading-post which he set up on the Senate floor was the means of raising the sugar duty and placing a tariff on lumber and cement, he was unable to prevent reductions in the rates on pig iron and aluminum. This failure doubtless contributed to developments which now point either to "Old Joe's" withdrawal from the Pennsylvania Senatorial race, or to his ignominious defeat by James John Davis, biggest and best Moose of all time. Also, it now turns out to the great grief and astonishment of "Old Joe" that a comparatively small proportion of Pennsylvania voters are manufacturers, and that the overwhelming remainder tend to regard his Washington activities much as they are regarded by decent people elsewhere; to wit, as those of an unscrupulous lobbyist.

HIS present plight provokes reflection. Control of the Pennsylvania governorship, by which he always has set particular store and by which he was elevated to the Senate, has definitely been lost by the withdrawal of his candidate, and strong pressure is being applied from Washington to secure his own withdrawal. The reason for the latter is simple: the Administration realizes that "Grundyism" will be one of the leading Democratic issues in the fall Congressional campaigns, and it believes that the issue will lose much of its sting if Grundy himself is out of the picture. This attitude on the part of the Administration makes it extremely difficult for the Mellons to lend "Old Joe" much support, without which his candidacy is hopeless. Uncle Andrew is unwilling to jeopardize his own tenure, especially since there still remain in the Treasury a few dollars in wartime excess-profits taxes that have not been refunded to the corporations which paid them. Nor is he in general one to sacrifice himself on the altar of friendship.

THE situation resulting from inquiries into the lobbying proclivities and financial eccentricities of National Chairman Claudius H. Huston is equally disturbing from any sound Republican viewpoint. While it is recognized among loyal party men that Mr. Huston's habit of using trust funds to margin his personal stock account is but another proof of his genius, they realize that it is likely to be misunderstood by an electorate unaccustomed to large affairs. This impression is heightened by the disclosure of other episodes in his interesting career. Hence they are urging him to make the Great Sacrifice for the good of the party, trusting that God and Herbert Hoover will reward him. Thus far Doubting Claudius has stood pat, with an air that seemed to ask who was going to throw him out. Apparently it will not be his friend in the White House. Mr. Hoover shows a marked distaste for that job. It is true that, following the revelations of the lobby committee, a correspondent of the New York Times made the prompt discovery that the President had never recommended Huston for the post. This remarkable bit of detection was accepted, by those who know the accommodating nature of the Times, as the inevitable setting for that familiar Hoover drama, "Throwing an Old Pal to the Wolves," but the action has been unaccountably delayed, and it appears that the National Committee may have to act as its own bouncer. Eventually, of course, Huston will have to go. His methods are too advanced for an old-fashioned firm.

AN unhappy fatality seems to pursue those who occupy the office of Secretary of the Interior, and it should cause no surprise if the learned Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur proves not to be an exception. Poor Albert Fall had an insatiable craving for Liberty bonds and cash in satchels. The lamented Dr. Work had an unconquerable weakness for the sound of his own voice. Dr. Wilbur is addicted to the companionship of men recommended by the power magnates. He must have them around him. One such, whom he made executive secretary of the Federal Power Commission, effectually wrecked its work in a short time. This inclination is peculiarly unfortunate at a time when the Secretary's attitude is so important to the power-using public. It may be partially responsible for the absent-mindedness which caused him to tell a Senate committee that he had not made up his mind about the form the Boulder Dam contract should take, when, in fact, his assistant was then en route to California with the draft in his pocket. It may have inspired him to repudiate an interview which he unquestionably had given the Associated Press, to the effect that the department was no longer interested in Samuel Insull's efforts to grab Cumberland Falls. This feeling of comradeship, or something equally mystifying, is responsible for his determination to give the Southern California Edison Company a substantial share of Boulder Dam power, in plain defiance of the law which confers a preference right on States, municipalities, and other political subdivisions. There is a growing desire here to learn at whose instance Dr. Wilbur was put in the Cabinet—and to what end. I confidently predict that he is heading for serious trouble.

THIS writer was one of that confiding multitude who acclaimed the new era of candor and freedom inaugurated by President Hoover in his relations with the press. The battered and frayed White House Spokesman through whom the profound thoughts of Calvin had been conveyed to the public was abolished. As formerly, the correspondents would submit their questions in writing, but under the Hoover plan the answers could be published in one of three forms to be designated by the President: (1) as facts stated on the correspondents' own authority; (2) as information officially made public at the White House; or (3) as direct quotations from the President. In addition, newspapermen would have daily access to Secretary George Akerson, himself a former Washington correspondent. It is my sad duty to report that the working of this plan has steadily been narrowed and restricted until now less reliable and printable information comes from the White House than at any time while Coolidge was President. Written questions have been so consistently ignored that few reporters any longer trouble to submit them. The direct quotation phase has degenerated into a system of Presidential "hand-outs," palpably propagandist in character and seldom responsive to any inquiry. Many reporters have found to their sorrow that Akerson's information simply is unreliable —although not all of them believe he is to blame. His positive statement on the afternoon preceding the nomination of Charles Evans Hughes that the new Chief Justice would be Justice Stone remains the classic example, although examples could be multiplied. In addition, the practice of having "fair-haired boys," once employed by Roosevelt, has been resurrected, whereby the President gives private audiences to correspondents who have demonstrated their willingness and ability to publish stories that he particularly desires published. It was often possible to ask Coolidge a question and obtain an informative answer. But now—"if you don't see it in the hand-out, it isn't there." The old Oriental habit is hard to shake.

Colorado Bars Judge Lindsey

By HARRY McGUIRE

ON December 9, 1929, Ben B. Lindsey, internationally known as the founder of the modern juvenile-court system, was disbarred from the practice of law in Colorado by the Colorado Supreme Court. The opinion of the court, written by Chief Justice Greeley W. Whitford, declared with acid bitterness that Judge Lindsey had been "false to his oath taken as a judicial officer, and also false to his oath as an attorney and a counselor at law, and has thereby proved himself unworthy of the trust reposed in him by this court, and withal wanting in that indispensable moral character which the administration of justice demands of an attorney and counselor."[*] In pages teeming with sarcasm and recrimination the reason for this action was made clear. First, Judge Lindsey had practiced law while he was the judge of the Juvenile Court. Second, and more important, he had received $37,000 from Mrs. Helen Elwood Stokes and $10,000 from Samuel Untermyer, Mrs. Stokes's attorney, which was held to be in violation of the statute which limits the compensation of juvenile judge to the statutory salary. This much the public knows from the newspapers. What the general public does not know is the history behind this decision—and because Judge Lindsey's disbarment is the result of years of effort to "get" him, I propose to indicate something of the background.

First, the grounds for the disbarment proceedings. The Supreme Court, in accepting the interpretation of Judge Lindsey's actions in the Stokes affair which was placed upon them by Philip S. Van Cise (a violent Lindsey-hater who dug up the whole matter and pressed it upon the Grievance Committee of the Colorado Bar Association), quite obviously interpreted the law in terms of the letter rather than of the spirit. It is a common joke in the clubs of Denver that if the Supreme Court were to test all lawyers by the criteria applied in this case, three-fourths of them would have to go back to selling insurance.

As for the contention that Lindsey practiced law while a judge:

> It is alleged and admitted by Judge Lindsey that at the request of Helen Elwood Stokes he prepared a petition which was thereafter filed in the County Court of the City and County of Denver praying the appointment of the said Mrs. Stokes as guardian of her minor children. Also that he thereafter, on June 25, 1926, prepared the formal order appointing the said Mrs. Stokes guardian of the estates of her minor children. That thereafter Judge Lindsey, at the request of Mrs. Stokes, went to the city of New York and actively engaged in negotiations and

[*] On February 21, Judge Lindsey was completely exonerated by the California bar when the board of governors of the State association, after consideration of the charges on which the Colorado decision was based, announced that no irregularity on the part of Judge Lindsey had been disclosed by its investigation and that no action would be taken against him.—EDITOR THE NATION.

> conferences looking to a settlement of the claims of the minor children of Mrs. Stokes for a portion of their deceased father's estate in which they had been completely disinherited.

It is claimed that this constitutes practicing law.

The preparation of the petition for guardianship or any other probate matter and the order of appointment are purely formal or clerical. The clerk of the County Court, or his deputy, and in many counties the county judges themselves frequently prepare such petitions and other petitions for any person who needs the same and requests that it be done. No one has ever yet claimed that such courtesies extended to widows or the representatives of orphan children constituted practicing law. Indeed, it is a matter of such insignificance and unimportance so far as the practice of law is concerned that the Legislature of Colorado has authorized any male person over the age of twenty-one years, of good moral character, to practice in the County Court sitting for probate business. And in the case of Judge Lindsey the informalities of his court work have gone to such a point that his arguments and briefs in child-welfare cases from his own court, or other courts, have been received in the Supreme Court without the slightest question or objection.

It has been internationally recognized that one of Judge Lindsey's foremost contributions to jurisprudence has been his insistence that procedure in the Juvenile Court should be personal and often informal, and that judicial red tape should not stand in the way of the judge's doing his best for the children in whatever manner his discretion dictated. In the early days of the Juvenile Court these innovations in court methods led to many a brush with custom-bound guardians of law and order, but of late years they have been universally recognized and lauded.

As for Judge Lindsey's practicing law when he went to New York in behalf of the Stokes children, the facts, unobscured by personal malice, are simple. Mrs. Stokes implored Judge Lindsey to become the general guardian of her minor children so that he could carry on the contest of the will of their deceased father. This the Judge declined to do, but he did, at the urgent request of Mrs. Stokes and her Denver attorney, go to New York, where he participated actively in efforts and negotiations to bring about a fair settlement. Here he was a mediator and arbitrator, and his personal prestige and convictions were the sole weapons he could contribute in the fight for the disinherited children. Mrs. Stokes already had an eminent New York lawyer, Mr. Untermyer. Under the laws of New York Judge Lindsey could not have qualified to practice law if he had tried to. Morally, his personal aid for the Stokes children could not be wrong unless the children's property were under his jurisdiction, which would open the possibility that his future decision might be prejudiced. But in this case the service performed by Judge Lindsey could not in any possible way conflict with his judicial duty. The service was wholly dissociated from his judicial service—the service being performed in New York in relation to a claim to property which under no possible circumstances could be brought within the jurisdiction of the Denver court.

Mrs. Stokes and Mr. Untermyer judged that Judge Lindsey's influence had been highly helpful in winning the case for the children in New York. Mrs. Stokes, moreover, had long before openly admired Lindsey's juvenile work, with which she had been well acquainted for years before circumstances first brought her and her children into his court. Therefore Mrs. Stokes and Mr. Untermyer gave Judge Lindsey a gift of appreciation from their personal fortunes, an amount calculated to provide him with a life income of $200 a month. This sum did not come from the estate of the children, as has been alleged. One important point should be clearly borne in mind: that it was the Probate Court of the City and County of Denver which had jurisdiction over the children's estate and not the Juvenile Court; and that Lindsey, before accepting the gift from Mrs. Stokes and Untermyer, laid the whole matter before the judge (Luxford) of the Probate Court, and Judge Luxford whole-heartedly approved.

These are the alleged grounds upon which one of the most famous jurists of our times, who throughout more than thirty years of public service has time and again sacrificed his personal ends both politically and financially (it will never be known how many destitute mothers and children received help out of Lindsey's own pocket!) in the interests of his work for children and families, is declared "wanting in that indispensable moral character which the administration of justice demands."

But neither the newspapers nor the people of Denver believe that these grounds, which rely upon the nicest of technicalities, are the true reasons for Judge Lindsey's disbarment. People say, "Well, they finally got him." It is sometimes deplored that in a purely formal sense Lindsey may have been indiscreet in accepting a life income from Mrs. Stokes and Mr. Untermyer; but the regret is not that a public servant who kept himself poor all his life (Judge Lindsey still lives in the bare little house which saw his first struggles) in fighting for "the greatest good of the greatest number" has finally enough money to live on. It is simply that these circumstances allowed "them" to "get" him. Who are "they"? I shall very briefly summarize some of the outstanding cross-currents in Lindsey's background, and you can judge who "they" are.

1. When first made a county judge, over thirty years ago, Lindsey openly fought the corporations. He found rank corruption in court, city, and State offices, and he denounced it. Public-utility officials and their lawyers have been his bitter enemies and have constantly sought underground means of getting him out of power. How they have tried to bribe him—sometimes with money and sometimes with hope of offices as influential as those of mayor of Denver and governor of Colorado—is recorded in Lindsey's early book aimed at corporation graft, "The Beast." These forces were relieved when he turned his attention to the Juvenile Court; and public opinion forced them to bow before his work with children. But always they feared him.

2. He was first a Democrat politically, but such was the common people's admiration for his ability and honesty that the Republicans found it useless to oppose him, and after he formed the Juvenile Court he allowed his name to be unopposed on both Republican and Democratic tickets. But the politicians never loved him, because from the first he refused to kotow to the spoils system; and as most corporation graft was also political graft, most of the big politicians in Colorado at some time or other found Lindsey embarrassing. He gradually became non-partisan, a kind of non-political institution; and when in one election the politicians in both parties decided they would cook his goose by refusing him nomination on either ticket, he ran as an independent and gave them the only beating rank-and-file politicians have ever taken in Colorado. Politicians have respected him, feared him, and wished that he lived in Lithuania.

3. When the specter of the Ku Klux Klan arose in Colorado, and turned to its mysterious will great men, from United States Senator and Governor down to the Mayor of Denver, there was one man who without waiting for it to intimidate him rose like a Daniel and denounced it. He could have ignored it, or winked a knowing eye at its dark doings, like many other judges and officials. But he poured on it a torrent of wrath out of the pure honesty of his sense of justice. "Get Lindsey!" became the subterranean purpose of the Klan. So he paid the price of his honesty in an election in which he clearly won, but which was protested to the Supreme Court.

4. Lindsey had often accused members of the Supreme Court of being in effect tools of the corporations. The court had seldom been friendly to him or to his reforms, having on some occasions given decisions against these reforms. When the Klan protested his last election, the Supreme Court, on the flimsiest of evidence, threw out in toto the precincts in the Hebrew section where Lindsey's lead had been immense, and awarded the election to the Klan candidate, a questionable figure who had meanwhile committed suicide. They awarded the salary Lindsey had been earning under his certificate of election while the long-drawn-out case was being heard to the widow of this man. In short, the Supreme Court of Colorado has long been antipathetic to Lindsey.

5. Church members and women have been Lindsey's strongest supporters, crusaders in his defense when he was attacked. Now comes the juvenile judge with the idea of companionate marriage (that is, birth control, and divorce by mutual consent when there are no children). To many this seems a kind of "trial marriage," or free love. Lindsey is represented as a godless revolutionary attacking our good Christian moral order. Consequence: the "stable element" of the community, which once shared Lindsey's battles so lustily, now hangs back doubtfully. In their hearts these people are still for Lindsey—but his "liberalism" of late has been a bitter pill for them to swallow.

6. In addition to the fact that many of Colorado's ablest lawyers are corporation-hired or are politicians—and in either case Lindsey's hereditary enemies—Lindsey's cutting of red tape in his court, his successful attempts to save the costs of legal service to the poor people who came to him, and his late ideas for a House of Human Welfare in which many matters now subject to intricate court procedure and pleading by lawyers would be settled by a commission hearing the cases directly from those involved are important reasons why the legal profession fears Lindsey.

I have roughly indicated who "they" are who "got" Lindsey; all these forces, in one form or another, were behind the disbarment, which even considered as an act apart from its background was a gross injustice to a great and honest public servant. To close in good legal fashion: the Supreme Court of the United States, recently reiterating the ancient principle of the spirit as opposed to the letter of the law, said: "All laws should receive a sensible construction. General terms should not be so limited in their application as to lead to injustice . . . or an absurd consequence."

In the Driftway

THERE is a new as well as an old New Orleans, and the proponents of the new city do foolish things sometimes in their efforts to achieve what they fondly imagine to be Progress. But fortunately New Orleans has a considerable and articulate body of citizens who look these efforts toward Progress in the mouth and make a hullabaloo if they disapprove of them. More fortunately still, practically everybody in New Orleans realizes that its historic and individual character is a commercial asset, attracting visitors and giving the city a standing distinct from that of other towns which is worth something in dollars and cents. And a commercial asset is treated with respect in every community with which the Drifter is acquainted.

* * * * *

A RECENT instance is the vigorous protest against a proposed city ordinance which would require the removal of the old balconies in a part of the business district above Canal Street. In justice to the advocates of the ordinance it should be explained at once that the proposal would not apply to the old French quarter, the Vieux Carré, below Canal Street, where most of the balconies, with their beautiful iron grill work, are to be found. Nobody in New Orleans—at least no politician—would be rash enough to attack these. They are too precious a commercial asset. The ordinance was proposed in connection with a new "White Way" lighting system in the business section and would not affect many really worth-while old balconies. Yet it aroused a storm of protest. Grace King, the author of books on the city which are known far outside it, Professor Ellsworth Woodward, director of the art department of Newcomb College, and Walter Parker, a civic leader, came out publicly against the scheme. So did the Art Association and—strange as it may seem to some—the Association of Commerce, the leading business men's organization. It was pointed out that the balconies were useful as well as beautiful. Walter Parker, for instance, said in a letter to the city officials concerned:

> No sane tropical or subtropical city apes the architecture of cold climates, but builds to suit its own climate. In heavy rains or warm sun people on unprotected sidewalks do not linger to look into store windows, but hurry to some protected spot. Just the reverse is true on well-protected sidewalks.
> If it is necessary to pass an ordinance relative to balconies above our sidewalks, pass one to preserve them, beautify them, and assure their continued utility and charm, but certainly not one compelling their destruction.

The Morning Tribune, in espousing the campaign against the proposed ordinance, also was wise in emphasizing the fact that the balconies are a commercial asset. It printed a cartoon showing a workman at the top of a stepladder knocking down a balcony, while a group of men representing other cities—Atlanta, Pittsburgh, Omaha, and Houston—shouted their approval. The drawing was entitled: Helping Others to Our Tourist Trade.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Showmanship in Oregon

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: When I was a boy in London I had heard about a distant land called America but not about a man named George Washington. Then one day, after seeing a marvelous circus, I knew that Phineas T. Barnum was the greatest showman on earth and, ipso facto, the greatest American. Here in Portland, a man who owned and managed successfully theaters and other shows all his life became our mayor about twelve years ago. The other day, when the local Communists put on their own show at the Plaza Blocks near the City Hall, George L. Baker, mayor and ex-showman, instead of putting the cops and the militia to work, showed the poor dubs what a real barker can do by haranguing them. It may be that his impromptu speech was a lot of hooey, but so much the better; for fighting hooey with hooey is akin to fighting the devil with fire. At any rate there were no cracked Communist heads. At least, not cracked by police clubs.

Another Senator on Virtue

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: If you haven't already seen it, be sure to read Senator Blease's speech of March 18 in the Senate. I think it is the first time I have ever heard of a Senator boasting in the Senate that lynch law prevailed in his State. His exact words (Congressional Record, March 18, p. 5748) are these:

> I am proud to stand here as a representative of the State which was the mother of secession, which stood for manhood and for freedom, which stood, and today stands, above all States of this Union for the protection of the virtue of womanhood, because that State authorizes no divorce from the bonds of matrimony, and which stands, above all, on the decision that whenever any man, whether he be white or black, puts his hand upon a woman against her will and her consent, the punishment therefor shall be death; and, if necessary, the technicalities of the law will be thrust aside, and that sentence will be immediately put into execution.

Power Control Breaks Down

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: For three years I was a resident of Alameda City, California, which has a municipally owned electric supply. Recently I moved to Oakland, which is supplied by one of the great power companies. In Alameda my monthly bill for electricity for 170 kilowatt hours was $5.92. Under the privately owned supply my bill for 170 kilowatt hours is $6.65. The difference is $8.76 per annum, which enables the privately owned company to earn nearly 13 per cent on its valuation. The difference between the 13 per cent and the 8 per cent allowed as a "non-confiscatory" return by our enlightened Public Service Commission is plowed into the aggregate profits.

SOCIAL ENGINEERING

To the trained social worker, social engineering is not a phrase, but a daily opportunity and inspiration. The social worker whose work is with the Jews of America must be trained to grapple successfully with the peculiar problems that spring from the distinctive character of the Jewish individual and community in relation to the American environment.

College graduates and those about to be graduated should look carefully into the advantages, both tangible and intangible, of

Jewish Social Work as a Profession

A number of scholarships and fellowships ranging from $150 to $1000 for each school year are available for especially qualified candidates. May 9th is the last day for filing applications for the maintenance fellowships.

Tabula Rasa

By LESLIE NELSON JENNINGS

Aforetime it was written in the groan
Of glaciers crawling slowly to the sea,
Engraved on massy tablatures of stone,
Told by a fern frond's cursive tracery.
Earth is a palimpsest, a page that few
Can read and not remember; yet the mute
Witness within us craves another clue
To the incalculable Absolute.

Nature, that old Historian, has grooved
In granite such a text as must endure
When our inventions all have been disproved.
Who shall proclaim the primogeniture
Of this frail substance which the wind can mold
And one small crevice of creation hold?

The Analysis of Morals

Five Types of Ethical Theory. By C. D. Broad. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.50.

IF Great Britain at the moment were not so rich in brilliant philosophers—Whitehead, Alexander, Eddington, Moore, Russell, to name but a handful—we should hear a great deal more of C. D. Broad, M.A., Litt. D., fellow and lecturer in the moral sciences at Trinity College, Cambridge, author of "Scientific Thought," "The Mind and Its Place in Nature," and the present volume. Dr. Broad has many of the more important merits of a fine philosophical writer. He ingratiates himself at once by his unpretentiousness and remarkable lucidity. He is a rigorous and acute logician, quick to smell and pounce upon a fallacy or an ambiguity. While he does not put his trust completely in "common sense" (else he would be no philosopher at all), he has a fitting respect for it. He dismisses as "silly," for example, any theory, no matter how self-consistent, "which may be held at the time when one is talking or writing professionally, but which only an inmate of a lunatic asylum would think of carrying into daily life." He distinguishes sharply between critical philosophy—"the analysis and definition of our fundamental concepts and the clear statement and resolute criticism of our fundamental beliefs"—which he applauds, and speculative philosophy, which he deplores. It is speculative philosophy, of course, which interests most persons, because it pretends to supply a "total view" of the universe. But Dr. Broad finds speculative philosophers as a class pretentious dogmatists who have been "more certain of everything than they had a right to be of anything," and he dismisses their elaborate systems as moonshine.

Dr. Broad's present volume is a critical examination of the ethical theories of Spinoza, Butler, Hume, Kant, and Sidgwick. He remarks that he chose these five because their theories are extremely unlike each other, and because all are thinkers of the highest rank. He devotes much the largest space to Sidgwick, whose "Methods of Ethics" he regards as "one of the English philosophical classics," and "on the whole the best treatise on moral theory that has ever been written." It is chiefly the involutions and the dull dignity of Sidgwick's writing, he believes, that have resulted in his having less influence today "than many writers, such as Bradley, who were as superior to him in literary style as he was to them in ethical and philosophical acumen." Dr. Broad's own ethical theories, developed in his criticism and in his final chapter, are too complicated for summary here. It is enough to say that they are developed along traditional academic lines, and that one of his most important (and to me most dubious) conclusions is that "the fundamental concepts and the fundamental judgments of ethics are a priori."

Those of us who do not take a professional view of the subject are likely to approach a volume of this sort with a certain amiable skepticism. We are likely to reflect on the very negligible influence that any of the five philosophers discussed, or even all the metaphysical moralists put together, have had on the actual working moral code of the majority of men. And we are likely to be particularly prejudiced against Dr. Broad, for not only does he discuss seriously thinkers and theories that most of us look upon as long since discredited or superseded, but he himself, in an age when our ethical ideas are being influenced as never before by our knowledge of such sciences as anthropology, psychology, and biology, and by political and personal experiment, still clings to the ancient assumption, stretching back through Spinoza and Plato, that we can discover all we need to know of the ethics of human conduct by looking within ourselves, by examining the common facts known for centuries to everybody, and by simply being careful not to fall into any logical fallacies. Dr. Broad betrays this attitude not only by the type of his argument throughout the volume, but by his statement in the preface that "everyone has the necessary materials [for the study of ethics] at his disposal."

We may take as an example his treatment of Kant. A writer like Havelock Ellis, who may be taken as typical in many respects of our "modern" outlook on ethics, does not trouble to analyze Kant's particular arguments at all. He derides the whole idea of attempting to "rationalize morality," a temptation chiefly felt, he thinks, by "the man whose brain is hypertrophied and his practical life shriveled to an insignificant routine—the man of whom Kant is the supreme type." Dr. Broad would probably think it extremely unphilosophical to bring in such personal references in an attempt to discredit any thinker's views, though he apparently admits that others would find such considerations relevant, for he extends an engagingly candid warning to his reader, in the preface, that his own "range of experience, both practical and emotional, is rather exceptionally narrow even for a don." Dr. Broad's own approach to Kant is one of great apparent respect; he expounds the Königsberg professor's ethical theories in detail and examines them step by step. And I find the result extremely entertaining, for Dr. Broad's patient and unhurried logic finally demolishes the Kantian ethics pretty completely.

Dr. Broad would not apparently be greatly troubled by Havelock Ellis's charge regarding the "harmlessness" of academic moral teaching. He remarks in his concluding paragraph: "We can no more learn to act rightly by appealing to the ethical theory of right action than we can play golf well by appealing to the mathematical theory of the flight of the golf ball. The interest of ethics is thus almost wholly theoretical, as is the interest of the mathematical theory of golf or billiards." But I do not believe we can be so cavalier about the matter as this. What Dr. Broad probably means is that it is only the fundamental theoretical presuppositions of the subject that interest him and philosophers like him, just as it is merely the fundamental concepts of physics, and not any of its details or practical applications, that interested him in his "Scientific Thought." Ethics is not, as Dr. Broad seems to believe, merely a branch of critical philosophy; it is, or ought to be, a social science on the plane of economics. Now economists may fittingly concern themselves with the examination of fundamental concepts, such as the meaning of value, but if they confined themselves entirely to such purely "theoretical" problems, and never troubled with such practical affairs as taxation, tariffs, unemployment, and particular prices, the result would merely be that such questions would be settled solely (as they very nearly are) by persons ignorant of basic theory. There is, of course, nowhere any definite line between theory and its application; it is by application, indeed, that economists test, extend, refine, and modify their theories: application and theory must enrich each other. What we have at present in the field of ethics is, on one hand, abstract theorists of the Dr. Broad type, who regard their subject as a sort of fascinating logical game, and, on the other hand, writers like Ibsen, Shaw, D. H. Lawrence, Ellis, Wells, who have a very real influence on actual moral codes, particularly in the sexual realm, but little interest in fundamental problems of theory. Perhaps only when the two types of thinking are united will ethics come into its estate as a genuine instrument in helping us to conceive and realize the good life. HENRY HAZLITT

The Novelist Fadeyev

The Nineteen. By Alexander Fadeyev. Translated from the Russian by R. D. Charques. International Publishers. $2.50.

WHEN Fadeyev's novel first appeared, in 1927, the Russian critics acclaimed it as the best and most authentic depiction of the red partisans—irregular, spontaneously organized Soviet troops—in their bitter struggle against the whites. What distinguished Fadeyev, a Communist, from the middle-class writers who dealt with the civil war and the Revolution, from Blok, Pilniak, Biely, Leonov, Ivanov, and others, was, the Russian critics pointed out, the restraint, the realism, one might almost say, the naturalism, of his narrative. While the middle-class "fellow-travelers," lashed by their own fears and passions, envisaged the Revolution as an apocalyptic upheaval and the partisans as a blind, elemental mass of beasts or supermen, Fadeyev saw and described his partisans as ordinary beings—fools, cowards, intellectuals, and cutthroats, who love, hate, eat, talk, fight in an atmosphere of everyday existence in the midst of ordinary human sorrows and joys. Hence the simplicity of Fadeyev's style. There are no artifices here and no inflations, no symbolical storms and impressionistic extravaganzas; the work is free of the "fellow-travelers'" ecstatic outbursts, mystical shudders, and prophetic ravings. Not that it is devoid of the heroic; indeed, it is surcharged with it. But Fadeyev, in the manner of Tolstoy, to whom he is greatly indebted, humanizes his heroes by lowering them. With him heroism is never exalted or forbidding; it is simple, natural, the outgrowth of everyday conditions, not infrequently the result of weakness, the concomitant of despair. Instead of drawing his revolutionary figures as mythical monstrosities or lifeless algebraic symbols of the mass will, Fadeyev individualizes them, endowing each one, through a subtle process of inner, psychological illumination, with a distinct character, a glowing personal quality.

The Siberian steppes and forests, the civil war, the vicissitudes, defeat, and final annihilation of a red company, form the background against which are pitted the magnificently conceived, boldly hewn figures of a few partisan men and one woman. The incomparable Morozka, half-peasant half-worker, who leads a loose, devil-may-care existence, steals vegetables from the peasants, gets drunk, and carries on with women, but who for all that is a lovable, generous, brave fellow, loyal to the point of self-forgetfulness (though his class loyalty is intuitive rather than conscious), is one of the most appealing characters in the book. As a contrast there are the repellent Chizh, cultured and utterly cynical, and the pitiful student, Mechik, feeble, sensitive, self-conscious, unstable. Not less real are the other partisans. However, the most interesting and complex character among them is the leader of the company, Levinson. He illustrates best Fadeyev's method of humanizing his heroes by lowering them: "A small man, wearing large topboots, distinguished by a long, red, pointed beard, in appearance rather like a gnome in one of those drawings in children's fairy books." This sickly little Jewish intellectual, who tells salacious jokes, who knows the anguish of doubt and fear and indecision in the face of inevitable cruelty, is certainly no legendary hero, no monumental figure. Yet as the story unfolds he grows in stature; with all his handicaps and faults he reveals himself as a genuine hero, a sterling revolutionist, a devoted friend, a wise and self-sacrificing chief. The peasants and workers of his company cannot resist the impact of his personality. He enforces discipline through persuasion and example, through threats and severe punishment. Only once do we see him break down. It is at the end of the story, when his forces are decimated, his best comrades killed, and he, huddled up on his saddle, weary and heartbroken, tears running down his beard, heads the little band of nineteen survivors.

Despite the tragic ending, this story is not at all depressing. Like all real tragedies it is cathartic. We close the book with strengthened faith in a new Russia and with a feeling of affectionate admiration for the heroic little Bolshevik leader who "ceased crying" because he realized "that it was necessary to live" and that "a man had to do his duty."

Cowboy Harris

My Reminiscences as a Cowboy. By Frank Harris. Charles Boni. 75 cents.

"MY Reminiscences as a Cowboy," by Frank Harris, is the most absurd farrago of falsities I have ever read. The only possible reason for writing it must have been to provide words to sell; the only reason for reviewing it is to prevent people from buying it. The author has certainly lived up to his reputation for ignoring the truth. If he was ever a cowboy—and there is not so much as one homely metaphor of the soil or one fresh fact to show that he once rode the range—his memories of the experience have become so dim that in writing he found himself obliged to construct rather than arrange them. The construction is about as convincing as the most strained Western thriller.

The account opens with Mr. Harris working in a Chicago hotel in the "early seventies." Here he meets two cowmen from Kansas, throws in with them, and sets out to buy cattle. They go to Taos, which Mr. Harris says is "near" the Mexican border below El Paso, but which any road map will show to be close to four hundred miles from that stretch of the Rio Grande. However, Taos is a good place to have a bloody fandango, which sounds like an echo of the real thing as described by Harvey Fergusson in "Wolf Song." Then with one of his partners Mr. Harris slips over into Mexico and steals fifteen hundred head of cattle, which unaided they drive back across the Rio Grande. Indeed, Mr. Harris drives them alone while his associate shoots pursuing Mexicans. In exchange for a few hundred head of the booty a Texan agrees to aid the thieves. This Texan owns a herd of six thousand cattle which three cowboys constantly keep under guard. Now, even a modern bell hop should know that thirty times three men could not among them keep six thousand cattle constantly under herd.

Accompanying Mr. Harris's outfit is Wild Bill Hickok, who in fact was never a cowboy and who was at this time very busy as marshal at Hays City and Abilene. This makes no difference to Mr. Harris. He says that his three heroes are Cervantes, Shakespeare, and Wild Bill; it is to be hoped that he knows more about the first two than he shows himself to know about the last.

He gets back to Chicago just in time for the great fire of October, 1871, his original investment of $3,000 having been converted into $12,000. Mr. Harris does not give the date of the fire. He does not give a single date in the whole book, nor does he give more than half a dozen geographical locations, counting that of Taos, "near the border." Such vagueness may be an aid in making the narrative plausible to the ignorant; to anyone at all judicial it suggests the account a little boy might spin to his mother of having taken a ride on the tail of a buzzard.

A few people who are conscious of art are trying to write of the old West with sincerity and truth. The difficulty they experience in securing a serious hearing is largely explained when such a travesty as Frank Harris's "Reminiscences" is soberly sent forth as an outstanding book of the month—even in paper binding.

Through the Silver Screen

A Voyage to Purilia. By Elmer Rice. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. $2.50.

THE land of Purilia, surrounded by pink clouds and lulled in eternal melody, lies somewhere between Lilliput and Erewhon. Elmer Rice, author of "Street Scene," has now written a scholarly work on the life and habits of a most extraordinary people. Although almost immediately after landing on Purilian soil he is caught in a vast network of tangled lives, undergoing the most terrible hardships and encountering the most thrilling adventures, surely, that ever fell to the lot of any scientific explorer—adventures which carry him over half the Purilian globe and which end with the violent death of his "pal," Johnson, the thwarting of the scoundrelly Millwood, and the rescue of the beautiful Pansy Malone from a fate worse than death—he is never for an instant deterred from his purpose. Even while playing the hero he remains the ethnologist.

Only one or two of the many amazing phenomena of Purilian life may be indicated here. One of these—the disembodied voice which the author has named the Presence—is quite inexplicable. At odd intervals it speaks, seemingly out of nowhere, to make some announcement ("Spring comes early to the Purilian hills"), to introduce some person ("Mrs. Malone, Pansy's mother, old before her time from work and worry"), or to offer a bit of mild philosophy or humor ("Jim Slocum, the hired man, never ate peas for fear of cutting his mouth"). The Purilian people seek salvation through tremendous physical and emotional stresses, salvation taking the form of a kind of Nirvana in spiritual union between a man and a woman. But this goal is rarely achieved save by the upper castes. For the caste system is rigidly enforced in Purilia and Mr. Rice has gone into the subject in great detail, arranging and classifying the various orders and explaining how the several castes impinge upon one another.

Mr. Rice's satire is admirably sustained, with its intricate plot, its absurd solemnity, and its mordacious irony. He has surmounted what must have been enormous difficulties with such apparent ease that never for a moment does the writing threaten to go off key. It is to be hoped that the motion pictures acquire the rights.

A Conscientious Objector

"Hey, Yellowbacks!" The War Diary of a Conscientious Objector. By Ernest L. Meyer. The John Day Company. $2.

THIS is a well-worth-while little book, the unvarnished, simple tale of what an American youth had to endure in 1917-18 because he took literally the commandment "Thou shalt not kill." The conscientious objectors were the real moral heroes of the war. They were literally tested by fire. While Mr. Meyer did not have to undergo the inhuman tortures such as crucifixion, tying up by the wrists, drenching with ice-cold water at midnight, solitary confinement on bread and water, and all the other crimes in the name of the war to preserve democracy and righteousness endured by others, he had enough to undergo in all conscience, beginning with his expulsion from the University of Wisconsin by a trial board of war-crazed professors. That Mr. Meyer was able to keep up his courage, yes, preserve his mental balance, is remarkable; it gives fresh proof that the will and power to endure for one's beliefs have not yet passed out of this materialistic world.

Altogether it is a moving narrative bound to touch anyone except the men in uniform who are too blind or dull to see that the preservation of liberty of conscience is the most important thing in the world, and that next to it comes refusal to bow down before the power of the state when one's mind and conscience dictate revolt. Mr. Meyer's volume is an excellent companion piece to Norman Thomas's "The Conscientious Objector in America." We wish for it a wide distribution.

Oswald Garrison Villard

Another Coleridge

Coleridge, the Sublime Somnambulist. By John Charpentier. Translated by M. V. Nugent. Dodd, Mead and Company. $3.50.

BY reason of the strange territories which Coleridge's imagination explored in his poetry, the contrast between his works and his restricted middle-class life has always seemed peculiarly marked by pathos and tragedy. The popular view of the man who wrote four of the finest poems in the English language and one of the first masterpieces of modern literature has been of a frustrated individual whose years, except for a brief period of brilliant creative activity, were spent in ill-fated pursuits or under the shadow of incapacity and mental decay. The backgrounds of his unhappy career are familiar: the rural obscurity of Devon, the schooldays at Christ's Hospital, the restless Cambridge years, the distress caused by the French Revolution and the Pantisocracy scheme, the somber winter in Germany, the later London period divided between irregular employment and lecturing, and finally the incarceration with the Gillmans at Highgate in a firm but dispiriting attempt to cure himself of the opium habit. The golden years were brief; they came when he lived for a short time in the Quantoc Hills near the Wordsworths and wrote "The Ancient Mariner," "Kubla Khan," "Christabel," and other early poems. Without achieving the respectable and rather sanctimonious serenity of Wordsworth's old age, and incapable of carrying out many of his ambitions, Coleridge joined the sorry ranks of those poets who must nourish their lyric inspiration in a body racked by all the ills which misfortune, bad habits, and domestic misery supply. But the drabness and mediocrity of his surroundings and private life can never detract from his front-rank position, gained by a few great poems and his profound criticisms.

Religious Liberty?

CLAIMS have often been advanced that the establishment of Religious Liberty in America was the work of George Calvert, Lord Baltimore, and that the Maryland Province was the first to grant toleration to all. See The Commonweal, March 19 and March 26.

Without any comment, or expressing any opinion, we beg leave to cite some facts, quote some authorities, and ask some questions.

1. From The Roman Catholic Church in the Modern State, by Charles C. Marshall (Dodd, Mead & Co.), pp. 118-119, footnote:

> "The liberal spirit of Virginia in 1776 and of her great Statesman (Jefferson) brings out in strange contrast the early spirit of the Province of Maryland under Lord Baltimore, so often referred to by Roman Catholics as the paradise of religious liberty. By the Maryland Statute entitled 'An Act concerning Religion,' enacted 21st April, 1649, and approved by Lord Baltimore himself, it was provided that all persons within the Province who deny Jesus Christ to be the Son of God, or who deny the Holy Trinity, or speak reproachfully thereof, shall be punished with death and confiscation of all lands and goods. (Archives of Maryland, vol. 1, p. 244. Cf. Woodrow Wilson, A History of the American People, vol. 1, pp. 130-131). . . . It is indeed today a whimsical notion of toleration that would take the life and confiscate the goods of a man who does not believe in the Holy Trinity."

2. From the Encyclopedia Britannica:

> "Williams and his companions founded their new settlement upon the basis of complete religious toleration, with a view to its becoming 'a shelter for persons distressed for conscience.' . . . He was the first and the foremost exponent in America of the theory of the absolute freedom of the individual in matters of religion."
> WILLIAMS, ROGER (1604-1684), founder of the colony of Rhode Island and pioneer of religious liberty . . . in June, 1636.
> QUESTION: Was the Maryland Act of 1649, providing for death and confiscation, or the Rhode Island Declaration of 1636, the first "establishment of religious liberty in America?"

3. From The Great Encyclical Letters of Pope Leo XIII, issued upon his death in 1903 by Benziger Bros. with the imprimatur of the late Cardinal Farley, p. 149:

> "Let us examine that liberty in individuals which is so opposed to the virtue of religion, namely, the liberty of worship, as it is called. This is based on the principle that every man is free to profess as he may choose any religion or none."
> After arguing at some length against this principle, the Pontiff declares it to be "no liberty, but its degradation, and the abject submission of the soul to sin" (p. 150).

4. From Pope Pius XI, letter to Cardinal Gasparri, May 30, 1929 (Cf. Current History Magazine, August, 1929):

> "In a Catholic State liberty of conscience and liberty of discussion are to be understood and practised in accordance with Catholic doctrines and Catholic laws."
> (From the same letter): "In matters of conscience, jurisdiction lies with the Church, and with her only, by virtue of her divine mission."

5. From The Manual of Christian Doctrine, whose forty-ninth edition was printed 1928 by John Joseph McVey, with the imprimatur of Cardinal Dougherty, stated in its preface to be for use in "the classes of High Schools, Academies, and Colleges," we read the following instruction for the students—future voters—treating of the relation of the Roman Catholic Church to the State, on page 133:

> "122. May the State separate itself from the Church?
> "No, because it may not withdraw from the supreme rule of Christ.
> "123. What name is given to the doctrine that the State has neither the right nor the duty to be united to the Church to protect it?
> "This doctrine is called Liberalism. It is founded principally on the fact that modern society rests on liberty of conscience and of worship, on liberty of speech and of the press.
> "124. Why is Liberalism to be condemned?
> "1. Because it denies all subordination of the State to the Church. 2. Because it confounds liberty with right. 3. Because it despises the social dominion of Christ, and rejects the benefits derived therefrom."

The State and the Church is a volume written by John A. Ryan, D.D., LL.D., Director of Social Action, National Catholic Welfare Conference, and Professor of Moral Theology at the Catholic University of America, published 1924 under the imprimatur of Cardinal Hayes. Discussing religious liberty as guaranteed by modern constitutions (such as our own), Dr. Ryan, pointing out that the principle he enunciates has no immediate application in the United States, writes, p. 38:

> "But constitutions can be changed, and non-Catholic sects may decline to such a point that the political proscription of them may become feasible and expedient. What protection would they then have against a Catholic State? The latter could logically tolerate only such religious activities as were confined to the members of the dissenting group. It could not permit them to carry on general propaganda."
> QUESTION: Are Lord Baltimore's co-religionists today the advocates of freedom of conscience, toleration, and religious liberty?

M. Charpentier establishes no original point of view in interpreting Coleridge's life, and his subtitle shows it. A biographer does not gain much in lucidity when he tries to solve the problems of an erratic genius by conferring somnambulism upon him. The historical facts are not enhanced in the process, and the interpretation of the poet's work is clouded by a smoke screen of psychological assumptions. In the case of Coleridge this method appears defective at once, for it may be compared with Professor Lowes's researches in "The Road to Xanadu" (one of a half-dozen obvious titles missing in the present bibliography), where with no lack of glamor the history of the poet's mind and imagination is traced with profound insight. M. Charpentier employs all the trappings of the popular biography of the moment, but he is most successful when he discards the showy appeal and considers his man judiciously. Two sections of his book—those dealing with the Nether Stowey and Keswick periods and the final years at Highgate—contain some admirable explications of the evolution of Coleridge's aesthetic theory; and his high tribute to Coleridge's critical genius, which is scarcely overstated when he speaks of "the most stimulating criticism which has ever existed," will serve to emphasize the importance of a great modern critic. The reader will also see the general drift of French opinion about Coleridge and his fellow-poets. There is meager stylistic charm in this biography, but it will be found smoothly readable in its present translation, and throughout there is revealed a warm sympathy in presenting, within too handy a circumference, the dreams and ideals of the second genius of English romanticism.

An Entangling Alliance

The Franco-Russian Alliance, 1891-1917. By Georges Michon. Translated by Norman Thomas. The Macmillan Company. $4.50.

The Franco-Russian Alliance, 1890-1894. By William Leonard Langer. Harvard Historical Studies, Volume XXX. Harvard University Press.

THE appearance at about the same time of two books on the same subject, with identical titles except for the dates, is an unusual coincidence. Dr. Michon, whose book was published in French in 1927, remarks in his introduction that the history of the Franco-Russian alliance "has never been written." Professor Langer, who speaks of Dr. Michon's book in his bibliography as "the only systematic treatment of the history of the alliance as a whole," also observes in his preface that there has been "no exhaustive treatment" of the subject "to date." Professor Langer has apparently outstripped his colleague in the use of documentary material, and his account of the formation and early years of the alliance is the more detailed. The essential difference between the two books, however, does not lie in a more systematic treatment on the one side or a more exhaustive treatment on the other, but in the fact that Dr. Michon, by carrying forward his study into the period of the World War, is able to exhibit at length the evil consequences of the alliance to which Professor Langer, holding himself to a shorter period, does little more than allude.

It would be difficult to find, in so small a compass, a more vivid picture than Dr. Michon draws of the black cloud which the alliance with Russia hung over French politics and the French mind until revolution had sent Czarism toppling. The smug self-satisfaction of the French bourgeoisie in the decade before the World War, the vicious policy of Poincaré, the indifference to the appeals of Jaurès and others, the vast corruption of the French press by Russian money expended with the knowledge of Poincaré and under the direction of Klotz, the Finance Minister, the complete misunderstanding of the nature of the Russian government, and the enormous losses which the flotation of Russian bond issues brought to the French people—all this, and much more of the same amazing kind, is to be read in Dr. Michon's pages. Professor Langer does not go so far chronologically, but he, too, notes that "if mutual assistance in the event of a German attack was the common denominator of the Franco-Russian alliance, it was a miserable thing from the start," that over four billion dollars in loans was sent to Russia with the clear understanding at Paris that most of it would eventually be lost, and that France was "obliged to assume the unenviable position of supporting the odious Russian autocracy in its struggle with the liberal movement" in that country; for all of which it won, after 1891, only an "extremely precarious" position. Anyone who imagines that political alliances make for peace should ponder the facts which these two books present.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

The Jew in Effigy

Jews Without Money. By Michael Gold. Horace Liveright. $3.

IN the itemized account of our divinely ordained martyrdom which we Jews are keeping to present to the Lord on the day of final reckoning, one of the longest and fattest columns will be under the heading of Literary Damages. As a matter of fact, our literary ordeal at the hands of Jew and Gentile alike, Zionist and anti-Semite, yellow journalist and red has in many ways been more trying than our physical one; and, frankly, if we had known in advance of this gratuitous supplement to our sufferings, we should rather have chosen not to be the Chosen People. And not because we are getting crotchety in our old age. Being burnt in the flesh, as we have frequently had occasion to find out, is a painful enough business, but at least there is some dignity to it. But to be burnt in effigy! To be hissed and applauded—in effigy! To be vilified and deified—in effigy! To be laughed at and cried over—in effigy—as we have been subjected to in literature past and present, up to and including this latest affront—that is merely humiliating.

Perhaps that is what Shylock, one of the earliest effigies made of the Jew, had in mind when he cried (to all the Ghetto-mongers of the future)—"Hath not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions?" Shakespeare, perhaps, had never seen one, and for all he knew a Jew might have had horns and a tail. But what are we to say of Jewish writers—not literary Jews like Ludwig Lewisohn, but genuine products of the Ghetto like Michael Gold and others, whose books people the East Side with crudely carved effigies about as realistic as a crowd of totem poles. I can only reply that Mr. Gold is not really to blame. All those totem poles have been fathered before him by visiting Gentiles, and nursed at the breast of kindly Gentile reviewers, and all he did was to continue the breed. For centuries the Ghetto was an exotic corner of European cities, partaking of the unreality and colorfulness and crude conventionalizations of all things foreign to Gentile eyes. Out of this "conditioning" grew the "Jew," a mystical entity like the Holy Trinity, one in all and all in one, subdivided not into individuals but into the embodiments of various sentimental fancies about things Jewish. This peculiar, exoscopic romanticism was assimilated by the Western Jew with whatever language he learned, and unconsciously he got to see himself that way and, ultimately, to exploit himself that way for a receptive public. His temptation is not lessened by the fact that reviewers, quite able to hold up other fiction to some sort of aesthetic standard, would hail "Bertha, the Sewing-Machine Girl" as stark realism if it were only equipped with the proper East Side setting.

If the Gentile, sick of such regurgitations of his own fancies, is really bent on finding out what honest-to-goodness Jews look like, act like, taste like in fiction, let him try the following recipe. Quarantine all the Jews in one country—I don't care whether it is Palestine or these United States so long as the Gentile is kept out—and confine them to a language exclusively their own—Yiddish or Hebrew or perhaps their own brand of English. Then the Jews would be forced to write for themselves for a change, instead of posturing for the Gentile. The Ghetto would no longer be a pushcart devoted to cheap literary trimmings, for its inhabitants could not go on peddling their picturesqueness to each other. The word "Jew," deflated of its rhetorical content, would cease to be a figure of speech for the convenience of literary politicians like Ludwig Lewisohn and Michael Gold and become a noun that a self-respecting artist could handle without blushing. The Jewish writer would stop regarding himself as a foreign correspondent stationed among his people and would have to satisfy a critical jury of his fellow-Jews—for whom "Jewish life" would have no news value—who would apply the same standards that American critics apply to Sherwood Anderson or Elizabeth Madox Roberts. Only under such Utopian conditions, perhaps, will the "great Jewish novel" get itself written.

It occurs to me that I have not really reviewed this book, so I will let Mr. Gold himself sum it up: "All these things happened. They were part of our daily lives, not lurid articles in a Sunday newspaper." Can it be that Mr. Gold is getting self-conscious?

ALTER BRODY

Comforting Reminiscence

Grandmother Brown's Hundred Years, 1827-1927. By Harriet Connor Brown. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

THIS volume, the $5,000 prize biography of the Atlantic Monthly, is almost unique. Reminiscences of the aged are common enough, of course, and some of them find their way into print, but most of the latter are concerned with life more or less completely removed from the common level, either with great events, or with participation in them, or with such bizarre maunderings as appeared in "Trader Horn." Grandmother Brown's story deals with none of these things. It is, on the contrary, an account of everyday life, of the work, play, and philosophy of an intelligent, courageous, loyal woman, the kind of life that has been duplicated, except in length, by the hundred thousand in this country. The constantly recurring round of hard work of a pioneer farmer's wife, relieved by the variety necessarily incident to bearing and raising a large family, might seem to furnish material for only a commonplace narrative. As the author handles it, however, the story is far from commonplace; it is significant and entertaining, made so both by the large element of universality and by Grandmother Brown's distinct individuality. Her portrait might be regarded as a composite picture of all who have lived through experiences similar to hers, although by no means all who have had such experiences have met them as successfully and serenely as she did.

Her mission in life was her home and her family. To these she devoted her years and her strength, and from them she drew her reward. They were her contributions to the well-being of the community. If the contributions of all individuals were equally good, she believed, many of the problems requiring the services of the reformer and uplifter would cease to exist. Like most women who have seen life as she saw it she had strong convictions, but she was never bigoted in forcing them upon others. Her philosophy was the product of her own observation, tinged at times with sadness but also, on occasion, with delightful humor. And not infrequently, where Grandmother Brown's own views were too earnest for her to see humor in them, her daughter-in-law author contrives skilfully to let the reader see the amusing side. "I have always felt this way," said Grandmother Brown, "that it is a woman's duty to make a happy home and teach her children to vote the Republican ticket."

The book has little to do with public affairs, but it is a very interesting contribution to the study of an important phase of American life. RALPH VOLNEY HARLOW

Drama

Nosce Te Ipsum

THE Theater Guild's experiments with standard plays have not always been among its happiest efforts, but with "A Month in the Country" (Guild Theater) it has achieved a delightful production of a delightful play. Chekhov himself never imagined a more charming group of people than that which Turgenev has here brought together, and Chekhov himself never scrutinized character with a keener or more tolerant gaze. One will look in vain for that tumultuous despair which is commonly supposed to be inevitably a part of the famous Russian soul, but one will find in its place something which is, perhaps, hardly less characteristic—a gently bubbling gaiety just tinged with melancholy and a quiet, almost elegiac beauty. These people are, to be sure, all idlers; they have eaten of some lotus and they dream their lives away, content to watch the birches grow and to speak of love. But no one ever justified idleness more completely by making it graceful, for they talk divinely about nothing in particular, and they get the full savor of the tiniest, almost non-existent adventure. After two hours in their company it seems that life could not be more profitably spent than in such doings as these.

Natalia Petrovna, married to a gentle, ineffectual country gentleman, has a lover of long standing; but when a young tutor appears in the house she confesses a penchant for him. The tutor is flattered by the favor of the great lady, and the lover, tardily scrupulous now that he has been displaced, persuades him that they should leave together. They say goodby after some nervous references to the delicacy of their honor, and the lady accepts their farewell with an irony whose delicacy makes its deadliness almost imperceptible: "I am sure that you are both honorable men—very honorable men. In fact, I think that you are the most honorable men I have ever met." And that is all, but it is quite enough. Quite enough because, I think, both the author and his creatures are so exquisitely aware of every value which the situation contains. Turgenev sees through them all. He follows every turn of every individual's psychology. But he does not see through them any more completely than they see through themselves, or know them any better than they know themselves, for it is, indeed, in learning to do just that that they seem to have spent their lives. Self-knowledge, complete in the adults, may be still growing in the youths, but as one watches the keenness with which they note their own emotions, one is sure that their experiment with living will achieve the success at which it aims. Doubtless they will never do anything, and quite probably they will be unhappy. But they will be thoroughly familiar with their own souls, and they will get the full value out of every emotion. They will see it coming, they will know when it is there, and they will reflect upon it after it has passed—even though, perchance, they have never heard of the "hard and gem-like flame."

Turgenev and Chekhov are the only writers I know who have completely justified a pause on the road which leads from tragedy to comedy. Both have reached the detached and critical intelligence which belongs to the latter. Both are completely sophisticated and, in certain senses at least, completely disillusioned. Yet neither has even approached the brittle hardness of pure comedy. Each is knowing without being quite cynical, and though neither has any lingering tendency to find cosmic significance in man or his doings yet both feel with and for him. In them human nature is neither funny nor grand, but somehow, without being either, it is charming. And that perhaps is the secret of their fascination. Here for once one does not have to make one's choice between intelligence and feeling or be put off with comedy tinged with inappropriate sentimentality. The clarity of vision is never clouded; no veils are drawn in order to make people or things seem softer than they are. And yet their little joys and little sorrows take on a significance which is more than comic.

In such a play as this, where everything depends upon the evocation of a mood, it is obvious that only the most expert acting and the most expert direction will do, but the production at the Guild Theater leaves almost nothing to be desired. Nazimova, as Natalia Petrovna, gives a finely modulated performance which seems to me quite the best she has achieved since her return to the stage; Henry Travers and Dudley Digges are very fine in comic roles; and in fact the whole cast, including Eunice Stoddard, who was seen first in "Red Rust," is excellent. Moreover, the settings, modeled by Raymond Sovey upon the designs by M. S. Dobuzhinsky for the Moscow Art Theater production of the same play, contribute much. Perhaps the garden scene reveals the weakness of all attempts to treat outdoor scenes realistically with the aid of paper flowers and poisonous-looking grass, but the empire room, done in blue, is one of the loveliest I have ever seen.

The Haiti Commission's Report

THE President's Commission for the Study and Review of Conditions in the Republic of Haiti was appointed on February 7 and consisted of the following members: W. Cameron Forbes, chairman; Henry P. Fletcher, Elie Vezina, James Kerney, and William Allen White. On February 4 President Hoover, in announcing that such a commission would be appointed, said: "The primary question which is to be investigated is when and how we are to withdraw from Haiti."

The work of the commission in Haiti was fully reported in our International Relations Section by Mrs. Helena Hill Weed, special representative of The Nation in Haiti. The commission's report, which was unanimous, has just been published. We print below the principal sections and the recommendations of this report.

. . . The reasons which impelled the United States to enter Haiti in 1915 are so well known that they need not be set forth in this report. Conditions were chaotic; means of communication were largely non-existent; the peasant class was impoverished; disease was general; property was menaced; and the debt of the government, indeterminate in amount, had risen—at least on paper—to staggering proportions. . . .

The commission desires to record its high praise of General Russell's whole-hearted and single-minded devotion to the interests of Haïti as he conceived them, his unremitting labor, and his patient and painstaking efforts to bring order out of chaos and to reconstruct a governmental machine which had been largely destroyed by years of abuse, incapacity, and anarchy. Since the Occupation the Haitian government, especially under President Borno, with the guidance and assistance of the American officials in its service, has a fine record. . . .

The commission was disappointed at the evidence it received of the lack of appreciation on the part of the educated and cultured Haitians of the services rendered them by the Occupation and their own government. Out of many dozen witnesses only one or two made favorable mention of the achievements of their administration. . . .

Under the American Occupation—and with its consent—the legislative chambers were dissolved in 1918, and by an interpretation of a new constitution adopted under its aegis, they have not since been reassembled. The country has been ruled by a President and a Council of State exercising, under the direction of American officials, the legislative authority. Local self-government has also largely disappeared. The important municipalities and communes are ruled by commissioners appointed by the President. The members of the Council of State itself have been appointed and removed by him. . . .

The people of Haiti, since the dissolution of the National Assembly by President D'Artiguenave, have had no popularly elected representatives in control of their government. The American Occupation has accepted—if not indeed encouraged—this state of affairs. Certainly reforms could be instituted and governmental measures carried through more easily in these circumstances, and were. The acts and attitude of the treaty officials gave your commission the impression that they had been based upon the assumption that the Occupation would continue indefinitely. . . . The commission was disappointed to find that the preparation for the political and administrative training of Haitians for the responsibilities of government had been inadequate. . . .

The commission is not convinced that the foundations for democratic and representative government are now broad enough in Haiti. The educated public opinion and literate minority are so small that any government formed in these circumstances is liable to become an oligarchy. The literate few too often look to public office as a means of livelihood. Until the basis of political structure is broadened by education —a matter of years—the government must necessarily be more or less unstable and in constant danger of political upheavals.

The commission is of the opinion that the progressive steps looking toward the withdrawal of the assistance now being given by the American Occupation should be taken on the theory and understanding that the present treaty will remain in force until 1936, it being understood that such modifications as circumstances require and the two governments agree upon may be made at any time. It is too early to suggest in what form the American Occupation should be liquidated upon the expiration of the treaty or in what form such further aid and assistance as the Haitian government might desire from the United States should be provided. . . . The commission recommends the gradual reduction of the marine brigade if and as, in the judgment of the two governments, the political situation warrants. . . .

It is obvious that after the withdrawal of the American forces, the orderly functioning of the Haitian government will depend in large measure upon the efficiency and discipline of the Garde. The primary and principal duty of the Garde—the maintenance of law and order—has been well and conscientiously performed. The replacement of American officers of the Garde by Haitians, contemplated by the treaty, has not been carried out, however, as rapidly as, in the opinion of the commission, it should have been done. There is not now and there never has been a Haitian officer of the Garde above the grade of captain. There are now but 2 Haitian captains on duty with troops out of a total of 23, 17 Haitian first lieutenants out of a total of 58, 19 Haitian second lieutenants out of a total of 57, and 28 aspirant officers (cadets), all of whom are Haitians.

. . . The commandant of the Garde testified that American officers serving with the Garde could be transferred back to the Marine Corps at any time to make room for the promotion of Haitians, and this should be done where vacancies occurring in the ordinary course are not sufficient to give the opportunity for a faster promotion of Haitians. Notwithstanding the fact that there are a number of American non-commissioned officers serving as company officers in the Garde who have rendered fine service for from eight to fourteen and one-half years, not one of them has ever been promoted above the grade of captain in the Haitian Garde. The commission believes that some of these men are at least as well fitted by training and experience to be promoted to field rank as marine officers who have not had their experience in Haiti. . . .

The financial achievement of the American administration is noteworthy. . . . Some witnesses who appeared before your commission criticized the financial management of the government and even went so far as to charge improprieties in connection with it. Many complained that they were kept in ignorance as to how their money was collected and how spent. This shows that they had not read the careful reports issued by the Financial Adviser in both English and French. . . .

Of The Nation, published weekly, Wednesday at New York, N. Y., for April 1, 1930.

State of New York }
County of New York } ss.

Before me, a Notary Public in and for the state and county aforesaid, personally appeared Oswald Garrison Villard, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the Editor and Publisher of The Nation and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management (and if a daily paper, the circulation), etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, embodied in section 411, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business managers are: Publisher, Oswald Garrison Villard, 20 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.; Editor, Oswald Garrison Villard, 20 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.; Managing Editor, Henry R. Mussey, 20 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.; Business Managers, None.

2. That the owner is: (If owned by a corporation, its name and address must be stated and also immediately thereunder the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding one per cent or more of total amount of stock. If not owned by a corporation, the names and addresses of the individual owners must be given. If owned by a firm, company, or other unincorporated concern, its name and address, as well as those of each individual member, must be given.)

The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.; Margaret DeSilver, 98 Joralemon St., Brooklyn, N. Y.; Katherine S. Dreier, 88 Central Park West, N. Y.; Mary Knoblauch, 55th St. and Seventh Ave., New York, N. Y.; Agnes Brown Leach, 170 East 64th St., New York, N. Y.; Ellen McMurtrie, 1104 Spruce St., Philadelphia, Pa.; Estate of Mary D. McMurtrie, 1421 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.; Maria C. Scattergood, 355 Bourse Bldg., Philadelphia, Pa.; R. L. Selene, 334 California St., San Francisco, Cal.; Oswald Garrison Villard, 20 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.; Edward S. Waters, 52 William St., New York, N. Y.; Maurice Wertheim, 57 William St., New York, N. Y.; Estate of J. Wertheim, Central Union Trust Co., 80 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: (If there are none, so state.) None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustee, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

5. That the average number of copies of each issue of this publication sold or distributed, through the mails or otherwise, to paid subscribers during the six months preceding the date shown above is: (This information is required from daily publications only.)

revenues in excess of the amount called for by the amortization plan. The wisdom of this course is open to question; it might have been better to have reduced the taxation, especially the export tax, and left the debt to work itself out during its normal term, thus keeping more money in the country where experience has shown it was badly needed. Little by little the American Occupation has extended its intervention in the financial operation of Haiti, until 60 per cent of the revenues are now expended under American supervision, including the Service of the Public Debt. . . .

Friction between the Haitian courts and the American treaty officials has arisen at various times because, on the one hand, the courts have refused to enforce or have obstructed the execution of certain administrative measures and because, on the other, the treaty officials have refused to obey the orders of the court on the ground that the treaty is the law of the land and its observance and the agencies set up by it cannot be obstructed or interfered with by the judiciary. The question raised is delicate but goes to the heart of our treaty relations with Haiti, and the commission recommends that in case of future conflict of authority on this score the matter be settled by direct negotiations between the two governments. . . .

One accusation persistently brought against the American intervention concerns the inserting in the constitution of 1918 of an article granting to foreigners the right to take title to Haitian land. It is evident that the change has produced much irritation and suspicion. From the inception of the Republic in 1804, the Haitians had consistently excluded foreigners from owning real property, and in the face of such a tradition it was unfortunate to have had the land policy altered under American auspices. The commission recommends, in case the Haitian people desire to amend this provision, that our government make no objection thereto, merely limiting itself to seeing that rights and titles acquired under the present constitution—which are comparatively few—be respected. The commission found no instance of undue advantage having been taken by Americans of the clause enabling foreigners to acquire real estate. . . .

Race antipathies lie behind many of the difficulties which the United States military and civil forces have met in Haiti. The race situation there is unique; the Negro race after more than a century of freedom has developed a highly cultured, highly sophisticated, race-conscious leadership. This group, which is proud to be known as the "Elite," forms the governing class. . . . Their language is French. Their Catholicism is French. The masses of Haiti are poor and ignorant. Generally speaking, they are of pure African descent. Illiteracy keeps the peasant masses politically inarticulate, except in case of mobs or bandit gangs, which formerly infested the countryside and often furnished the forces of revolution. These bandit gangs have been broken up and have disappeared under American rule, but the social forces that created them still remain—poverty, ignorance, and the lack of a tradition or desire for orderly free government. . . . The failure of the Occupation to understand the social problems of Haiti, its brusque attempt to plant democracy there by drill and harrow, its determination to set up a middle class—however wise and necessary it may seem to Americans—all these explain why, in part, the high hopes of our good works have not been realized. . . .

The commission recommends:

1. That the detail of naval and marine officers for all Haitian services be made for a minimum of four years and that an effort be made to secure Americans who will agree to continue employment in these services, so that upon the expiration of the treaty a force of American doctors, engineers, and police officers will be available for continued assistance to the Haitian government, should it then desire it;

2. That, if possible, some form of continuing appropriation for roads be urged for expenditure by the Haitian government, with a policy that will provide enough funds to keep all existing roads in suitable repair before any new construction is undertaken; also in regard to further construction that only roads most urgently needed to develop regions now settled . . . be undertaken until the present economic depression has passed;

3. That the United States interpose no objections to a moderate reduction of the customs duties, internal revenue taxes, especially those imposed upon alcohol and tobacco, or to a reduction or elimination of the export tax on coffee, if the condition of the Treasury so warrants;

4. That it be suggested to the Haitian government that it employ one American adviser in each administrative department of the government to perform such work as the respective cabinet minister may delegate to him, these officers to give expert advice and assistance to the Haitian government; . . .

5. That, as an act of graciousness on the part of the United States, a moderate appropriation be made available during the continuance of the treaty to defray the cost of American civil officials in the Haitian government service;

6. That an appointment of a military attache be made to the legation when the time shall have arrived for a minister to replace the high commissioner, as the question of the preservation of order is of first importance. . . .

Complying with your instructions to suggest sequent steps to be taken with respect to the Haitian situation your commission offers the following:

1. That the President declare that the United States will approve a policy, the details of which all the United States officials in Haiti are directed to assist in working out, providing for an increasingly rapid Haitianization of the services with the object of having Haitians experienced in every department of the government ready to take over full responsibility at the expiration of the existing treaty;

2. That in retaining officers now in the Haitian service, or selecting new Americans for employment therein, the utmost care be taken that only those free from strong racial antipathies should be preferred;

3. That the United States recognize the temporary President when elected, provided the election is in accordance with the agreement reached by your commission with President Borno and the leaders representing the Opposition;

4. That the United States recognize the President elected by the new legislature, acting as a National Assembly, provided that neither force nor fraud has been used; . . .

5. That at the expiration of General Russell's tour of duty in Haiti, and in any such event not before the inauguration of the permanent President, the office of High Commissioner be abolished and a non-military Minister appointed to take over his duties; . . .

6. That whether or not a certain loss of efficiency is entailed, the new Minister to Haiti be charged with the duty of carrying out the early Haitianization of the services called for in the declaration of the President of the United States above recommended;

7. That, as the commission found the immediate withdrawal of the marines inadvisable, it recommends their gradual withdrawal in accordance with arrangements to be made in future agreement between the two governments;

8. That the United States limit its intervention in Haitian affairs definitely to those activities for which provision is made for American assistance by treaty or by specific agreement between the two governments;

9. That the new Minister be charged with the duty of negotiating with the Haitian government further modifications of the existing treaty and agreements providing for less intervention in Haitian domestic affairs and defining the conditions under which the United States would lend its assistance in the restoration of order or maintenance of credit.

The Press Today
A New Series by
Oswald Garrison Villard

UNDER the above title Mr. Villard will inaugurate in THE NATION of April 16 a series of articles of unusual interest and importance to both the professional and the lay reader.

During the last decade the evolution of the press has been proceeding at an accelerated pace toward operating efficiency. But during this time there has been no corresponding improvement in the character of news-reporting, and no agency has been born to insure the public against the dangers inherent in the increasing capitalistic control of the daily papers.

Long in contemplation, these articles rank among the most timely and authoritative ever to come from Mr. Villard's pen. Due to his well known command of the subject, there has been an increasingly insistent demand for such a series, and he has now consented to begin it at once. The first four titles will be:

April 16—The Associated Press (No. 1)
April 23—The Associated Press (No. 2)
May 7—The United Press
May 21—The Chain Daily and What It Connotes

A mine of vital information, illustrated by a wealth of anecdote, is here thrown open to Nation readers. Immediate return of the coupon will enable us to start your subscription with the opening of the series—April 16.

THE CENSUS ENUMERATOR that ran into a woman who hadn't spoken to her husband for thirty-two years—"and I'm damned if I'll speak to him now for you or anybody else"—was matched by the other one that turned in only thirty-two names after a whole day's work because the women insisted on telling her all their troubles and she hadn't the heart to break away. The public has been so thoroughly warned against the fake census racketeer, whatever that strange animal may be, that the genuine enumerator finds it necessary to wear dog-proof puttees. Ever since Augustus sent all the world home to be taxed, people have regarded the census-taker with a certain suspicion as maybe the precursor of fresh ills to come. When we consider the World War, Uncle Andy Mellon, Reed Smoot, last winter's daily bulletin from Little America, the present race of world's-champion pugilists, and all the other orms of taxation without representation, we sympathize with their feeling. Yet if we are not counted how can we brag how many of us there are? For ourselves, then, we hall cheerfully answer not only the twenty-nine impertinent general questions that a prying Uncle Sam has devised, but lso the thirteen queries he is directing to our being out of job. We wonder who slipped those last ones over on a Republican Administration.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS BILL (Senate Joint Resolution 49), creating a government corporation for the operation of the great power plant on the Tennessee River, was passed by the Senate on April 4 by a vote of 45 to 23, after a brief debate in which Senator Norris put into the record additional information about the crooked lobbying that has been done against the measure. The bill provides for the building of another great dam at Cove Creek, Tennessee, on the Clinch River, 300 miles from Muscle Shoals, practically doubling the capacity of the enterprise at the latter point and making possible a development of nearly 450,000 firm horse-power. If the House passes the bill, as is expected, we shall face an interesting situation. President Hoover is opposed to "the operation by the government of either power or manufacturing business except as an unavoidable by-product of some other major public purpose." Will his devotion to this principle cause him to veto a bill twice passed by Congress? His position is not made easier by the existing public knowledge of the shameless activities of his handy-man, Claudius H. Huston, chairman of the Republican National Committee, in lobbying against the bill.

WHEN IS A MONOPOLY not a monopoly? When it belongs to the Secretary of the Treasury, and when an inconvenient Attorney General is promoted to the Supreme Court. If you don't believe it ask the Federal Trade Commission, which on April 4 dismissed all monopoly complaints against the Aluminum Company of America, Mr. Mellon's concern that owns or controls all the bauxite deposits in the United States, produces something like 95 per cent of our virgin sheet aluminum, owns 36 per cent of the stock of the Aluminum Goods Company, our biggest manufacturer of aluminum goods, and all the stock of the United States Aluminum Company, our next-largest producer, not to speak of various other unconsidered trifles like 75 per cent of the stock of the American Body Company and 89 per cent of that of the Aluminum Die Castings Corporation. When that honest lawyer Harlan F. Stone was Attorney General he proceeded against the company for violating the consent decree of 1912, finding that, controlling the raw material and enjoying high protection, it controlled the price of sheet aluminum. When Mr. Stone left the Cabinet for the Supreme Court, his great successor John J. Sargent forgot all about aluminum, and William D. Mitchell has not happened to think about it yet. Now comes this reassuring decision by the Trade Commission, just three days after argument before that body was concluded. We are glad to know that the Aluminum Company is not a monopoly; we had supposed it was.

UNEMPLOYMENT has commanded widespread attention during the past ten days. President William Green of the American Federation of Labor surprised the Senate Commerce Committee by testifying that unemployment among federation members had never fallen below 9 per cent during the past twenty-seven months, and that it had this winter reached a peak of 22 per cent. He urged a federal employment service, special counsel and training for workers displaced by technological change, job analysis to keep places open for older workers, and long-time planning of public works. He declared that revolution might well be the alternative to unemployment insurance under non-union conditions. Governor Roosevelt of New York, in a rather notable message, calls attention to the "accumulation of unemployment" due to seasonal and cyclical business fluctuations and technological changes. In appointing a committee to develop plans of stabilization he emphasizes the possibilities of cooperation of government and industry. Meanwhile the Senate Finance Committee has reported favorably Senator Wagner's bills providing for the better collection and publication of unemployment statistics and for creating what is popularly called a "prosperity reserve" in the building of public works, with a maximum annual appropriation of $150,000,000. His third bill, creating a federal employment agency, has not yet been reported. Despite the President's lamentable lack of leadership, the existing emergency is thus driving us slowly in the right direction, though nobody yet boldly advocates unemployment insurance, which of course is an essential of any thoroughgoing program under private industry.

INSTEAD OF THE $555,000 requested by President Hoover, Congress made a deficiency appropriation of only $195,000, it will be recalled, to stop the slow starvation of Indian children in reservation schools during the rest of the school year. The amount, though inadequate, will give some relief to the hungry children, but only if promptly used by the Indian Bureau. Next year's fight is now on in the Senate Appropriations Committee. In order to make possible the Hoover standard (surely a modest one) of 37.8 cents (against the 20 cents of the Burke-Meritt regime) per child per day for food and $42.20 per year for clothing, appropriations of $475,000 for food and $370,000 for clothing in excess of last year's allowances will be necessary. Certain Senators have given notice of their intention to fight, if need be, for these items. It is to be hoped that they will stand by their guns, and that they will have the unwavering support of the Indian Bureau against Representative Cramton if he attempts to continue longer the national disgrace of letting these children go naked and hungry.

CENSORSHIP IN MASSACHUSETTS is two words less absurd than it used to be. After a long fight certain citizens in the Bay State who feel strong enough to meet even a so-called dirty word without flinching have brought about an important change in the censorship law. That famous law, which has kept Massachusetts pure and the rest of the world amused, formerly condemned "a book . . . containing obscene, indecent, or impure language." It now condemns a book "which is obscene, indecent, or impure." The Citizens' Committee for the Revision of the Book Law tried to insert before the word "obscene" the words "considered as a whole," but were unsuccessful. Massachusetts still has many words to go before censorship will disappear completely from its borders, but at least we may hope to be spared in future the sorry spectacle of seeing such works as "An American Tragedy" and "Strange Interlude" barred from "the hub of the universe."

THE NEWS FROM HAITI is not wholly reassuring. An Associated Press dispatch of April 2 brought the welcome tidings that Dr. George Freeman, head of the Service Technique, whose tactlessness was the occasion of the December outbreak, had been recalled and expected to leave Haiti on April 10. The same dispatch, however, reported that the Nationalist group led by J. Jolibois, which stood with the others in support of the commission's plan, has now requested the withdrawal of General Russell at once and the immediate ending of the Occupation. President Borno, meanwhile, continues his efforts to dynamite the commission's work, and in consequence, the Associated Press reported on April 4, General Russell has issued an order that the President can send no telegraph messages except those that have been approved in writing by the High Commissioner—an interesting example of the actual location of power under the decree of martial law put into effect last January. Leaders of the patriotic group are reported, however, as believing that things are going well and that President Borno's efforts will fail. Nevertheless the situation needs close watching.

GANDHI HAS MADE SALT in India and by his act inaugurated the long-awaited campaign of civil disobedience. He set out from Ahmedabad on March 12 and after a march of 200 miles reached Dandi, a small town on the Gulf of Cambay. Early on April 6, almost eleven years after the massacre at Amritsar, Gandhi waded into the sea and filled an earthen jug with sea water to be heated for the manufacture of salt. In challenging the government monopoly of salt Gandhi has chosen a simple and clear-cut issue. A tax on salt is indefensible in any case since it works a greater hardship on the poor than on any other class. In India, where according to one estimate the number of persons living below the margin of subsistence is never less than 40,000,000, the situation is further aggravated politically by the fact that soon after the war the government of India in order to prevent a deficit in the budget, doubled the salt tax by fiat after the Legislative Assembly had voted agains such action. So far the government has refrained from arresting Gandhi, though it has arrested many of his asso ciates and even his son. But the news from India, which has increased greatly in volume, is filled with riots and rumors of riots. In the past, reports from India have too often been unsatisfactory both as to reliability and as t emphasis. In the present crisis some of the dispatches seem to reflect the political sympathies of the reporters. Neve was there greater need of unprejudiced reporting.

ANOTHER INDEPENDENT WEEKLY, the Iris Statesman, has succumbed to financial difficulties an changing taste. Founded in 1923 largely with the aid o American friends of Sir Horace Plunkett, it traveled from the first a hard financial road, until at last a costly libe suit and the loss of subscribers through its stalwart oppos tion to a censorship bill ended its career. While it laste it was easily the most distinguished organ of free and en lightened opinion that Ireland possessed. For that its bri liant editor, George Russell (Æ), was chiefly responsibl Russell made the Irish Statesman not only the organ of cooperative movement which revolutionized the Irish dair industry, but also the friend and exponent of the school

Irish writers which numbers W. B. Yeats and J. M. Synge among its distinguished names. He was too reasonable, however, to be a partisan, and while he gave his powerful support to the treaty which ushered in the Irish Free State, it was always for a large and generous attitude toward politics that he pleaded. Something of jealousy of his intellectual distinction, his moderation, and his fame undoubtedly showed itself as time went on and a younger group of writers, artists, and men of affairs forged to the front.

THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS worth of hate is for sale cheap in London. J. Hartley Manners, English playwright, who died a year ago, bequeathed $3,000 to the Royal General Theatrical Fund of London on condition that two of his plays, both of them violently anti-German, should be given annually for at least six years at benefit performances in the Drury Lane Theater. According to his own words, the bequest was made in order that "the remembrance of the atrocities committed by the Germans on the English people be kept alive at least for that period." We are glad to record that the Royal General Fund has turned down the offer. An English ship captain who died recently provided that all his savings be used for the benefit of German sailors; the German author of the "Hymn of Hate" has regretted his words publicly; a British naval officer not long ago received cordially in England the U-boat commander who had torpedoed his ship and gallantly rescued him and his crew; German students may once more study at Oxford as Rhodes scholars; the common soldiers who fought each other have compared notes and found out that war is one part insanity and three parts mud and terror. The persistent malice of Manners's bequest, made eleven years after 1918, is equaled only by Whitney Warren with his insistence on an angry inscription at Louvain.

COSIMA WAGNER GONE? It is true that for years Bayreuth has no longer known her dominating personality, yet that determined figure seems indissolubly connected with the great music festival which she and her husband founded in the days when the world was still skeptical of the "Master." To Richard Wagner she went from her husband Hans von Bülow, just as her mother had left the Count D'Agoult for Franz Liszt. The latter's daughter could hardly be less than musical and a strong character. In and out of wedlock she was an able wife for Wagner. She even bore with adequate composure his biting sneers at her father, whom he once accused of "rendering service only in fingering for piano-playing." When Wagner died she entirely dominated the scene, pushing her musically untrained and ungifted son Siegfried to the front and insisting so strongly upon all her rights and royalties as to earn an unenviable name abroad. Yet as late as 1896 Bayreuth barely covered its expenses. Especially in connection with "Parsifal" was malign influence attributed to her. As Lilli Lehmann recorded in her memoirs, Cosima Wagner herself laid violent hands upon "Parsifal" in 1883, entirely changing it, and thereafter "depended solely on her own wishes and taste." Often her interference and her personal "breaking-in" of great and experienced artists drove them to despair or flight. Yet when all is said and done people might dislike but finally they came to respect the daughter of a great talent and the wife of a genius.

Conscription

ON April 1 the House of Representatives resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the conscription of men and money in war time. This is merely another milestone in the ten-year-old argument that has been occupying the Committee on Military Affairs and the American Legion and plaguing those members of the citizenry who oppose conscription by whatever name it is called. The resolution in question the other day was one introduced by Representative Snell providing for the creation of a commission to "study and consider the feasibility of equalizing the burdens and to minimize the profits of war, together with a study of policies to be pursued in event of war, so as to empower the President immediately to mobilize all the resources of the country." With several minor amendments and one very important one, the resolution passed.

Proponents of the measure divided themselves into two camps: those who said the resolution would eliminate that naughty and unpopular fellow, the war-profiteer, and those who said it was perfectly meaningless and harmless and therefore they proposed to vote for it. Those who opposed it pointed out that whereas the alleged purpose of the measure was to provide some means for placing the burdens of war upon capital as well as labor, actually it did nothing of the kind. The Constitution of the United States provides that the government may not confiscate property without just compensation. Therefore the idea of conscripting capital in war time—without, of course, compensation—is clearly unconstitutional. The burden of conscription would, accordingly, fall upon labor, and capital would be left to its own devices. At this point in the discussion Representative Huddleston of Alabama introduced his important amendment to the bill, which was passed by only 123 votes to 120. The amendment provided that the commission "shall not consider and shall not report upon the conscription of labor."

Debate on the resolution provided some very elegant Congressional oratory. Gentlemen who frankly looked forward to the next war and wished to prepare for it gave place to gentlemen who remembered that there was in existence a Kellogg pact to outlaw war; gentlemen who talked vaguely about conscripting capital were reminded not only that capital cannot, by the Constitution, be conscripted, but that capital has a way of protecting itself in emergencies of this sort, mainly at the expense of labor. On the whole the discussion was highly illuminating. It disclosed that there were men in the House willing to consider favorably the idea, as Mr. Huddleston said, of permitting the government to seize "upon a workingman whether a farmer or a mechanic or whatever he may be" and put him to work for a private industry at a soldier's pay so that the owner of the industry might make a profit out of his labor. But others vigorously opposed so thoroughly un-American a procedure. It is evident that a body of opposition to a conscription law exists and will be heard. The resolution, as amended to exclude labor, is meaningless. But let no one suppose that therefore the idea of universal conscription of men, if not actually of money, is dead and need not be guarded against. Loose talk about prohibiting war profits must not be allowed to confuse the issue. Conscription is still a menace.

The Power Trust and the Indians

THE best site in the United States for the production of cheap power in large quantities is about to fall into the capacious maw of the power trust. As the Senate passes the Norris bill for public operation of the Muscle Shoals plant, which with auxiliary steam can produce some 450,000 horse-power, the Federal Power Commission is on the point of handing over to the Rocky Mountain Power Company the five great sites on the Flathead River, in western Montana, where it is possible to develop 214,000 units of primary power without auxiliary plant of any kind. The circumstances of the proposed lease, unhappily shrouded in secrecy, demand the most rigid scrutiny; and President Hoover, Secretary Wilbur, Commissioner Rhoads of the Indian Bureau, and Assistant Commissioner Scattergood, if they are to safeguard their own reputations as capable public servants, must act with the greatest care.

Owing to particularly favorable natural conditions, notably natural storage and uniform flow, the Flathead sites, the third-largest water power in the United States, which are owned by the Flathead Indians, offer extraordinary opportunities for cheap power provided a near-by market can be developed. Site Number 1 controls the flow at the lower sites; all five must be leased and operated as a unit. There are two bidders. One is the Rocky Mountain Power Company, a subsidiary of the Montana Power Company, controlled by the great Electric Bond and Share Company and intimately related to that Montana giant, the Anaconda Copper Company. The other is Walter H. Wheeler, a Minneapolis engineer whose financial support is not a matter of public record. Mr. Wheeler proposes to use all five sites provided he can develop a market, as he is confident he can, thus producing 214,000 horse-power and paying the Indians $1.12½ per horse-power, or $240,750 a year. The Rocky Mountain Power Company proposes to develop only site Number 1 and that only to the extent of about two-thirds its capacity, or 68,000 horse-power, for which it will pay $1 per horse-power, or $68,000 a year, a little more than one-fourth of the Wheeler offer. Assistant Commissioner Scattergood has declared that neither bid represents by any means the full value of the power. Mr. Wheeler professes his ability, if granted a permit, to secure contracts for the industrial use in the immediate vicinity of the plant of power which he proposes to sell at $15 per horse-power per year, the lowest rate in the United States, thus bringing about the development of a great electro-metallurgical and fertilizer industry for which he declares great stores of material are readily available in the adjoining section of Montana. The Rocky Mountain Power Company, that is, the Montana Power Company, on the other hand, proposes to transmit the power 140 miles to Anaconda, where it will be merged into its general power system. Company officials express a doubt whether they will develop more than site Number 1, as they have sources other than Flathead more advantageously located with reference to their existing system. In fact, they now have 200,000 undeveloped horse-power in reserve, enough to take care of the increase of consumption at the present rate for the next twenty years. Under these conditions it is charged, with great show of reason, that the real purpose of the power company is to get hold of the Flathead sites, thus preventing competition with its own system and especially preventing the development of an electro-metallurgical and chemical industry that will compete with the Anaconda.

There is no space to go into the history of the negotiations leading to the present situation, in which the Federal Power Commission, without any adequate public explanation, proposes to award an enormously valuable lease, not to the highest but to the lowest bidder, on terms that appear no less than downright spoliation of the Indians who own the sites. The power company, by the use of funds which it proposes to charge to the development cost of the project, with the active aid of Superintendent Coe of the Flathead agency organized a so-called Flathead Indian Association, a group of 20 Indians out of 3,000, which in opposition to the authorized tribal council urges the acceptance of the power-company bid. This association has been defended by Representative Cramton on the floor of the House. Assistant Commissioner Scattergood began in November with a brilliant defense of the rights of the Indians. His later course has been hard to understand, and his present position is by no means wholly clear to the public. Mr. F. E. Bonner, executive secretary of the Federal Power Commission, is charged with having prejudged the case on an incorrect statement of fact.

We make no suggestion of corrupt motives against any of the actors in this remarkable drama. We do not urge acceptance of the Wheeler bid; we feel strongly that there is much in the situation that needs clarification, and that under the present circumstances no permit should be granted to anyone. There is no reason whatever for haste and every reason for deliberate procedure. The President of the United States favors the development of our water power by private enterprise; he must therefore guard himself against every suggestion of favoritism to the huge financial interests that stand to profit by his policies. His Secretary of the Interior should be on the alert to protect him. If there are adequate reasons for the lease, which on its face appears thoroughly indefensible, surely they can be made clear to that great body of citizens like ourselves whose only interest is the welfare of the Indians and the public. Unless and until those reasons are made clear neither President Hoover, who is fundamentally responsible, nor Secretary Wilbur, who is his active agent, nor Commissioners Rhoads and Scattergood who are the guardians of Indian rights, nor the Montana delegation in House and Senate, who will bear a heavy responsibility for what is done, nor the Montana Power Company itself can afford to incur the risk of odium that will attend the making of this lease today. Why does not Mr. Wilbur forthwith rid the Power Commission of that incubus Secretary Bonner, and send him back to the power companies who recommended him? Failing that, let some Senator come forward and sponsor the Kvale resolution postponing the making of any lease at all until it can be done by a reorganized power commission in whose knowledge and purpose there can be unqualified public confidence. And let Congress pass the resolution without delay.

The Palestine Report

BRITISH royal commissions rarely make reports that satisfy everybody, and there should be no surprise that the report of the Shaw Commission on the disturbances last August in Palestine evokes some hostile comments from Zionists. Judging from the summary of the report which has been cabled to this country, the commission has taken much pains in collecting evidence, and in apportioning responsibility has made every effort to be fair.

The primary cause of the August outbreak, as the commission sees it, is in "the Arab feeling of animosity and hostility toward the Jews, consequent upon the disappointment of their political and national aspirations and fear for their economic future." The Arabs cherish the twofold fear "that by Jewish immigration and land purchase they may be deprived of their livelihood and in time pass under the political domination of the Jews." The particular incident that led to the outbreak was the Jewish demonstration at the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem on August 15, but to this are to be added, as inciting influences, the activities of rival societies, "exciting and intemperate articles" in Arabic and Hebrew newspapers and in a Jewish paper published at London, propaganda among the less-educated Arabs, inadequate forces of military and police, and apprehension of political influences in the decisions of the Palestine government. Fundamentally, however, the difficulty appears to be economic and political rather than racial or religious.

To meet the economic difficulty, the report urges a restriction of Jewish immigration to a point which shall accord with "the economic capacity of Palestine to absorb new arrivals," and the development, with the aid of scientific inquiry, of better agricultural methods so as to provide for a larger population. In spite of ordinances intended to protect small landowners, large sales of land between 1921 and 1929 have left many Arabs without land and with no alternative lands available. "No criticism," the report declares, "can be levied against the Jewish land companies in respect to these transactions," but the practical effect has been to create "a landless and discontented class" which constitutes "a potential danger to the country."

Politically, the difficulties in the situation have to do with the desire of the Arabs for self-government and the policy of Great Britain as a mandatory Power. The commission regrets that the Arab leaders did not accept the offer of a legislative council made in 1922, but it recognizes that the Arabs "are united in a demand for a measure of self-government" and that resentment over continued failure "is greatly aggravating the difficulties of local administration." As for Great Britain, the report stresses the importance of a clear statement, to be issued "with the least possible delay," of the policy which the British government proposes to pursue in Palestine, particularly in regard to the provisions of the mandate safeguarding the rights of non-Jewish communities. Such a statement appears to be forecast in the declaration of Prime Minister MacDonald in the House of Commons, on April 3, that it is "the firm resolve" of the British government to "do equal justice to all sections of he population of Palestine," and that to the discharge of hat duty "it will apply all the resources at its command."

Virtue in Cans

MR. WILL HAYS, Moses of the Movies, has gone his illustrious prototype several better, for he has just descended from his own particular Sinai (located at 469 Fifth Avenue) with no less than twenty-one commandments intended for the guidance of the Children of Hollywood. Among other things the new code provides:

1. That crimes against law shall never be presented in such a way as to throw sympathy with the crime as against law and justice. (Note. Law and justice are assumed to be inevitably the same. The Boston Tea Party is ruled out.)

2. Revenge in modern times shall not be justified as a motive. (Note. "Modern times" probably lets "Hamlet" in.)

3. The use of liquor in American life shall be restricted to the actual requirements of characterization or plot. (Note. Whatever that may mean.)

4. Scenes of passion shall not be introduced when not essential to the plot. (Note. Whatever that may mean.)

5. Ministers of religion in their character of ministers of religion shall not be used as comic characters or as villains. (Note. The New Art of the Movies being what it is, it is obviously inadvisable to suggest that there may be such a thing as hypocrisy. Those who pretend to be good are good.)

6. The history, institutions, prominent people, and citizenry of other nations shall be represented fairly. (Note. We sell our films almost everywhere. Bolsheviks need not be considered as "people." In case of war all citizens of the enemy country automatically become villains and sadists.)

Mr. Hays is so transparently simple-minded that it is hardly worth while to accuse him of deliberately using virtue for commercial purposes, but whether he happens to be in on the game or merely a tool in the hands of others the fact remains that he always manages to strike the proper attitude—the one, that is to say, which surrenders every right to every sincerity while promising to respect all the prejudices of every convention. Some years ago the industry discovered that suggestiveness and sensation were necessary to its profits but that truth and consistency were not. Accordingly it invented the perfect formula—five reels of transgression followed by one reel of retribution; it hired Mr. Hays to consecrate that formula; and Mr. Hays has been busy at his task ever since. Obviously it is now the job of the directors to stay within the letter of his law without ceasing to be as lurid, as salacious, and as tawdry as the audience demands. And to judge by their achievements of the past there is little reason to doubt that they will succeed magnificently.

We are willing to leave aside all questions of art and its duty to comment upon life as the artist sees it. We should, however, like to point to the results already achieved by Mr. Hays's method. He has proposed above all to keep the movies sexually clean, and yet there was never any form of artistic expression which was so completely drenched with sex. The suggestion of everything which he has attempted to suppress has diffused itself through every scene, and the mind of the audience is encouraged to play about every idea that cannot be stated. Perhaps if an occasional film "justified adultery" or admitted that otherwise respectable girls sometimes have illegitimate children it would not be necessary for every film to deal with seduction arrested at the bedside.

NOBODY can touch unemployment in any of its phases without finding that there is one step in government ownership which should be taken as soon as possible. There should be no such thing as a private employment agency. To a certain extent I am waiving the fact that some of them are dishonest. I refer chiefly to those handling unskilled labor and supplying men for railroad construction gangs and similar enterprises. The crooked ones are probably in a great minority, but I have heard a sufficient number of stories to be convinced that certain agencies are active in fomenting a labor turnover.

But with the best intentions in the world and the highest degree of efficiency, it seems to me that unemployment affects the life of the nation so directly that the nation cannot afford to neglect making this its own private and exclusive business. There are plenty of voters still who do not favor municipal ownership of public utilities. However, we have gone past the day in which it was the custom to scream "Communism" at the suggestion of a city-operated subway. If it is considered rational for the city to move the workers from their homes to their jobs it seems to me wholly logical that this same city should manifest a concern about finding a job for the individual to be transported.

Moreover, the matter of unemployment falls not unreadily under the scope of public health. It is not fantastic to contend that poverty is a disease and far more catching than smallpox. It seems to me just as useful to send city employment agents to the bread line as to rush doctors with vaccine to a stricken tenement. Most of my information comes from Mr. William Ross, with whom I have been working in a study of a single New York City bread line—that maintained by contributions to the Little Church Around the Corner, of which Dr. Randolph Ray is rector. This seems to be one of the few churches in the city which have really taken any very active interest in working to alleviate the conditions caused by unemployment. The various ministers who were extremely busy in urging on recruiting in the last war have been singularly silent in the matter of calling the community to the hiring line.

Mr. Ross, who was an organizer in the American Federation of Labor strike in Marion, North Carolina, has made inquiries among the bread liners as to their political philosophy. He is shocked to find that for the most part they have none. Even the seasonal workers, whose plight seems palpably the product of a vicious and inefficient system, have no complaint to make. "Bad breaks" suffices to comfort the ego of most of them even though it cannot feed and clothe them.

Until I talked with jobless men I never realized how thoroughly America has been sold on the theory that there is a direct boulevard even from the bottom to the very top of the economic heap. All but the oldest men in the job line are hopeful. They have had bad luck for a few months, or a year, but the turn may come at any moment. It's all part of a game which they accept without much resentment. Of course the line is filled with unfounded legends as to the antecedents of some of the liners. I was told in all seriousness that doctors and lawyers were waiting for the daily dole and that one of the men in the ranks had been a millionaire in the long ago. For these stories I could find no confirmation.

Of course some of the unemployed are a little cautious when anybody talks to them about communism. They have a feeling that possibly it is an effort to pin something on them. Yet even when their confidence is gained they manifest no knowledge of any of the left-wing movements and very little interest. One did state that he felt the Communists were right in a few things but much too radical. Good old standpat Republicanism does not by any means disappear at the first pinch of adversity. One old gentleman without a shirt to his name was very stuffy in his attitude toward trade unions and the reds. He never did quite say, "If they don't like it here why don't they go back where they came from?" but it was not far from the tip of his tongue.

Yet on the whole one finds small trace of acute class consciousness of any sort in the line. Very hungry and dispirited men seem poor tinder for the revolutionary urge. Still, one can't escape the feeling that the Communists are doing a rotten poor job in propagandizing the unemployed. I rather think that their violence on irrelevant subjects is to some extent a defensive mechanism to cover up inefficiency. Thus I read in Revolutionary Age, Mr. Lovestone's organ: "It is entirely natural that of all the New York papers Heywood Broun's liberal New York Telegram should be the loudest and most virulent in the demand that the arrested Communists should be railroaded to jail with the speed of the most powerful locomotive. This is the role of liberalism in a show-down. The Brouns and their philosophies are only symbols of capitalist decay and degeneracy. Let the workers be on guard . . . especially against their soft, sweet, 'clever' words, which are only a mask for capitalist brutality!"

Aside from the fact that none of that is true it all seems a singularly trite theme. I'll give a silver dime to each and every Communist faction in New York, no matter what it costs me, if anybody can prove that I ever urged railroading Communists to jail. Of course it isn't my Telegram. That's a Communist gift. And the Telegram has not been in any sense a red-baiter. But if the charge against me were true I think it would be singularly small matter from the point of view of anybody intent upon world revolution.

Here in America communism lies in sterile hands. Aside from Michael Gold and Max Eastman, I don't know anybody connected with any of the various warring groups with a capacity for writing forceful and simple English. Communism has not been able to adapt itself to the vernacular of the masses. I watched handbills being sent along the bread line in which unfortunate, hungry, and unskilled workers were asked to disarm "the fascisti of the bosses." Nobody in that line could have disarmed a fascist because there was no one whom I saw who even knew what the word meant. The revolution stands in bitter need of a red Ring Lardner.

HEYWOOD BROUN

The Press Today

I. The Associated Press[*]

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

NO more than a river can the stream of news rise higher than its source. For the Associated Press the sources within the United States are its members, except where it has established its own bureaus in the leading cities with special reporting staffs. Thus in all places where it cannot maintain its own correspondents it calls upon each member newspaper for all the local news which that member has gathered. The member cannot sell that news to other news services, and must hold itself in readiness to supply as much or as little news of a given event in its territory as the Associated Press may desire. Each member must print on its masthead in its every issue this legend: "The Associated Press is exclusively entitled to the use for republication of all news dispatches credited to it or not otherwise credited in this paper, and also the local news of spontaneous origin published herein." The stream of the Associated Press's news must, therefore, reflect the intelligence, the taste, the integrity, the news and business standards of its members—it cannot rise any higher. If its standards have sunk seriously in the last thirty years, this is in response to the changing methods and ethics of its 1,250 members. Its best feature is that it is not a money-making concern, but a cooperative, non-profit-making organization, incorporated as a membership society under the laws of New York State. But its strength is its great weakness as we shall see, for the fact that it is a cooperative organization puts it at the mercy of the mass psychology of its members.

A member can be admitted only by a vote of the directors, who do not confer a franchise, as is so commonly believed, but merely elect the new member to receive that form of service which, in accordance with his means, he seeks to obtain. Thus, the daily news report varies from a few hundred words for the smallest members to 75,000 words in the larger centers. In a single normal week recently the news report amounted to 2,562,715 words, excluding the figures of bond- and stock-market prices. To collect and distribute this news—at a cost in 1929 of about $10,000,000—the Associated Press has no less than 3,300 employees. If the staffs of the Associated Press newspapers should be counted in, the association could legitimately claim that about 80,000 persons were gathering its news every day of the year, every hour in the twenty-four. Plainly it has become one of the most powerful engines for the creation of public opinion in the world. Together with its rivals, the United Press and the International News, or Hearst Service, it supplies all the newspapers of the country. Its standards, its integrity, its leadership, its attitude toward the great political and economic issues of the day become, therefore, of the utmost importance to everyone who believes that the safety of American institutions depends upon there being a correctly informed and intelligent electorate. If the service is biased or unfair it is obvious that tremendous damage can be done. As it is, the very fact that in the smaller cities and the rural districts it must rely upon its members for accounts of local happenings, places it at the mercy of their reporting.

Thus, if there are labor troubles in Pennsylvania or in the Southern States, the news is affected by the bias of the local Associated Press dailies, unless the issue becomes one of such magnitude that a special correspondent is sent to the scene; even he will have to rely upon member help if there is a large territory to be covered. Since the newspapers of the great industrial towns of Pennsylvania are usually controlled, directly or indirectly, through advertising or ownership, by the large capitalists, it is obvious that in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred their reports will represent the view of the employing class, just as, if there were a group of labor dailies in the Associated Press in a given territory, its news from that section would inevitably reflect the labor point of view. To illustrate: In the steel strike of 1919 the press of Pittsburgh sided entirely with the employers; scarcely a reference to the strikers' actual demands can be found in the columns of the five newspapers that were the Pittsburgh members of the Associated Press during the strike period. Their whole stress was upon the pestiferous foreign laborer and radicalism, with frequent charges of bolshevism. Actually in only one issue out of four hundred did an article appear which described the scandalous violations of American liberties and of the federal Constitution by local authorities, and the arrest of many men merely for daring to exercise that right to free assembly guaranteed by the Constitution. Naturally the public, either in or out of Pittsburgh, got little or no impression of this, despite the fact that the Associated Press had its own Pittsburgh bureau. Out of fifty-six clergymen in the city at that time, forty-four went on record as declaring that the newspapers were unfair to the strikers. But if anyone should allege that the Associated Press deliberately lent itself to any suppression of news, or misrepresentations during this strike, he would make a false statement. I believe that its highest officials were not conscious at that time of the character of the service they were rendering. It is, I repeat, a question of the news stream not rising higher than its source. The misfortune remains that in labor matters the Associated Press is too often dominated by the class tendency of its members.

Take another case: In the South there are no daily papers owned and operated by colored men, or any colored reporters employed by any daily or by any news service. All the news which gets out of the South comes from white reporters who record occurrences involving race friction with the bias of their race. Being a white man, the reporter of a lynching or the like must inevitably side with his crowd, for he would lose his job if he did not. The Negroes assert with reason that many injustices and many terrible events are often suppressed. They declare that nearly 9,000,000 blacks living in the South have no means of getting unbiased news to the American people, save through their own little-read papers North and South. The only Negro, they declare, who can reach the first page of the great dailies is the Negro criminal; if there is occasional recognition of a great Negro musician or scientist, it is usually with surpassing condescension, as one admires a reading horse or a trained seal. There are exceptions, of course, for there are editors like Gonzales in South Carolina, Breckinridge of Lexington, Kentucky, until lately Julian and Julia Harris in Columbus, Georgia, and a number of others who seek to do justice to every man irrespective of color; but the facts in general are as stated. If anyone doubts this I can supply him with an Associated Press report of the murder of some Negroes whose sole crime was that they tried to vote in Florida. Its local correspondent failed to inform it that men, women, and children were burned alive in this election trouble—a crime as horrible as was ever reported out of revolutionary Russia. It never carried this news. Again, the Associated Press was the medium of wholesale lying and crass misrepresentation in reporting some race troubles in Phillips County, Arkansas, which it portrayed to the American people as a "Negro rebellion," "of more than a local nature, possibly planned for the entire South." The simple truth was that a group of white men attacked a meeting of colored tenant farmers held under the guidance of a white attorney to formulate the innocent demand that they receive written settlements of their accounts from their white landlords. This was all there was to the Associated Press's rebellion—the facts being all established later before the Supreme Court of the United States. The Associated Press, however, never apologized for the wrong it had done, or rectified its error.

[*] This is the first of two articles on the Associated Press in a series of rticles on the American press. The second will appear in our next issue.—Editor The Nation.

I desire here, however, to stress that there are real and legitimate difficulties in the way of the Associated Press's reporting the troubles of the disfranchised and the disadvantaged. Its proper aim is to present actual news of events, not essays on given problems or situations. Hence, in cases like the recent strikes in North Carolina and Tennessee it carries only the dramatic event, such as a murder, or a "battle" between police and strikers, or the evidence in a sensational trial. It makes no effort to portray the actual condition in such social dramas. The public does not know that at Marion, North Carolina, at this writing, a thousand American-born workers and their children are living in tents and being maintained by philanthropy because they dared to strike against intolerable living conditions. The average laboring man who believes that our entire press is "kept," and its news services likewise, does not understand the technique of news reporting, or realize that no member of the Associated Press is compelled to print all or any part of the news furnished to it. It is a fact that the Associated Press is frequently blamed for its apparent failure to wire news which it actually did furnish, but which the recipient discarded. No reader can, therefore, be certain that a charge of suppression or omission lies against the Associated Press until he has seen what the service originally contained.

Finally, it must be remembered that those who are deeply engaged in causes are frequently the last ones able to gauge correctly the treatment they are receiving in the press. This applies just as much to those on the side of the larger battalions as to those who are battling for forlorn hopes or radical reforms. An interesting anecdote of the late President Taft is in place here. During the Pinchot-Ballinger controversy which ended so disastrously for him, Mr. Taft received many complaints from friends throughout the country that the Associated Press was not adequately reporting the Ballinger side of the case. To the head of the Washington bureau, John P. Gavit, Mr. Taft presented a pile of protests. But Mr. Gavit, being forewarned, had brought with him a similar pile of complaints from Mr. Pinchot and his friends. When the President had perused these he turned to Mr. Gavit in his kindly, good-natured way and said, "Well, if you are being scolded by both sides like that you must be about right in your reporting." The Associated Press has often felt reassured when it has been abused by both sides to a quarrel.

The most striking example, in the writer's own knowledge, of this is worth recording because of the light it throws upon the difficulties even an ideal news service would encounter. The Standard Oil case of 1908 attracted national attention. One of the foremost attorneys for the government, Mr. Frank B. Kellogg, subsequently United States Senator from Minnesota, Ambassador to Great Britain, and Secretary of State, wrote the following letter on October 29, 1908, to Mr. George Thompson of the St. Paul Dispatch:

> I am very busy these days taking testimony in the Standard Oil case. Your friend Melville E. Stone is controlled absolutely by the Standard Oil people. He will not, of course, send out any reports of the testimony that he is not obliged to, at least that is my opinion from all I have seen. I told Don Seitz of the World, and Hamlin of the Tribune, and the man on the Times, and they have had special men at the trial, and as you will see from the inclosed clippings they have published some of the testimony I have been bringing out. But from Chicago not a word came out against the Standard Oil. It is astonishing that that concern can control the Associated Press.

The writer of this article was chairman of a special committee of the Associated Press appointed to investigate this and other charges. It reported upon Mr. Kellogg's allegation by saying that "your committee is convinced that whatever the individual faults of reporting may have been or whatever attempts were made to color the reports nothing was carried during this long hearing which violated the integrity of the A.P. service." Mr. Kellogg was immediately compelled to retract his baseless charge against Mr. Stone under threat of suit for libel.

This case is illuminating also because it exemplifies the enormous difficulty of reporting which often confronts a news-gathering agency. There were ninety-five hearings in New York City alone, some interesting, many dull, tiresome, and extremely technical. It was a most difficult legal battle to record; a trained legal mind would often have found itself at a loss to report adequately to the public just what was going on. Not only are such cases peculiarly open to misunderstanding by partisans of either side, but they are frequently seriously affected by the headline writers, who often give a color and slant to the whole story which does the Associated Press great harm. The only wrongdoing brought out by the investigating committee in this case was that of a member of the Associated Press. Himself in the train of Standard Oil, he gave $300 to a reporter of the New York City News Association (an organization which has no connection with the Associated Press, but which is frequently confused with it), not, as he said, to corrupt the news, but to insure accuracy in reporting and justice for the Standard Oil.

That this man should promptly have been expelled from the Associated Press goes without saying. Indeed, its failure to discipline its members, or to set up any ethical standards to which they should conform, is one of its greatest weaknesses; here again the cooperative form of the society and the low moral standards of the entire press intervene, precisely as they did in the later case of William Randolph Hearst. For years the Associated Press carried on an action against Mr. Hearst because he had been guilty of "improper and unconscionable use of the memberships held in the complainant by representatives of the New York American, the San Francisco Examiner, and the Los Angeles Examiner." It would be impossible to frame a more complete indictment of a man than the Associated Press's portrayal of Mr. Hearst as a violator of its own by-laws and as a thief of its news, which he stole by fair means and foul. Yet when the Associated Press's contention was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States in a decision of far-reaching importance, establishing as it did a vital principle, namely, the right to ownership of news created by an individual or an agency, the Board of Directors lacked either the moral or business courage to rid their service of the Hearst connection.

Indubitably, no press association anywhere else undertakes to censor the journalistic morals of its patrons. But the Associated Press does impose certain standards of conduct upon its members besides refusing to permit them to sell the news delivered to them, or the local news which they originate. Thus, they are held rigidly responsible for releasing advance matter at the proper time, and are fined for any violations of instructions. They may be suspended or expelled for violation of the by-laws, though the latter step may be taken only after it is approved by four-fifths of the membership. Moreover, the Associated Press does not hesitate to punish its critics among its members. Thus, it fined the editor of the Philadelphia North American $300 for saying that an Associated Press cablegram had in all probability been written "in New York or Washington, and never was near an ocean cable." Later the Lancaster Intelligencer was made to apologize for the heinous offense of falsely charging that the Associated Press was "scooped" by another news service. If it can set up regulations and standards of conduct in cases like these it certainly seems incomprehensible that the Associated Press should have permitted a man to remain a member who had struck at its very integrity and had not hesitated at the use of any means to gain his end. It is the simple truth that a small newspaper doing these things would have been expelled; the Associated Press was afraid of Mr. Hearst's power, and the growing number of newspapers brought into his chain of dailies.

Here, again, we have an example of an inherent weakness due to the cooperative character of the service. It is only fair to point out, however, that in the field of reporting of political events the fact that the membership comprises both Republican and Democratic newspapers has helped to make its officials hold the scales even. In the many years that I have been familiar with its work, it never did better reporting than in the last Presidential election when, as far as I can ascertain, it was scrupulously fair to the Socialist candidate, precisely as it reported the La Follette campaign with evident desire to do complete justice. When it comes to reporting happenings in Washington, and to its relations to the Government of the United States, there is a different story to tell. But here the explanation is not so much the cooperative character of the organization as the false philosophy of the two men who are today the powerful influences in the Associated Press, Adolph S. Ochs, its leading director, and Frank B. Noyes, its president. But this must be left to a subsequent article.

British Budget Problems

By JAMES DUNBAR

Edinburgh, March 25

AS the financial year draws to a close it becomes possible to estimate with a fair degree of accuracy the likely trend of Mr. Snowden's budget. The latest returns of revenue indicate that the deficit on this year's accounts will not be so heavy as was anticipated even a month ago; while on the other hand the publication of the estimates of expenditure for 1930 makes clear the exact amount of the increase over the estimates for the current year. Certain loud protests that have been made against higher taxation should be discounted at the outset. Organizations like the Federation of British Industries, the National Union of Manufacturers, and the Income Tax Payers' Society are all interested in reductions of direct taxation and hey enter their warnings no matter which party holds the reins of government. Their protests this year may have been ouder than usual; but that is to be attributed to the fear hat the Labor Government intends to embark on costly ocial services. The Federation of British Industries, for example, issued recently a manifesto on taxation. Attention was drawn to the undoubted increase in unemployment and to the fall in prices during the past few months, and the assertion was made that "the limits of industry's taxable capacity have been reached."

It is necessary, however, to look at other objective facts than the figures of unemployment and prices. The statistics of income in the annual reports of the Inland Revenue show a different picture, and in relation to taxation are more accurate data to work upon than the data quoted by the federation. The following table shows for each year since 1923 the gross income from all sources, except weekly wages, which the Inland Revenue brought under review:

1923..............................	£2,584	millions
1924..............................	2,599	"
1925..............................	2,669	"
1926..............................	2,705	"
1927..............................	2,704	"
1928..............................	2,765	"

Throughout all these years there has been a great burden of unemployment and depression in the basic industries. Nevertheless, as the table shows, the gross income was nearly £200 millions higher at the end of the six years; and indeed it was higher in 1923 than in 1920 when the post-war trade boom was at its height and there was practically no unemployment.

These protestations of the F.B.I. and kindred bodies are to be taken as no more than public attempts to intimidate the Chancellor. How much Mr. Snowden is susceptible to these blandishments is of course another matter. The Hague negotiations last year left Mr. Snowden with a world-wide reputation for stern, unbending will; and it can be taken for granted that if he wanted money badly enough he would shrink from no measure of new or additional taxation. He has often given in speech and writing the surest indications of where he will seek more money for the purposes of government. He accepts the media of income tax, supertax, and death duties, and he would add but one shot to his locker, namely, the taxation of land values. He would not add to the tax burdens of the man of moderate income but rather would lighten them. He would tax investment income more heavily and steepen the rates of supertax and death duties.

In a pamphlet he wrote at the time of the general election last year, Mr. Snowden dealt plainly with these matters. Referring to the supertax he pointed out that 98,000 persons in 1927 had incomes over £2,000 a year, to a total of £568 millions; and that the supertax paid amounted to £58 millions. "There is a little margin left there," wrote Mr. Snowden, "for meeting the cost of some of the Labor Party's social schemes." Again, on the subject of the death duties, Mr. Snowden wrote that in 1927 estates valued at £511 millions paid duties amounting to £77 millions, and added, "There is scope there for some addition to the duties without reducing the heirs to a state of starvation." Since the war both Sir Austen Chamberlain and Mr. Churchill have increased the death duties, adding between them over £20 millions a year to the revenue. On the taxation of land values Mr. Snowden was more definite. He put the capital value of the land of Great Britain at £5,000 millions, and stated that "a tax of 3d. in the pound on that value would bring in a revenue of over £60 millions a year."

From these three sources Mr. Snowden would not find it difficult to get as much as £100 millions if he required it. Perhaps the F.B.I. believes that the Chancellor is going to seek such a sum this year. If they do they are very much mistaken. At The Hague Mr. Snowden made a determined stand for an extra £2 millions a year in Britain's share of reparations; and since he returned he has devoted a similar determination behind the scenes to the task of keeping down expenditure. There have been two main instances of that. The act extending the widows'-pensions scheme is not nearly so comprehensive as the previous declarations of the Labor Party foreshadowed. And the same can be said of the Unemployment Insurance Act. On both these measures the left wing of the party, led by Mr. Maxton, put up a strenuous fight for greater benefits than the government proposed. There were revolts and even talk of the expulsion of Mr. Maxton and his associates from the party. The important point here is that the rebels were met always with the same answer: the government cannot afford the money. Mr. Snowden's determination has won and the extent of his success is revealed in the recently published estimates of expenditure for the financial year 1930-31. Increases are recorded to the extent of £20 millions on certain social services; war pensions and some other accounts show a decrease of £4 millions, and there is a like decrease in the estimates for the navy, army, and air force combined. The net result then is that for social and defense services Mr. Snowden has been able to limit expenditure to an increase of £12 millions over the revised estimates for 1929.

There is no doubt that Mr. Snowden has been keeping the rein on expenditure for a very definite purpose which can be guessed. It is not that he desires to produce a popular budget. In 1924 he was fortunate enough to inherit a surplus of £48 millions from his predecessor and became doubly popular by giving relief from indirect taxes and imposing no new taxes. He may have disturbing recollections of that former budget, but today his mind is bent on a vastly different project. He has already paid much attention to the conversion of debt on favorable terms, and in the past few years Mr. Churchill has given him a great deal of worry over the sinking fund. On these points Mr. Snowden's mind is well known: he wants to strike at the huge burden of national debt, to provide an adequate and even increasing sinking fund, and thereby to reduce the enormous bill of £300 millions a year for interest.

Mr. Snowden's preoccupation with that problem was evident in 1924 when he appointed the Colwyn Committee to inquire and report upon the national debt and existing taxation. The committee, reporting in 1926, recommended that the sinking fund should be increased to £75 millions within five years, if necessary by additional taxation, and to £100 millions within a further seven to ten years. Unfortunately for these recommendations Mr. Churchill's dealings with the sinking fund in the past five years were most unsatisfactory; and for the current year the best he could do was to provide for £50 millions. It is certain that that sum is not enough for Mr. Snowden, and it may well happen that he will increase it to £62½ millions this year and then next year to the £75 millions of the Colwyn Committee.

For the past few months the Chancellor has been much baited in the House of Commons on the McKenna duties on motor cars and the safeguarding duties on lace, buttons, and a half-dozen other articles. He has persistently refused to declare his intentions on these duties. Deeply pledged to abolish them, he is, however, faced with a double problem in dealing with them at the present time. The unemployment figures mount up, and supporters of safeguarding keep repeating that to abolish the duties is to aggravate unemployment still further. More important, from the Chancellor's standpoint, is the revenue from the duties, estimated to be £32½ millions for the current year. That is no mean sum and with a deficit facing him, increased expenditure to meet and the sinking fund to be raised to an adequate figure, Mr Snowden can scarcely sacrifice £32½ millions of revenue.

There is one other contingency Mr. Snowden must have in mind. The doings of the government at home have caused profound disappointment among its supporters and in the country generally. Expectations were undoubtedly high and the performance has been meager. Mr. Snowden therefore, if he can afford to do little this year in the way of social services or of remitting indirect taxes, will have to revive drooping hopes by budgeting for a surplus at the end of 1930. If the Government is to stand a chance of being returned to office, it must have much more on the books to its credit than there is at the present moment.

The New Naturalism

By IRWIN EDMAN

THE new naturalism is as old at least as Lucretius, which is to say, as old as Democritus, or even older. Since labels are in order and to become a public possession an idea must first attach to itself an ism, a suffix, it is hereby proposed that naturalism be the name given to a point of view which, though it had its inception in the lucid and direct intelligence of the Greeks, has been forgotten enough in our time to have its mere revival regarded as a novelty.

It is here suggested, first, that it will provide that clarity and order in the search for which many of us are engaged among the confusions of our own day, and because of which we are ready to jump at the first shabby promise of a philosophy, even if that promise, in performance, turns out to be merely a flight to some alleged authority or decorum. It is here suggested that that clarity and integration can best be found not by fleeing nature or condemning it or bemoaning it, but (it is so simple, indeed, as to be almost banal) by starting with nature, by beginning, as somebody once said, with what we have and going on from where we are.

What have we then, and where are we, "in the middle of the road of our life," in terms which, granted the general intellectual setting of the twentieth century, we can with some degree of honesty accept? Well, whatever qualifications the new physics may have put into the twentieth-century version of nature, it is in a natural world that we have to conceive ourselves to be living, that is to say, a world with a structure that is, however complex in its details or in its operations, intelligible, a world whose general movement physics can describe and of which even the ayman with a paucity of physics can discern the hang. It s a system if not with any purpose at least with an order. There are no miracles in it, unless its wonderful variety, cope, and possibilities continually mounting be themselves regarded as miracles. Its stellar infinity may be a theme for cosmic amazement; its complexity artfully studied may yield us marvels of comfort, luxury, swiftness, ease, and conrol. It is the setting, the theater, and the material of ourelves; our nature is part of it, though cosmically an accident, geographically and temporally an incident in it.

So far from regarding nature as something hostile or alien or absurd, as was the sentimental fashion of he nineteenth century, or such echoes of it as we find in Bertrand Russell or Aldous Huxley or Joseph Wood Krutch's "Modern Temper" in the twentieth, we are inlined to regard it as being, like Jehovah, that that it is. And what it is, is the matrix and material of all our ideals nd the locus of all possible destinies. It is what we have, t is where we are. For this, too, is the modest recognition f the new naturalist, that the eyes with which he beholds ature are natural eyes, and that the mind with which he bserves or condemns or in imagination transfigures nature s itself a movement in and a flowering of it. The spirit which others would have contend against the flesh is itself simply the expression, luminous and climactic, of animal life, the flesh become radiant and subtle and consciously alive. Not birth but death is a sleep and a forgetting, yet before that somnolent oblivion there is much that may be done, imagined, and remembered. The memory may be extended, through history, to the beginning of the race and before; the imagination may compass more than generations through doing may translate into existence.

The naturalist is aware of the tragic frustrations and corruptions of the spirit by the flesh, by society, and by the world. But he knows that spirit is only the flesh articulate; he knows that society nourishes it and that it can find its only employment somehow and somewhere in the world. He is, therefore, less ready than spirits less conscious of the soil which alone nurtures them to disparage the body, to cry down society, to say farewell to the world. He hesitates to set up a dualism between the flesh and the spirit, between man's higher and lower nature, because he knows how deep in the flesh lie the foundations of those altitudes the spirit sometimes touches. He does not flee to an ivory tower of saintliness or aestheticism, since he is too aware of how much the language of his hopes and aspirations comes from his fellows for whom he could develop a dainty or an unctuous contempt. Nor can he come to disdain or to distrust that earth out of the colors and forms of which he has built his most unearthly paradise. He knows he is but a nostalgic stranger in heaven; he may be an angel looking homeward, but clay is his body, men and women his companions, and earth his home.

It is because he recognizes himself as thus "umbilical to earth" that the naturalist seeks to discover the morals implicit in, rather than to impose a morality upon, the nature of which his animal body is the expression. He is inclined to feel the pulse-beat of vitality in forces and impulses in him from which a mind debauched by genteel conventions might flee in horror. He cannot see what there is horrible or shameful or disintegrating about sex. He can see rather what horrors, shames, and disintegrations may follow upon the attempt to hide, ignore, or repress that vital energy. He knows how much the golden thread of physical love qualifies much that seems to have a subtler texture. He knows how much that glamorous energy contributes to the beauty of the world and his passion for it. And by the same token he respects, as a force to be reckoned with and as a material to be made much of, any impulse or vitality that animates the animal frame of any human creature. He will think twice before condemning any of those great natural drives out of the simple homely elements of which the most spiritual enthusiasms are ultimately derived and complicated.

It would be a want of understanding to suppose that the naturalist would therefore counsel anarchy or caprice as the goal of life. Order will be to him, as to any soul at peace or in search of it, a desideratum, but the order will be that of a harmony, not that of a regiment. It will be dictated by the scope of a possible music, by the given elements in his frame and in his world; it will not be an order imposed by authority for its own sake nor restraint for the negative satisfaction of saying "No." The art of life is a possible art, he realizes, though a difficult one, since the elements in it are so mercurial, in an individual so often at war, and since the individual has not only himself to war with.

Toward that harmonizing of himself within himself and of the society of selves the naturalist will welcome with already justified hope, rather than condemn with traditional dismay, those sciences, young but auspicious, which teach him to recognize and deal with the forces and energies at large in his own psyche and in the society by which his own psyche is conditioned. That a body of knowledge and a technique as young as psychoanalysis should have generated much quackery and much nonsense, he will be well aware. But he will respect its already demonstrated therapeutic value and realize those potentialities of integration which it brings to light. From it he has learned to think twice before hurling about epithets of abnormal and normal, perverse and sane, high or low. He has learned from it not simply to see the seamy side of nobility but the seeds of nobility in what the rough condemnatory language of tradition calls evil. But most of all he will have learned from the newer psychiatric sciences of psychology and psychoanalysis that the business of morals is that of the integrity or, better still, of the integration of character. And a large part of that technique by which a soul is rendered whole is its release from those deviousnesses and evasions, those repressions and shames, which prevent it from facing the realities of its self and its world with candor, generosity, and courage. An order that excludes half and the more urgent half of the energies by which men live and by whose drive they continue to care to live is a fraudulent peace.

It is indeed because, naturalistically regarded, the individual is himself so largely the expression of the society in which he lives that one becomes a little impatient of those who frame a moral code, a theory of criticism or of life, without reference to the social, economic, and educational conditions which make the soul, under any social order, characteristically what it is. The two forces now dominant, as writers as different as John Dewey and Stuart Chase constantly remind us, are science and the technology related to it, the machine. It is possible for a few spirits to flee from these, to live physically at some lovely "Fiesolan" distance and spiritually in some flight to the Middle Ages or to Greece, as if those forces and resources were not the dominant determinants of the character of the age and the lives of its contemporaries. But their peace will be half built on what they half forget, and there will be, inevitably, a tincture of revolt or disdain or despair in their quietistic raptures. Their joy will have the internal poison, moreover, of conscious irrelevance, as will even more profoundly that of those who try to bask in vanished sunlight and live as correctives, scolding, petulant, and doomed, in the midst of the contemporary world.

No. One cannot be at peace even with oneself in a society that is not in its whole organization, so intervolved are contemporary lives, at peace. It is not simply because he feels that some new war might wipe out for all eternity the fragments, lingering and lovely, of a dying civilization that the new naturalist feels it necessary to study—that he may help reasonably to control—the economic and scientific and industrial forces afoot in the world. It is because he is aware that the ordered (which is to say once more, the harmonized) life is socially conditioned that he wishes to face frankly the facts of science, machinery, industrial democracy, and internationalism to see what may be made of them. He has already had evidence enough of what science and the machine can do to the forms and to the formulas of our lives. The five-room apartment and the suburban bungalow, the radio, the airplane, and machine production have given him many goods cheaply, and have without his realizing it changed the whole matrix of his and of everyone's life. Part of the disorder in the contemporary soul is that persistent living "between two worlds, one dead, the other powerless to be born." A large part of the current disillusion or the endemic retreat into citadels of vanished authority comes from the fact that practically we are compelled, intellectually resigned, to live in the present world of science and the machine. But our imagination from childhood has been nourished on the ancient symbols, the antique creeds, the inherited beauties. We work in the twentieth century and dream in the twelfth; we are neighbors to the dynamo and we escape to a marble temple shining on an ancient Mediterranean hill.

A large part, indeed, of what passes for love of the classics and for the classical temper is simply a timid and uneasy refusal to let the imagination brood or play upon the contemporary scene. That form constitutes half of beauty, and the love of it half the aesthetic experience, there can be no doubt. And it is not surprising that a civilization comparatively simple or relatively stable should have generated forms upon which the eye and the mind are prone to linger. But the challenge to literature and to the other arts in our generation is precisely that of giving some pattern and coherence to the new world, the new themes and the unprecedented urgencies that have come into our lives with the new order.

Man is a half happy but, historically considered, quite explicable accident. There are moments of the angel in him and he is, as an old naturalist once remarked, "in apprehension how like a God." But he is compelled, willy-nilly, to absent himself from felicity awhile and in this harsh world draw his breath in pain to tell his story. But if it were not for this harsh world there would be no story. If it were not for that world and for his own complex nature in it, there would never be felicity.

The naturalist surveys life and nature and greets with welcome understanding all that art and literature which render the lusts of the beast and the loves of the god in that earth-bound and heaven-dreaming creature which is man. Being human, he loves as much as any classicist those achieved forms and beauties which are part of the human tradition. But being human, he is not simply an inheritor of a past. He is the living part of a present. He is, too, the living imagination of the future. And it is to the literature and art of his own age, however formless they be or however half articulate their forms, that he will turn for the expression of his sense of nature, his love of life, his hopes, his fears, and his illusions—what used, in short, to be called his religion.

Who Reads the Classics Now?

By HENRY HAZLITT

IT is hardly necessary to remark that any culture worthy of the name must draw its life both from the finest minds of the present and the greatest minds of the past. If it confines itself to either to the exclusion of the other it becomes deformed. The disease of reading too exclusively the books of dead authors is probably confined, in the modern world, to the older pundits of India and China, and in America and Europe to a few scattered academicians. Our real danger is that of reading too exclusively the works of our own time. That the present tendency is too heavily in favor of current books there can be no reasonable doubt. The chief questions we have to answer concern its extent. What is the approximate present ratio in the reading of old books as compared with current books? Has the tendency in the last generation, or in the last few years, been toward the reading of relatively more old books or fewer? Exactly which of the old books are being most read today, and which have been forgotten?

In an effort to get at something beyond mere impressions, the present writer sent an inquiry to the leading publishers who carry old books or classics on their lists, to the American Library Association, and to a number of the leading libraries throughout the country, to obtain whatever figures were available in regard to the comparative reading and buying of old and new books, or impressions in the absence of such figures.

One of the most interesting results of this inquiry is the remarkably wide differences of opinion among those whom one would assume to be in the best position to know the facts. Thus Miss Marilla W. Freeman of the Cleveland Public Library reports that "in almost every field the general reading public demands more than ever before the books which are currently reviewed and discussed," while Mr. Arthur E. Bostwick of the St. Louis Public Library gives it as his impression that "old books are being still read to a very considerable extent side by side with the new." Differences among the publishers are even more pronounced. Mr. J. W. Lippincott, who expressed his opinion on the subject several months ago, now writes: "We are profligate with our riches and would rather pay $2.50 for a new novel on the chance that it may be good reading than to give $1 for an old book that is sure to be interesting." And Robert M. McBride and Company add: "The public is becoming less and less interested in the older and hitherto standard books. This applies particularly to that group of authors who were considered 'staple stock items' by virtually every bookseller a few years ago. Formerly these authors, who shall remain nameless, were stocked in their entirety; now any bookseller will tell you that he finds it necessary to carry only a few outstanding titles of each." Little, Brown and Company remark: "It is definitely our feeling that the older books are steadily losing ground." "The majority of publishers," according to the Houghton Mifflin Company, "now agree that new books (published during the current year) are having a larger proportional sale today than ever before. Many houses find that whereas a few years ago there was an approximate fifty-fifty division between old and new books, today there is, generally speaking, a sixty-forty ratio in favor of new books." Mrs. Blanche W. Knopf writes: "Obviously, the reading of very old classics has practically disappeared and it is amazing how few are read today as compared to current books." This is supported by Mr. M. G. Michaels of Brentano's: "From my own observation, the reading of the old classics is almost a thing of the past. Even a current volume becomes old in sixty days unless it is an obvious best-seller."

Such opinions, as I have said, meet with flat disagreement from other publishers. Mr. John Macrae, Jr., of E. P. Dutton and Company, writes: "I know that some of the publishers have reported a decreasing sale in the classics. . . . This, however, has not been true as far as we are concerned. . . . In my opinion the public is just as much interested in the classics and just as much interested in older books of real merit as it ever was." Mr. Harrison Smith of Cape and Smith remarks: "I should say that there was a steadily increasing demand for old books." Dodd, Mead and Company conclude: "Our experience . . . would seem to indicate that the classics are having a happier time today than they ever had." The publishers who confine themselves almost exclusively to reprints are of the same opinion. The Modern Library finds that "the classics don't do so badly. Probably the days of the old parlor sets of Dickens, Scott, Jane Austen (those wedding-present books behind glass cases) are over, and when we remember some of the typography and illustrations and bookbinding that were used on these sets the change seems like a good one. When people buy the classics now they at least read them."

Before venturing to say which of these opinions seems most justified, or whether there is a possible reconciliation of some of those that appear to be opposed, I shall present such general figures and such information regarding specific books as I have been able to obtain. Any comparison of "old" and "new" books, of course, must involve the drawing of some arbitrary line. In my own inquiry I asked which were the best-selling or most widely read books today that first appeared ten years ago or more, and if these were mainly books published in the twentieth century, which were the best-selling or most widely read books that first appeared more than fifty years ago.

The most general answers, naturally, came from libraries rather than individual publishers. Unfortunately, the libraries do not keep continuous statistics indicating the number of times specific books are taken out; one has to fall back, in the main, upon impressions of librarians. The Public Library of the City of Los Angeles, in answer to my inquiry, tabulated the book checks of various authors for "a representative day." The nine most popular fiction authors were taken in four groups: (1) classics, (2) "standard" authors from the period of approximately 1885 to 1900, (3) better writers of today, and (4) late or living writers of love, mystery, adventure, and Western stories. Of the books of the last group of authors, consisting of (arranged in order of popularity) Zane Grey, Bower, Oppenheim, Mary Roberts Rinehart, Kathleen Norris, Kyne, Gene Porter, Temple Bailey, and Ethel Dell, 241 copies had been taken out; of the books of "better writers" of today—Galsworthy, Cabell, Dreiser, Bennett, Wassermann, Garland, Wells, Atherton, Tarkington, Walpole, and Wilder—119 copies; of the books of the standard authors of the period 1885-1900—Doyle, Conrad, London, Hardy, Kipling, France, Lew Wallace, Harte, and Churchill—77 copies; and of the books of the "classics"—Dumas, Scott, Dickens, Hugo, Tolstoy, Cooper, Hawthorne, Brontë, and Jules Verne—76 copies. With allowance made for local preferences and for the possibly misleading indications which one day's record would give, these figures have some value as indicating ratios.

This classification, it will be noticed, is made partly on the basis of age of volumes, and partly on the basis of supposed merit. There is no virtue, of course, in reading old books per se. There is no necessary relation between the age of a book and its value. This might seem too obvious to be worth stating, were it not for the common superstition, shared often by the most intelligent people, that only the bad books die and only the good survive. A certain quasi-permanent type of sentimentality, as the results of the present survey show, may appeal to sentimental readers indefinitely, and some rubbish lives for ages.

Here are the books over ten years old given by Mr. Bostwick in a letter to the writer as among the most popular at the St. Louis Public Library: "Tarzan of the Apes," "The Crisis," "Pollyanna," "The Americanization of Edward Bok," "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "The Virginian," "Up from Slavery," "Ben Hur," Roosevelt's letters to his children, and "The Mill on the Floss." H. M. Lydenberg, assistant director of the New York Public Library, reports that both from agreement of impressions and the statistical support of the number of copies it is necessary to keep on the shelves, the following six volumes that appeared ten years or more ago are among those highest in demand: Dostoevski's "Crime and Punishment," Shaw's "Man and Superman," the earlier volumes of Galsworthy's "Forsyte Saga," O'Neill's earlier plays, Wilde's "Picture of Dorian Gray," and Tolstoy's "Anna Karenina." The most popular books that appeared fifty years ago or more are several plays of Shakespeare, several novels of Dickens, Voltaire's "Candide," Goethe's "Faust," Hugo's "Les Misérables," Browning's poems, and Plato's "Republic." Perhaps the most unexpected inclusion here is Browning, while Dreiser is an unexpected omission in the first list. Dreiser's novels are in more demand, however, in the library's East Side branches.

The Cleveland Public Library gives as "the most popular classics": Rabelais, Boccaccio's "Decameron," Barrie, Shaw, Keats, Shelley, Emerson, Whitman, Mark Twain, Kipling, and Robert W. Service. If the total number of copies of a book kept on the shelves may be taken as a fair index of the demand for it, the following list of the dozen leading novels fifty years old or more is interesting: Tolstoy's "Anna Karenina," 62 copies; Wallace's "Ben Hur," 50; Stevenson's "Treasure Island," 49; Scott's "Ivanhoe," 45; Hugo's "Les Misérables," 43; Dumas's "The Three Musketeers," 43; Hawthorne's "The Scarlet Letter," 41; Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin," 39; Dickens's "David Copperfield," 36; Bulwer Lytton's "The Last Days of Pompeii," 36; Eliot's "Adam Bede," 34; Cervantes's "Don Quixote," 32.

Among publishers the best indication of the relativ popularity of old books can be gained from the reprin series. Many of these volumes sell annually in number that any publisher would be delighted to see as the tota sales of a new book. Unfortunately, even where publisher have shown the present writer figures for his own information, they have expressed the wish not to have the figure published, so that exact comparisons of sales of old and new books cannot be made. Moreover, certain old titles may b issued in various editions by as many as half a dozen or dozen publishers, and if the totals of these could be compiled the sales of many of the leading titles would easil run to a higher total than those of many of the leadin current titles.

The Modern Library probably offers an excellent inde of the current popularity of older volumes. Its best-sellin books in 1929 were, in their order, Merejkowski's "Th Romance of Leonardo da Vinci," Dostoevski's "The Brothers Karamazov," Rostand's "Cyrano de Bergerac," Voltaire' "Candide," "The Autobiography of Benvenuto Cellini, Hudson's "Green Mansions," and Hardy's "The Return o the Native." Oscar Wilde's "Dorian Gray," "Mob Dick," Anatole France's "The Red Lily," Butler's "Th Way of All Flesh," Zola's "Nana," and Flaubert' "Madame Bovary" also rank high. The A. L. Burt Company cite as their half-dozen best-selling classics: Emerson' "Essays," "The Three Guardsmen," "The Mill on th Floss," "Oliver Twist," "Ivanhoe," and "The Last Day of Pompeii."

Grosset and Dunlap list as their six best-selling book published ten years or more ago: Wharton's "The Age o Innocence," Grey's "The Border Legion," Hutchinson's "I Winter Comes," Tarkington's "The Magnificent Ambersons," Lewis's "Main Street," and O'Brien's "Whit Shadows in the South Seas." Their best-selling books firs published twenty-five years ago are London's "The Ca of the Wild," Churchill's "The Crisis," Stoker's "Dracula, Wiggin's "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," London's "Th Sea Wolf," and Wister's "The Virginian." Their best-sel ing books published fifty years ago are Mark Twain's "Th Adventures of Tom Sawyer," Wallace's "Ben Hur," Verne "The Mysterious Island," Stevenson's "Treasure Island, and Melville's "Moby Dick." The Book League of Ame ica, which offers its subscribers to new books their choic of a list of older books, finds that books of the earlier twentieth century were chosen in the following order: Butler "Way of All Flesh," Ellis's "Dance of Life," Dou las's "South Wind," Frazer's "Golden Bough," Phelps "Essays on Modern Novelists," and "The Education o Henry Adams." Books of the late nineteenth centur (1890-1900) were chosen in this order: Whitman's "Leav of Grass," Ibsen's "Selected Plays," Chekhov's storie France's "Thais," Mark Twain's "Innocents Abroad," an Hardy's "Return of the Native."

D. Appleton and Company report as their best-sellin books published ten years or more ago: Stephen Crane "The Red Badge of Courage," and Phillips's "Susan Leno Her Fall and Rise." Their most popular volumes publishe fifty years or more ago are Bryant's poems, "Alice i Wonderland," the works of Charles Darwin, Spencer, an uxley, "The Three Musketeers," and Joel Chandler arris's "Uncle Remus." Dodd, Mead and Company find pert Brooke's poems still enjoying "a steady and phe- menally large sale"; and a very high sale also for Lau- ce Hope's "India's Love Lyrics," France's "Penguin and," Douglas's "South Wind," Dunbar's "Complete ems," and several titles by Lafcadio Hearn. Among the ch older books their most successful is their set of An- ny Trollope, the demand for whose work is apparently reasing. There is also "still a tremendous demand" for Elsie books. Doubleday, Doran and Company report ong their best-selling books Conrad's "Lord Jim," "Nig- of the Narcissus," "Youth," and "Victory," the short ries of O. Henry, Helen Keller's "Life," half a dozen umes of Kipling, "Cyrano de Bergerac," Tarkington's enrod," Maugham's "Of Human Bondage," Bennett's ld Wives' Tale," Whitman's "Leaves of Grass," and llery Radot's "Pasteur." In the Star Dollar Library the t-selling volumes are Wells's "Outline of History," asputin," "Catharine the Great," and Cellini.

E. P. Dutton and Company find that their sales among classics in their Everyman's Library, as well as in the adway Translations and other reprint series have all in- ased during the past year. In fiction, outside of these rint series, their best-selling old books are "The Four rsemen of the Apocalpyse," "On the Branch," "The rple Land," and "Joanna Godden." The two most active books of Harcourt, Brace and Company are Louis Un- meyer's anthologies of "Modern American Poetry" and odern British Poetry." The first of these has sold over ,000 copies and the second 80,000. Harper's best-selling ks, ten years or more old, include the earlier volumes of e Grey, Van Dyke's "The Other Wise Man," and Booth rkington's "The Turmoil." "Ben Hur" and "Trilby" sell very largely. In fact a million copies of "Ben r" were recently sold to Sears, Roebuck and Company. best-selling older books of Henry Holt are Rolland's an-Christophe," Dorothy Canfield's "Understood Betsy," Stevenson's "Home Book of Verse." Houghton Mif- Company's best-selling older books are Havelock Ellis's e Dance of Life," "The Education of Henry Adams," ot's "What Men Live By," and Cather's "My Antonia." Knopf's best-selling older books are: "Growth of the ," by Knut Hamsun, "The Prophet," by Kahlil Gibran, Hudson's "Green Mansions." Books of general interest lished between 1900 and 1920 that sell best today on the 3. Lippincott Company's list are "The Life of Whis- " by the Pennells, Jack London's "The Daughter of the ws," and the various volumes in Dr. Furness's "Vari- n" Shakespeare. The most popular volumes published be- en 1890 and 1900 are Paul Leicester Ford's "George shington," Marie Corelli's "Barabbas" and "Sorrows of n," and Ouida's "Under Two Flags." Among the Lit- Brown publications about 12,000 copies were sold last of "Ramona," by Helen Hunt Jackson, first published 884. "The Complete Poems of Emily Dickinson" and cis Parkman's "The Oregon Trail" also sell well, and 0 copies were sold last year of Alcott's "Little Women," published in 1868. Elinor Glyn's "Three Weeks," first ished in 1907 and now issued by the Macaulay Com- , still sells about 2,500 copies a year.

The most successful books of ten years ago published by Macmillan's are Dostoevski's "Brothers Karamazov" and "Crime and Punishment," London's "Call of the Wild," Wister's "The Virginian," Stephens's "The Crock of Gold," and Churchill's "Richard Carvel." Of these by far the most successful are "The Call of the Wild" and "The Virginian." In general non-fiction, the best-selling books are Jane Addams's "Twenty Years at Hull House," Frazer's "Golden Bough," and Bryce's "American Commonwealth." The most successful books appearing more than fifty years ago are Butler's "Way of All Flesh," Ibsen's "Selected Plays," "Marco Polo," Whitman's "Leaves of Grass," the collected poems of Browning and Tennyson, and "Alice in Wonderland." Cabell's "Jurgen," published originally in 1919 by Robert M. McBride and Company, still sells well. The Oxford University Press's best-selling book, first published more than ten years ago, is "The Oxford Book of English Verse," and their best-selling reprint volumes are Boswell's "Johnson," a one-volume Shakespeare, the poems of Keats, the poems of Shelley, Euripides's "Electra," Melville's "Moby Dick," and Chaucer's poems. The five best-selling volumes of Scribner's first published ten years or more ago are "The Americanization of Edward Bok," Galsworthy's "Forsyte Saga," Roosevelt's letters to his children, and Edith Wharton's "Ethan Frome." Of books published fifty years ago their highest-selling volumes today are "Hans Brinker," by Mary Mapes Dodge, and "Old Creole Days," by George W. Cable. The Vanguard Press's best-selling old books are "Love's Coming of Age," by Carpenter, Veblen's "Theory of the Leisure Class," Lenin's "The State and Revolution," and Sinclair's "The Jungle." Bellamy's "Looking Backward" still enjoys a considerable sale. The Viking Press still sells annually about 5,000 copies of Zona Gale's one-act play "Neighbors."

The general conclusions that can be confidently drawn from this survey are perhaps meager. A few generalizations, however, seem reasonably safe. The current reading of older books, as shown by the experience of libraries and by the reprint series of many publishers, is at least far from negligible. Indeed, the current sales of, say, the ten leading old books, in all editions, would probably compare quite favorably with those of the ten leading new books. We must remember, too, that the reading of older books is probably comparatively greater than either current sales of such books or library borrowing would indicate: there is, for example, the important factor of inherited home libraries.

On the other hand, it seems to be true that just as the book clubs tend to concentrate public attention on fewer current volumes, so under the new dispensation attention is being concentrated on fewer "classics." As a nation we have been trained to ask for the advertised product, and this is true of books as of other merchandise. Books are sold far more than they used to be by ballyhoo. Mass-production economics is beginning to be felt in the book field as it has been elsewhere. The book clubs are merely the outstanding example of this. There is also the growing tendency of publishers generally to concentrate advertising and publicity on a limited number of titles. There is less buying scattered over a wide range of older books, and more concentrated buying (or should one say concentrated selling?) of a few of them. Such a situation is, of course, potentially dangerous, but its effect must depend also to a large extent on which volumes are eliminated and which retained.

Interior

By STANLEY J. KUNITZ

I close my book; tonight, tonight,
When wet gusts tug at the chestnut burr,
Permit my will, that's half my light,
To sit domestic by the fire;

And watch the clock in present tense
Draw circles of the time to love;
And contemplate the simple beans
Profoundly baking in the stove.

Having beheld with recent eyes
The sterile pits of reason's moon,
I shall not be, I think, less wise
For homely things and homely rune;

Nor wholly trust the merely true
Of prose; nor hear with tempered vein
The feathered devil in the flue,
The breaking vowels of the rain.

Gorki's Trilogy

Bystander. By Maxim Gorki. Translated from the Russian by Bernard Guilbert Guerney. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.

FOR years the prophet and reporter of the proletarian revolution, Gorki, when he found himself a little too old to keep up with the terrific onrush of events, decided to settle down, survey the traversed path, and try to recapture for posterity the colorful people and stirring incidents of his arduous and variegated life. Though he is not any longer in the vanguard of the revolution, Gorki is still tremendously popular with the laboring masses of the world. In Russia he is a veritable idol. "Every one of us, no matter what category he belongs to," once said a Soviet worker, "has one warm, living spot in his breast, and that is the memory of Gorki." In the Soviet Union Gorki is honored not only as the father of proletarian literature and as the man whom Lenin called "the most important representative of proletarian art," but also as the guardian angel of Russian culture, as the friend and counselor of numberless young proletarian authors, and as the only outstanding Russian man of letters who has remained loyal to the working class.

Ever since 1913 Gorki has been writing almost exclusively in a mood of serene retrospection. His marvelous series of autobiographical works, his book of "Recollections," his "Fragments from My Diary," as well as most of the fictional works written by him during his later years, have all been in the reminiscent vein. "The Life of Clim Samghin"—a three-volume epic of which "Bystander" is the first part—attempts to give not only the intimate story of the hero Samghin, but also a comprehensive picture of Russian life during the forty years preceding the October revolution. Taking the "gloomy eighties" as his background for "Bystander," Gorki proceeds slowly, laboriously, with a wealth of meticulous detail, to unfold before us the gruesome panorama of social struggles and cultural upheavals in prerevolutionary Russia. Epoch follows epoch; one generation follows another—the nihilists of the sixties and the populists of the seventies, the Bazarovs and the Niezhdanovs; the rebellious sons of Turgenev's novels are n themselves fathers who are spurned by their "decadent" sons having "aroused hopes they had not been able to fulfil" for "having occupied themselves with questions of a purely terial nature, ignoring the riddles of spiritual life." By a r combination of scientific objectivity, artistic sympathy, and c ative imagination, by a discreet use of contemporary poems episodes and personages, Gorki evokes the spirit of those nig marish years: a phantasmagoria of repressions, imprisonme exiles, executions, pogroms; the intelligentsia, frightened humiliated, scuttling away into their holes, there to seek c solation in pale dreams of a remote social justice, in mysti explorations of the twilight regions of the soul, or in the biza worship of Beauty and the Self. The most usual escape, h ever, is in drink and debauchery. "Let's drink. We must dr Brother!" shouts one of the Dostoevskian characters in book. "We are a serious folk; we must drown four-fifths our soul in drink. To live with all one's soul in Russia strictly forbidden by everybody. By everybody: the police, priests, the poets, and the prose writers. But when we h drunk our four-fifths, we'll begin collecting little pornogra pictures and telling smutty stories from Russian history to another. There's our prospect in life." Horror. Deject Utter hopelessness. Yet within the womb of the present germs of the future begin to stir. The working class is g ually becoming a potent social factor. New "sons" come f to replace their degenerate fathers. A new generation of Ma ists, scientific socialists, proletarians invade the arena, and b to prepare the settings for the momentous events of 1905 1917.

Thrown against this shifting background, there is a of dynamic, evolving characters, men and women and dren, intellectuals, peasants, workers, bureaucrats, merch priests. But while the delineations of many characters are o uncommonly felicitous, some being brilliantly original in ception and unforgettably vivid in form, those of some of major characters, we regret to say, are somewhat blur shadowy. Clim Samghin himself, the central personage in novel, the prism through which most of the occurrences in book are refracted, is utterly unreal, invented. Hence of the events refracted through him, though historically aut tic, also appear unreal and invented. In his treatment of the author tries to be super-subtle, analytical, keenly psy logical. But he is not very successful. We are shown a dred different traits belonging to Clim, yet we never com know Clim himself. We learn a great deal about his rela with his family, sweethearts, friends; we learn of his vac tions, pretensions, and disillusionments, but our knowledg never synthesized into a living image. The same applie Lidia, and Tomilin, and many other characters. They they philosophize, they go and come and go again, and can never make out why, where, and whither.

The truth is Gorki is no master of form, particularl big form. His novels and plays are almost invariably a phous, rickety, loose. To conceal these fundamental struc defects he is often forced to resort to dogma, tendentious romantic vaporing, and endless and vapid philosophizing. there was an element of beguiling novelty in having a se tious tramp regale us with sparkling bits of Nietzschean dom; by now the novelty has worn off. And as regards losophizing intellectuals such as we find in this book, they achieve the devastatingly explosive results of an Karamazov they almost always manage to become unmitig bores. In the nineties of the last century their discus might have sounded very profound; in the year of our 1930 they strike one as insupportably piddling and unn sary. Gorki seems never to have learned that long spe can never make up for a poor plot, and that without orga tion, concentration, and clarity no novel, however "splendid in scope" and monumental in bulk, can be properly called a masterpiece.

Ironically enough, according to the publishers Gorki considers this trilogy his "life work," his "ultimate test." If true, it is a strange commentary on human nature, particularly on the artist's nature. For Gorki is not the first or the only artist to set a wrong relative value on his own work. Perhaps he does not consider his autobiographical works "art." Perhaps they came too easily to him—those vivid recollections, so free of plot, literary convention, and intellectual hokum. Perhaps Gorki himself does not fully realize the incomparable beauty, the greatness he has achieved in those broad, flowing, artless streams of throbbing life. JOSHUA KUNITZ

Shelley's First Child

Shelley's Lost Letters to Harriet. Edited with an Introduction by Leslie Hotson. Little, Brown and Company. $8.

MR. HOTSON has added another triumph to that list of triumphs which promises to grow so long as to make him the leading literary detective of our day. He has discovered nine of the letters which Shelley wrote to Harriet Westbrooke after he had left her for Mary Godwin. One was already known, but it was insufficient. Others had been searched for, by Peacock, Kegan Paul, and perhaps innumerable unknown men, in the Public Records Office during the century which followed the miserable confusion attending the affair. Now Mr. Hotson has turned up—not the letters themselves, but court copies of them consulted in the case of Shelley vs. Westbrooke. And the situation of Shelley during those painful months between July and October, 1814, is at last quite clear. If it is of any importance to know how he felt about Harriet, and what he said to her, we know it.

In a certain sense nothing is added here to our knowledge of Shelley's character. It was always to me an unpleasant character, and it becomes no more so now. That is to say, it still does not become quite detestable. The only difference is that he is permitted to display it with a more preposterous fulness, he is forced—and this may be a violation of his privacy of which one ought not to take advantage—to seem more unpleasant than ever.

The trouble with the letters is that they are so just, so noble, and so righteous. Shelley was a man of principles, and a man of principles is so dreadfully concerned with proving himself right. He fails to see that the question of right or wrong seldom comes in at all. Shelley is not to be blamed for the original injury he did Harriet; his passion for Mary was apparently quite uncontrollable. He is to be blamed, I think, for writing Harriet a series of sermons about her duty as a liberal—a thing, incidentally, which a more sensible man would have known she never had been. He is to be blamed for his brotherliness, his fatherliness, his exacerbating fairness. He is to be blamed, indeed, for writing at all—for thinking there was anything he could say to make Harriet feel better. I am sure that everything he said made her feel worse. For she was a child—his first child—and did not know better than to be hurt.

"I repeat," he says, "that my attachment to you is unimpaired." What could that mean to Harriet? "It is no reproach to me," he continues, "that you have never filled my heart with an all-sufficing passion." Of course not, and I suspect that Harriet never thought so. If she hated anyone it was Mary—whom Shelley wants her to see, she is so wonderful. But then, "I murmur not if you feel incapable of compassion and love for the object and the sharer of my passion." No, no, Mary also will be a martyr to the fiendish prejudices of mankind, which Shelley fears Harriet is now beginning to shar

But Shelley is chiefly anxious lest Harriet think him in t wrong, and asks her whether what he is now doing to h heart is not balanced by all the improvement he has given h mind in the past—and perhaps overbalanced by the improv ment he still offers. "Consider how far you would desire yo future life to be placed within the influence of my superinten ing mind." Later on, when Harriet has become hysterical a has lost caste with him by showing herself still a slave to "t vilest superstitions"—a slave, that is, to anger and jealousy he reminds her sorrowfully: "I would have superintended t progress of your mind, and have assisted you in cultivating elevated philosophy." The spectacle of Shelley abusing his wi for an abandonment of principles which did not apply in t least to her feelings, and which if she had ever understo them she had shared with him merely because they were part of him, is not exactly edifying, nor can it make me li Shelley.

I prefer Keats's confessed jealousy whenever Fan Brawne went to a dance without him; I prefer Byron's willin ness to admit himself a sinner, even though a proud one; prefer—well, in the case of Shelley I should have preferr a certain amount of silence. Deliver me from all persons w want to depose that they have hurt me in the cause of highe truth. Better that they should hit and run.

Tragedy, Q. E. D.

Gallows' Orchard. By Claire Spencer. Jonathan Cape a Harrison Smith. $2.50.

FROM the first sentence of "Gallows' Orchard" M Spencer has the respect of the reader. Here, one fee is, at the very least, a craftsman. And when the nov is finished one looks back with admiration on the spare, stro lines of its structure. Wise in her selection of incident, spari but effective in her description, Miss Spencer conducts her sto with an assurance that can only be born of complete imaginati comprehension. So sharp is the impression of maturity whi the novel makes that one wishes to give the author the bene of every doubt, even when she employs a device seemingly cumbersome as the alternation of the historical present wi the past tense. One knows she has her reasons though th may seem inadequate.

It is with an ethical problem that Miss Spencer has co cerned herself. Effie Gallows, says the minister, has a ra quality: "It isn't her looks or her character or her way looking at things; it's something else; it's something hard explain. It's something that you feel everybody ought to ha on the strength of being alive, and yet I have never met anyo but her who had it." In such a woman the sense of person integrity is naturally strong, but Effie has sinned against h integrity by marrying a weak and colorless admirer to provi a father for another man's child.

The wrong she has done she soon realizes, and she resig herself to her punishment. "If people are low in their hea they can do low things and not hurt themselves, and never punished; but when you know a thing is wrong and still y do it, you are doomed." The inhabitants of Durkie, the Scot town in which she lives, gladly take upon themselves the r of avenging furies. Always distrustful of her because s possesses something they lack, and now outraged as much her pride as by her misdeeds, they persecute her by every mea they can devise and in the end stone her to death. Five m according to the varying degrees of their strength and wea ness, suffer with her.

And Other Adventures of a Pragmatist in Aesthetics

By HORACE M. KALLEN

Author of Frontiers of Hope, Why Religion?, etc.

Here is a series of wise and witty essays that deflates current cults (and not least among them is Humanism), that exposes the seven arts with sly humor and deep understanding. Other men have told the truth about the priest, the politician, the patrioteer. Dr. Kallen here reveals the truth about the poet, the critic and the censor.

HORACE LIVERIGHT N.Y. GOOD BOOKS

Two books may be compared though they are not of equal merit, and it is not unprofitable to place "Gallows' Orchard" beside "The Scarlet Letter." Not only are they alike in theme; their weaknesses, however they differ in degree, are of the same kind. The spectacle of the inevitable workings of unalterable law is grand, but it is not moving. Effie's remark, "When a thing has started it has to work itself out," like Chillingworth's "Let the black flower blossom as it may," is impressive rather than stirring. The situation is justly presented; Effie's character is clearly defined; the five men act their appropriate parts. But something is missing, and the tragic ending brings from us only the satisfied admiration that is given to the last line of that kind of sonnet one calls neatly turned.

In part, no doubt, the explanation lies in the essential difficulty of the task: the character of an Effie Gallows is easier to define than to convey. Beyond that, however, is the obstacle of Effie's passivity, a passivity implicit in Miss Spencer's conception of the situation. Effie is made for affirmation, for struggle, and when she does momentarily struggle the reader feels with her. But she is committed to negation, forced to be something less than herself, less than a person. Like the characters in "The Scarlet Letter," she is by definition two-dimensional, and her death fails to lay strong hands upon our emotions.

GRANVILLE HICKS

A Great Poet

A Vision of the Mermaids. By Gerard Manley Hopkins. Complete Facsimile Edition Limited to 250 Copies. Oxford University Press. $7.50.

The Life of Father Gerard Manley Hopkins, S. J. By Father Lahey, S. J. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

TWO hundred and fifty copies, I have heard, made up the whole edition in which for the first time the few but wonderful poems of Gerard Manley Hopkins were published. That was in 1918. Their extraordinary author had been dead twenty-nine years. Save for occasional publication chiefly in religious periodicals and anthologies, on whose reluctant editors they had almost to be forced, the poems were known only to a handful of impressed but not always understanding friends. They knew the man to be remarkable and respected the poetry as his utterance. These friends included Coventry Patmore, who esteemed Hopkins enough to take his advice in revising his own work, but who gave up the effort of following Hopkins's bewildering innovations, and Robert Bridges, who in his understanding and will to understand becomes an example of a good friend. It was to Bridges that Hopkins intrusted his manuscripts to be published after his death. Victorian timidity no doubt, and later the war, lengthened the delay; finally the book was published in the carefully and conscientiously annotated edition of 1918, which is being reprinted within a few months with additional poems. To precede this reprinting we have now a useful biography and a facsimile of one of the longer Hopkins manuscripts.

Bridges may seem to have been a hesitant sponsor; but the temper of Hopkins's generation and the general impatience with experiment will account for his hesitation. He may seem to be too defensive in his editorial notes, to dwell too submissively on the defects and too shyly on the excellences. But in 1918 matters were different. Today we have become not so much tolerant of as styled to experiment. Mr. Bridges could not have anticipated the quick acceptance of this poetry, and still less its immediate and increasing influence.

In the twelve years since their publication the 250 small books have been searched out and become scarce. Five English booksellers in a year's time could not locate a copy for one insistent purchaser. Among poets the possessors' names were exchanged and the copies were borrowed oftener perhaps than those of any book in recent years. With the publication of the forthcoming new edition of the poems it will probably be observed that in some recent poetry influences attributed to other poets are in reality Hopkins's. The Poet Laureate's work owns it, and Hart Crane's "The Bridge," unquestionably a great poem and one of the few of our generation, shows the present benefits of Hopkins's liberating and enriching experiments.

This influence cannot, I think, be attributed mainly to his many and extraordinary contributions to English versification although they are the first to be noticed and both in quality and in quantity constitute probably the greatest addition made by a single poet. Today we are inclined rather to imitate an attitude of mind than a form; and for that reason a T. S. Elio exerts more authority than an E. E. Cummings. In Hopkins however, it is not so much an attitude of mind—else we should all seek some individual form of asceticism—as the virtue of an example. Here is a poet who was not afraid to write exactly as he wished, who dared to take the risk of a crabbed and queer appearance, of obscurities into which readers would no follow him.

Such independence has always been rare in literature. Few poets seem to have been so indifferent to or disciplined agains the pleasure of publication. It is the only form of his asceticism that it would be profitable for us to imitate, though devou Catholics may think differently. Hopkins was even conten after his admission to the Society of Jesus to give up writing poetry altogether. He wrote to his friend Canon Dixon:

> What [verses] I had written I burnt before I became a Jesuit [i.e., 1868] and resolved to write no more, as not belonging to my profession, unless it were by the wish of my superiors; so for seven years I wrote nothing but two or three little presentation pieces which occasion called for. But when in the winter of '75 the Deutschland was wrecked in the mouth of the Thames and five Franciscan nuns, exiles from Germany by the Falck laws, aboard of her were drowned I was affected by the account, and happening to say so to my rector, he said that he wished some one would write a poem on the subject. On this hint I set to work and, though my hand was out at first, produced one. I had long had haunting my ear the echo of a new rhythm which now I realized on paper. . . . I do not say the idea is altogether new . . . but no one has professedly used it and made it the principle throughout that I know of. . . . However, I had to mark the stresses . . . and a great many more oddnesses could not but dismay an editor's eye, so that when I offered it to our magazine, the Month . . . they dared not print it.

He wrote, as he said elsewhere, to satisfy a love of design but he wrote, too, out of a love and understanding of words, o their sound and of their sense, that is unrivaled in our literature. He played almost boisterously with them, running them out in delightful repetitions, in transformations and substitutions. This freedom with words is even more characteristi than his rhythms or his marvelous imagery. This and th exigencies of his bold rhythmic scheme led to the oddities fo which Bridges apologizes too much, and of which the autho was fully conscious, as this passage from a letter to Bridge shows:

> No doubt my poetry errs on the side of oddness. I hope in time to have a more balanced and Miltonic style. But as air, melody, is what strikes me most of all in music, and design in painting, so design, pattern, or what I am in the habit of calling "inscape" is what I above all aim at in poetry. Now it is the virtue of design, pattern, or inscape to be distinctive and it is the vice of distinctiveness to become queer. This vice I cannot have escaped.

AMERICA LOOKS ABROAD

THE NEW ECONOMIC HORIZONS

by PAUL M. MAZUR

Author of American Prosperity

What good or ill do the years 1930-1940 hold for us? The stock-market crash was only a symptom of something much more far-reaching. Dangers that threaten the whole structure of our business and social life should be understood by every well-informed man and woman, if the best way out is to be found. The social and economic reform of Europe, a war of tariffs, a United States of Europe, the cancellation of war debts, international trade—these are just a few of the possibilities which this brilliant young banker discusses.

America Looks Abroad opens up new avenues of thought for the intelligent reader, who will arrive at a greater understanding of world problems through a reading of this clear and sane book. $3.00

And again two months later:

> Moreover the oddness may make them repulsive at first and yet Lang might have liked them on a second reading.

The elements of Hopkins's originality are bewildering. He is astonishingly bold with words and with forms of speech; he is free with ellipses, coins new words, breaks them in two, transfers the parts of combined words, as when "brimful in a flash" becomes "brim in a flashful"; rhymes internally, alliterates, omits that's and which's to have every word dynamic, and displaces prepositions so that their very movement in the sentence adds to their force; combines words to sharpen their rhythm, quicken their meaning, and harmonize their sound.

Such a procedure is inimitable; it is his poetic personality, which will certainly stimulate and encourage other poets along the paths of their own individuality, but which it would be very dangerous to copy. It is his prosody that is his main contribution.

"For purpose of scanning," he writes, "it is a great convenience to follow the example of music and take the stress always first. . . . If this is done there will be in common English verse only two possible feet—the so-called accentual trochee and dactyl." This may seem to conflict with the admitted fact that English verse is largely iambic; and his own use of trochaic and dactylic rhythms gives his poetry its oddness. In developing his rhythm he substitutes good English words for the Latin and Greek terms. Thesis he calls "stress"; arsis, "slack." The iambic he calls "rising"; trochaic, "falling" rhythm; where the stress falls in the middle he calls it "rocking" rhythm. "Mixed" (logaoedic) rhythm results where these are mingled for variety. Again taking example from music (in which he was adept enough to compose fugues) he contrasts rhythms for counterpoint and achieves striking effects. However, his most important contribution to versification is what he names "sprung" rhythm, which is counterpointed throughout. Each stanza is scanned continuously so that the lines merge together. It may have "hangers" or "outrides," a series of unaccented syllables which contribute pauses and variety. The feet have from one to four syllables, the accent falling always on the first. Hopkins makes remarkable use of the one-syllable foot, which gives concentrated and intense effects.

I give this example of a poem in "sprung" rhythm that contains some of his other effects:

PIED BEAUTY

Glory be to God for dappled things—
For skies of couple-color as a brindled cow;
For rose-moles all in stipple upon trout that swim;
Fresh-firecoal chestnut-falls; finches' wings;
Landscape plotted and pieced—fold, fallow, and plow;
And all trades, their gear and tackle and trim.

All things counter, original, spare, strange;
Whatever is fickle, freckled (who knows how?)
With swift, slow; sweet, sour; adazzle, dim;
He fathers-forth whose beauty is past change:
Praise Him.

If the innovations strike us first we must remember that it is the major poetry heightened by them that is his real contribution. Beyond question Hopkins belongs among the great poets of English literature. The experiments may be taken as evidence of the subtlety and diversity of one of the greatest minds to express itself in poetry in his generation.

How diverse and fertile his mind was the two books now published before the new edition of his poems reveal. Father Lahey's biography is useful for its information and its supplement of examples of Hopkins's prose, a prose as remarkable and as rich as his poetry. He was always intensely interested in clouds, and kept a journal of day-to-day changes in the sky which contains some of the most wonderful descriptive writing I have ever seen—sensitive, accurate, powerful, and always musical.

The biography is too formally a memoir to attempt to solve the problems of his asceticism and his conversion to Catholicism. Father Lahey is intelligent and sensitive but his answers are those of a cleric. The evidences of suffering in the "terrible" sonnets of the later years are piously explained away as a mystic source of happiness. Perhaps Hopkins's love of forms led him to adopt the most formalized way of life offered in the contemporary world. There can be no question of the sincerity and the profundity of his belief, but there can be no question either, from the evidence of his poetry, that the beauty of ceremony, the bodying forth of belief, attracted him sensuously.

Hopkins, who was a composer, philosopher, naturalist, and philologist, was also a painter. The reproduction of his autograph of "A Vision of the Mermaids," an early but beautiful poem which won a university prize, contains a Blake-like illustration that shows a powerful fancy. It is published in a limited edition that is certain to become a prized collector's item, especially since the poem is not published in full in any other form.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

From Belly to Mind

The Human Mind. By Karl A. Menninger. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

IN the limestone rocks in and about Buffalo, New York, the flattened impression of a curious lobster-like animal may be found. It was but one of many a crustacean that darted here and there in that great sea and its sluggish marshy reaches that once filled the interior of the North American continent countless millions of years ago. One of these fossils, the gift of the recently deceased genial and honored curator of the Buffalo Academy of Sciences, Henry R. Howland, lies temporarily as a paper weight upon this masterly work of Dr. Menninger's upon the human mind.

The apposition is not without interest, for, in a sense, above may be found the fossilized shadow of the creature that started the human brain on its upward pathway and below a concrete model portrayal of what that evolutionary product can bring about after all these millions of years.

The geologist has given the name "Eurypterus" to the fossil; the psychiatrist—Karl A. Menninger—has given a consummately valuable outline of the living instrument, the "human mind," that makes man's activities different from those of his paleostrachean ancestor.

In spite, however, of the millions of years of steady climbing up the ladder from Eurypterus, when, if Gaskell's fascinating hypothesis is to be given some credence, the structures which were primarily belly were cast aside in order that those to be brain might advance, we still hear the ancient and faulty one-sided slogan, "Mens sana in corpore sano." Even the Eurypterus so many eons past knew that body had to be sacrificed for brain. Thus this oft-quoted "a healthy mind in a healthy body" should have bracketed with it that even more importan correlate, that without a healthy mind a healthy body is o little service, and the still more important higher synthesis dear to the Hegelian dialectic, that only a healthy mind, in th highest sense, will produce a healthy body. What this "highest sense" of mental health, as an ideal, and its countles variants are and may be is told in this unusually attractiv volume.

Dr. Menninger has discarded the colossal humbug of th normal mind and has adopted the case method of presenting his subject. Every human mind is different and he tells us how and why—not in the prolix and ponderous terminology of the classifiers and Dewey card-index systems, but in simple, understandable, and yet quite scientifically correct terms, such as "personalities" that have to meet "situations" and develop "symptoms" if unsuccessful. He discusses the "motives" of "personalities" and the power of these motives; and "treatments" and "applications." Here is the simplest of skeletons filled in with a richness of detail that is informing and fascinating.

Dr. Menninger's handling of the most satisfactory recent methods of obtaining self-knowledge and of conquering our narcissism, namely, those of psychoanalysis, is essentially moderate and sound. He fortunately does not lose himself in psychoanalytic intricacies, but portrays only the more stabilized and usable conceptions which this method of investigation has made available. He shows above all that the method is only for the expert, and he holds that it is of the highest importance that those who value mental activities above those of the body should seek to have their mental discomforts treated only by properly trained individuals. Maurois and the New Biography

Byron. By André Maurois. Translated from the French by Hamish Miles. D. Appleton and Company. $5.

FOR the preparation of this volume M. Maurois was given access to several unpublished sources of material. From them he has selected various anecdotes which fill out without essentially altering the accepted outline of Byron's character, and he has achieved a clear if not particularly profound or original portrait of the man whose psychology is well summed up in the statement that "his tastes inclined him to intellectualism, his pride to dissipation." Perhaps M. Maurois, reacting against the reaction which followed upon Byron's enormous popularity, tends rather to exaggerate his merits as a poet. Perhaps he does not sufficiently take account of the fact that, however tumultuous Byron's rebellious passions may have been, the symbols which he used to express them were peculiarly childish, and his diabolical gestures—drinking out of a skull and making love to his half-sister—characteristic of a wickedness hardly more original or inventive than the virtue of the conventional people whom he despised. Yet despite a certain diffuseness, and despite an occasional laboring of the obvious in the psychological analysis, the book is extremely readable.

M. Maurois has, however, considerably altered his method since the days when he allowed his imagination full play in "Ariel." In part, perhaps, because the materials for the life of Byron are so copious that there is little temptation to fill in imaginary details he has made but sparing use of novelistic embroideries, and he has appended a long list of sources to the individual chapters. Nevertheless, the most interesting question in connection with his work still remains the question of method, and the advisability of making biography come as close as even this biography does to historical fiction. In order to point the question let us take one or two examples.

The conventional biographer might, for instance, begin something like this: "Newstead, the ancestral home of the Byrons, had been formerly an Augustinian monastery." M. Maurois, on the other hand, opens his book thus: "Through the enchanted Sherwood Forest, close to Nottingham, a little band of black-habited monks, canons regular of the Augustinian Order, came wandering among the oaks. King Henry the Second of England, threatened with excommunication for the murder of Thomas à Becket, had promised the Pope to do penance and to endow monasteries. A site was chosen in a valley, close to a spring and lake; the trees were felled, to the glory of God and for the salvation of the king's soul." Now a hundred recent biographies have made this picturesquely narrative beginning extremely familiar and it may reasonably be questioned whether it has not, by becoming conventional, already lost whatever justification it may once have had. Yet this, after all, is a matter of taste, and the method is less obviously open to serious objections than is the method of certain other passages where M. Maurois uses details which, so far as the reader can tell, may be either drawn from documentary sources or merely imagined.

Consider, for example, some sentences near the beginning of the third chapter. " 'And the Lord said unto Cain, Why art thou wroth and why is thy countenance fallen?'—May Gray was reading the Bible aloud, and the little Byron was listening with passionate eagerness. He did not understand all the words but he felt the strange and terrible poetry of the Book. Why did the Lord refuse poor Cain's sacrifice? 'Because of his sin,' said May Gray. Sin? What was sin? . . . All Scotland seemed full of ghosts. . . . In the darkness the child could feel evil things prowling about him." The list of sources gives four references for May Gray, but how many of the details do these sources give? Doubtless they establish the fact that she read him the Bible. But do we know that she read just that passage? Do we know that the little Byron asked specifically about sin, and that he was afraid of ghosts? Or, to take another example: When Maurois, speaking of the expeditions which the young man made with Mary Chaworth, says that "sometimes during these excursions their bodies touched, or hand brushed hand," and when he adds that "the contact made the boy's blood leap," are these details taken from Byron's journal or are they merely the biographer's conception of what probably would happen?

Perhaps these questions seem trivial, but the implications are not. The biographer must, of course, use his imagination, but the whole difference between the biography and the historical novel lies just in the fact that in the former one knows when the author is interpreting or imagining, while in the second one does not, and no little part of the pleasure which belongs to the reading of biography is just the pleasure which comes from following the process of the writer as he builds his picture out of the fragments of fact. When M. Maurois says that Byron's pride was responsible for his dissipation he is using his imagination, but since no concrete fact is involved we know that he is using it. When, on the other hand, he writes of Byron's mental state at the time of his marriage ceremony: "A mist seemed to float before his eyes; he was thinking (Heaven knew why!) of the parting scene with Mary Chaworth, conjuring up the room at Annesley, the long terrace, the grassy fields, that lovely face now twitching with unbalanced fears," we do not know whether we are reading a novel or not. One may turn to the list of sources, where one will find: "Byron's thoughts during the religious service are derived from his poem 'The Dream.' " But if one happens to be one of those general readers for whom a biography like the present is intended, one will have to look up the poem to discover, first, how literally these details are taken from it and, second, how nearly indisputably the poem is direct autobiography.

Few will deny that M. Maurois writes the kind of thing he does write more skilfully and with greater taste than most of those who adopt similar methods, but it is still worth asking whether or not it is worth while to jeopardize the difficult and beautiful art of biography by allowing it to merge even slightly with the totally different art of historical fiction. Dramatic form, vividness, and psychological significance are all virtues in biography, but the art of the biographer is the art of attaining them in the highest possible degree without adopting means which make the so-called biography into something else.

BORZOI BOOKS

Russian-American Chimera

The Two Frontiers. By John Gould Fletcher. Coward-McCann. $3.

EMPLOYING the Spenglerian method of historical intuition and analogy, Mr. Fletcher arrives at the vision of Russia and America as the two great barbarian, frontier nations, encircling and pressing upon a harassed European civilization, and between them determining its doom. The world finds itself in the dilemma of having to make either a choice or a compromise between "the two opposed conceptions of the destiny of mankind": the triumphant new capitalism of America and the equally vigorous social mysticism of Russia. Conflict is inevitable between these giant adversaries and spells disaster for all that Europe represents of human values and arts. The duty of intelligent Russians and Americans is to "oppose the tides of bolshevism and Americanism. . . . We must save America and Russia from themselves."

"The Two Frontiers," with its richness of prophecy, analogy, fantasy, and sheer nonsense, falls thus into the class of those œuvres de synthèse, those vehicles of generalization, whose frequent appearance has been an interesting sign of the time. The appealing notion of Spengler that modern man has become a historical animal, his whole attempt at a morphology of civilizations, has encouraged this form of speculation. But for this dangerous new game one needs a generous equipment; one needs a large and curious documentation and intellectual daring enough to stun or enchant the reader, now with paradox and now with brilliant intuitions. Else one comes to grief.

Certainly Mr. Fletcher comes to grief. The technique of the gifted Spengler in the hands of a faltering historiographer becomes a lamentable instrument. The whole system of judgment by historical analogy, which lures Mr. Fletcher as far back as Egypt and Babylonia in search of parallels to the Russian and American situation, breaks down before our eyes. We become aware instead of all those terrible antitheses and baffling lacunae with which the record of man on earth abounds; so that all that passes for "philosophy of history" seems still suspect, a debased form of metaphysics.

In that dark past from which all nations emerge, amid ludicrous analogies drawn from ancient Egyptian dynasties, Assyria, or early Rome, Mr. Fletcher is simply lost upon the historical ocean. Few readers will fail to perceive the futility of likening one of our Presidents to Amenophis IV, or Catharine the Great to George Washington! Nor at a later stage do any of the comparisons and contrasts between the mysterious empire of Eastern Europe and the colonies, the provincial republic beyond the Atlantic, seem much more valid. The greatest portion of this work, devoted to a confused account alternately of Russian and American history, was intended no doubt to substantiate the author's convictions about the present epoch in both countries. It tells us no more than the definitive genealogy of Mr. Henry Ford, traced back to Norman times, would tell us about his qualities as an automobile-maker.

The treatise on the growth of the two literatures during the nineteenth century is written out of a better equipment. But even here one marvels at the uselessness of likening Hawthorne to Gogol, the Byronic Pushkin to Irving, and Mark Twain to the obscure Lyeskov. No, it would have been far better for Mr. Fletcher to have confined himself to the present, the actual character of the two great "frontier nations," which under the sign of certain ruling economic ideas seem rather to show an astonishing resemblance, even affinity, for each other than to be on the verge of deadly conflict.

Once we look beyond the surface phenomena and the professed doctrines which governments conveniently choose to adopt—such as "capitalism" or "communism" or "democracy"—the actual will and impetus of these two nations declare themselves for precisely the same ideas of incessant materialistic progress. Today Russia subjects all other interests to that of the vast Five-Year Industrial Expansion Plan. And the direst Rotarian in our land could not fail to applaud such booming enterprise. The leaders of both nations have the common ideal of raising the physical dignity of the mass, while ignoring or discouraging those individual liberties, those human arts and refinements which were usually predicated of perfected societies. Both peoples are apathetic toward politics: no such shades of opinion or opposition are tolerated as in politically minded England and France. The development of both nations, in short, is toward collectivism and uniformity in response to the working of sheer economic force, which in their case is seldom checked by the limits of tradition or religion, as in the case of the little jealous countries of old Europe. One begins to believe that Moscow is closer to Wall Street with its beehives of engineers and promoters than to our political libertarians who make abortive demonstrations in its honor. The American ideals of Ford and Edison have been added to the Russian religion of equality and state service. And by the same token one may hope that a certain moral fervor will some day he communicated to Americans by Russia's example, so that a heightened social responsibility might work again upon the somewhat successful, but rather unfinished, native system.

In any case Mr. Fletcher's chimera of war between the Russian and American titans seems scarcely to justify the long, pious pilgrimage to ancient Babylonian oracles for verification. One sees these giant nations, each committed to its "great experiment" by economic causes long in preparation. Neither will be stayed by issues such as freedom of thought, personal liberty, or gay passions. Art and learning, as well as the disinterested classes who contribute to them, will have to make shift within the system; while the old illuminated nations of Europe can hardly hope, through the force of their culture or their rooted prejudices alone, to combat the resistless economic tides that sweep upon them today.

MATTHEW JOSEPHSON

Witnesses Against War

Témoins. By Jean Norton Cru. Paris: Les Etincelles. 100 francs.

A REMARKABLE book, of great interest to historians, psychologists, librarians, pacifists, students of literature, and many others. Unless suppressed by a conspiracy of silence it will cause many a militarist to rage and many a French writer to gnash his teeth, but it deserves to be consulted carefully as a notable contribution to what war really is. It confirms Sherman's dictum.

Mr. Cru has collected, annotated, analyzed, and skilfully compared several hundred French war diaries, reminiscences, reflections, and novels of persons who claim to have fought at the front and to have been "witnesses" of the realities of the World War. With extraordinary diligence he has ferreted out a brief biography of each writer, indicated all the regiments or divisions, with dates, to which he successively belonged, and given brief typical selections from the works of each. His closely printed volume of more than 700 large pages is both a bibliography and to some extent a critical anthology of the war literature of the common poilu like himself. In addition to a very complete index he has added eleven ingenious analyses, which enable the reader to find out what the men in the trenches thought and wrote about, and which give interesting statistics of their ages, peace occupations, geographical origins, fighting sectors, and publishers.

Mr. Cru, though a professor at Williams College, was born in France and fought throughout the war. He understands thoroughly the psychology of his fellow poilus. By comparing their written accounts, by using maps, and by internal evidence, he is able to sift out discriminatingly the relatively few reliable and accurate books from the majority which are vitiated by ignorance, imagination, self-importance, and the false bombast of "glory." One of his tests, for instance, is the poilu's reference to rain, which is easily checked up. One author he discredits because he uses Boche in August, 1914, whereas the true word in the first weeks of the war was Alboche, the shorter form not coming into general use until the early autumn of 1914. He uncovers the plagiarism from the memoir writers of the Napoleonic period. By intensive study of this kind he is able to rescue from obscurity or oblivion such excellent and reliable writers as Ardant du Picq, Deauville, Genevoix, Lintier, and Pézard; and also to dissect with levastating criticism such ignorant, overestimated, and fantasic best-sellers as Barbusse, Bertrand, Péricard, and Stéphane Lauzanne.

Mr. Cru concludes that whatever illusions about the glory of war the poilu may have had at mobilization, as soon as he was in the mud of the trenches with shells exploding round him his dominant thoughts were fear, weariness, horror, isgust, and the desire to live and to leave. He has some scathng remarks about staff officers, both on account of their outf-date prejudices arising from hard-boiled past training and n account of their ignorance of front-line conditions. It is omewhat the point of view of Philip Gibbs's "Now It Can Be Told" or of Jean de Pierrefeu's "Plutarch a menti."

It is to be hoped that similar studies may be made of German, English, and American "witnesses." Spade-work of his kind, distinguishing fact from fancy, will be of great serice to the future historian. It will also debunk the notion f the gloriousness of war, show its utter terribleness for those n the front line, and consequently strengthen the peace movement.

Dr. Levin's Life

outh in Revolt. By Shmarya Levin. Translated by Maurice Samuel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

IN The Nation for January 1 I reviewed Dr. Levin's delightful and moving "Childhood in Exile" without knowing that it was only the prelude to what promises to be one the important autobiographies of our time. This second volme carries on its author's personal fortunes through the eights and nineties, in and out of high schools and universities, nd from Russia to Germany. But it is much more than a rsonal record. Along with the youthful Levin we come to ips with Russian history and Jewish sufferings; we pass rough the terrible period of the pogroms; we go deeply into e whole Jewish question; and we make contacts with the cial revolutionary forces. Dr. Levin, of course, writes from e standpoint of the profoundly sincere Jewish Nationalist, the onist, a man who has devoted his life brilliantly and effecely to a single cause. And though the style is graceful and bane there is no compromise in the point of view. But whater one's political views, one will be deeply moved as one serves the naive country boy developing into the hot-blooded ung dialectician, the university student in the thick of every wish Nationalist disturbance, meeting leaders, writing poetry d essays, and making passionate speeches. Here is a young man who had something to work for, to fight for, to dream for. Here is a type of the university student of whom one has read —the type who in times past has played an important part in every revolution, but a type which, alas, in our own glorified institutions one has never seen. Many fascinating people crowd this vivid story of intellectual youth. Some are old friends from Swislowitz; some are or are to become famous—scholars, Jewish leaders, socialist leaders. One expects to hear more of them in the forthcoming volumes of the work.

The Sitwells Present—

The Man Who Lost Himself. By Osbert Sitwell. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

IT was to be expected after the first flurries of Anglicized French verse, after "Façade" and the sea farce and "Southern Baroque Art" that the problems besetting the novel would not have long to wait for a Sitwellian solution. It was equally to be expected that the result would follow the family's general characteristics and be original, brilliant, and a trifle confused.

Many of the aesthetics of Mr. Osbert Sitwell's book mus be discounted. Whether biography is the only material which offers a perfect design for a novel; whether, to obtain a proper perspective of a man living today, it is necessary to postulat the remote future; whether the typical twentieth-century novel will set a balance between mind and action are question Mr. Sitwell plays with but to which he makes no definite replies. What is important is that, eschewing the paths of th advance guard of the modernists, Joyce and Proust, refusing t chart another stream of consciousness or to record the psychology of a social stratum, Mr. Sitwell trys to weave a pattern between a mental phenomenon and a landscape. Poe, b divorcing both his characters and setting from reality, achieve magnificent designs, and Mr. Sitwell might well have succeede within realistic bounds had he not chosen a phenomenon which could have occurred if Tristram Orlander had stayed in London and never set foot in Granada. The gifted young autho whose unrequited love affair eventually told on his nerves experienced his readjustments to life in acute visionary form but what Mr. Sitwell fails to show is the indisputable influence of Granada on these experiences. The result is a cleavage i the design: Tristram never really merges with his backgroun his story and Granada's never become one. Yet this separation confusing as it is in view of the author's emphasis of his technique, does not harm the essential quality of the work.

"The Man Who Lost Himself" is ironic fantasy such a only the Sitwells concoct with grace. Its impressions of grotesque beauty are built as much from the delicate mixture o farce, realism, and a peculiarly poetic awareness of nature infinite guises as from the tragedy of Tristram's fatal sens tiveness. The picture of Granada, of its changing shape colors, odors, and sounds under the rising and setting sun ar moon, succeeds in that most difficult of all descriptive tasks—th creation of a personality for a portion of the earth's surfac What the great romantic poets were wont to do for the Rhin and Greece Mr. Sitwell does for this hill in Spain. On th pages from which this image rises is some of the richest co temporary prose—prose which for its fecundity, resilience, ar dignity reverts for comparison to the masters of the eighteen century. Rhetoric of this kind, with its intricate structural ar emotional convolutions, is a lost art among the cinematic write of the day, but as Mr. Sitwell revives it, it contains inflectio of wit and elegance which are not to be ignored.

Delightful Lunacy

TODAY the author's part in the talking picture is undoubtedly much more important than it used to be in the days of the silent picture, but his exact contribution till remains a great deal of a mystery. As an example one nay quote "The Man from Blankley's" (Central), the honors f whose authorship are distributed by the program among the author," the "screen adapter," and the "dialogist." In this ase therefore, unless one has read Mr. Anstey's original story, ne really does not know whether the credit for the delightful ialogue of the picture should go to him or to the "dialogist"; or does one know whether upon him or the "screen adapter" hould be fastened the blame for the thinness of the plot and he triviality of some of the scenes. Despite this uncertainty, owever, let it be stated with all haste that "The Man from lankley's" is a picture decidedly different from the general run f Hollywood productions. It has "quality"—the quality of ubtle and imaginative literary intelligence—shining through its nes, though it lacks similar distinction in its dramatic and nematic aspects.

It gives one a quite pleasant shock to discover a world as oignantly grotesque and whimsical as that in "Alice in Wonerland" or in Chekhov's "The Wedding" in what ostensibly is n unpretentious farcical comedy poking gentle fun at a collecion of Victorian freaks. Indeed, the Dickensian flavor of the cture, to which reference is made in the program, extends no urther than the make-up and costumes of its characters, hereas there is a distinct echo of Lewis Carroll and Chekhov the delicious disquisition on the peculiarities of scarabs, and such bits of conversation as the remark by one of the guests at "hair does not grow under the legs of a rhinoceros." The riking resemblance of "The Man from Blankley's" to "The edding" can hardly escape notice, particularly in the parallel a lord and a general who unknown to themselves act the rts of hired guests at a party. But in both plays the plot is ly a peg on which the authors hang the wistful lunacy of eir characters, and one's only regret is that compared with hekhov's play "The Man from Blankley's" is just a little too me. Mr. John Barrymore plays the tipsy lord excellently, d of the rest of the cast the midgety Miss Jones in the small rt of Miss Bugle mingles her eccentricity with almost enough thos to create a memorable image. Apart from its dialogue d acting the picture can boast of no cinematic virtues. It itates the stage quite expertly, but gets no farther than that. is to be hoped that even Hollywood will one day realize that ematic treatment of dialogue is not confined to close-ups of e speaking characters.

Though Hollywood has not yet learned how to give music om the screen instead of reproducing it as it is given from stage, Mr. John McCormack's "Song o' My Heart" (Forty-urth Street Theater) deserves praise for the technical quality its reproduction of sound and the simplicity and persuasive nquillity of its acting and setting.

One does not look for any kind of "sophistication" in Mr. lson's pictures, but it seems as if the brand of sentimental peal so skilfully exploited by this artist were beginning to wear her thin. "Mammy" (Warner Brothers) is, of course, aner instance of backstage life, this time of the minstrel variety, d with its simulacrum of a plot it provides Mr. Jolson with ficient opportunities for singing Irving Berlin's reminiscences the world's music direct from the stage platform. Mr. Jol- is a gifted enough artist to try to get away from a formula inning to pall.

Shakespeare Without Pain

MUCH can be said in favor of the Shakespearean stock company. To its members the bard has become an everyday affair and that fact in itself is enough to remove one of the curses which rest upon the Shakespearean performance. No one can play him week after week without losing the awkwardness which too great reverence induces, and nothing is more likely than too much reverence to destroy the acting value of plays which are eminently actable as well as a great many other things. Doubtless certain fine shadings are lost; but it is hardly less likely that some of them were lost when Burbage was a star, and what one seeks in the theater is not the thing which one can get better in the study but the thing which one cannot get there at all—the rush of the action and the physical confrontation of creatures endowed with flaming eloquence.

No one, I suppose, ever accused Fritz Leiber or any member of his company of brilliance. Neither have I ever heard serious discussion of any original interpretation invented by him, for he is, I believe, not wont to discover that Hamlet suffered from an Oedipus complex or that Shylock was a hero. But he is, on the other hand, an experienced war horse who has not only played with Julia Marlowe and Robert Mantell but barn-stormed as well, and though I do not know how many commentaries he may have read he has at least nine of the major roles by heart—which implies a certain familiarity with the text of the dramatist whom he plays. The result of it all is that the performances which he and his Chicago Civic Shakespeare Society have been giving at the Shubert have at least those elementary virtues which count for much. His Hamlet is clear and comprehensible, his Petruchio amusing, his Richard III rather thin, and his Lear pretty bad. But most of the performances are undeniably interesting, and accordingly, whatever else Shakespeare may or may not be when thus interpreted, he certainly is not a bore.

Mr. Leiber makes something of a boast of avoiding the academic. He prefers, so he says, to present Shakespeare rather than to inflict him, and in the effort to achieve this laudable end he cuts without mercy (though by no means without judgment) when the occasion seems to demand. Moreover, despite his promise to present the dramatist "as he wrote," he has no scruple against employing that most famous of interpolations "So much for Buckingham" or, what is infinitely more objectionable, against the rather frequent interjection of certain colloquial "well's," "why's," "yes's," and "no's" not in the text. Indeed, he gags his "Taming of the Shrew" most unmercifully and seems to have forgotten that in addressing the players a few evenings before he had described that sort of thing as the result of a "most pitiful ambition." He could, in other words, be a bit more faithful without approaching pedantry, and demonstrate the faith he professes to have in Shakespeare's skill as a popular entertainer by making fewer such minor improvements. But these are, after all, matters of no very great moment, and even if we insist that they are blemishes, the fact remains that much can be subtracted from Shakespeare without greatly diminishing what is left. It is not often that we get an opportunity to see any one of the plays performed with any sort of competence at all. Mr. Leiber gives us nine, gives them tolerably well, and on the whole gives them for their own sakes rather than because he has some trick scenery to show off or because he has become infected with an itch to disport himself in some production designed for his own aggrandizement. Chicago is fortunate to have him, and I hope he will visit us again.

UPLIFTING MORAL UPLIFTERS

Mr. Brock hits straight, and hard, in a book that is very likely to upset the indifference of the long-suffering American public.

Nicholas Roosevelt says: "You did a fine job and I only hope you will be roundly abused by all meddlers, so that the whole country will read you. I admire your freedom from sectional, denominational and occupational bias. This makes you invulnerable—except by the meddlers themselves."

"Shows to what extent minorities govern in the United States . . . on every conceivable phase of censorship of the individual . . . My guess is that we are going to see more books like it. Distinguished Books

A HISTORY OF

MODERN CULTURE

Volume One—The Great Renewal: 1543-1687

By PRESERVED SMITH

This volume contains an accurate and variegated survey of the intellectual progress of Western culture during the period of its great renewal. Professor Smith describes in turn the sciences, the humanities and the spirit of the age as they were reflected in the work and expressed thought of the leading men of the time. $5.00

THE GROWTH AND DECADENCE OF CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT

By J. ALLEN SMITH

"The late Professor Smith appears in the present book as a quiet ut outspoken challenger of a good many cherished notions about he merits of American democracy. . . . His temper is so fine, his ourage so unflinching, and his learning so obvious though carefully oncealed, that what he says may not safely be neglected even if one isagrees."—WILLIAM MACDONALD in Current History. $3.00

SOME SOUTHERN COTTON MILL WORKERS AND THEIR VILLAGES

By JENNINGS J. RHYNE

Gaston County, the scene of the recent labor struggles, is likewise the scene of this book, which treats of 500 families in the four types of mill villages represented in that area. Housing, wages, hours, mobility, origin of family, relationships with management—and many other aspects of mill village conditions have been studied. The survey was made before the strike and was prepared for the Institute for Research in Social Science under the direction of Professor Howard W. Odum. Ready now. $2.50

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY IN NORTH CAROLINA

By CLARENCE C. NORTON

An account covering one of the most important periods of our history—1835-1861—and dealing with the issues that culminated in the Civil War. It discloses the background of much party machinery familiar to us today. May. $3.00

THE SEVENTEENTH-CENTURY SHERIFF

By CYRUS HARRELD KARRAKER

Studies of local government have given too little attention to English origins. This volume, containing many illustrative documents not before printed, does give the background, showing how local government diverged from the orginal in colonial Virginia and Maryland, and using the sheriff as a typical officer of that background and of the departures from it. May. $2.50

NORTH CAROLINA: Economic and Social

By SAMUEL HUNTINGTON HOBBS, JR.

In these days of ballyhoo it is often very difficult to come upon an honest appraisal of a state. Yet that is what Mr. Hobbs has made in this survey of North Carolina's resources, wealth, industries, population, agriculture, water power, education, illiteracy ratios, farm tenancy, etc. He has studied the state closely for 15 years and knows whereof he speaks. His book is therefore a model for "home-state" studies. May. $3.00

MATERIALS FOR THE LIFE OF SHAKESPEARE

By PIERCE BUTLER

Not an outline, but a narrative, in which the most important source documents are deftly inserted at their proper places and slightly modernized for convenient reading. Particular emphasis is placed on those materials relating to contemporary opinion of Shakespeare. A book for the reader, teacher, and student of Shakespeare and for libraries lacking Shakespeare sources. April. $2.00

RELEASED: A BOOK OF VERSE

By ANNE BLACKWELL PAYNE

A slender little first volume of lyric verse by a Southern poet whose work has appeared in leading magazines and poetry anthologies. Her sonnets, light lyrics, and "poems for a child" are all admirably sincere, simple, clear in imagery, and true in their rhythms. April. $1.50

American Charities and Social Work . .

By AMOS G. WARNER, STUART A. QUEEN (University of Kansas), and ERNEST B. HARPER (Kalamazoo College).

Fourth Edition (26th printing)

Revised and Reset

The "Charities" of 1893 and the "social work" of 1929 display striking differences. Professor Queen has contributed an introductory section giving the reader a perspective of the whole field. Then comes the original Warner material, which is followed by a survey of recent social work. The new material comprises two-thirds of the entire text.

[FROM AN EDITORIAL]

I want to persuade my readers to secure the current issue of The Bookman. In my opinion, this is the most important and the most significant number ever printed.

I have known The Bookman from its birth in England, October, 1891, and have but to turn around in my chair to reach for the first eleven volumes. In 1897 I left England and a little while later transferred my allegiance to The Bookman in America, whose first editor was, I believe, Professor Thurston Peck. In all these years since I do not recall a single issue which, for interest, insight and courage, comes up to the one that lies on my desk at this moment.

Glenway Wescott's appreciation of Elizabeth Madox Roberts, Chesterton's characteristic outburst on "Magic and Fantasy in Fiction," Francis Hackett's essay on "The Post-Victorians," and Hamlin Garland's "Roadside Meetings," would, by themselves, make any magazine notable. But that which makes this issue so worth while for the student of contemporary tendencies in literature is the space that it gives to, and the attitude it reveals toward, humanism. Not to speak of the rather militant controversy between Allen Tate and Robert Shafer on what Mr. Tate called "The Fallacy of Humanism," there are two other articles that should be read by everybody who would understand what all the excitement is about.

Mr. Seward Collins, the editor, devotes his whole article on "Chronicle and Comment" to humanism. In fifteen two-column pages Mr. Collins gives his readers the most thorough and intelligent review and exposition of the humanistic movement it has ever been my good fortune to read. It would be impossible to give in a few paragraphs the gist of this comprehensive essay. I think there is scarcely a point at issue between humanists and anti-humanists on which Mr. Collins has not something illuminating to say. The whole movement is here set forth with a sympathetic understanding and a clarity of expression that makes the essay of immense value to those of my readers who know of humanism only what its enemies have ignorantly said of it.

But the chief place is given to Mr. Paul Elmer More's article on "A Revival of Humanism." It is far more than the review of Humanism and America, which it modestly pretends to be. It is an answer—and a magnificent answer—to all those sneering critics who delight in pointing out that humanists "can't even agree among themselves," and who draw the damning conclusion that humanism is nothing but confusion worse confounded. That there should be divergencies in so critical and delicate an attitude toward life and letters as humanism implies is a foregone conclusion, the human mind being what it is. But the truly impressive thing is the unanimity of humanists on certain essential and revolutionary views and attitudes.

The Twilight of Empire by Scott Nearing

Author of "Black America," "Dollar Diplomacy", etc.

The manuscript of this book caused Dr. Nearing's expulsion from the Communist Party. In these pages he raises the question whether the United States has entered upon an imperialist cycle comparable to that of Rome and of other empires that have vanished.

Building for Happiness

The common impression that social work is primarily concerned with salvaging unfortunates is only partly correct. Social work is concerned not only with normalizing the socially maladjusted individual but also with building up a happier and culturally richer community life. In Jewish social work the opportunities for constructive work are especially numerous and promising.

Have you chosen your career? If not, you should examine carefully the advantages, both tangible and intangible, of

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE BUDGET SPEECH of the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought to the British taxpayer the unwelcome, though not wholly unexpected, news of an increase in the normal rate of income tax, together with an increase in the surtax rate, a raising of the death duties from 40 to 50 per cent on estates exceeding £2,000,000, and an additional tax on the brewing industry, all the new taxes together being calculated to bring in some £42,000,000. As Mr. Churchill bequeathed his successor a deficit and made unsatisfactory provision for the sinking fund to boot, and as the present Cabinet has increased expenditures, Mr. Snowden had a hard task, and he has performed it with characteristic British courage. He announces that the Government is planning a valuation bill to serve as a basis of taxation of land values, a reform generations overdue. He states that the safeguarding duties will be allowed to lapse as they expire, and while expressing regret that the present financial situation does not permit him to wipe out the McKenna duties now, declares that the Government will keep its pledges regarding them. Philip Snowden may be depended on to keep faith.

PRESIDENT HOOVER and Secretary Stimson have both expressed their lively satisfaction with the results of the London conference. In doing so the President gives the tonnage basis of the parity agreement for the British and American fleets. We set down his figures, and beside them the figures of our present fleet, reported by the Navy Department as of July 29, 1929:

	Treaty basis	Present navy
Capital ships	460,000	525,850
Cruisers	339,000	305,000
Aircraft carriers	135,000	92,500
Destroyers	150,000	337,996
Submarines	52,700	81,807

A few points deserve notice: Battleships are obsolete, and there are to be no replacements for six years. Our actual cruiser tonnage afloat last July was 75,000 tons, the figure given above including cruisers building as well as the additional fifteen only authorized. The treaty figures would mean an addition of nearly half to our present tonnage in aircraft carriers. As for the last two categories, both Great Britain and the United States wanted to abolish the submarine entirely. We are glad that the President finds the figures satisfactory.

THE PROTEST AGAINST JUDGE PARKER has become so formidable that Republican leaders in the Senate have waited on the President and warned him of the party danger involved. It is a fitting judgment on Mr. Hoover for making a purely political appointment of this sort to the Supreme Court. The strength of the Negro opposition, based on Judge Parker's anti-Negro utterances, is notable, and the fear that it inspires in Republican breasts is encouraging. Labor objection, due, of course, to Judge Parker's action in upholding so-called "yellow-dog" contracts, under which workers pledge themselves not to join a union, has disturbed the President so much that he has found it necessary to issue a public defense of his candidate. Opposition is strong in the Senate and in the Judiciary Committee itself and the committee report has been deferred a week. Altogether, it begins to look as though the North Carolina politician might be taken for quite a ride before he is firmly seated on the Supreme Bench. Perhaps after a few more tries President Hoover may come to consider the desirability of nominating to the Supreme Court a genuinely intelligent and liberal jurist.

THE FLATHEAD POWER LEASE, which we discussed two weeks ago, is still pending as we write, but is likely to be awarded at any moment unless the strong hand of Congress intervenes. The record in the case is clear, and each step in the affair makes the position of the responsible government officials worse. Assistant Commissioner Scattergood at the November hearings demonstrated that the minimum Indian rental should be $319,000 a year. By basing the rental on the earnings of the dummy Rocky Mountain Power Company, which will sell cheap to its owner, the Montana, this figure has now been juggled down to $104,000, and there are reports that it may go even lower, despite heated Indian protests. Senator Frazier deserves public thanks for exposing the fraud on the floor of the Senate and making a gallant fight for the Indians. Senatorial courtesy ought no longer to prevent the introduction and passage by the Senate of the Kvale resolution to refer the whole sorry business to a reorganized Federal Power Commission, particularly now that the Couzens resolution for such reorganization has been reported. If the lease is now jammed through, President Hoover, Secretary Wilbur, and Commissioners Rhoads and Scattergood are going to find themselves in a most unenviable position in the eyes of informed men.

THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT must choose between two immediate unknowns in India. It must decide whether Gandhi at liberty is more dangerous than Gandhi in jail. At first, apparently, the Viceroy thought that the campaign of non-violent civil disobedience would die of anemia if it were met by non-violence. But the campaign has been increasing in volume. Jawarhalal Nehru, president of the Indian National Congress, has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment for violating the salt law; the Mayor of Calcutta has been sentenced to six months on charges of sedition. The Gujarat district—the region in Bombay province in which both Ahmedabad and Dandi are located—is thoroughly roused. In the city of Bombay, to the south, several hundred thousand followers of Gandhi demonstrated against the salt tax, and the salt law is being flouted as it is in most of the large cities of British India. Meanwhile the boycott of foreign and especially British cloth is gaining adherents, while according to a New York Times dispatch the boycott of police and government officials in the Gujarat district referred to above is so complete that the authorities have been compelled to establish a store of their own to provide food and other commodities for themselves. So far there have been remarkably few arrests and practically no violence in the civil-disobedience campaign, though there have been several clashes between police and striking workmen in various parts of India. Whatever the government decides about Gandhi, however, and whether the present campaign fails or not, the events now taking place make it seem impossible that the relationship of India to Great Britain can be again what it has been in the past. India's demand for self-government can no longer be answered either by a recital of the good works of the British raj or by reiteration of the opinion that Indians are not fit to rule themselves.

AFTER A CLOSE SQUEAK things seem to be past the immediate crisis in Haiti. The central question was whether or not President Borno's Council of State on April 14 would ratify the choice of M. Eugène Roy, the candidate agreed on for temporary President by the various political groups and the Hoover commission. The intrigues of Borno and his followers brought matters to such a pitch that there was imminent danger of an outbreak, and it became necessary for the American Department of State to take strong ground in sustaining the commission. According to a United Press dispatch, President Borno on April 13 accordingly adjourned the Council of State, officially declaring such adjournment "indispensable to the public peace." This action leaves the legal situation somewhat mixed, but the State Department has warned President Borno that no one but Roy will be recognized as temporary President, and President Hoover gives evidence of a commendable determination to carry out the recommendations of the commission. So long as this policy is adhered to and the Haitians feel assured of American good faith, immediate difficulties can be overcome.

ALL HONOR to the Supreme Court of Minnesota, which has actually had the gumption to declare a veteran-preference law invalid. To be sure, it was a flagrant case, and it touched the monopolistic spirit of the lawyers' guild, for it was a measure admitting to the bar without examination any veteran whose disability under the World War Veterans Act was rated as at least 10 per cent at the time of the passage of the Minnesota law. Even so, it is refreshing to hear the court, after asserting the familiar legal principle that the basis of any legal classification must be germane to the subject matter, say flatly:

> We are unable to conceive how the fact that the applicant has served in the World War and has been disabled therein to an extent rated under a federal statute as at least 10 per cent at the time of the passage of this act has any tendency to show that he possesses the qualifications necessary to fit him to practice law.

If other courts had the nerve to apply the same principle in other cases, most of the veteran-preference acts that at present serve to prevent the best men from being selected for various lines of public service would disappear from our statute books.

RESPECT FOR LAW has been so much touted ever since Mr. Hoover solemnly called for the observance of all the laws in sight that important steps in the great campaign ought not to be overlooked. The New York courts, as usual, have been doing their bit, while in one of the most notorious cases the House of Representatives has graciously helped out. Federal Judge Grover M. Moscowitz of the Eastern District of New York, whose gross misconduct in office has been under investigation by the Judiciary Committee of the House for about a year, has just been censured by the House for "unethical and dangerous" conduct "threatening the destruction of the confidence of the bar and the community in the court and calculated to bring it into discredit," but the honorable judge, it is reported, intends to stick to his job. Chief Magistrate William McAdoo of the New York City courts has also been censured by the City Bar Association for depriving William Z. Foster and other Communists of their constitutional rights and "abusing his powers without justification" in refusing to admit them to bail, but the Chief Magistrate's retirement to private life has not yet been announced. We daresay that technicalities by the yard are on the side of the New York court which on April 11 ruled out summarily pretty much everything that counsel had to offer in defense of Mr. Foster and others for their conduct in the Union Square demonstration on March 6, and then allowed the great and only Police Commissioner Grover Whalen to hold forth for an hour and five minutes, but to the average man the proceedings of the court smell to heaven.

ON APRIL 6 Inspector Piaggio, of the United States Immigration Service, strode on the stage at an anti-Fascist meeting in Cooper Union, in New York, and attempted to arrest Armando Borghi, Italian anarchist, wanted for deportation. A small riot ensued, in which Borghi escaped and a policeman shot and killed Carlo Mazzolo, an American citizen and a war veteran. Inspector Piaggio could scarcely have done worse if he had deliberately undertaken to incite a riot. His action lends too much color to the charge that he is animated by hostility to American anti-Fascists, and abundantly warrants the investigation promised by Immigration Commissioner Day. We trust that it will be a thorough one, and will show whether Mussolini has been able to extend his influence to our immigration service. The case calls attention again to the operation of our present immigration law in destroying the right of asylum. Political refugees are likely to reach our shores without proper papers. The immigration service then may find itself engaged in the task of catching them and sending them back home to prison, or by special arrangement deporting them to countries that express a willingness to receive them. We believe that the United States ought to be today, as it has been in the past, a refuge for the oppressed of other lands.

A VERDICT carrying the penalty of death has just been returned by a jury against a man for the murder of a fourteen-year-old girl. This sounds ordinary enough until one learns that the man is white, the girl was black, and the scene is New Orleans. By the law of the State a jury in returning a verdict of murder in Louisiana must stipulate either for the death penalty or for some lighter punishment, and New Orleans newspapers say that, so far as is recalled, the case is the first one in the city in which a white man has been condemned to death for slaying a Negro. Several verdicts of guilty have been returned in similar circumstances heretofore, but not with the death penalty. There was nothing unusually atrocious in the murder. The slayer was a supernumerary policeman who shot his victim in a hotel kitchen after she had repeatedly repulsed his advances. His defense was intoxication, but there was testimony that he could talk coherently when questioned immediately after the tragedy. The New Orleans Times-Democrat, a conservative organ of the old regime, says editorially that "had the slayer been a Negro and his fourteen-year-old victim a white girl, the crime would have aroused a storm of indignation" and that the jury "deserves community approval and thanks for prescribing the penalty provided by the white man's law." The Nation, as its readers know, is not in favor of capital punishment, but it is in favor of one law for all, and it is glad to see respect for this rising superior to race feeling in the heart of the old South.

ON APRIL 7 Malcolm MacDonald, son of the Prime Minister, and Megan Lloyd George, daughter of David Lloyd George, made their maiden speeches in the House of Commons under the eyes of their respective and doubtless beaming parents. "As always happens when the opportunity offers," runs the New York Times's special cablegram, "the whole House rose to the occasion, made a most friendly nonpartisan demonstration in honor of the two young parliamentarians, and offered congratulations to their respective fathers." What could be more charming and more characteristically English in its sportsmanship? The House of Commons is rigid in its rules, severe and caustic in its judgments, and determined to keep its proceedings at a high level, but it is always kindly to the beginner whether he or she be a youngster or well beyond middle age. That fact must give great courage to the youths about to make a debut in the room where Cromwell and all the long line of famous Englishmen since his time took the plunge and then learned how to make history.

WITH THE PALESTINE REPORT still the subject of lively and acrimonious debate, it is a pleasure to record the dedication at Jerusalem on April 15 of the Wolffsohn Memorial Library of the Hebrew University. The fifth anniversary of the opening of the university shows its library of 217,000 volumes already the largest in the Near East. Open to the public of all races and religions, it is used by Moslems and Christians as well as Jews. Its medical library, the only one of importance in the whole region, is already performing an important service. It includes, also, the Jewish National Library, founded thirty years ago by the Lithuanian physician Dr. Joseph Chasanovitch, and the great mathematical library of Professor Klein of Göttingen, and its collections in these fields are already among the finest and most complete in the world. One intensely interesting item is the original manuscript of the theory of relativity, presented by Dr. Einstein, a member of the first board of governors of the university. The library building was erected by the labor of Jews and Arabs, men and women, scholars and students, many of them coming from Eastern Europe. We congratulate the chancellor of the university, that great American Judah L. Magnes, and his associates, and their supporters all over the world, who in the short space of five years have brought to a state of fruition their great enterprise for the healing of the nations.

THE NEW YORK TELEPHONE COMPANY announces that its experiments with television are progressing nicely, thank you. It is now possible to sit in a sort of booth that shuts out other sights and sounds, with a glass plate in front of you and a system of instruments above your head, and, speaking into no transmitter, listening with no receiver, to talk to the plainly perceived image of someone any number of miles away, whose face you see, whose voice you hear, whose watch, held up before your distant eyes, you can tell time by. As yet the device is far too elaborate and expensive for commercial use. But we are convinced that it is only a question of time before the face of our vis-a-vis on the telephone will be as visible as his voice is now audible. And when that day comes we are going to be very uncomfortable at the thought of possible next steps after television has become a commonplace. What if some scientist should invent a button that could be held in the hand and that, when lightly touched to the forearm of a companion, would disclose the unfortunate person's secret thoughts, his inmost desires and distastes? We have enough confidence in modern science to be afraid that just such a hideous invasion of our privacy may one day take place. These inventing fellows will stop at nothing. We hereby give warning, therefore, that if the time ever comes when we cannot think our own thoughts without detection this paper will suspend publication and its editors will form in line and jump off the nearest bridge. We are as yet not worried about what sort of communication will be established if the corpses are recovered.

Court, Beer, and Politics

TO be the daughter of a Senator, the wife of a Senator, and herself a Senator—that record may be assured to Congressman Ruth Hanna McCormick by the astounding majority she rolled up over Senator Deneen in the Illinois primary. As a wife she revenged herself for the defeat in 1924, by only 6,000 votes, of her husband by Senator Deneen; as a daughter she proved that she has not forgotten the teachings of Mark Hanna, whom, even as a young girl of fifteen and sixteen, she accompanied on his political campaigns. For herself she proved once more a most uncommonly shrewd politician. She did not run for Congress until she was sure of her nomination. Her campaign for the higher office began the day of her election to the lower House, but she did not strike against Deneen until she was sure that everything was ready. Having eliminated the weak Senator Deneen—to the profit of the party—she will now organize against former Senator James Hamilton Lewis, the Democratic nominee, and put him to his trumps to win. It would be easy to prophesy victory for her just on general principles.

Not that we feel that her election would mean a great change in the representation of Illinois in the Senate, or the appearance of another genuine Progressive in that body. Mrs. McCormick should stand with the Progressives. She and her husband championed Roosevelt in 1912. No one could ever charge that she admired Calvin Coolidge; indeed there were times when it would apparently have taken but little to put her into the La Follette campaign. Had she been true to her better self she would have landed there. But she was too practical and too much of a politician, and so she is, by grace of Mayor William Hale Thompson and his ally, Crowe, the first woman to be nominated for the United States Senate by a popular ballot. We are well aware that she denied in a preelection statement that there was any alliance between her and Mayor Thompson. But Messrs. Thompson and Crowe are claiming her victory as theirs, and the fact is that no criticism or denunciation of this evil political pair has yet fallen from her lips. She has been quite willing to profit by their aid, while taking no position for or against them, precisely as she let it be known that she was a Dry but failed during the primary campaign to state her position as to prohibition in any straightforward fashion. That is being "practical" and "playing the political game," but the rotten political life of America is to be redeemed in no such way.

Mrs. McCormick herself at once shrewdly identified her triumph with her opposition to America's entrance into the World Court, against which she protested in every speech that she made. But Senator Deneen, too, was opposed to the World Court in a mild way. There was thus no real issue between them. Indeed, the whole contest savored of the shadow-boxing so familiar in our political life. Already it is reported that the Wets, the pro-Leaguers, and other groups are going to wage a determined war upon Mrs. McCormick, and there are those who see in all this the emergence of prohibition as the great national issue. Both parties are split in pieces on it. Yet somehow or other it is believed by many that there will be a clear-cut line-up on this issue by 1932. They are encouraged in this belief by the poll taken by the Literary Digest, and by the action of the New York Assembly in voting 82 to 61 for the repeal of the New York State enforcement act and demanding a constitutional convention to eliminate the Eighteenth Amendment from the Constitution. We do not look for any such upheaval. For the present we shall continue to see the same old pussyfooting on the liquor issue.

In the coming Congressional elections, on the other hand, the impending severe chastisement of the Republican Party will come chiefly because of the general depression, the lack of employment, the low price of grain, the denial of any real relief to the farmer through tariff revision, and other economic reasons. Prohibition may enter here and there, as in the State of Massachusetts, where the proposal to repeal the State enforcement law will be overwhelmingly carried next fall. But by and large it is not beer that is going to decide whether the Republicans or Democrats shall control the next Senate and House of Representatives. It is the general economic status of the country that will count. Mr. Hoover and his party have so long declared themselves the custodians of prosperity that it ill behooves them to quarrel with anybody who votes against them. There is nothing that Mr. Hoover can now do about it except to pray for a revived industry, for bumper crops, and for high prices all around. Since the last are so largely controlled by the world market, the President is in a difficult position. He can pretend that he got what he wanted in the tariff bill; he has already declared that there has been a really satisfactory achievement in London; and he can insist that but for him and his conferences the industrial crash would have been far worse. The public, unless there is a marked change, will hold him and his party accountable.

Were our press in possession of its former critical faculty, were our public willing to analyze critically, Mr. Hoover would be in for an even severer chastising than is indicated at the present hour. Every week confirms his lack of leadership. Had he, for example, sent to the Senate last fall our agreement to enter the World Court, subject to the revisions agreed to by the other signatories to the Court, it would hardly have been an issue for Mrs. McCormick. Instead, her success raises the question whether it will now be possible to ratify the convention. Mr. Hoover refuses to lead in the matter of unemployment. Instead, it is left to a Democrat, Senator Wagner of New York, to insist that the Senate, at least, shall in some degree face this difficult subject. For all the brave words uttered by Ramsay MacDonald and Herbert Hoover after the Rapidan meeting, we face a naval agreement which makes possible the scrapping of two battleships and involves the building of a number of new cruisers. The naval conference has been a failure from the point of view of reducing the military and naval burdens against which Mr. Hoover protested, declaring that they were the heaviest borne by any large country in the world. It is not surprising that the President's stock falls. It will be amazing if the electorate does not soundly trounce him and his party at the polls next fall.

Another War Truth

AN extraordinary and vitally important historical admission has just been made by David Lloyd George as to the manner in which England entered the war in 1914. It was made in the course of a debate on April 7 in which Prime Minister MacDonald reaffirmed his readiness to consult with the leaders of the Opposition concerning any particular phase of the negotiations of the Naval Disarmament Conference in order that Mr. Baldwin and Mr. Lloyd George should be posted as to exactly what was taking place. Mr. Lloyd George heartily praised this attitude of the Prime Minister and went on to say that it was very important that "we should know what we are being committed to because these commitments are matters of peace and war." He continued as follows (italics ours):

> There has been a good deal of discussion as to whether or not we were committed in 1914. If we were, we were committed to something which was very vague, but where it was a question of honor, whether there was a real commitment or not, we gave the benefit of the doubt to the others. We don't want those conditions to arise again. We don't want any commitment by which the French will assume we have incurred certain obligations which we did not intend to incur.

We have in these words high confirmation from one of England's war premiers of the worst charges made by the critics of Sir Edward Grey and the Asquith Government as to their plunging England into the hell of the World War at a cost of a million British lives. It was known at the time that the commitments to France had been concealed not only from the British people and their Parliament, but also from a majority of the Cabinet. They had even been jesuitically denied. Only a small inner group knew. But when the fatal hour came Sir Edward Grey and the Prime Minister assured the country that the agreements with France were solemn and binding, admitting of no question and no indecision. The honor of England, they stated, was absolutely involved. Now we have Lloyd George's word for it that, in that same historic Parliament, it was all "very vague," that there was doubt as to whether there was a "question of honor"; but "whether there was a real commitment or not" the statesmen then in charge were willing not only to sentence to death a huge number of their countrymen, but to jeopardize the very existence of Great Britain herself.

This confirms us in our belief that the men who so light-heartedly plunged England into the war should rank among the great criminals of our time. Even before the war began, England's economic and financial position was being seriously challenged by Germany and the United States. It is at this hour not established that she will ever regain the status she held on August 1, 1914. We know that some of her industries have not rewon their former health, and that there has hardly been a time since the armistice that there have not been from 800,000 to 1,500,000 persons out of employment. That the Empire has passed its prime and that it is actually disintegrating is the opinion not merely of foreign observers, but of numerous Englishmen whose judgments are worth having. And this disintegration was enormously accelerated because there was some "very vague" commitment between an inside ring in the British Cabinet and the French government, and their respective military staffs; because, as Lloyd George says, England gave the "benefit of the doubt" to France in 1914; because Edward Grey and one or two others insisted that the sacred honor of England called for the most frightful blood-letting in history!

If Lloyd George now has had a change of heart on this as on so many other matters, that is surely to the good. It is a step forward in government, too, that Ramsay MacDonald is willing to consult with the Opposition, and to let Parliament as well know just what commitments his Government proposes to undertake. But that, of course, is not enough when it comes to a matter of war and peace. There we must continue to take our stand with Alanson B. Houghton, lately our Ambassador to Great Britain. Having been a diplomat and a highly successful one, he insists that no small group of men in high office is wise enough to be intrusted with the power to make war; that no government should have the right to begin hostilities without having a plebiscite of the masses, who are the ones who pay the price when war comes. Sir Edward Grey sat safely at home and never risked his skin after condemning a million of his fellow-citizens to death—a whole generation whose absence goes far to explain why it is that England in industry and commerce seems to lack at this moment its historic aggressiveness and efficiency. The oncoming generations in Europe certainly have the right to demand that they shall not be condemned to death because somebody had a "very vague" commitment with somebody else, and was at the same time able to say whether or not the country should go to war.

Saving the Children

AMERICAN children have a great stake in what happens at Washington during the coming weeks, for the work of the Children's Bureau is in peril. President Roosevelt in 1909 called his White House Conference on Child Health and Welfare. This conference gave great impetus to Lillian D. Wald's idea of a Children's Bureau, which at the insistence of the National Child Labor Committee, guided by Dr. Alexander McKelway, was established in 1912. President Taft signed the act creating the bureau and appointed Julia C. Lathrop of Hull House its first chief. The act assigned to the bureau for investigation a long list of subjects, including among others infant mortality, diseases of children, mental deficiency, and child labor.

The first study undertaken was that of infant mortality. This was so brilliantly done, and aroused such sustained public interest, that it was continued until eight cities had been covered. These earliest studies showed that six nations were more successful than we in keeping their babies alive to the first birthday; that our maternal death-rate was the highest among civilized nations which kept records; and that a baby's chance of living was six times as good if its mother lived and could stay at home with it during its early weeks, as when she had to go back to the factory or do heavy work at home. From these and other discoveries the maternity and infancy work followed almost inevitably in 1920.

$100,000,000 placed at his disposal by Congress, President Wilson allotted to the bureau (besides its regular appropriation) $150,000 to be spent for a Children's Year. Among other ingenious means of increasing interest in the care of maternity and infancy, the services of Sir Arthur Newsholme, the leading English authority on infant mortality, were enlisted. In consequence of the year's work there arose a nation-wide movement for joint effort of the nation and the States to promote the welfare of mothers and babies.

President Harding, during the campaign of 1920, suggested the establishment of a social-welfare department to include the work in behalf of maternity and infancy. He was persuaded, however, to substitute his approval for an annual appropriation for five years of $1,240,000, to be used under the so-called Sheppard-Towner Act by the States for this work, besides the regular work of the Children's Bureau.

President Coolidge recommended the extension of this act for two years; but unhappily in his last message to Congress he urged that there be no further extension of the appropriation for maternity and infancy. On June 30, 1929, accordingly, the seven years' joint work of the government and the States came to an end, without intervention in its favor by President Hoover.

Hoping to forestall this disaster, Senator Jones and Representative Cooper on April 19, 1929, had introduced a bill providing $1,000,000 (in place of the former $1,240,000) annually for five years to continue the bureau's maternity and infancy work. The measure slumbered in committee for a year, and nearly a year of cooperation between the nation and the States has thus been lost since the Sheppard-Towner fund lapsed on June 30, 1929. Fortunately, the Jones-Cooper bill was favorably reported in the Senate on April 8.

Compared with the vast sums appropriated for agriculture, roads, and other like purposes the annual appropriation for saving the lives of mothers and babies has always seemed trivial. But it has been spent with extraordinary care and skill. Thousands of mothers and children are alive and well because of the bureau's energy in promoting health work, in cooperation with the States. When the bureau was founded only eight States were included in the birth-registration area. By patient cooperation thirty-eight States have been added, and the last two will soon be included.

With the example of his five predecessors before him, what will President Hoover do? Representative Cooper caused great confusion by introducing on February 14 a measure intended ostensibly to turn over to the Public Health Service all the health work of the bureau, and declaring that he did this at the request of the President. It is late in the session, and prompt action is necessary. If the President will make the Jones bill, which has now been reported out of committee, an Administration measure, as he can consistently do, following his address to Congress on December 6, there will still be time for an appropriation to be passed and money made available for the Children's Bureau to resume its beneficent activity at, or even before, the beginning of the new fiscal year. It is greatly to be hoped that this work, which has shown so large a measure of accomplishment with so small an appropriation of funds, may be continued without further interruption. It is for President Hoover to say the word.

A Lover of America

UNUSUALLY sympathetic interest is due a bill now pending in Congress for the appropriation of $100,000 to be expended on a suitable monument, to be erected at his home in Henderson, Kentucky, to the memory of John James Audubon, the naturalist. Audubon was born in Haiti, but the United States was his adopted country which he ardently explored and loved throughout his life. His great work, "The Birds of America," made him famous here and abroad. For that he spent years wandering over the American forests, observing, listening, taking notes for the paintings which with scrupulous care he made in color and life size of each specimen, as he conceived it, of American bird. The English engraver, Robert Havell, Jr., collaborated enthusiastically with Audubon in preparing the pictures for the press. For twelve years the volumes were in the making. They were Audubon's life work, and are in themselves a monument to his genius.

It is pleasant, however, to think of him not as the author of a noble and imposing book, but as the "American Woodman," the man who loved nothing so much as to wander alone through the wildernesses of this country a hundred years ago. Audubon possessed the tough and generous physique coupled with gentleness that seems to be a prerequisite of the successful observer of animal life. He was tireless and unafraid; he was freshly eager with each new day for a new area to explore. He could sit for hours in perfect quiet while the life of the forest moved around and above him. He loved the forests, the beasts and birds in them; above all he loved the strange or desperate or merely kind frontiersmen whom he met on his journeys. When he heard the squatters along the lower Mississippi dismissed as "a sallow, sickly-looking sort of miserable beings," and he later had occasion to inspect them, he cried: "See the joyous mother and daughters as they stand on the bank! . . . A store of vegetables lies around them, a large tub of fresh milk is at their feet, and in their hands are plates filled with rolls of butter." He could color even poor white trash with his own abundant life.

At Henderson, Kentucky, he started his adult life with his young wife and their first child. There he made several unsuccessful essays at business, but he was not destined to be a business man. He was a lover of the woods, and in the woods and occupying himself with what he found there his wife very sensibly—and perhaps generously—let him alone. There could be no more fitting place for an Audubon memorial, however, than in this place where Audubon spent his earlier years. And the United States could well afford to make a gesture of thanks to the memory of one of her first and most devoted lovers. A national monument at Henderson, designed so that it might have some practical value to those who share Audubon's interests in American fauna and flora, would go a long way toward softening the unpleasant impression made by others of our national tributes to the defunct great. One hundred thousand dollars is not a sum to dicker over. Let us spend it for a man of peace, one who celebrated his country by what he found to look at there, not by what he hoped, either by military or other conquest, to acquire.

MY radical friends seem to be of two minds. All of them expect the social revolution, but they mean various things when they speak of it. To some it suggests an actual setting up of barricades upon the streets and the shooting down of capitalists and bourgeoisie. In fact, some of the reddest of my acquaintances will not guarantee the success of their plans unless they have the privilege of cutting down a few million inevitable dissenters. The revolution contemplated by the Socialists seems to me a more thoroughgoing affair. As I understand it, they think less of musketry and more about the power of ideas. I never could understand why a fellow who wants to stick a bayonet into an opponent's ribs is considered a realist, while the man who wants to put a notion into his head is said by some to be a sentimental idealist.

For instance, what justification is there for the scorn which Left-wingers are fond of tossing over their shoulder at Norman Thomas? Why is it impractical to suggest that even a revolutionary change can be voted in by an aroused majority? In a revolution the more numerous side is pretty apt to win. If you have sufficient power to swing a revolt you ought to have enough to carry an election. As I understand my Communist friends they maintain that winning the election would be of no use to a proletarian party because the minority would still set up too active and violent a resistance. But I fail to see why the same thing does not hold true of revolution. After you've got a revolution won you've got to keep it that way. It is hard to build secure foundations on a coup.

Although I am not one to applaud everything done by the Soviet Republic I should hardly care to deny that the present regime has scored unmistakable triumphs. There seems, at the moment, not the slightest serious threat of any overturn of the general policy which is now functioning. Indeed, I view with marked suspicion many of the shrieking noises which come from Russia about the danger of attack from without its borders. Lenin, and the men who followed him, may have made many fundamental changes in the attitude of man, but they have not succeeded in eliminating the human penchant to play politics. And I believe that when a Soviet leader rouses the mob with a story of the manner in which England, America, or France is waiting to pounce upon the "workingman's fatherland" he is talking largely to consolidate the support of his fellows. He is following a very old principle. It is never difficult to secure loyalty by holding up a bogy man in front of your followers and frightening them with that.

I find it difficult to locate the main thread of the Communist propagandic theory over here. In the same speech an agitator will predict the imminence of the day on which the comrades are to take over the whole economic and governmental structure of the United States and immediately after he will shed tears of woe at the prospect of an attack upon the Soviet Republic by the powerful financial interests of this country. They are going to swallow us or we are going to swallow them. It seems to me that these two predictions are mutually exclusive.

Personally I feel that the Communists have made little headway over here. I am not necessarily rejoicing in this. I am merely stating it as an opinion. Often I wonder how a thoroughgoing, scientific revolutionary can justify the petty squabbles and riots which have featured recent red activity in the city of New York. Somebody will have to tell me in clearer language than I have heard yet just what purpose is fostered in baiting the police until the cops lose their heads and make fools of themselves by indiscriminate clubbing. Where does this rather trivial activity leave the famous old theory of economic determinism? Marx, if I read him aright, thought of the eventual proletarian revolution as inevitable. Capitalism would grow and grow and swell and swell until at last it would drop to the ground like an apple too long in the sun. If this is true no Whalen can stay the process nor yet promote it. And so I am at a loss to understand why so much energy should be wasted in the effort to prove the man a fool. If I were a Communist I would most certainly refuse to have my head broken in order to demonstrate a fact so obvious to all observers.

If the great day is being borne along upon the billows of vast subterranean streams it would seem rather petty to waste much effort in the dissemination of little handbills. Of course I know that the Communists are not the first nor yet the last group to lay the whip across the flanks of the very steed which they have picked to be the certain and inevitable winner of the race in question. For instance, people who say "The Lord will provide" are very seldom content to let it go at that. Even though they put their trust in Him, even so they think it not a bad idea to nudge the Creator upon occasion and to call His attention to the thing which they have proclaimed He will surely do.

To switch the subject of the sentence somewhat, even I, a humble columnist, have been accorded the honor of Communist heckling. Last week I spoke at the Rand School about unemployment, and a few Communists were there among the socialistic audience. I must say for the Left-wingers that they played fair enough and let me have my stuttering say without the handicap of outside interference, but when I asked for questions the deluge came. A Communist is, among other things, a man incapable of expressing himself in anything less than ten thousand words. And of course he doesn't ask questions. He makes speeches. Still, even that cannot justly be condemned by me. I'd made a pretty long talk on my own account.

But my friends the reds pay no great compliment to the Russian experiment by behaving as if it might be knocked down by the slightest puff of air. For instance, my departure from the lecture hall was signalized by the little knot of Left-wingers going into a huddle, like a Yale football team, and defiantly giving a long cheer with three "Soviet Republic's" on the end. Now I had not lifted so much as a finger against the "workers' homeland." But if I had, even if I had lifted two, I can't quite understand why that should constitute a menace worthy of the attention of any busy man intent upon world revolution.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Ruth McCormick Smashes Through

By FREDERIC BABCOCK

Chicago, April 11

RUTH HANNA McCORMICK'S smashing success in the Illinois Senatorial primaries is being hailed as the greatest political victory ever won by a woman. It was indeed a triumph for feminine leadership, but it had many other significances. It indicates (1) that the West, led by its foremost State, is still anti-World Court and anti-League of Nations; (2) that it is still politically dry; (3) that it does not look with favor on many of the policies of the present national Administration; (4) that it has made up its mind to crash through the sex barrier surrounding the Senate.

Perhaps the best idea of how Mrs. McCormick did it may be gained by visualizing the campaign. Picture a woman tremendously alive and tremendously ambitious, brilliant, likable, tireless; a shrewd campaigner, equipped with amazing organizing ability and a thorough knowledge of all the tricks of the game; thin, with thin, determined lips and brown eyes that laugh; a walking, talking advertisement of what one can do with wealth and brains—and charm. On the other side was Senator Charles S. Deneen: "The good Lord cast him in the mold of a statesman, but gave him the mental operations of a ward politician." A beautiful specimen of futility, not unlike Dear Old Charlie of "Strange Interlude": full of desire, but impotent. His answer to his opponent's slashing attack on the World Court was an 8,000-word pamphlet, all dressed up in legal phraseology, defending his vote for America's adherence. Nobody read it and nobody cared. Senator Deneen let his campaign drag until two months before the primaries. By that time the enemy had walked off with most of his votes and there was no getting them back, even if he had been a good campaigner.

In Chicago, the main battleground, the Senator had a well-oiled machine and the support of a large number of the best people. But Mrs. McCormick picked up what was left. The Thompson machine, dealt a death blow two years ago, saw a great opportunity for resurrection. It supported Mrs. McCormick to advance its own purposes. So did all the other anti-Deneen people (and there are hordes of them), all the petty local machines, and all the guerrillas not included in the Deneen ranks. Tammany in New York and the Vare machine in Philadelphia have their counterpart in the City Hall crowd in Chicago. Mrs. McCormick joined hands with this gang to capture the Republican nomination. For this she was roundly berated. Personally, I cannot blame her. She accepted all the support she could get. She denied that there was any alliance—and many of us believed her. There is little to choose between the Thompson gang and the Deneen gang. They shift around every two years. Today's ally is tomorrow's enemy. Mrs. McCormick was a candidate needing votes. She had her own organization, built up through years of effort. If undesirables insisted on climbing aboard her band wagon she was not the one to shove them off.

So Mark Hanna's daughter, defying Hughes and Root and Hoover on the World Court question and staking everything on that issue, came to Chicago and waged war like the seasoned veteran she is. Daughter of one Senator and widow of another, she deemed it necessary to deal with gangsters, gunmen, racketeers, and political parasites. Opposing her was a Senator offering the noble spectacle of herding church vote and gang vote into the ballot booths together. Chicago shouted its choice, and "downstate" echoed the decision. The vote was an emphatic rejection of the World Court, with or without reservations. I doubt if one voter in a thousand could define the Root formula or a protocol, but he had an idea that the Court was tied up with the League of Nations and he wanted none of it. The vote further showed that discrimination against women in Illinois politics is almost negligible. Still further, it was an indirect protest against the economic policies of the Hoover Administration, which has no blinder or more faithful follower than Senator Deneen.

The first hurdle cleared, Mrs. McCormick must face the Chesterfieldian James Hamilton Lewis. Twelve years ago Medill McCormick defeated Lewis for reelection to the Senate. Six years ago Deneen defeated McCormick for renomination. Now McCormick's widow has turned the tables on Deneen, and is out to win again over Lewis. With Mrs. McCormick a Dry and Lewis a Wet, the Wets will make a prodigious effort to put him across. Some say it will be done. My own guess—seven months in advance of the anticipated event—is that Mother Illinois's next Senatorial offspring will be a girl. If unemployment and Hoover prosperity continue till November Lewis will get a huge vote from the discontented. But he will have to overcome a normal Republican majority of half a million and, on top of that, the opposition of thousands of determined women and church members who may not approve of Ruth McCormick as an isolationist, but do approve of her as a dry.

If one were to judge by the straw votes and the noise made by the Wets one would say Illinois was wet. At the risk of getting into hot water I venture to say it's dry. In the Literary Digest poll it has been going wet by three to one. But in the April primaries Mrs. McCormick and Senator Deneen, both Drys, between them rolled up a vote of something like 1,200,000. The only wet candidate on the Republican side got a few thousand. On the Democratic side, Lewis, the Wet, got about 300,000. Of course, the comparison between that total and the combined dry total, four times as great, is unfair, and Lewis's is the minority party anyway. But the dry majority is there, and it will be there next November.

One of Mrs. McCormick's ambitions was to make her husband President. As long as he lived she remained in the background. When he died she set out on her own career. Now she has been nominated for the Senate. She will be elected. She will make a good Senator if not a great one. She is no idealist. In the Senate she will play the game and make friends. After that, will she try for the Presidency? There's no law against it.

Politics, Purity, and Pelf

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, April 12

AN odor—thick, oppressive, and horribly reminiscent of the Ohio Gang—is settling down on the capital. Just as the Republican leaders were beginning to hope the public might be induced to forget the politico-financial adventures of National Chairman Claudius Huston, they were confronted with the prospect of an infinitely greater scandal, arising from the history of post-office leases during the past ten years. That gigantic frauds have been practiced on the government and the investing public, with the knowledge and collusion of officials of the Post Office Department, has long been suspected by those who realized how perfectly the leasing system lends itself to corruption. Unless my reportorial judgment is sadly defective, the worst of those suspicions will be confirmed during the Senate investigation which now impends. I expect to see it disclosed that a number of syndicates are actively in the business of leasing post-office buildings to the government; that they are receiving exorbitant rentals under long-term, non-cancelable contracts awarded by the Post Office Department; that more than $100,000,000 worth of bonds were sold to the public on the basis of these contracts, and that many have been purchased under the impression that they were government securities. I expect to see it disclosed that officers or former officers of the government were interested in the leases or profited from the sale of the bonds. I am confident it will be discovered that nearly half of the $18,000,000 annually paid by the government in post-office rentals has been unnecessarily expended, and that a considerable percentage of the profits from the leases and the bonds has been passed on in the form of "commissions" and "attorney fees." Nor should the Senate investigating committee confine itself to leases. It should make a thorough inquiry into the mail contracts awarded to ship companies and air-mail carriers. It should ascertain whether any former officers of the government are interested in the companies receiving such contracts, what service they are rendering, and what they are being paid for it. In connection with the leases, it is important to know the identity of the lessors, the names of the persons who represented them in the negotiations with the Post Office Department, the size of the fees paid for that service, the amount of bonds that have been issued, the names of the banks and investment houses through which they were floated, and the size of the commissions paid on them. Finally, the committee should take pains to learn whether any political contributions have been made by the beneficiaries. Before the work is finished we shall doubtless have the pleasure of gazing again on the frank and open countenance of that exemplar of ethics and morals, Elder Will Hays. And how some of us will enjoy it!

* * * * *

THE lobby committee performed a sufficiently good job on Muscle Shoals to insure Senate adoption of the Norris bill for government operation of that great plant, but there are excellent reasons for believing that further inquiries would be amply rewarded. For example, what names are signed to the canceled checks cashed by the Muscle Shoals lobby? What public officials are stockholders in the American Cyanamid Company, the Union Carbide Company, or affiliated corporations? Have the officers of those corporations contributed to any political campaign funds in recent years? Information tending to answer some of those questions has been reported to members of the committee, but the answers have not been made public. The fact is that the members have grown weary under the torrent of hostile criticism directed at them by ill-informed or partisan editorial writers and by ignorant business men, and have lost the zest which characterized the committee's earlier proceedings. Chairman Caraway is disgusted with the public's ingratitude, and Senator Walsh is having one of his periodical attacks of legalistic conservatism. Incidentally, the latest breeze from the direction of Republican national headquarters serves to remind us that the eccentric Claudius is still clinging tenaciously to the party chairmanship, though his friend in the White House has done everything except set the dog on him. The melancholy truth is that Hoover, for one reason or another, is afraid to throw him out. Probably he will remain until certain gentlemen in New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois serve notice that campaign funds will not be forthcoming until his successor is elected. That will turn the trick. It always does.

THERE must be a surfeit of laughter on Olympus these days, when the gods peer down on the Washington scene and harken to the voice of "Old Joe" Grundy denouncing machine politics and corruption in Pennsylvania. How they must have roared when they saw him appear before the Senate Privileges and Elections Committee to demand the adoption of a resolution providing for the strictest investigation of campaign expenditures in the Republican primary in which he is opposing "Puddler Jim" Davis! Make no mistake—this is the identical "Old Joe" who proudly admitted raising and spending $250,000 in the last Republican Senatorial primary held in that State, and who even more proudly confessed raising $800,000 for the last Republican Presidential campaign! It is the same "Old Joe" who a few months ago scornfully admonished the "backward States" of the West and South to "talk darn small," and proclaimed Pennsylvania as one of the few commonwealths fit to have a voice in the government of the nation! Now we find "Old Joe" sallying forth in the armor of a reform candidate, bent on redeeming his precious Pennsylvania from boss rule and graft, and actually intimating that he would welcome the assistance of Senator Norris in his crusade for civic purity. I have listened to his piteous cries, and they leave me unmoved. As between the Vare Gang and the sacred Mellons, I will take the former every time: they have more honesty, and they are less expensive. And a Puddler is never so dangerous as a Grundy. The Illinois situation is but slightly less diverting. There "Next-Week Charlie" Deneen, who managed at one and the same time to be the bosom friend of the late "Diamond Joe" Esposito and the representative of "the better element" in Illinois politics, has just taken a handsome licking at the fair hands of Mark Hanna's daughter. The elevating influence of women in politics was strikingly demonstrated when Mrs. McCormick made her candidacy the occasion for an alliance which restored the unspeakable Thompson-Crowe machine to power in Cook County. As was to be expected, "Next-Week Charlie" and his lovely opponent fought it out on everything except the issues. On the bogus World Court question Mrs. McCormick gave an exhibition of demagoguery that filled Tom Heflin and Cole Blease with melancholy envy for a fortnight. My Illinois agents report that the exquisite J. Ham Lewis stands a good chance to beat Mrs. McCormick. Certainly he is entitled to the prayers of all honest people.

INDIGNATION probably is a form of weakness, but the temptation to indulge in it is almost irresistible when one contemplates two examples of partisan meanness that have lately come to light here, one designed at the expense of the finest character in American public life, and the other at the expense of the unemployed men and women of the country. Ten months have elapsed since the Senate, for the fourth time, adopted the Norris resolution providing for the submission of a Constitutional amendment abolishing "lame-duck" sessions of Congress. A few days ago its author made the astonishing discovery that Speaker Longworth, instead of referring it to a committee of the House, had calmly pocketed it. At once Senator Norris prepared to introduce a resolution calling for an investigation of this high-handed business. The House leaders, learning of his intention, hastened to report a similar resolution of their own, in a vindictive determination that no amendment to the Constitution should be permitted to bear the name of the Progressive Norris. It was perfectly characteristic of them. The other instance was one in which the Old Guard leaders in the Senate resolved that a Tammany Democrat, namely, Senator Robert Wagner, must not be permitted to have the credit for helping to relieve unemployment. Three bills, each intelligently drafted to accomplish that end, were introduced by him more than two years ago. They were referred to a committee, and there, the Old Guard decreed, they must remain. It made no difference that unemployment was increasing. The obstruction finally ceased only when Hiram Johnson succeeded Jones as chairman. As is well known, Hiram wastes no affection on either the Administration or the Grundybund. He moved the Wagner bills by main strength and vocabulary, and it is possible that Congress may now do something to help the starving—that is, if the House leaders do not decide that famine is preferable to its relief by an Al Smith Democrat.

The Press Today

II. The Associated Press[*]

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

IN the last analysis any organization is what the men in it make it. What of the men in the Associated Press? It is a pleasure to record the fact that despite the relatively poor salaries paid the Associated Press has generally been served by a devoted, honest, and loyal set of men and women, a credit to themselves and to the service. There is no eight-hour and no twelve-hour day for them. They must be the first into any disease-ridden or calamity-scourged town, and, of course, they must not be afraid of the firing line—David Lawrence, the well-known Washington correspondent, for instance, is the possessor of a gold watch awarded to him by the A.P. for risking his life to report the battle at Juarez in one of the Mexican revolutions, when he stayed on duty for three days and nights without rest. The men are drawn to the service by the extraordinary fascination of all newspaper work, and by its excitements. They feel that they are in a measure public servants and the interest of the "game" compensates for the small salaries and the exacting hours. Sometimes they exercise a profound influence upon the progress of political events, becoming guides, philosophers, and friends to men in high office. Rarely is any charge of manipulating the news for personal profit brought against an employee of the Associated Press. Indeed I have never heard it alleged that anybody in the Associated Press was using his position in order to make money, although there have been plenty of opportunities because of the custody of important public documents in advance of publication. Where irregularities have occurred, as in the matter of misreading a Supreme Court opinion, it has almost invariably appeared that the error was accidental. Naturally, since they are human beings, Associated Press men are liable to make mistakes.

Rarely, indeed, does a black sheep like Edgar G. Bellairs, a former chain-gang convict with a lifelong career of crime behind him, get into the service. Even he used it, however, not to feather his own nest, but to build up fictitious reputations for General Leonard Wood and other army officers to whom he was particularly devoted. But this incident could just as well have occurred in any other news-gathering agency. The danger is not that unworthy men will get into the Associated Press, but that its reporters will prove to be unable to write their dispatches without coloring them, consciously or subconsciously, as they think that Frank B. Noyes of the Washington Star, president of the Associated Press, or Adolph S. Ochs of the New York Times would like to have them colored. Their orders are to refrain absolutely from bias, to be "truthful, accurate, unbiased, decent, and interesting." Nothing was held more vital than this by Melville E. Stone, who was for so many years the beloved head of the organization. In consequence of his efforts to keep the service free from bias the charge was frequently made that it was dull in the presentation of news, illiberal, uninterested in the great currents of social reform and in the progress of labor. That the English it used was often extremely bad was, I think, beyond denial. In other words, the news report was written in the early days of the Associated Press as men like Victor Lawson of the Chicago Daily News, William R. Nelson of the Kansas City Star, Charles Hopkins Clark of the Hartford Courant, Melville E. Stone, and the other giants of a bygone journalistic age wished it written.

[*] This is the second of two articles on the Associated Press in a series of articles on the American press. The third, on the United Press, will appear in our issue of May 7.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Today it seems to me that the besetting sin of the Associated Press is its worship of authority. This is in no small measure due to the personal attitude of Messrs. Noyes and Ochs. Mr. Noyes is a resident of the District of Columbia where his newspaper, the Washington Star, depends for its success upon the army of office-holders, whether of Republican or Democratic origin. The Star never offends and rarely criticizes the powers that be. It is not doing it an injustice to say that it has one of the most colorless editorial pages in the world; it can become excited over the question of retiring pay for the departmental clerks, and it can, of course, denounce with the best the I. W. W., the Socialists, the Bolsheviks, and the bootleggers. But as for daring to go counter to authority, or fearlessly exposing the mass of corruption which since the war has corroded our public life, the Star is to seek. Mr. Noyes is not a fighting man either by temperament or philosophy. In consequence the Associated Press reporter in Washington is just about as conscious as anybody could be that it pays to stand in with those who are in office lest one be shut out of official conferences as were two reporters of the Federated Press, a radical organization, at one time. Mr. Ochs, too, does not believe in criticizing severely men in high office. It is, perhaps, common knowledge that several years ago he planned to appoint a national advisory committee to supervise the editorial page of the New York Times, and that the negotiations broke down when, after having given assurances that the committee would have freedom to formulate policies, it appeared that this did not apply to the President of the United States and other high officials. It is therefore easy to understand why the Associated Press not only reflects the viewpoint of the great capitalistic interests of the country, but also the attitude and the point of view of those in authority in Washington. One constantly gets the impression that the Washington bureau, consciously or unconsciously, considers itself under obligation to seek a creditable explanation of any disclosure adversely affecting high officials.

During the war, of course, the Associated Press lent itself as freely to the uses of the government for propaganda purposes as did the corresponding services in England, France, Germany, and Italy to their governments. Even before we entered the war it carried the wholesale falsifications of the late John R. Rathom of the Providence Journal, whose romancing finally became even too vivid for the United States government to brook. It was responsible for a wickedly cruel and false report of a speech made by Senator La Follette in which he was made to say that we had no quarrel with the Germans over the sinking of the Lusitania, when he said precisely the opposite. No other alleged quotation from his lips did so much harm to this brave and patriotic American citizen, whose statue now stands with those of the greatest men of our public life in Statuary Hall in the Capitol at Washington. Not until years later was this wrong corrected on the initiative of the writer of this article. During the years prior to our entrance into the war the A.P. quite failed to obey the injunction of President Wilson to be neutral in thought and deed—an exception to its rule always to obey authority.

As for Russia, the Associated Press always knows well where its duty to God and our country lies. In the early days of the Bolshevik government the Associated Press was as eager as the New York Times to grab any absurd rumor and spread it abroad. It still believes in the high news standards of its service, but can it look back with anything but shame on some of its Russian reports? Thus, in April, 1918, it overthrew the Bolsheviks and reestablished the old regime under the Grand Duke Alexis. In August it had Lenin and Trotzky running hand in hand to Kronstadt for safety. On the eighteenth of that month it kindly allowed the Germans to seize Kronstadt. On September 1 it reported Lenin as back and in charge, for it announced that he had been shot by a girl. The next day he died, only to be resurrected by the Associated Press, for three days later he had a relapse—to see Petrograd revolting and peasants "storming the city" a few days later. On October 17 poor Lenin was shot again. In December he was about to flee to Sweden; before he could make his getaway, doubtless at the instigation of the Associated Press, he was arrested on January 9 by Trotzky himself and imprisoned in the Kremlin. Fortunately the Associated Press was soon triumphantly able to report that he had escaped to Barcelona; a couple of days later he had buried the hatchet and was making speeches with Trotzky in Moscow. All of which is delightful romancing, but hardly worthy of a service which believes that its reports are the most accurate and reliable and unbiased in the world. If its news from Moscow has now steadied down, it is in no wise as valuable as that sent by Walter Duranty to the New York Times.

Now such things happen during the hysteria of war time, or of events leading up to war. But the continuance of the policy of playing the game of the men who are temporarily delegated to run our government at Washington, and of letting them give out their propaganda anonymously, is just a little bit too much for journalists to stand who believe in fair play and professional ethics. Yet the practice goes on, and not only in the purlieus of our Capitol, as witness the fact that during a large part of the American occupation of Haiti the Associated Press has been represented in that island by an officer of the Marine Corps, just as if this officer were in a position to report freely and frankly the Haitian criticisms of the Occupation, of which the Associated Press correspondent was an official and uniformed member, or the acts of his superiors. If the revelations of the justified Haitian criticisms of our occupation, which led President Hoover's commission to that island to reverse our policy there, came as a surprise to the American people it must be in large part due to the fact that the Associated Press has had a marine officer as its correspondent. It is only just to add that when trouble broke out there the Associated Press immediately rushed to the island a civilian correspondent, and that it did its utmost to bring out the truth about the Aux Cayes massacre. But no amount of good intentions or actual honorable achievement in a crisis can atone for the fact that during periods of quiet the only news source of the Associated Press in Haiti was an officer of marines. For it was in the quiet periods that those policies were formulated which so aroused the population of Haiti against us that there would have been worse bloodshed than ever had not the commission fortunately intervened just when it did. Nor is the excuse that the Associated Press could not afford to maintain a special correspondent in Haiti a valid one. It maintains correspondents at places far less important than Haiti, especially if one considers that what we did in Haiti aroused the bitterest indignation against us in every Central and South American country, to our financial as well as moral cost as a nation. As I write, it is about to begin a service of "comic strips" to its members. This it can finance; but it was unable to raise the money needed to insure a fair and accurate report of a situation which to all South Americans was a touchstone of our national good faith and of our honorable intentions toward all of Latin America. Unfortunately, in Nicaragua, in Mexico, and in our other extraterritorial ventures the Associated Press invariably regards every situation through the spectacles offered to it by our officialdom.

Here, as has been said, is the greatest weakness and the greatest danger of the Associated Press. I find myself far less interested in the decay of the character and quality of the news service, which has deeply stirred other critics of the service, notably Mr. Dewey M. Owens in the American Mercury for April, 1927. It is true, however, that Melville E. Stone must be turning in his grave if he is aware of the kind of sob stuff that is now appearing in the Associated Press reports—banal and bathetic stuff of the kind to shame a college sophomore despite the fact that the rules of the A.P. urge "a simple narrative style" and deprecate fine writing. Here are two examples quoted by Mr. Owens:

> Death advanced and beckoned for the last time. The tired, worn-out man drew a long breath, there was a slight flutter of the eyelids, an almost imperceptible twitch of the nostrils.
> Woodrow Wilson's soul had drifted out on the great dark tide that runs around the world.
> Outside a sickly sun broke through a cloudbank. A little native warbler, a pilgrim venturing forth in search of early spring and sun, stopped for a moment and from his twig aloft twittered a happy note. Almost at that moment Mr. Wilson was passing out.

> Luther Burbank, withered by age, died here early today amid the flowering fruits and blooms he had created for the benefit of mankind.
> The noted horticulturist passed on to the great adventure of a hereafter in which he had no faith.
> Only a few weeks before the end he had declared that he could not believe in a life after death.
> And as life ebbed away and he stood on the brink he did not falter in his conviction.

If this is the sort of stuff the 1,250 members of the Associated Press want how can we expect to find anything else, seeing that we are dealing with a cooperative news service? Mr. Kent Cooper, the present able general manager, who rose from the ranks and represents an entirely new school from that of Melville E. Stone, has to face an intense, rapidly growing, and successful competition from the virile and liberal United Press. He has broken with tradition after tradition of the service—the comic strips are his latest venture. So the Associated Press has long since abandoned its original conception of being a service devoted exclusively to the gathering of news; it is now engaged in the merchandising of purely amusement features. Side by side with a vast deal of really-admirable and altogether praiseworthy reporting of the vital happenings of the world, a great deal of it well, soberly, and accurately written, it disseminates a line of trivial and often nauseating human-interest stories wholly devoid of any news value. I append two of them which I clipped from the first page of Mr. Noyes's worthy Evening Star on January 18 last, when I happened to be in the capital:

> By the Associated Press.
> WAUKEGAN, Ill., January 18.—Trixie, George Van Valkenberg's police dog, isn't dead after all. She's sick, but the doctor says she'll be all right.
> Several days ago Trixie's master arranged to put her out of her misery via chloroform. Afterwards he took Trixie to the garage to await suitable burial weather.
> Yesterday the grave was dug, and Van Valkenberg went to the garage to get Trixie. From her blanket shroud the dog scrambled up and ran to her master.

> By the Associated Press.
> CHICAGO, January 19.—Animals, real and imaginary, have driven Mrs. Sophie Seidler to seek a divorce from Walter.
> She says her husband imagined the existence of pink elephants and wiggly snakes, and that they annoyed him dreadfully. In an effort to get rid of them, his wife asserts, he got real animals and took them to bed with him. One night he would come home with a cat, another night a dog, and some times with a rabbit, a pigeon, or a chicken.
> Mrs. Seidler told of a strange pastime favored by her spouse. When funds for beverage purposes were scant, she charged, he would run around and around the room in circles until he got dizzy.
> She wants, besides a divorce, custody of their child.

The purpose of this sort of thing is, of course, to help publishers to sell their "stuff" by "brightening up" their numerous pages. Here let us recall that in his memoirs, "Fifty Years a Journalist," Melville E. Stone declared that "the Associated Press is writing the real and enduring history of the world, and is not chronicling the trivial episodes, the scandal, and the chit-chat"! Plainly Mr. Cooper has no use for such sentiments. Other times, other morals! The amazing part of it remains that this descent to coarse vulgarity and trivial banality is the work of an organization which has no private-profit motive. It is what one might have expected of Hearst, but never of the men who fell heir to the Associated Press which was founded in its modern form in 1893 with such high hopes, such high standards, and such a sense of responsibility to the American public and to their profession that the founders never could have stooped in any such way to conquer large circulations.

The fact is, however, that the newspaper profession in America has changed in our time from a profession to a business—a purely money-making affair in which the professional aspect has disappeared in all but a few of the dailies of the country. They are being affected by the great economic currents that are hourly producing greater and greater aggregations of capital, larger and larger financial and economic and industrial units. The newspaper owner, as I have so often pointed out, is caught in the vicious circle of steadily rising costs, steadily increasing competition, and the demand for larger and larger circulations and more and more advertising. To the great merchants of the newspaper world the Associated Press is delivering the goods. Why all this tiresome nonsense about ideals and standards in its journalism? The Associated Press is what its members are willing that Mr. Noyes and Mr. Ochs and Mr. Cooper shall make it. They have much to be proud about, can boast of many fine things done, and have many admirable personal achievements to cite in reply to their critics. What does the rest matter as long as Cyrus H. K. Curtis and William Randolph Hearst and our other newspaper barons are content, and Washington officialdom finds their society wholly congenial? Let only those who are chronic fault-finders dwell upon the curious fact that it is the cooperative non-profit-making service which is illiberal and is so rapidly lowering its standards, and that it is the money-making United Press which has wide human sympathies and considerable idealism. But the reasons why the United Press is what it is must be reserved for another article.

The Turning Financial Worm*

By J. G. CURTIS

AMONG the distinctions possessed by Chicago is that of having been the center of opposition to branch banking in the United States. California formerly shared the burden and the honor, but California has since been lost to the cause. She can do no more now than serve as a desolate object-lesson to the Cook County patriots who have long and steadily realized how wholly dependent the well-being of this country was upon the independent banker. To be sure, as was told recently in The Nation, some five thousand of those independent bankers have disastrously failed to live up to their responsibilities. And to be sure, in California, where branch banking is practically universal, there have been only about ten failures in ten years, though the banks of that State were afflicted with the same depression that tried those in the Central West. In San Francisco, it is true, the Fleishhackers of the Anglo and London Paris National, once the biggest bank in California, and Mr. F. L. Lipman of the Wells Fargo Bank and Union Trust, once the second biggest, still look contemptuously upon their upstart competitors, the Bank of Italy and the Bank of America, which singly or together are the greatest branch-bank organizations in the country, and say that of course branch banking is "still experimental." To the Royalists in France the Republic is also "still experimental." Mr. Giannini has in twenty-five years made the Bank of Italy not only bigger than any two of its local competitors, but the fifth largest bank in America.

In Chicago there is nothing so wicked as the shameless branch banks of New York, Boston, Cleveland, and other cities, running wide open in broad daylight and even under State supervision. In Chicago there are quiet, gentleman-like, unofficial arrangements linking banks together in bonds that are concealed from the public and from the regulating authorities. But not branches—God forbid! But the practice of having private connections only has recently been challenged by the brazen Mr. George Woodruff of the National Bank of the Republic, who instead of keeping things dark has come out frankly and announced the formation of a legal holding company with associate banks. What Mr. Woodruff has in his National Republic Bancorporation with its fifteen banks in and near Chicago is something technically different from branch banking in that instead of one corporation with numerous offices, which is the characteristic of branch banking, his different banks retain legal entity but are owned by a holding company. It is therefore like the American Telephone and Telegraph, which controls the associated operating companies of the Bell system. Mr. Woodruff is not the pioneer with such corporate structure for banks. He was preceded by Mr. Andrew Price of the Marine Bancorporation of Seattle, with ten banks; by Mr. E. W. Decker of the Northwest Bancorporation of Minneapolis, with ninety banks in the Northwestern States, Minnesota, Iowa, the Dakotas, and Montana; by that great competitor, the First Bank Stock Corporation, with eighty banks; by the First Security Corporation of Ogden, with twenty-five banks; by the Southwestern Corporation of Oklahoma, with fifteen banks; and by similar groups in Michigan, Oregon, Wisconsin, Kentucky, Ohio, Georgia, and elsewhere. These groups are peculiar to the West and to agricultural regions. They are composed of the strongest banks in their respective territories. They are extending themselves aggressively. Why?

The answer is that the beloved independent bank is obsolescent. Yet in spite of its inability to stand the gaff economically, legislatively it has been successful in securing laws for its own protection. It is as if the manufacturers of old oaken buckets had got laws passed to prohibit the establishment of municipal water systems. It would be natural to suppose that a way would be found to get around such laws. It would be necessary, though, not only to get around the laws, but also to surmount considerable prejudice based on a notion that old oaken buckets were an American institution, and that their use kept the people in control of their own water supply and preserved the nation from decay. Reform in the direction of branch banking—and by branch banking is meant regional or nation-wide branch banking—has not only been prevented by law, it has been obstructed even more effectively by the interests which stood behind the law. The inventors of group banking overcame this twofold obstacle only by making it possible for the independent bank to retain its identity (and its officers their jobs), and yet at the same time gain the strength through association which is one great advantage of branch banking. Group or chain banking is therefore a compromise of economics with law and with prejudice. It has the advantage for the public interest of the safety of branch banking; it has the advantage for the private interest that there can be as many bank presidents as ever. On the other hand, it has the disadvantage for the public interest that it cannot be so readily supervised by the State as branch banking; and the disadvantage for the private interest that it is administratively more cumbersome and expensive.

*This is the second of two articles on branch banking. The first appeared in the issue of February 26.—EDITOR THE NATION.

But to get back to Chicago. Just why has there been all this banking purity there? The fact is that the big Chicago banks, like the New York banks, have for years been cultivating the country-bank-correspondent business. If the independent country banks became members of branch systems their accounts with their city correspondents would be closed and the money would stay in the branch system. The same thing would happen that happened in California: every time a country bank joined the Bank of Italy it made the Bank of Italy bigger and the Anglo and London Paris National or the Wells Fargo relatively smaller, since one of the latter lost the account. At the same time the country independents were in a panic for fear the more efficient branch systems would enter their towns and begin competing with them. The interest of the country bank and of its city correspondent became one. Since branch banking was a sharper issue in the West than in the East, the banks there being weaker, the Cook County bankers were drawn more actively into the opposition to branch banking than were the New York bankers.

But New York has not been indifferent. Mr. G. W. Davison, of the Central Hanover Trust Company, made a moving appeal at the last meeting of the Bankers' Association for the "correspondent relationship." He hoped and believed that the big city bank was the country bank's best friend. Of course, that was something for country bankers to laugh at, no matter how much they feared branch banking. In the latter system a local banker knows at least where he stands, and that he can count on his organization, whereas if he is merely the correspondent of a city bank he knows he may be left in the lurch. But it is clear why so many New York and Chicago bankers do not want branch or group banking. It means change. The Pacific Coast and the Northwest will no longer have to supplicate the East. The hinterland is at last concentrating its financial resources for a bit of real independence, and the established money centers are not at all sure they like it.

This strengthening of sectional finances is obviously a gain. But it leaves untouched the charge that branch banking or its substitute, the group or chain system, will monopolize credit. Mr. Henry Dawes, who with his distinguished brothers controls the Central Trust, a Chicago bank with a correspondent business it does not want to lose, paints frightful pictures of the branch system sucking all the money out of the rural centers. Even if this possibility existed—which is not for a moment admitted—there remains the present inadequacy of banks as they are. It is a calamity for banks to fail, a calamity to borrowers and a calamity to depositors. It is better to have them niggardly in their local loans than insolvent. But as a matter of fact a branch or group bank brings stability to a community and an increase of funds rather than a decrease. The great branch systems of Canada go into pioneer settlements where no sane and scrupulous independent banker like Mr. Dawes would ever go. And even in an established community where the independent is safe enough, a branch organization can maintain better service than the independent one.

On the other hand, it would be ridiculous to assume that great regional branch-bank systems are without danger to the public. They will, of course, need regulation and supervision beyond what banks now have. The advantage is that they can be supervised to some purpose. They furnish by the fact of their size and geographical spread a groundwork of practically invulnerable safety which the individual banker cannot approach. They offer the opportunity for increased services to small communities which the independent cannot afford to provide.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter is embarrassed. Not financially—or at least no more so than usual—but socially, as it were. He is indebted to a lady for a gift, but he can't make out who she is. Several weeks ago, when declaring himself in favor of a liberal use of color, he mentioned his predilection for what are commonly called "loud" ties. Not long after, a communication arrived on gay orange paper bearing the letterhead in red type of the Indian Craft Shop of Monterey, California. The letter read:

> After reading your column this week we couldn't resist sending you one of our ties. Now the great difficulty for us is to find men brave enough to wear them. . . .
> My sympathies were always stirred by the dulness and ugliness of men's clothing; but after I went to Santa Fé and looked upon Witter Bynner I felt less unhappy, and now when you descend upon Monterey in a Kelly green suit and red tie I shall know that further sympathy is needless.

This much was typewritten and presented no difficulties. But then followed the signature in script. The first two names were readable, indicating, as the Drifter has already revealed, that the writer was a lady. But the last name, after a brave, bold beginning, wandered away indefinitely toward the rainbow's end. The Drifter has examined the signature—at intervals—several times since, but in vain. There was a man once who, whenever he received a letter he couldn't read, wrote at once to the sender: "I accept with pleasure your kind invitation to dinner next Wednesday evening." But to do that one has to be able to read at least the name of the writer. And anyhow Monterey is a long way off. The dinner might be cold before the Drifter arrived.

* * * * *

IN the meantime, the tie reached the Drifter under separate cover. There is nothing vague or indecipherable about the tie. Undeniably its color, as the sender says in her letter, is red. There is brilliance, sparkle, and energy in that tie. So much so that when the Drifter unfurls it to the breezes and struts along the street he is practically a parade. People line up along the sidewalk as he goes by, and if President Hoover were to walk on one side of Pennsylvania Avenue dressed in the Stars and Stripes and the Drifter on the other side wearing his Monterey tie, the Drifter would without question draw the larger gallery. Almost any day the Drifter expects to be arrested for taking part in a parade without a permit. And he once stopped traffic on a busy highway by coming unexpectedly around a corner. The leader in a line of speeding automobiles jammed on his brakes and came to a grinding halt, having mistaken the Drifter's red tie for a "stop" signal. THE DRIFTER

To Spring

By VIRGINIA MOORE

Unsullied Spring, O just-about-to-begin:
Fresh river-flags, cold crocuses, low bed
Of deep-dyed violets where snows have been;
Tulips as pale as butter or as red
As Aphrodite's bosom where it bled;
Sweetpeas crowded together, dappled with dew
(Pink, pale, color of salmon, lavender almost blue),
Pushing the fence—and over all the spell
Of a rich, rank, germinating smell
Out of the earth, an odor green and brown—
Bushes of rainy lilacs weighted down.

O Spring, O light of limb, O lovely stepping one,
Brushing the speared grass, leading the warm sun;
O leafy glade, unspoiled, unspotted, cool,
Dipping your matted roots into the rain's pool:
Mortal am I, mortal and twisted with pain,
But I would begin too—I would begin again.

Gide's First Novel

The Immoralist. By André Gide. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

STRANGE are the mysteries and accidents of translation. André Gide, commonly regarded as the foremost author of France, has been writing for forty years. Translations of his works did not begin to appear here until 1926. "Les Faux Monnayeurs," published in France in 1925, came out in English translation in 1927. But his first novel, "L'Immoraliste," published in 1902, only now appears in an American edition.

The story, told in the first person, is that of Michel, a man brought up as a student of dead civilizations, and entirely absorbed in his studies, who marries a young girl at his dying father's wish. On his honeymoon he is attacked by tuberculosis, and he emerges from the shadow of death with his outlook upon life completely altered. For the first time he realizes the exquisite delights of pure sensation; his older studies no longer appeal to him, except as he finds here and there something relevant to his new feeling. He becomes fascinated by the last years of the empire of the Goths, and what attracts him most is the figure of the young king Athalaric, "this fifteen-year-old boy, . . . rebelling against his Latin education and flinging aside his culture, as a restive horse shakes off a troublesome harness; . . . preferring the society of the untutored Goths . . . plunging for a few years into a life of unbridled pleasures . . . and dying at eighteen, rotten and sodden with debauchery."

Michel becomes constantly more restive as he feels this impulse toward "a wilder, more natural state"; and at his country home in Normandy, where he goes with his wife, Marceline, to spend the summers, he consorts by preference with the coarsest and most disreputable of his farm hands. It is now Marceline who succumbs to tuberculosis, and though Michel has an odd sort of love for her he knowingly takes her to climates bad for her health, and does not conceal from her his changed views. He is troubled not only by his new impulses but by doubts which affect all culture. What can man do more? he asks himself. "Is what man has hitherto said all that he could say? Is there nothing in himself he has overlooked? Can he do nothing but repeat himself? . . . And every day there grew strong in me a confused consciousness of untouched treasures somewhere lying covered up, hidden, smothered, by culture and decency and morality." It seems to him then that he has been "born to make discoveries of a kind hitherto undreamed of"; he soon goes to the length of "sympathizing only with the wildest outbreaks of conduct in other people" and of regretting that such manifestations are subject to any control whatever; the worst instinct of every human being appears to him the sincerest. At the end he betrays Marceline with the mistress of an Arab boy, and comes home to find her dying.

Were it not for its depressing close, the novel might almost be considered a seductive argument for immorality. It was indeed so considered by reviewers at its first appearance, and M. Gide has felt called upon to defend it in a preface, in which he complains:

> No one was grateful to me for the indignation he felt against my hero; it was as though he felt this indignation in spite of me; it overflowed from Michel on to myself; I seemed within an ace of being confounded with him. But I intended to make this book as little an indictment as an apology and took care to pass no judgment. The public nowadays will not forgive an author who, after relating an action, does not declare himself either for or against it.

Yet it is evident that Gide intended his novel to be regarded at least in part from the moral side—to raise, if not to answer, a fundamental moral question. From this angle, the book is slightly dated. It recalls that "religion of sin" with which the name of Baudelaire is most frequently associated, and which troubled the fin de siecle group. The present-day reader is let down, too, when he finds, after so much profoundly philosophical preparation, that the protagonist's revolt takes forms no more original than those of egoism, unfaithfulness, and sexual aberration. After all, vice is as commonplace as virtue.

But as a psychological study, as a work of art, "The Immoralist" is almost a masterpiece. The mental change in Michel and his moral disintegration are made thoroughly convincing; they do not proceed step by step like a logical theorem, but with those advances and recessions so frequent in life. Michel's drift toward homosexuality, in particular, is suggested with the utmost delicacy and skill. One might think of this as an acute psychoanalytic novel, free from jargon, were it not that it was written long before psychoanalysis effectively made its appearance. The minor characters, the Arab boys and the Normandy farm hands, are drawn with great shrewdness, and the figure of Marceline, while not perhaps as sharply realized and full-bodied as it might be, is lovely and pathetic. Admirably translated by Dorothy Bussy, the book is written in a graceful idyllic prose. It is a novel that puts to the test once more two dubious, weather-beaten words, for it is completely "classical" in form and completely "romantic" in message.

Two Kinds of Satire

Lost Buffalo. By Leonard Bacon. Harper and Brothers. $2.
Droll Parade. By Carlton Talbott. Horace Liveright. $2.

LEONARD BACON can tell a rattling good story in expertly written verse, and he has told another one in "Lost Buffalo." Here again, in his usual exact metrical pattern, his accustomed eighteenth-century manner, Mr. Bacon's purpose is satire. His laughter is, however, always a bit forced and his satire is frequently based more upon a pedantic and aristocratic snobbishness than upon true wit. He looks down his nose at whatever he is describing and consequently always sees it a bit askew. In "Lost Buffalo" the poet is debunking what he considers the sentimental attitude toward the American Indian. In so doing he sometimes cheapens himself more than he does the Indian. He is a very prejudiced man; he doesn't think much of Indians or Jews or radicals—and he tells us so. To destroy these false idols he uses no rapier-like thrust, no ridicule other than that of character depreciation. He makes his Indian a drunkard and a fool, and although some Indians may be both this type of Indian is not in the majority. He calls Lenin (or says that his child calls him) "funny man." This method of caricature would be equally effective or ineffective regardless of what subject is caricatured.

Mr. Bacon has always been debunking something, and often very successfully. He was most entertaining indeed when he started after Ph.D.'s and the scholastic pretense and folly in degree-hunting. He is often an amusing and annoying poet at one and the same time. This is probably what he wishes to be. One wonders, however, why he has never quite become the expert intellectual satirist that he promised to be.

Carlton Talbott in "Droll Parade" is a rollicking antic and trick performer. His touch is as light as Mr. Bacon's is heavy; his verse form more varied but less expert. He is lusty and hilarious—neither of which attributes could ever be Mr. Bacon's. He writes alleged historical incidents, but his stories always have to do with kings in their off moments, with priests not entirely priestly, with virgins not quite virginal, with emasculated dragons, and with aristocratic stomach aches. His poems dash along through naughty incident after naughty incident. They make no pretense to complete story-telling nor to serious character portrayal. They read easily and entertainingly. Mr. Talbott has not the polish or skill of Mr. Bacon, but he is more fun.

EDA LOU WALTON

The Soviet Achievement

Soviet Russia. By William Henry Chamberlin. Little, Brown and Company. $5.

Russia Today and Yesterday. By E. J. Dillon. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

MR. CHAMBERLIN, who is the Moscow correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, has been for seven years a resident of Moscow and, what is even more important, has a Russian wife to aid him. He has traveled in remote portions of the country, living for weeks at a time in peasant villages in central Russia, the Ukraine, and the Caucasus. His desire to be non-partisan is obvious on every page; his objective is to furnish an intelligent, balanced understanding of what is going on, supported by the historical background of the Revolution and the Communist movement. He has as a result achieved a volume which will be for some time to come one of the best reference books on the achievements of the Soviets, especially from the historical point of view. His volume is crowded with facts that every visitor to Russia should know to enable him to understand what he sees on his travels. Here he will find answered most of the innumerable questions with which the tourist is confronted on his return to America, such as: Are there still wild, homeless children? How many Jews are there in the ruling clique? How many Communists are there, and how does the central commission function in disciplining and purifying the party? What is the exact story of the break between Trotzky and the group headed by Stalin, etc., etc.?

The very fact, however, that Mr. Chamberlin desires to be as judicial as possible makes the book hard reading. His style, too, is dull and heavy. It is to be hoped that in later editions there will be more careful editing to eliminate frequent repetition, and to catch some slips, due presumably to the difficulty of revising the manuscript at such long range. Thus, he speaks of Lunacharsky as Commissar of Education although Lunacharsky was dismissed from office in the early fall of 1929. The book is also not up to date as to the more recent developments in the war against the kulaks, or the successful grain-collecting campaign of the fall of 1929. It is only fair to add, however, that no book on Russia can be up to the minute. I know of one that is on the stocks two chapters of which, involving months of research and study, were destroyed on a single day by a couple of Soviet decrees introducing an entirely new system of law, or legal procedure.

For the human element in the situation, as well as for a colorful picture of what is going on in Russia, one must turn to other volumes than Mr. Chamberlin's, such as Maurice Hindus's admirable "Humanity Uprooted." Mr. Chamberlin, for example, has given little space to the vexed questions of sex relations and the making-over of the family. Finally, it may be added that he believes that "bolshevism is a Russian rather than an international phenomenon." The positive gains for Russia from sovietism he finds to be the annihilation of agricultural landlordism, the cultural autonomy of the non-Russian nationalities, and the emergence of a new spirit of what may be called plebeian democracy. He feels that the substitution of state for private control and operation in industry, transport, banking, and trade has yet to prove itself. But he adds that it is "now so firmly rooted and established and taken for granted . . . that one can no more imagine its replacement by private capitalism than one could imagine the introduction of communism in America. For good or evil Marx's economic ideas are to receive a long-term, thorough, practical demonstration in Russia."

The interest of Dr. Dillon's volume lies first in his extraordinary knowledge of pre-war, Czarist Russia, in which he was for many years professor of comparative philology in Kharkov, editor of an Odessa paper, and correspondent of various English and American dailies, and then in his extraordinarily favorable view of the Bolshevik achievements. He revisited Russia in 1928 after an absence of fourteen years and portrays the astounding difference in the Russian scene as he viewed it, usually with the highest praise. His book is not meant to be as searching a volume as Mr. Chamberlin's, and it obviously lacks Mr. Chamberlin's depth of knowledge of Soviet Russia. Like Mr. Chamberlin's, Dr. Dillon's volume is already in places out of date, and one feels in it the need of more definite and unqualified statements. Dr. Dillon has every reason to be bitter against the Bolsheviks. They not only seized his life savings, but robbed him "of one near and dear, whose loss all the money in the world cannot make up." Despite this he remains remarkably detached and non-partisan in his judgment of the Bolsheviks, of whose achievements he often speaks with genuine enthusiasm. For instance, writing of the Ukraine he knew so well, Dr. Dillon declares that it "has risen from the dead" into a most impressive "independence, vigor, and relative prosperity"; that it "has become animated with a new soul." As for the embattled peasant, Dr. Dillon declares that "the disenthralment and cultural uplift of the peasantry by the leaders of bolshevism is one of the most marvelous feats on record." Foreigners who like himself had studied in Czarist days "the habits and the wretched social status of the peasantry will find it hard to recognize them as they are today." Similarly he cannot withhold his admiration of what the Soviets have accomplished in other fields. Here is his conclusion:

> The Bolshevists then have accomplished much of what they aimed at, and more than seemed attainable by any human organization under the adverse conditions with which they had to cope. They have mobilized well over > one hundred and fifty millions of listless dead-and-alive human beings, and infused into them a new spirit. They have wrecked and buried the entire Old World order in one-sixth of the globe and are digging graves for it everywhere else. They have shown themselves able and resolved to meet emergency and to fructify opportunity. Their way of dealing with home rule and the nationalities is a masterpiece of ingenuity and elegance. None of the able statesmen of today in other lands has attempted to vie with them in their method of satisfying the claims of minorities. In all these and many other enterprises they are moved by a force which is irresistible, almost thaumaturgical.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Salvation Through Monism

The Proving of Psyche. By Hugh I'Anson Fausset. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

MR. FAUSSET'S book is in two parts, but the argument which runs through them both is of one piece. In the first part he sets forth a philosophical position which is called "true romanticism" and in the second he criticizes the ideas of Irving Babbitt. The whole book is closely reasoned and well written, but it is not easy reading; Mr. Fausset employs a terminology to express his ideas of which it is difficult to approve, and he indulges in references to a certain "ideal" personality which arouse my suspicions of his whole program.

I have an ineluctable hostility to writers who employ the figure of Jesus as a symbol for the perfect man. We know too little about Jesus for the reference to have any precise or convincing meaning. It is impossible to say that Jesus supports this or that argument. If the evidence about Jesus were as overwhelming as the writers who employ this device imply, it would never have been possible for a whole school of not entirely idiotic Biblical critics to maintain that Jesus never existed. In any case, to employ Jesus as a symbol for an ideal, and particularly to employ his alleged ideas to sustain an argument as intricate as that Mr. Fausset sets forth, is to indulge in indefensible myth-making. Other than as a religious symbol Jesus has precious little to do with present-day intellectual dilemmas.

Of course the reason Mr. Fausset appeals to his version of the ideas of Jesus is that he wants to reestablish what he calls a religious synthesis of the personality. He wishes to "formulate a faith in which intelligence need no longer prove fatal to imagination." "The essential problem that lies before humanity," he writes, "is how to combine creatively, as distinct from balancing negatively, apparent opposites, how to harmonize the individual and the social, the fact and the desire, the natural and the human, the conscious and the unconscious, the idea and the thing." The great enemy of his program is dualism. He correctly believes that all dualisms are destructive of human personality, setting up false antitheses within man. He chooses to believe that Jesus solved that problem by synthesizing the conflicting claims upon man into a religious monism. Official syncretic Christianity restored dualism to a basic position in Western philosophy. It has been perpetuated ever since in literature by the classicists, and it has been fought in literature by the romanticists. The classicists tend to achieve a perilous negative balance, artificial in nature, between the conflicting elements of life. The romanticists have perceived the artificiality and perilousness of the classic balance and have revolted against it. But while they have seen the weakness of classicism they have rarely had the resources to achieve a true synthesis. Mr. Fausset believes that the materials are now at hand and that they point to a synthesis beyond dualism; they point to a religious monism. Mr. Fausset admits that the old supernaturalism is dead. He says, however, that "the supernatural is being recovered . . . as the creative principle in the natural." He talks about "the divinity immanent in life." One apprehends this divinity apparently by an imaginative apprehension of life, a sort of cooperation of reason and instinct. Mr. Fausset would surrender himself to this impersonal power, this divinity. This surrender, he maintains, will save him from hypostatized egotism, which is the dangerous element in all philosophies grounded exclusively in reason. His final aim would be, as said before, a religious monism which reconciles the moral and the mystical impulses, the instincts and the reason, the animal and the human (i.e., apparently, the cultural heritage), and similar dualisms. And, finally, he calls the creative will of life (i.e., the "divinity" in life) the "Father." He alleges that is what Jesus meant by Father!

It is easy to see from the preceding rapid and crude summary of Mr. Fausset's closely reasoned argument that the chief indictment of Mr. Babbitt is that he not only desires to perpetuate a dualism, but actually glorifies it. Now I too think that the central dualism of the new humanism is one of its major flaws, but I do not agree that it is necessary to drag in a somewhat far-fetched interpretation of the alleged teachings of Jesus in order to discredit it. I do not know of any greater disaster to contemporary thinking than this use of terms like "religion," "Jesus," "Father," and so on to sustain an argument for a modern necessity. There is small evidence that Mr. Fausset (and this is true of most of the people of his type) has ever engaged in the labor of "dissociating" the emotional incrustations which make the use of such terms dangerous. Such terminology befuddles rather than clarifies modern thinking. And, finally, it is apparent that all Mr. Fausset wants is an integrated personality, a personality harmonious in its workings, not split into opposing fragments to the point of disintegration. I fail to see anything in this ideal which cannot better be achieved through the technique of science, and consequently I cannot but object to the use of such muddied words as "religion" in advocating its necessity.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

Another "Love-Life"

Balzac: The Man and the Lover. By Francis Gribble. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

A DISCUSSION of this book might, as one reluctant reviewer has shown, present the current estimate of Balzac's achievement, the results of scholarly research into his life, or other matter incidental to the author's purpose. Otherwise, one must baldly declare that the writer of the "love-life" of a dozen famous figures has added a thirteenth. In an early letter to his sister Balzac wrote: "I have two and only two passionate desires: to be famous and to be loved." Mr. Gribble tells us this in the first sentence of the first chapter and reminds us of it constantly, his aim being to show how the second desire was realized. The author's ability imaginatively to re-create his hero may be illustrated in his account of the newly unearthed fact that an uncle of Balzac's was guillotined for murder. He begins: "It is not even certain that Balzac himself knew anything about it. He would hardly, if he had done so, have written of the guillotine as 'the pillar of society'." And he ends the tale: "Balzac was a lad of nineteen at the time the murder was committed. The matter may (though it is unlikely) have been hushed up so successfully that even he knew nothing about it, in spite of the fact that he was at one time in correspondence with his cousin, Louis Balssa's son. But though the story stands in no direct relation to his career, it seems right and reasonable for his biographer to tell it. It is a new fact—a striking and significant fact. It offers, on the assumption that he knew of it, a partial explanation, for what it may be worth, of that morbidity which always haunted Balzac."

The frequent digressions, however, such as the consideration as to whether a charming woman is more desirable at twenty or forty, and the love episodes themselves are presented with a delicacy that probably will both please the inhibited reader and satisfy the unavailing censor.

JOSEPH T. SHIPLEY

A Pioneer Fairy Story

Cimarron. By Edna Ferber. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

WITH the instincts of a true story-teller, Miss Ferber has chosen for her latest dashing novel an irresistible protagonist. The hero of her tale is the West—mad, generous, loud-mouthed, colorful, untamed. The Wild West, the West of infinite distances, of men and horses, of six-shooters and daylight bank robberies, of Indians in beaded moccasins and blankets, of mud huts and red "likker," the West that Oklahoma was forty years ago. And her hero was obliging enough to be not only untamed, which gave him an altogether picturesque beginning, but to be full of ambition, which made his taming a matter of less than a quarter of a century. And when he had settled down to a tidy existence of front porches and twenty-year-old elms blossoming in the desert, he came into a fortune! Oil; oil that made him so rich he could buy diamonds by the bucketful—and being a simple soul, he did exactly that. Our hero, then, turns out to be none other than our old friend Cinderella.

With this background, Miss Ferber, practiced writer that she is, could not fail to make a tale that would fire the imagination of a great many thousand readers. But she has done more than draw a brilliant picture of Oklahoma. She has created men and women who go there to live—and in a measure do live there in the pages of her book. I say in a measure because I think Sabra and Yancey Cravat, and certainly Sol Levy and Dixie Lee and Cim and Donna and Felice, have a tendency to be gorgeous painted figures on the back drop of the West. I can see them well enough; but I cannot quite feel them or hear them. Not because they are preposterous or exaggerated. Miss Ferber assures me in her preface that only the more credible incidents in her book are not bona fide. The most unbelievable ones are the true ones. Yet I never get inside Yancey's skin; I never penetrate, indeed, beyond his white sombrero and his Prince Albert. I never feel that he is more than an actor to whom the great panorama of a civilization that is rolling out behind him is no more than a scene in a play. I see the struggle, in the case of Yancey and Sabra his wife, of soul with sense, of the dreamer with the practical man—in this case, the practical woman. I see Yancey full of zest and poetry, eager for a new life, afraid of security, afraid of monotony; I see Sabra passionately set on making a home for herself in the wilderness, a home that shall be neat and snug and warm like the home she left in Kansas. But when I have finished reading all that Miss Ferber has to tell me of Yancey and Sabra they are still strangers to me, I do not know them.

I suspect that this is due to Cinderella. If the magic flow of oil had not drenched the erstwhile Indian Territory in gold, Miss Ferber would not have been betrayed at the end of her story by a falsely romantic conclusion. It is all so easy. Neither Sabra nor Yancey, it is true, strikes it rich. But they do not need to. Their daughter becomes first the mistress and then the wife of the richest man in the country; their son marries one of the despised and downtrodden Osages, but she is really a princess in a white buckskin gown. Sabra is the leading woman in the State; Yancey is the most famous figure, the model for a monument to the Pioneer, and dies a hero, magnificently catching in his arms a can of nitroglycerin that was hurled unexploded from a gusher. It turns out to be a fairy story. No matter if it really happened. It is the Fairy Story of the Pioneer and the Indian. It delights my eye but, like most fairy stories, it does nothing to my heart.

There were, of course, blood and tears on this last of the frontiers; there were death and despair. Miss Ferber knows it as well as anyone. But somehow her despairs are less convincing than her triumphs. Yancey, dying with a broken chest, will play Hamlet tomorrow night, or if not Hamlet then Buffalo Bill. And if Yancey is a stage hero, the Osages in "Cimarron" are stage Indians. Only in the incredible hour of their triumph, when they wear blankets over beaded Paris frocks and cerise silk shirts, when they buy Packards by the half-dozen, when the miserable spot of earth that they had been last exiled to bursts with oily wealth beyond any dreams, are they real. They will help make "Cimarron" a successful musical comedy, a super-feature movie. Even they, even the Wild West, cannot make it into the great book it ought to be.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Hymn of Hate

Grandeur and Misery of Victory. By Georges Clemenceau. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

CLEMENCEAU'S last book reveals the soul of the Tiger of France, but it adds nothing to his stature. It is a prolonged snarl of hate—hate of Foch, of Poincaré, of Haig, of Pershing, of the Germans, of Briand and the League of Nations. There is in it surprisingly little hate of President Wilson, and just one admiration—for Clemenceau himself.

Raymond Recouly's "Foch: My Conversations with the Marshal" inspired the eighty-year-old hermit to pen these savage reflections. Half the book is a reply to what he calls that "impudent farrago of troopers' tales"; the rest is a bitter attack upon the Frenchmen and others who had "mutilated" Clemenceau's own Peace of Versailles. But what Clemenceau makes most clear is his own tremendous egotism, his blank incapacity to see good in any but his own work.

Foch had failed to give Clemenceau credit for his achievements and had criticized Clemenceau's peace. Clemenceau replies first and most shatteringly by exposing Foch's own ambition and vanity. Foch campaigned to win the supreme command and even stooped to have terra cotta busts of himself made and distributed to his political friends, including the unforgetting Clemenceau. Next, Clemenceau declares that he was himself responsible for Foch's appointment to the united command, and that he saved him from disgrace after the defeat on the Chemin des Dames. Third, the ex-Prime Minister asserts that Foch was insubordinate—a "soldier in a state of rebellion"—and a liar. All of which may be, but these are vices characteristic of both antagonists. Clemenceau himself certainly never yielded to any higher authority, and he too has been accused of lapses of memory.

Poincaré is to Clemenceau "the man of inaction," Briand "the leading light of French defeatism." He says he told Lloyd George that from the day after the armistice he had found him an enemy to France and that Lloyd George, a man of a "bright, two-fisted smile," replied, "Was it not always our traditional policy?" The American soldiers, according to Cle-

AN OPEN STATEMENT of POLICY by THE TRUSTEES of THE BANK of NEW YORK and TRUST COMPANY

In view of the many changes that have taken place in the banking field during the past year, and firmly convinced that the interests of its customers and future customers can be best secured by the preservation of the independent position of the bank, the trustees feel that the following outline of its policy will be of particular interest at this time

THAT the Bank of New York and Trust Company must preserve its independent position and that the historic continuity of what is now the oldest bank in America, retaining its original name and the first financial institution in America to use "Trust Company" as part of its title, must remain unbroken.

THAT there is a real place in New York for conservatively managed banks and trust companies of moderate size where customers, both in the Banking and Trust Departments, may have easy access to and personal acquaintance with the senior officers.

THAT the Capital and Surplus of the Bank of New York and Trust Company, when considered in relation to its responsibilities, rank the institution among the strongest in the country and that it is entirely adequate to take care of the requirements of the great majority of wealthy corporations, firms and individuals.

THAT its Trust Department—continuously operated for more than one hundred years by the New York Life Insurance and Trust Company and the Bank of New York and Trust Company—is completely equipped to care for the largest estates and trusts as well as for those of moderate size and that its record for administration of fiduciary trusts of all kinds entitles it to rank among the leaders.

THAT the fact that the company is not a distributor of securities, either directly or through an affiliated company is of distinct advantage to its customers and to all those interested in its trust funds, as its advice and information concerning investments are entirely impartial.

THAT the Company's unique Charter, under which Trustees are elected for life or "good behavior" with power to fill vacancies in the Board as they occur, affords a guaranty of continuity of management that is of inestimable value to the creators of trusts, some of which are intended to continue far into the future

menceau, did not go into the battle line until the war was "practically over," and Pershing's desire for a complete separate army cost the lives of thousands of Frenchmen. And today "America, who has made a separate peace after growing incredibly rich through the war, claims for her treasury the contributions earmarked for restoring French soil to a productive state."

But the Treaty of Versailles, Clemenceau's own baby, appears in a new halo. Foch and Poincaré had attacked him for not annexing the Rhineland and he defends his handiwork, even so far as to declare that no one has a right to change it. Its keynote, this strange old man says and repeats, "is the liberation of the peoples, the independence of nationalities." This of the treaty which calmly divided Germany's colonies among the victorious empires, allotted Shantung to Japan, vivisected Germany with the Polish corridor, forbade the union of Austria and Germany, and created the monstrosity of the Free City of Danzig! It is not the entire treaty, however, upon which he pronounces his blessing. President Wilson's League of Nations was to him "nothing more than an epitome of the parliaments of all nations, to which all historic disagreements, all diplomatic intrigue, all coalitions of national, or even private, egoisms were to come and concentrate, multiply, intensify, and perhaps sometimes even find some momentary mitigation."

The tragedy of Europe, to Clemenceau, was that his treaty had not been maintained intact. Every mitigation of it was a crime—the failure to hang the Kaiser, the admission of the Germans to international conferences and to the League of Nations as equals (it is typical of Clemenceau's mind that he completely forgot the Germans when he said that the Peace Conference called before it and heard "all the parties interested"), and all the gradual steps by which the settlement of reparations was reduced from an abstract principle to a calculation of economic possibilities. In 1929 Clemenceau was still thinking in 1918 terms. He was still passionately sure of Germany's exclusive and complete responsibility for the war; positive that the German revolution was "mere window-dressing," and that the Germans were still deceitful Huns, a menace to the peace of Europe. The outstanding phenomenon of 1929 Europe, to his inflamed eyes, was that "Germany was arming, France was disarming." He died a disappointed man, sorry for France because she had left him alone in his old age and had turned to weaker leaders who had undone his great work.

In the darkest days of the war this man had indeed that "stubborn will to win" whose lack in Haig and Pétain he deplored. But in peace time—even in war, one may believe—that is not enough. One turns the last page of this sometimes eloquent, often pungent, almost always petty book with a sense of relief that France so soon relieved Europe of the incubus of such a man of hate.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

At the Bottom

Bottom Dogs. By Edward Dahlberg. With an Introduction by D. H. Lawrence. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

THIS is a hard book. It grows out of the rough pavement of the meaner streets in our Mid-Western cities. It is not dramatic; not about hobos or criminals or sporting characters. It is about bottom dogs, youngsters like Lorry, whose mother has established the Star Ladies' Barber Shop in a poor section of Kansas City. Lorry runs about in the streets until his mother decides it is best for him to be sent to an orphan asylum in Cleveland. He enters the home when he is twelve and stays there five years. We learn a great deal about this home, which seems not to have been worse than the average place of the kind (which is bad enough), and a lot about the other boys there.

After Lorry gets out he hangs around Cleveland for a while, then goes back to his mother in Kansas City. He seems to be getting nowhere. Finally he rides the rods to the Coast. American life on Lorry's level is surely the crassest form of life known to man. In this novel there are no lurid scenes, no extraordinary pictures of depravity, cruelty, or crime. But the whole is raw and hideous—and true. Except for the last chapters about the Los Angeles Y.M.C.A. and its hangers-on and Solomon's Dance Palace, in which the writing is jazzed up, the book is written in a stale, flat, back-alley Americanese—an ugly argot. There is a lot of meaningless foul talk which, however, is important, for it tremendously enhances the realism. D. H. Lawrence writes an interesting preface. In it one feels both the fascination and the revulsion with which a sensitive spirit, himself once a boy of the laboring class in the Old World, views this admirably perfected photograph of a portion of the American scene. But like so many American novels, of both high and low degree, it is a novel about a background.

FRED T. MARSH

Music

Young Mr. Purcell

THE very early spring, shining, keen, a little bare, touched with the sadness of things young, clothed itself in sound not long ago when the Friends of Music finished their eason at the Mecca Temple with "Dido and Aeneas." It was written in 1690 by a man of thirty-two for a young ladies' seminary in a London still fresh with the great winds of the Elizabethan springtime.

Mr. Bodanzky, with the penetration into the central spirit of whatever he conducts which usually characterizes his readngs, had felt and understood those winds. Under his direction he work unfolded like a veritable banner of youth, high-colored with the robust patterns of the choruses or brocaded with the delicate supple lines of the arias. It lived from beginning to nd. The secret of such vitality in performance is notoriously lusive, but this time it arose from very subtle modulations in empo and dynamic. The larger dynamic curves and the larger hythmic designs were never distorted, but their lines were lightly and constantly varied. The regulation of this inner ulse seems to be the interpreter's chief task. If none exists he performance becomes an anatomical survey of a musical orpse; if it beats too strongly hysteria results.

Mesdames Telva and Flexer and Mr. Schlegel brought to heir roles sincerity and much beauty of tone, though the latter's roduction was marred by a shake which sometimes left one in oubt as to the exact pitch. Mr. Meader made up in fine legato nging and excellent diction what he lacked in fire—a criticism erhaps unmerited, since the Trojan prince seems to have been istastefully cautious. Mme Matzenauer's voice and musicianhip realized entirely the range of emotion and the great musical eauty of the Dido. Her When I Am Laid in Earth, the tragic nd moving song which Bach incorporated into the St. Matthew assion, stirred the audience profoundly.

Thus projected Purcell's music produced something of the nazement of a miracle. Here is a score written over two centuries ago by a man who died at thirty-seven and was even isoted from the most significant musical developments of his time. e may have been curtailed as well by the exigencies of a new rm, for this was the first "opera" in English. He was certainly limited by the harmonic palette of the seventeenth century, mere sheaf of accepted colors if compared with the iridescent ances, the all-permitted tonal combinations of the modern

"Most Prolific Source of Dangerous Disease"

—Dr. Foges, Rudolfinerhaus Hospital, Vienna

THE 28 feet of human intestine, says the famous head of the great Vienna Clinic, is the most prolific source of dangerous disease. He states that 90% of civilized women over 25 years and men above 35 suffer from Intestinal Stasis (Constipation) in some form.

Sir Arbuthnot Lane, noted King's Surgeon of London, directs attention to this greatest single cause of ill health in these words: "The material which accumulates, decomposing beyond normal, infects the mucous membrane of the colon and appendix. Organisms extend into the dammed up and stagnating contents, infecting the food supply. The absorption of these toxins and organisms by the blood vessels and lymphatics, being in excess of what the liver, kidneys and ductless organs can deal with, circulate through the entire body, lowering the vitality of every cell and causing their degeneration. In consequence, the whole gamut of disease as known to us in civilization appears." composer's canvas. Yet this genius contrives with his seventeenth-century tools, the tonics and dominants and cadences whose boundaries the most naive dance tune of today exceeds in every measure, a music marvelously fresh and various. For nearly an hour he distributes melodic declamation, woven polyphony, fragile, exquisite melodies, and full-blooded lusty choruses. So dextrously does he apportion them, so rich is his invention, that the listener is passed from change to change without one moment of slackened interest.

That idiom he found so meet looks very cramped to us now. Not one composer living could move in its narrow rooms with grace. Why, with all our new resources, is a great deal of contemporary music such spiritless stuff, so merely clever? Have we no Purcells? Perhaps the expansion of the musical idiom has been so rapid, we are so perturbed by the sheer strangeness of the intervals employed, that we stand confused in a din of atonality and cannot hear our Purcells for the noise they make.

Drama

Shakespeare and Expressionism

FRITZ LEIBER'S King Lear was the most unsatisfactory of his performances. The play is probably the most difficult of the Shakespearean tragedies, and no matter how vigorously Mr. Leiber vociferated he never once succeeded in convincing the audience that his passion rose to a height which would justify the wildness of the words he was called upon to utter. And yet, inadequate as the interpretation was, the rule that any performance of a Shakespearean play is likely to reveal values unnoticed in the study held even here, and I confess that I had never before caught the full force of certain of the scenes or realized the extent to which it is true that in this play the poet not only anticipates the utterance of the completest nihilism ever achieved by a Strindberg or an Andreyev, but anticipates also even their method of expression. For if the scene on the heath—the scene in which the maddened Lear discusses the universe with a naked man and a fool—were written today, critics would surely not let it pass without some reference to both Russian gloom and the technique of expressionism.

When Lear, come to his dotage, renounces the power which had served to protect him from knowledge of things as they are, he experiences first of all the depth of human ingratitude, and he realizes that what he had hitherto supposed to be virtue was in fact no more than avarice and fear. Appalled by his discovery, he renounces his kindred and, not yet wholly disillusioned, he goes forth to discover what kind of peace a plain man can make with the natural world. But the scene on the heath reveals the utter failure of his quest. Wisdom, embodied in the Fool, reveals her impotence and is reduced to offering the cold comfort of cynicism. Inanimate nature, whom some, even before Rousseau and Wordsworth, had imagined as a kind mother, shows her solicitude by pouring down rain upon them and crashing her thunder above their defenseless heads. There remains only the innate dignity of the creature man, but the nakedness of Poor Tom reveals clearly enough how much that amounts to when the forked radish is brought to the final test. "What is your study?" demands Lear. "How to prevent the fiend and to kill vermin," answers Tom, and that, no doubt, is the whole duty of man, for the phrase means, I take it, how to achieve both peace of mind and peace of body. But the scene in which the words are spoken reveals how utterly the whole company has failed to do either. Lear has appealed in turn to each of the three abstractions in which it is possible for man to have faith—to Wisdom, to Nature, and to Man. All

Why a Training School for JEWISH SOCIAL WORK?

BECAUSE experience has shown that the social worker can only be successful if he knows and reckons with the social, religious and cultural background of the people among whom he works.

BECAUSE the Jewish group in America represents a religious and cultural group possessing a highly distinctive character.

BECAUSE the social worker who identifies his work with the Jewish group in America should, by special training and knowledge, be able to contribute to the problems of its adjustment to American life with a view to its own greater happiness and to the greater enrichment of the culture of America.

College graduates are invited to examine carefully the advantages of Jewish social work as a profession.

Scholarships and Fellowships ranging from $150 to $1,000 for each school year are available for specially qualified students.

May 9th is the last date for filing application for the $1,000 and $750 fellowships.

three have failed him, and so, while the elements seem to join him in his imprecations, he curses God. There is no principle of good upon which the human being can count.

If the scene says anything it says that man can believe in the goodness of the universe only so long as he is not compelled to contemplate it; that he may have faith while he lives in an artificially constructed world which seems to be governed by love and loyalty and duty, but that the structure is a fragile one likely to collapse at any moment as Lear's world has collapsed. It is made up of illusions; it is founded, in part at least, upon a misapprehension of the motives of such people as Goneril and Regan whose hypocrisy reassures such people as Lear. And when it does collapse it leaves those who have taken temporary refuge there lost in that anarchy of the heath to which nature is always tending to return.

Shakespeare, to be sure, saves himself (as he always does) from the madness which this way lies by a partial retraction. The very nature of tragedy as he writes it demands that some kind of order shall be reestablished; that something shall be salvaged from the wreck of human lives with which the tragedy deals. And it is, of course, Cordelia who performs this function. She is lost even at the moment when she is found again, but she does not die until she has restored to Lear his faith that goodness may exist—just as Desdemona does not die until she has given back to Othello the faith without which his death would have been intolerable. But whatever the scope of this retraction may be, it is not made until after Shakespeare has said all that can be said in defense of the belief that darkness rather than light is the ruling principle of the universe, and until, moreover, he has set forth the argument by means of a technique peculiarly "modern." Surely the scene on the heath is the inspiration of all the Walpurgis nights of literature, from that of "Faust" down to those of "Ulysses" and "Antic Hay." Surely also the fact is one which might profitably be remembered by those who believe Shakespeare outmoded, as well as by those conservatives who find only a distressing kind of insanity both in what some of the moderns say and in the way they say it. It is not only to men of the twentieth century that, in the words of a recent poet, "life has bared her bones."

Gandhi's Campaign Begins

By HERBERT ADOLPHUS MILLER

Bombay, March 15

I HAVE just spent three days at Gandhi's ashram, sharing all its activities, as the climax to five exciting and interesting weeks in India. During my five weeks I talked with missionaries, Englishmen, and Indian leaders of many religious faiths and political thought, Hindu, Moslem, Christian, and Parsee, liberal and radical. All agreed that there are only two real forces in India—the government and Gandhi.

I arrived at the ashram, a combined school and religious retreat, at the very moment when the ultimatum was being delivered to the Viceroy. The atmosphere was electric, as might have been expected at the general headquarters of an avowed army of revolution, but controlled, fearless, and confident. With this ascetic self-discipline I could not help contrasting the government at Delhi, housed in extravagance and surrounded by pomp and secrecy. Here in the ashram was a monastic life without secrets. Its messenger, carrying a declaration of war, was being sent on a fifty-hour trip third class. This messenger was a young English Quaker, expressly chosen to be a constant reminder to Gandhi that he himself has no hatred against Englishmen.

Gandhi was in the best of health and spirits, running and skipping with the children on his daily walk, and on all occasions full of laughter and banter. He has girded his loins for the battle of his life to arouse and free India; he has absolute confidence that the final outcome will be victory. When I asked him how large was his following he said that he did not know, but it was necessary to start in order to find out. He likened his efforts to arouse the people to a surgeon applying a blister to make a cure, always with the possibility that he may kill instead.

In reply to the claim that India has benefited by English rule, he said that there was no doubt that the British had done many good things—the hospitals, for example—though these good things reached only a microscopic per cent of those needing them and could not make up for the killing of self-reliance and the impoverishment of the masses. To the claim that only the government is able to preserve peace between Hindu and Moslem, Gandhi answered that the two religions had got on harmoniously before the English came. When the Mohammedans had shown a tendency to draw away, naturally the English had seized upon this divergence and stimulated it, on the principle of "divide and rule." "Hindus must be developed to such a point of self-control that the Moslems can have no fear," said Gandhi.

Mr. Gandhi, as is his custom, was sitting on the floor spinning during our interview. As I took my leave I said: "In wishing you success I do not know whether to express the hope that you will or will not be arrested." He laughed heartily and said: "It makes no difference; either is good. There will always be others to carry on, and the work will never stop." At evening prayer, with all the members of the ashram sitting on the ground around him, Mr. Gandhi read the list of those who had volunteered to go out in the first group on March 12. There were many questions about details from the audience. They were met with witty repartee by Mr. Gandhi and called forth bursts of laughter, but I could hardly keep back the tears. Before four o'clock the next day all had enrolled except a few men whose responsibilities in the ashram made it necessary for them to remain. The women were disappointed at not being allowed to go. Mr. Gandhi said the presence of women might embarrass the English and thereby make the fight unfair.

The work of preparing the men for the march and the women for taking over the men's work in the ashram was begun at once. I overheard an older man telling a younger one how to behave in jail and how to throw himself between the warring factions in case violence should break out. He was as matter of fact as though he had been giving directions for taking a journey.

Mr. Patel, the accepted first lieutenant of Mr. Gandhi and the brother of the president of the National Assembly, was arrested the last day we were at the ashram. As the police car approached, the members of the ashram lined up on both sides of the road. Mr. Patel burst out laughing and said: "I had expected to be the last to be arrested and here I am the first." He was loaded with garlands and given cotton to spin and then went on to the prison a mile beyond. This arrest was like "the shot heard round the world." Thousands flocked to the ashram, filling the four miles of dusty country road from Ahmedabad and camping by the gates of the ashram. The next day Ahmedabad declared a hartal (cessation of activities) and in the evening 60,000 persons gathered on the bank of the river to hear Gandhi's call to arms.

This call to arms was perhaps the most remarkable call to war that has ever been made. The dominant notes were non-violence, non-hatred, self-discipline, and sacrifice, fearlessness and persistence to the end. On the same day students at universities throughout India went on strike to continue until the day of the march. The casual observer could not fail to feel the complete absence of fear among all those who had committed themselves to the battle. There was much speculation as to whether the march would be allowed to begin, since its openly avowed purpose was to proceed to the sea and begin civil disobedience by illegally making salt as a protest against the iniquitous salt tax. But the march did begin at six-thirty on the day appointed. At eight-thirty in the morning, at a mass-meeting of youth in Bombay, I heard it reported that Gandhi had marched three miles with 125,000 people following. In the actual group there were seventy-two volunteers.

By the time this letter reaches New York Gandhi should have begun his work. The English are on the horns of a dilemma. They cannot overlook civil disobedience, but the arrest of Gandhi will take away the only man who can prevent violence. When he is arrested groups all over India are prepared to take up the work of civil disobedience, and the order has been issued for a general hartal for the day.

A Personal Message From

(Lecturer on Russian Literature—College of the City of New York)

Last year it was my privilege to act as cultural leader for the World Tourists, Inc., of their eminently successful tour to SOVIET RUSSIA. So many letters of commendation and enthusiasm were received by educators, travelers, teachers and business men who made up this group, that the WORLD TOURISTS have decided to send a similar tour this year to SOVIET RUSSIA under my guidance.

The tour begins June 26th, S. S. Lafayette, and includes 35 days in Soviet Russia. It will be my pleasure to interpret the remarkable changes that have taken place in Russia. A never forgetful tour. I earnestly invite immediate inquiry.

Full details will be sent including itineraries, rates, etc. Address

Gandhi's greatest strength is among the masses in the villages, in whose eyes he is a saint. The liberals and the intellectuals think it is better to strive for dominion status, although many of them are working heart and soul with Gandhi. There is vivid recollection of the methods of violence used successfully in Ireland, so that there is not complete unanimity about the use of non-violence. Many told me that they thought the first reprisals on the part of the government would be followed by sporadic outbursts of violence. They were not convinced that this would not be a good thing. One of the most prominent Indians in the government told me that it might take 200,000 Indian lives to 2,000 English lives, but that the Indians could afford their loss, while the loss of 2,000 important men would demoralize the government. Even the most convinced followers of Mr. Gandhi assume this outbreak of violence.

Jawaharlal Nehru, president of the National Congress which at Lahore in December declared for independence, is one of the closest workers with Mr. Gandhi, though he differs from him widely. The younger Nehru, a Brahman who lives in his father's palace, is an uncompromising Socialist, and thinks that all religion hampers progress. He radiates sincerity and faces the prospect of jail with the same fearless calm as Gandhi. He agreed with me that some guaranty to minority groups would help allay internal conflicts, but he had been unable to interest Gandhi in it for the reason I have given above. When I was in Delhi a conference was actually going on at which there were representatives of the divergent groups. No one expected much from it except an indication of purpose.

No one knows what policy the government will pursue. On the surface it does not seem worried. I heard the budget presented by the Finance Minister and noticed the remark that no allowances had been made for expenses in the event of civil disobedience or other disorders, though it was implied that there might be such disturbances. The Associated Press representative said that the call for news about India from England had multiplied many times in the past two months. The English press in India gives the news of the movement in detail, but is trying to belittle it with ridicule.

While I can make no prophecy as to immediate developments I am convinced that the Indians have actually started on the road from which they will not turn aside until independence is secured.

THE GUILT for the horrible loss of life in the Columbus penitentiary fire rests squarely upon the State of hio. Here is a penitentiary just a century old, built to ntain 1,500 persons and actually crowded with 4,900. It d already been the scene of one fire with terrible loss of e, yet nothing was done to remedy conditions. The 1929 ndbook of the National Society of Penal Information deared that the overcrowding was worse than in any other rge prison and that less than most other penitentiaries had grown away from the old ideas of penology. In other rds, this prison has for years been a disgrace to the rich d prosperous State of Ohio, which is now reaping just at it has sown. It cannot escape universal condemnation persons who have a spark of humanity and decency within m, who believe that no American State should be allowed outdo its criminals in its criminal mishandling of those s supposed to redeem and cure. We do not know or care o or what started the fire. Whether it was incendiary not, the black guilt of this mass murder rests on the State ich has tolerated so horrible an institution.

VE ARE GLAD the Conference Committee on the tariff bill has run the rates up all along the line, eeing invariably on the highest duties. We hope that s measure will emerge just as bad as it possibly can be, the worse it is the quicker will come the punishment and the reaction. Never, we believe, was there a spectacle of national economic folly similar to this of putting up tariff walls to a greater height than ever before in a period of business depression—the very moment when everything should be done to stimulate foreign trade. Meanwhile France has retaliated with a new high tariff on imported automobiles, trucks, and parts, passed in the Chamber of Deputies by 472 to 2, thus putting tariff burdens of about $1,000,000 a year on the American companies which are trying to sell their cars in France, the minimum duty on tourist cars being 45 per cent ad valorem. On April 16 the Cuban Minister to the United States, Dr. Orestes Ferrara, declared before the Southwest Foreign Trade Conference that the relations of his country to ours were "too sinister" to discuss before "so optimistic a gathering." But he felt obliged to point out that because of the new tariff "our sugar crisis is ruining our interests and at the same time yours, also." Once large and prosperous American companies in Cuba, he declared, "are going into the hands of receivers," and "have seen their investments reduced from $1,500,000,000 to less than $700,000,000." It is refreshing to note that one Democrat, ex-Senator James A. Reed, has told the truth about this bill. After rudely referring to President Hoover as a "misplaced cipher" he declared that the new tariff "perpetuates gross robberies for the benefit of a favored few."

IN FACE OF THE FACT that Senator Hiram Bingham was censured by his associates of the Senate for reprehensible conduct in deceiving the Senate Committee on Finance by sneaking a lobbyist of the Connecticut Manufacturers' Association into the committee's sessions as his private secretary, the President of the United States has chosen Mr. Bingham to head a commission to survey the situation in Samoa this summer. In face of the fact that his national Republican chairman, Claudius F. Huston, has been proved to have used for speculation for his private profit funds sent to him in trust to be used for lobbying purposes, Mr. Hoover permits him to remain as chairman. The President is either without the courage to oust him or without sufficient moral sensitiveness to be moved by the revelations of Mr. Huston's misconduct. What is the public to think of its Chief Executive in the light of these two happenings? Is it surprising that his stock steadily sinks? The rejection of his nominee for the Supreme Court, Judge Parker, by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate by a vote of 10 to 6 will still further diminish his prestige. The President might, it would seem, have looked up Judge Parker's record sufficiently to have ascertained all the details of his career both as a politician and as a judge before sending in his name.

MORE DELAY AT MUSCLE SHOALS! The House Committee on Military Affairs has discarded the Norris resolution for government operation of the Muscle Shoals plant, which passed the Senate by a vote of 45 to 23, and has selected a subcommittee of five to draft a bill for private operation under lease with an alternative plan for public operation if no satisfactory bid is forthcoming. If the Norris bill could be brought before the House that body would probably pass it; for the lobby revelations have made it politically dangerous to support the power companies. If a leasing bill can be reported, on the other hand, the extensive Southern interests that properly desire industrial development may be brought to support it as offering the only promise of action. With the Senate committed to public operation, however, such action by the House would only bring another deadlock and further delay in the utilization of this great plant. Apparently the power trust plans, if necessary, to continue the delay indefinitely in the hope that Senator Norris may be tired out or worn out in his magnificent fight for the public interest.

THE CHOICE OF ROLAND W. BOYDEN as a member of the Permanent Court of International Arbitration at The Hague is one of Mr. Hoover's appointments that can be commended. Mr. Boyden has had a useful and creditable experience in diplomatic or quasi-diplomatic business. He was a member of the American delegation at the Paris Peace Conference, and later, for some four years, served with dignity and general acceptance as the unofficial representative of the United States on the Reparations Commission. A few months ago he was designated by Mr. Hoover as umpire of the German-American Mixed Claims Commission. One of the early duties of the four American members of The Hague tribunal will be to nominate a successor to Chief Justice Hughes in the World Court of the League of Nations. The importance of this choice may be considerable if the United States decides to adhere to the court under the modifications of the court statute which have been made for its benefit. It is to be hoped, however, that the choice may not fall upon Professor John H. Wigmore, of Northwestern University, who has been strongly urged for the position. Professor Wigmore has high standing as a legal writer, but his attitude toward pacifists and radicals during the time, 1916-1920, when he was attached to the Judge Advocate General's office was so openly hostile as to unfit him for judicial honor.

UNCLE JOE GRUNDY'S campaign for election as Senator for Pennsylvania goes merrily forward, supported by a weird aggregation of wets, drys, labor leaders, and Mellons. The Mellon indorsement, announced by W. L. Mellon of Pittsburgh, spokesman for the family interests, declares that Pennsylvania needs a man of Grundy's "character, exceptional ability, unquestioned courage, and long experience," praises him to the skies for the way in which he "fearlessly" jammed through the tariff bill, and becomes positively eloquent in its defense of protection as the key to all of Pennsylvania's prosperity. Unfortunately, the day before the Mellon paean was issued the campaign committee that is supporting Secretary of Labor Davis came out with the charge that Grundy was planning to buy his nomination at the primaries, but such an allegation in the chemically pure political atmosphere of Pennsylvania is, of course, beneath contempt. A third Republican candidate, Professor Francis H. Bohlen, regarded as friendly to labor, is running on a wet platform. Even to Pennsylvanians the situation looks confused, but to the fearless Grundy the course is as straight as a string. The tariff bill, he told a crowd the other day in the face of all the other candidates, is "not what it ought to be"; the duties must be further revised—upward. This in Pennsylvania is known as statesmanship.

WHEN HENRY H. CURRAN, bearing the name of a lieutenant-colonel who gave his life for his country at Chancellorsville, appeared before the Senate Lobby Inquiry Committee, he charged that the Eighteenth Amendment had made the government "a murderer and an invader of the peoples' rights." When asked if he would favor a resort to arms if necessary, Mr. Curran, having previously declared that the "rights of mankind" as defined in the Constitution and Bill of Rights should be "defended in every way that may become necessary," sidestepped the question by saying: "We will cross that bridge when we come to it." Had any Socialist or red taken this position the welkin would have rung with demands that he be jailed for threatening to upset our government by force. In addition Mr. Curran testified that the great popular revolt against the Constitution, which his Association Against the Prohibition Amendment leads, was chiefly financed by seven multimillionaires, five of whom gave $5,000 a year each for Mr. Curran's own salary of $25,000 a year. Of these seven men five were Irénée du Pont, Pierre S. du Pont, Lammot du Pont, John J. Raskob, and Charles H. Sabin. Mr. Curran's society took in $427,213 in 1929 and is asking for $1,000,000 this year to elect a wet Congress. As a whole Mr. Curran's showing was anything but edifying, even to the wets who listened to his two days' grilling. Neither side shines in the hearings.

THE UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION continues acute. The Federal Council of Churches has urged the churches to give special attention to the problem on April 27. The National Unemployment League, seconding the suggestion of an Unemployment Sunday, urges that collections be taken on that day for relief purposes and that an appeal be made for a huge public-works program to relieve the existing distress. In the important matter of plans for the actual prevention of unemployment the federal government has allowed the leadership to pass to New York State whose Committee on the Stabilization of Industry for th Prevention of Unemployment recently appointed by Governor Roosevelt has already submitted an interesting preliminary report. Calling attention to the striking results attaine by some progressive employers, the committee says: "Whe employers become convinced of its value the habit of stabilizing will be included in their business practice just as naturally and completely as the habit of filing. . . . Th 'slump bugaboo' is not necessarily an act of Divine Providence. It is a problem to be faced and worked out, like another business problem." This is looking in the right direction, but if we are to get anywhere we shall have to trave a long way. An intelligently planned system of unemployment insurance, which as yet has scarcely begun to be discussed, could be made an effective agency to convince backward employers of the value of stabilization, for it could b arranged so that they would save money by steady operatio

THE RECORD OF THE DAUGHTERS of th American Revolution, whose annual congress has ju been held in Washington, remains unsullied. On Monda the Daughters heard President Hoover advocate the e trance of the United States into the World Court. On Wednesday the Daughters resolved against "involvement in European affairs" and in favor of "adequate" national, particularly naval, defense. On the same day resolutions were passed advocating registration of aliens, investigation of subversive organizations, and deportation of subversive aliens. But on Friday when one brave Daughter tried to line up her sisters in favor of the Eighteenth Amendment she was immediately suppressed by a resolution pledging the society to avoid controversial or dividing subjects such as religion, politics, and prohibition. On the same day Mrs. William T. Brown and Mrs. Carroll Miller, prominent members of the D. A. R., resigned because of the society's attitude toward the World Court and naval disarmament. On Saturday Mrs. Lowell Fletcher Hobart, President General, cried "Pacifist!" at the two resigners while the society reaffirmed its position by adopting another sheaf of resolutions calling for adequate naval and military defense and opposing the limitation plans of the London conference. Once more the Daughters have convened and adjourned. Once more, we are glad to say, they have upheld with characteristic courage the inalienable American right of resolution. But their ranks are thinning. Miss Margaretta Fort, daughter of the late Governor of New Jersey, and Mrs. Lois Kimball Rosenberry, wife of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, are the latest to announce their resignations.

UNION SQUARE in New York City on May Day is not big enough to hold a meeting, accompanied by patriotic flourishes, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and a meeting, accompanied by communistic and severely non-patriotic flourishes, of the Workers' Party. Police Commissioner Whalen has issued to the representatives of the Communists a permit for a demonstration to take place on May Day one hour after the Veterans of Foreign Wars are scheduled to end their program. If this is not looking for rouble we do not know what is. The workers have claimed Union Square as their own for nearly half a century; it was ormerly in the heart of the organized clothing-workers disrict and in it, times without number, speeches for the laborng man have been made which would have drawn listeners n no other part of the city. Now in this square of territory, New York's Hyde Park if it has any, we are to see two roups, almost at the same time, which are bitterly antagoistic to each other. On March 7 Richard J. Kennedy, unior Vice-Commander of the V. F. W., declared a propos f the May Day parade: "The Commander will issue orders o let the police and the National Guard units take care of ny rioting. . . . But no one need worry that the veterans won't be ready for any trouble and fully able to protect hemselves. They will wear their tin hats and will have xed bayonets on their rifles." In view of this sort of lanuage, in view of the fact that May 1 is the traditional workers' holiday all over the world, Mr. Whalen and Mayor Walker take upon themselves the gravest responsibility in ermitting these two groups to meet on the same ground. The sentencing of Robert Minor and William Z. Foster nd their companions arrested on March 6 to from one day three years in the penitentiary will not help matters. Unss Mr. Whalen can be persuaded to change these plans we ok forward to the occasion with grave apprehension.

VLADIMIR MAIAKOVSKY, the "proletarian" poet, committed suicide by shooting himself in the heart in Moscow on April 14. One hundred thousand people are said to have passed his bier in a single day, but his suicide, which occurred after his return from a late party and is reported to have been for love, is likely to be the occasion of some scandal. Communists are supposed to be above romantic follies of this sort, and the case is particularly striking in view of the fact that the dead man composed a bitterly satiric poem upon another Soviet poet, Serge Essenin, who went to a similar death for a similar reason. Scoffers will doubtless find in the event a proof of their contention that even the most enthusiastic Communists end by finding communistic life unendurable, but the suicide probably proves only that certain traditional Russian gestures are not likely to be forgotten immediately even by the most ardent of a new generation. Maiakovsky once accompanied Trotzky on a speaking tour and had formerly been regarded as the leading poet of communism, though his last two plays are said to have been failures and, what is worse, to have come under the suspicion of being doctrinally unsound. In spite of his suicide, he is to be given a civic funeral.

BOOKS AND LETTERS have sustained a great loss in the death of Charles Scribner, head of Charles Scribner's Sons ever since 1879. A man of the best of taste, and of standards he was never willing to lower, he brought to the publishing business the love of a master-craftsman. His books were to be books, but they were also to be creations of which he and his firm could be proud. So he lent distinction to his volumes, to his magazine, even to his admirable bookstore. Mr. Scribner was far more than just their publisher to his authors. His friendships were deep and varied, especially overseas. To American audiences he helped to introduce Kipling, Barrie, Galsworthy, Meredith, and Stevenson. Between himself and most of these as well as many American writers there were strong personal ties. It was a great achievement to conduct a fine house, to keep it intact and strong during so long a period, and to leave it receptive to new ideas. He was able to look back on his career with complete satisfaction and the knowledge of a life honestly, earnestly, and richly lived.

TO DANIEL CHESTER FRENCH at eighty our respectful homage. It is a long, long way from the Minute Man of Concord, his first great achievement, to his recently completed Flanders Fields; but it is a journey marked all the way by high standards, absolute devotion to his art, and the modesty characteristic of the noblest artists. There will be differences of opinion as to which is his greatest work; to us it is the deeply pondering Lincoln at Washington in Henry Bacon's marvelous setting, with the children of the capital sailing their toy boats under the Emancipator's eyes. Who can behold that and remain unmoved? His best-known work, Death Staying the Hand of the Sculptor, designed as a monument for the tomb of the sculptor Martin Milmore at Boston, is universal in its appeal. Recently Mr. French was asked to speak of American art as it is. He refused. It was in transformation, he said—in process of crystallization. Who could say where it was heading? So is art reflecting our politics. We are on our way—whither no man knoweth.

The Crumbs of London

THAT the outcome of the London Disarmament Conference is a bitter, almost a crushing, disappointment we cannot deny. That it closely approximates failure will, we believe, be the verdict of all clear-thinking persons. We had hoped for half a loaf; then for a slice. We have obtained only a few crumbs. We are well aware that President Hoover has hailed it as a great achievement. His assurance to the D. A. R. convention that "the conference has been able to bring about an actual reduction in the armaments of the three nations to about 25 per cent less than the standard discussed during the conference which was held at Geneva three years ago, and a reduction of about 12 per cent below present naval programs as rapidly as the present ships become obsolete" has not in the least convinced or impressed us. Why should anybody throw up his hat because of a reduction of 25 per cent below standards proposed in vain three years ago, or because of a reduction of 12 per cent from the present program as soon as some of the existing ships, unnamed, become obsolete? If this is all that can be said of the outcome at London it is little indeed. One recalls the drunkard who, on being reproved for his inebriation, sought to defend himself by saying how much drunker he would have been had he indulged in a lot more whiskey and soda. As a matter of fact, this is the usual face-saving of the politician determined to make the best of a bad situation. Mr. Hoover's first year in the White House has ended with almost nothing constructive or worth while to show. He is soon to sign or to veto the worst tariff bill in history. He would be less than human if he did not endeavor to make London appear a great triumph.

It is self-evident that his paean of satisfaction will not bear analysis. For example, he was very careful in his address of April 14 to say nothing of the fact that if we are to build up to the parity conceded to us at London we shall have to construct new ships to cost no less than $1,000,000,000. Is it Mr. Hoover's plan to recommend this? A disarmament conference which wound up with appropriations of $1,000,000,000 would be such a scandal, such a mockery, that we cannot think that even Mr. Hoover would dare to acclaim it as a long step toward peace. If Congress moves in that direction we shall consider the conference not only a failure but a dreadful disaster. Certainly no one can deny that the effects of such an additional building program would far offset the few concrete achievements, such as extending the battleship holiday until December 31, 1936, destroying two more antiquated battleships, the Utah and the Florida, and certain limitations of destroyers and submarines. Even this slight achievement is gravely weakened by a clause which provides that "any Power which deems its national security impaired by the new construction of an outside Power may upon due notice to the two other Powers increase its figures with a provision for a proportionate increase in their figures in the same category or categories."

How much really remains? The most substantial achievement of the Washington conference of 1922 was a psychological one—the ending of all talk of a possible war between the United States and Japan. From the day of the acceptance of the 5-5-3 standard the menace of an armed conflict with Japan came to an end in the press of the United States, with an occasional exception to prove the rule. No longer did the Sunday newspapers present their sensational articles as to the imminence of hostilities; no longer was it possible for some of those who betrayed the United States in the oil scandals to allege that the turning over of valuable government resources to private individuals was necessitated by the imminent coming of war between the United States and Japan. If the London conference should have a similar psychological result in putting an end to the constant talk of war between ourselves and the mother country, it would be an achievement well worth the cost. That Mr. Hoover thinks this will be the result is demonstrated by the following passage from his speech of April 14: "But, most important of all, it [the conference] has been able finally to turn the tide of constantly increasing naval arms and to end the poison of suspicion and ill-will generated by constant rivalry in construction."

One danger to our mind is that the conference, while cutting off a few ships and extending the battleship holiday until 1936, has not done anything to decrease or really to chasten the personnel of the various fleets. There lies the real menace—the constant discussion by naval men of the next war, and their increasing effort to alarm somebody as to the invariably inadequate war preparations of their governments. That they are little to be blamed for this is obvious. They must have an objective to keep up the fighting spirit. They are paid to plan and drill for the next war and therefore they must have a possible enemy. If England should disappear under the ocean tomorrow the navy men would at once find it necessary to build a fleet competent to handle the navies of France and Italy combined. If these fleets were to disappear there would still be Japan and Russia to give cause to the fear that leads to more appropriations for more guns and more ships. Whether we may actually look for any real demobilization of the spirit which engenders the naval rivalries that provoke wars remains to be seen. But if something has been achieved along that line, we repeat it will have been worth while and Mr. Hoover will be entitled to all the credit therefor—even if that leaves us far from those high hopes we all cherished after Ramsay MacDonald's visit to this country.

What should be the attitude of liberals and peace lovers toward the new treaty? There is nothing to be gained by an effort to defeat the convention which the delegates wil bring back to this country. But it must be ratified with a clear understanding that the lovers of peace think it but a tiny step forward, and even that only if there is no effor to build up to parity. Peace workers should serve notice now that they will fight as never before against any furthe effort to construct more ships, to squander more funds, to keep up that hideous waste which Mr. Hoover himself ha said makes our expenditures on army and navy greater than those of any other country in the world. Against the continuance of this abomination the conscience of America mus set itself without the possibility of concession or compromise

Merger on Merger

THE announcement of a reorganization whereby the General Electric Company and the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company will own 51.3 per cent of the voting power of the Radio Corporation of America calls attention once more to the process of unification and threatened monopoly in the radio field. If the plan is ratified by the stockholders at their meeting on May 6, the Radio Corporation, in return for 6,580,375 shares of stock valued at some $390,000,000, will acquire exclusive licenses under General Electric and Westinghouse patents to manufacture radio apparatus, together with their radio-manufacturing facilities and the stocks that they own in Radio Corporation subsidiaries, giving that concern exclusive ownership of the National Broadcasting Company, the R.C.A. Victor Company, the R.C.A. Radiotron Company, and R.C.A. Photophone. In addition to these companies, R.C.A. Communications, and the Radio-Marine Corporation, the Radio Corporation is also heavily interested in the amusement industry through the Radio Keith Orpheum Corporation, and in various other undertakings. A mere list of the interests owned by this giant, formed by the General Electric Company less than eleven years ago, is bewildering.

The activities of the Radio Corporation in its effort to get a monopoly of the air were the subject of much unfavorable testimony, it will be recalled, before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce last winter, and Senator Dill is now quick to call attention to what he declares to be Owen D. Young's plans for "a world-wide radio trust." The General Electric, he asserts, "is to be not only the parent company of the power trust and of the electrical manufacturing business but the parent company of the radio business with all its ramifications." Noting Mr. Young's part in founding the International Bank and adverting to the Radio Corporation's exclusive contracts with every great government except Russia, he demands that the Department of Justice determine "whether or not under our law today they have the right to form an organization leading to world-wide monopoly of radio development." It is a great question, which affects not only the business life of competing radio manufacturers, but, as Senator Dill points out, the very development of public opinion itself.

The movement toward integration and unified control, with all the accompanying dangers of private monopoly, is by no means confined to the radio industry, however, nor is it limited to our own country. An interesting article in a recent issue of the Japan Chronicle calls attention to exactly the same phenomenon on the other side of the world:

> The Big Five include Mitsui, Mitsubishi, Yasuda, Sumitomo, and Okura, and they operate in such a variety of forms that one never knows for certain that one is not dealing with them. Mitsui's have banking, insurance, and "trust," merchandising, textile mills and materials, fishing and other food industries, machine-making, mining, smelting, and metal refining, chemical industries, shipping and land transport, light and power, buildings and warehouses—in fact, it is difficult to say what Mitsui does not do.

The last-named company alone, with a capital above 600,000,000, though it devotes less than 12 per cent of that capital to trade, yet carries on more than one-fifth of all Japan's foreign commerce. The Chronicle writer does not believe that these great concerns are genuinely enterprising, or that they promote the larger interests of Japan; yet he rather gloomily forecasts their further development and increased control over government. Similar facts are reported from all over the world. The great German shipping merger is fresh in mind, and the operations of the steel cartel have already passed national boundaries.

One important and sobering conclusion emerges from a consideration of facts like these. While all honest men must sympathize with intelligent governmental efforts to prevent unfair competition and thus to keep the way open as far as possible for the small concern, the problem of the future deals with the great company, probably to an increasing degree with the monopolistic company. We have not yet devised any satisfactory machinery for its control in the interest of all the people where that interest clashes with the profit of shareholders. Our present confidence in the omniscience and benevolence of big business is only a passing phase of public feeling. The statesmanship of the future must help private industry to organize itself for the efficient performance of genuine public service if the great private company is to survive.

Defense of Freedom

ON April 5 Judge Canaga of the Ohio Court of Common Pleas sentenced two young women under the new Ohio syndicalism law to terms of from one to five and from five to ten years, respectively, according to an Associated Press dispatch, for distributing "anti-government literature at a Martin's Ferry (radical) demonstration last fall." The one who received the longer sentence "told the court she had not advocated use of force." Last fall five girl rusticators were sentenced in California by Judge Allison (one for from six months to ten years, four for from six months to five years) for raising in front of their camping ground a flag bearing the insignia of Soviet Russia. Since the Russian program entails the overthrow of capitalist society our safety, it appears, demands that these young conspirators be put out of the way.

More recently Judge Young of the Juvenile Court in New York sent a small boy back to the Jewish protectory, whence he had been released on parole, for playing hooky from school to attend an unemployment demonstration. As a result, this latter-day Huckleberry Finn may conceivably be detained in the protectory until he is twenty-one years old. Meantime, someone in New Jersey has unearthed a sedition law, passed in 1902 after President McKinley's assassination, as a means of jailing speakers of the left-wing labor movement. These are examples of the method of dealing with dissentient opinions in our lower courts.

What can be done about it? How untwist the curious kink in the thinking of a man who hopes that harsh and unjust punishment applied to a discontented minority will reduce that minority, first to silence, and at length to non-existence? We have one suggestion. Let him lock himself in his study and read a little book called "A History of Freedom of Thought," by a great historian, J. B. Bury, Regius Professor of Modern History at Cambridge University.

Professor Bury says: "A long time was needed to arrive at the conclusion that the coercion of opinion was a mistake, and only a part of the world is as yet convinced. That conclusion, so far as I can judge, is the most important ever reached by men." Professor Bury does not defend free thought and speech because they are rights. "The truth is that no valid argument can be founded on the conception of natural rights, because it involves an untenable theory of the relation between society and its members." The government, he argues, may well contend that it should prohibit the circulation of pernicious opinions. It can point out, with little fear of contradiction, that a man can do as much harm by propagating anti-social doctrines as by stealing his neighbor's horse.

Theoretically, then, he maintains, the government may stand on firm ground in suppressing free speech; morally, also, it may seem right. But practically it is wrong. For during the entire period through which Bury traces the long and painful struggle of the human spirit against suppression, from the Greek and Roman republics to the England of Darwin, Huxley, and Arnold, the effort to suppress, whatever its logical and moral basis, has been a complete and ghastly failure. For it has not suppressed. On the contrary, it has given strength, vitality, and currency to every doctrine, either good or bad, to which it has been applied. But if our judges should read Bury's book they would discover that the effort to make people keep still leads paradoxically to a complementary effort to make them speak. Not satisfied with forcing the objector to disavow his own beliefs, intolerance insists that in order to escape punishment he shall proclaim the beliefs of his accusers.

Here in America we may already watch the advance of this inevitable extension of the principle of suppression. A judge denies naturalization to a college professor of good standing, not on the ground that he voices opposition to our government or our Constitution, since the contrary is true; but because, suspected of pacifism, he refuses to proclaim in advance that in case of war he will bear arms. The same principle is present in the so-called "yellow-dog" contract now at issue in the case of Judge Parker. This form of contract rejects the man applying for work unless, going beyond neutrality on the question of unionism, he affirmatively declares against it as a condition of his employment. Out of the drive against free expression of opinion, comes the drive for forced expression of opinion. And with that drive, just as in war or in the days of the Inquisition, the minority, in order to be safe, comfortable, or self-sustaining, must go about forever pinning someone else's opinion to its sleeve.

America has a noble tradition of liberty—free thought, free speech, the right of assembly, the right of minorities to be heard. It was built up by wise, farseeing, courageous men—Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Garrison, Wendell Phillips, and the rest. This tradition we have accepted as a supreme condition of social progress. It goes beyond the sphere of momentary expediency. There is no reason why we cannot keep this tradition alive. History, common sense, common decency, are on its side. No doubt there are difficulties in preserving it. They are certainly no greater than those encountered when it was built.

A Plague of Locusts

THE news from Egypt has a strange Biblical sound. A plague of locusts has infested the land. But this time the Egyptians are not helpless. They do not look upon the plague as a punishment for their sins—unless it be the sin of having failed to exterminate the enemy. They are making open war, and the dispatches are as dramatic as any that ever came from the western front. There is no quarter asked or given, no means of warfare, however horrible or unscrupulous, that remains unemployed. A cable in the New York Times from Cairo reports that the heaviest fighting has occurred around El Arish. The Egyptian operations are being directed by the inspector general of the Egyptian army, with the help of an entomologist. Trenches a mile long were dug across the locusts' line of advance. As the locusts fell into these they were destroyed as fast as possible, but fresh arrivals immediately took their places. On April 11 a dense mass of locusts, estimated to have been seven miles long, emerged from Wadi. They rapidly filled the original trenches and others hurriedly dug. Paraffin was poured in and ignited. The charred remains of the locusts were flung out to make ready for the next advance. Flame guns decimated their ranks. At the end of the battle an area about two miles square was black with dead locusts, in some places four inches deep.

Thus Egypt has checked an invasion that might have done incalculable harm, but the danger is not yet completely past, for an army of locusts has been reported in Palestine. It must be kept in mind that so far all news of the war has come from only one side. Perhaps the locusts do not mind. They need not worry about propaganda as long as they may fall back on propagation. And their prospects are surely not hopeless. They are invading Egypt again after 3,000 years—so far as we can learn, as great in numbers as ever—and they may still be invading Egypt 3,000 years from now.

While the Greek cities fought each other, the Macedonians came down and conquered them. While the nations of mankind are either warring with each other or arming for that purpose, our most sinister enemies, the insects and the microbes, continue their relentless depredations. Man has reached his present power on the earth chiefly through the use of one weapon, his brain. The insects and microbes have reached their enormous numbers on the earth by the use of another weapon—their appalling powers of reproduction. It has still to be shown whether, in the remorseless competitive struggle for survival, man's weapon will prove more effective than that of his minute enemies. The locust horde, for one thing, needs no navy. A considerable number of them reached England in 1869, and it is believed that they were part of a swarm that came from the west coast of Africa. Other locust swarms have been seen at sea, 1,200 miles from land; one swarm that crossed the Red Sea in 1889 was estimated to be about 2,000 square miles in extent. Here is a war to which the D. A. R., the American Legion, and other organizations straining for exercise of their bellicose instincts may profitably devote their excessive energies. Here is one enemy against whom not even the most confirmed pacifist would wish to disarm.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

CAMPAIGNS for the purity of the King's English or for better national enunciation leave me a shade coolish. I am against the "whomers," the "should and woulders," and all the "me and I" clan. If any man or woman corrects your pronunciation of a word in a public place I think you have the right to punch him in the nose. No good American jury would convict you.

Of course, the people who take it on themselves to keep the other fellow's English pure and accurate advance highfalutin excuses for their activity. They adopt an "it hurts me more" attitude. One might believe that but for their bustling the world would go to pot and all of us live in penthouses on Babel. It is not the love of interference which moves them, so they say, but only a devotion to the mother-tongue.

Yet upon their own assertions I would indict them down to the last blue-stockinged heel. Take the classic Cyril, who first piped up, "Whom are you?" Mr. Ade, his creator, explained that the lad had been to night school. I hold that most of the gross mistakes of grammar arise less from sheer ignorance than from a little knowledge—coupled, of course, with much fright. It is the urge for elegance which leads us into error. For a month I have kept careful but silent count and I find that "me" is almost never put in the wrong place. I am not scoring such over-technical errors as "It's me," for that, I hold, is entirely permissible. Generally speaking there is a widespread popular belief that "me" is always essentially plebeian and vulgar. Mistakes arise in seeking to show off with "I" and place it in spots where it by no means has the right to go. "It was so good of you to take Mae and I to supper," says the beautiful blonde from Mr. Ziegfeld's show. I hasten to add that the beautiful blonde is entirely fictional. She exists, of course, but the author of this essay is not the "you" of the sentence. And she may add, "Between you and I, she's a good kid and I would hate to see her go out with anybody who wasn't a perfect gentleman."

Gladwys, you see, was frightened as a child by a grammar lesson. She didn't quite get the idea. It is her notion, and the notion of all the insufficiently educated, that there is something fundamentally coarse and crude about "me." It is not a lady's pronoun. And so Gladwys always strings along with "I" when there is any doubt and even if there isn't. She is not likely to be improved much by chance correctionists. They will only succeed in confusing her a little more. As things stand, Gladwys has at least a system. If they continue to pester the poor girl they will merely succeed in frightening every "I" out of her vocabulary.

If it were possible for each and every one of us to be a precisionist and to carry his education like a gentleman I might be in favor of movements for speech reform. Still, even such a state of society is open to certain criticisms. This would not be the best of all possible worlds if every man from porter to president exchanged the morning's greetings in a finished Harvard accent. I suspect that life would be easier and more natural if nobody ever undertook to hold his fellows up to grammatical and linguistic perfection. In fact, if no more eyebrows were ever arched we might all speak with far more forthright vigor. The natural man will find his way more readily to eloquent and truthful expression than the one who lives in constant terror of the lash of ridicule. All this is said by a man who feels that his own address is Halfway House. "Me" and "I" are managed moderately well by this particular hack. This is not said with any swagger. He ought to know something about "me" and "I" since in his function of columnist he uses both so frequently.

But as for "shall" and "will" I must admit terrific terror. The rules they taught in school have flown entirely. I try to pick the proper one by ear alone, but I am almost tone deaf. Time was when clients who pointed out mistakes could wound me. Now a happy callousness has been established. In a world in which not more than 5 per cent of my associates know all the subtleties of the words denoting futurity why should any commoner be abashed to stand with the majority? And if one meets this particular problem in his stride and does not tighten up one has, at the very worst, at least an even chance of picking the right word by sheer accident in any specific instance.

Some of the most fascinating talkers I know are men and women with scarcely a shred of grammar. Surely it is more important to talk in a wise and interesting manner than to speak correctly. "Why not do both?" you suggest. It can be done, but there are barriers. Too great a preoccupation with form is apt to war against the substance. I have known disciples of better speech who never failed to let each vowel sound come trippingly from the very tip of the tongue, and they afforded me neither pleasure nor profit.

People with this particular phobia are so intent upon forming each letter correctly that words are wholly a secondary consideration and sentences must shift for themselves. Once every week upon the radio there is, or used to be, a lady who appealed to all the tots within the sound of her voice to articulate until it hurt and never slur a syllable or put an "r" on after an "aw." As one who has never been able to break himself of saying "I sawrit" (i.e., I saw it), my opinion may be thrown out as malicious and incompetent. This is, no doubt, a vile linguistic fault. And yet I shudder to think of little children all hobbled and brightly burnished in their innocent prattle.

If it were within my power to wipe out the individual eccentricities of every local dialect I would not do it. The dulcet tones of the man from Georgia often annoy me, but I love to hear the lady from the same locality talk Southern. There is an Indiana dialect not altogether beautiful and yet it serves to lend variety to any drawing-room. In the election which gave us Herbert Hoover a number of voters cast their ballots against Smith because he used the "oi" in "bird," as is our native custom. To me the Governor was never more effective and never more palpably sincere than when he grew excited and talked pure Oliver Street. I even suspect that by now there are many who regret their choice and would rather have taken the New York liberal, "raddio" and all.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Prohibition in Littletown

By WILLIAM W. NORTON

LITTLETOWN—that is an assumed name—is one of the northeastern townships of New York State. It lies close to the foothills of a prominent and popular mountain section and boasts a population of some 1,200 souls. The township came into being during the last decade of the eighteenth century and rapidly became a typical settlement of Easterners. A small potash factory, a tannery, and several small mills are largely responsible for the present existence of the three hamlets, North, South, and East Littletown, each of which was once known for its cider mill, its saloon, and its hotel. Protestantism is regnant in Littletown but applied Christianity hardly exists. When Klan agitation enveloped the township a few years ago all Roman Catholic school teachers were disposed of in the name of the Great Jehovah. Like Zenith, Middletown, and the rest, Littletown is distinctly a type town. All social activities are confined to the Masonic Lodge, the Eastern Star, the Grange, the Ladies' Aid Societies of the churches, some very minor clubs, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. The township is Republican and dry, a unit in a county hopelessly controlled by an arid G. O. P. organization. Republicans outnumber Democrats by about ten to one and almost everybody is squarely behind the noble experiment.

Let us now examine the transformation wrought in this dry, all-American, Republican, eighteenth-century settlement by the Eighteenth Amendment. As far back as January, 1920, it was discovered that the legal fermentation of fruit juices provided a real measure of practical farm relief. During the first year of the big drought the manufacture of hard cider and elderberry, rhubarb, and dandelion wines increased by leaps and bounds; many a dirt farmer, whose former indulgence was limited to a glass or two of cool lager on rather infrequent market trips to near-by towns, now takes the precaution to stock his cellar with beverages that grow in strength as winter comes.

The first six years of the dry spell produced two stills, both operated by small farmers who have paid off their mortgages and now confine their efforts to home production and home consumption of various home brews. The art of making home brew is now so generally understood that stocks of bottles, caps, cappers, hops, and malts are regularly carried in some of the local stores. Of late, many of the newer concoctions made from imported fruits have become popular, making Littletown, considering its size, a very good market for lemons, oranges, and grapefruit. Each local artist in alcoholics assumes that his next-door neighbor is ignorant of both his thirst and his own particular method of slaking it; and the W. C. T. U., the victory won, continues to hold its regular meetings and white-ribbon teas as faithfully and with the same gullibility as a generation ago.

Littletown, of course, has its improvident sots, but none of them ever die from thirst. Many of them manage to hire out to the dry-voting, wet-drinking farmers and thereby eke out a more or less cheerful existence from the sparkling beakers of sassafrassed hard cider brought up from cold farm cellars. Others who crave the strongest, and are willing to part with a large portion of their wages, know when and where to purchase poor-grade alcohol flavored with juniper at four dollars per quart, and the transaction is completed within the township. There was a time when pure grain alcohol could be purchased from one of the choir singers in town, but to obtain this favor one had to have the proper social, fraternal, or family connections. It was a service extended only to those mute residents who had the good fortune to have been born in local purple. A very favored few still continue to get this splendid service. Even some of the local merchants gladly, and with due knowledge, supply the needs of transient bums with extracts and canned heat. There seems to be a sort of underground system in this town and it is in good working order. Through credentials or acquaintances one can get in touch without much difficulty not only with those hospitable folk who will provide gratuitously anything from a social glass to a social knockout, but with those more practical cider dealers who dispense the juice for a consideration only. A year ago there were at least twenty places in town where hard cider could be purchased at one dollar per gallon. The marked increase in the demand for hard cider has so extended its production that good quality has largely been sacrificed and the more dangerous prohibition drinks have been substituted.

Elderberry and elderblow wines have come into their own during the past few years. Many farms located back from the improved highways, farms that have been practically abandoned or have been poorly operated by tenants, have responded to the great urge, and vast clusters of elderberry bushes now grow in the hill sections of the township. This annual crop is making it possible to press the wine in barrel lots. The town's aged people, who require some little libation before meals and upon retiring, have long since spurned the regular herb tonics and have adopted the technique of the most discriminating whiskey drinkers. They have become the regular patients of knowing and near-by physicians. They have taken the prescription route to Scotch and rye, and the good doctor's fee is only one dollar for his services. The prevailing price at the drug-store ranges from three to four dollars per pint. One physician in particular has been known to canvass to some extent for this type of practice. The top of his office desk is adorned with a copy of the Holy Bible, which in the minds of his more law-abiding patients at once creates a desert-like atmosphere. However, the middle drawer of the same desk conceals an engraved United States Treasury prescription-blank book, the lone stubs of which indicate a good business in whiskey. Whiskey is prescribed for everything from hemorrhoids to hypochondria. In still another drawer of the same professional desk the doctor always keeps a broken pint, ready for any emergency, social or otherwise.

Operators of alcohol taxis make periodical though infrequent trips to some of the near-by incorporated villages where a variety of vile beverages can be purchased at a low figure and afterward disposed of at highway-construction camps at a neat profit. With all these conditions obtaining, Littletown is just about as bone dry, or as sopping wet, as it ever was. In the days of local option it made little difference whether the town voted license or no license; the citizen who hankered for a drink was always able to quench his thirst in home territory. It is the same now. There are many damp places scattered over a township which prior to 1920 never at any one time boasted of more than one real oasis in each of the three hamlets. Mere boys were never permitted to enter these ancient places, and they were seldom patronized by the younger men, for they were too much exposed to public view. Now, however, many of the younger set enjoy the adventure of snooping around for a drink in the more secluded nooks of the countryside.

It is far from exaggeration to conclude that the per capita consumption of alcoholic beverages in Littletown is somewhat in excess of what it was twenty years ago. Conditions seem to justify more drinks at a single sitting. In addition to this, there has developed a state of mind that blindly condones the hyper-hypocrisy of it all. Littletown folks seem to want the outside world to understand that their town is dry. Whatever may go on inside is strictly a private matter. The people are opposed to prohibition violations—by others. Some of the members of the W. C. T. U. will tell you that the township is as dry as a cork leg. The local clergymen generally corroborate this theory in sermons, addresses, and reports to the outside world; and deep-quaffing hypocrites contribute regularly to the collections taken for the benefit of the Anti-Saloon League and State reform bodies.

A series of interviews with many of the more prominent residents indicates that there are some who are, and who always have been, prohibitionists. These can see nothing but success in their cause. They are fully convinced that prohibition is actually in full force and effect. There are still more of those who believe that prohibition has failed to some extent and whose heart-to-heart, on-the-quiet conviction is that a change must be made. Outwardly these are dry. Another, still larger group, made up of well-to-do, temperate men, occasional or moderate drinkers, seems to be content with the present situation, and they will remain content as long as a beneficent nature yields her native fruits. This group is on the dry side. There are those wets who were in real sympathy with the Smith program, but whose religious life is coextensive only with its hatred for all things Roman Catholic. These have not yet worn off their first loyalty to the noble experiment. There are still others who are dry solely because of their affiliation with the Republican Party and its local organization. There is, of course, a group of out-and-out wets, and, lastly, there is a rather choice group of open-minded, observing folk who believe in temperance in all things, a reasonable modification of the law, and an immediate return to normality in human conduct.

Throughout its entire history the township has been almost entirely free from any serious crimes. An examination of the criminal records shows a steady decline in minor crimes since 1913. Prior to that date, there seems to have been no direct or indirect connection for the most part between crime and liquor. There were several convictions for public intoxication prior to 1920 and few, if any, since. Public intoxication is as manifest now as a generation ago, but constables do not concern themselves. Liquor or the lack of it has never had any visible effect upon the criminal records of the township. The locality is not so prosperous as it used to be; there is less money in the town; many of the well-groomed farms of twenty-five years ago are now dilapidated in both land and buildings; tenants are supplanting owners and the farmers' estates of the next generation will require little attention from the probate court. Of course, this may have nothing to do with prohibition, but it makes it a little difficult to believe that the countryside has benefited economically by prohibition.

Neither has prohibition had any noticeable effect upon the general health of the churches. Attendance is as small as it ever has been, perhaps smaller; the same occasional whiffs of alcoholic pungency permeate the church atmosphere at meeting time, and now and then the collection basket is passed, as of yore, for special contributions to be applied to the upkeep of the lobby at the national capital. The local churches have made prohibition their only fetish and total abstinence their greatest virtue. In the last analysis, Littletown has been made safe for hypocrisy. It is at the public dances that prohibition has one of its most positive effects in a social way. The boys somehow manage to bring high-powered beer in their cars and higher-powered gin in ornate hip flasks; and the more adventurous young girls of today are easily beguiled into drinking—drink for drink—with the town's "regular guys." Such a thing, we are well informed, never happened in Littletown before 1920. Then again the town has some evidences that synthetic liquor and young people are bad mixers under rural moons as well as under urban lights. When there are no dances there are always roadhouses not too far away where young couples get the required kick out of existence. No real effort has been made to check these conditions. Parents will not sense the facts—Littletown and all surrounding territory are dry.

Littletown differs slightly, if at all, from the numerous townships in the same section of the country. Select any one of these more or less isolated settlements and make a painstaking investigation. You will make the same discoveries and vary little in your conclusions. You will feel the same sting of repulsiveness too. You will find all of the specimens of the handiwork of a blind fanaticism. Here are some of the exhortations that were thundered from Littletown's pulpits during the last Presidential campaign:

> You can't be a true Christian in these days—or a decent American citizen either—unless you vote the straight, dry, Republican ticket next Tuesday. Prohibition and Republicanism have come to be one and the same thing.
> The only event comparable to the second coming of our Lord is the coming of prohibition.
> Rum is the only issue in this campaign.
> I am perfectly willing to state publicly that I shall forever be ashamed of any member of my church who may cast his vote for Smith and booze. No man can be sincerely opposed to this victorious prohibition.

There are several ancient cemeteries in which sleep scores of Littletown's best people. The inscriptions on the quaint stones indicate that many loved their country well and it is purported that they loved their God. Could these early Easterners return, they would find their old home town no more temperate than in their own day and generation. They would be deeply impressed with automobiles, radios, and airplanes, but they might find prohibition to be the most stupefying marvel of them all.

"My Dear Senator"*

III

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter in regard to the revolt of various Senators, yourself included, against the nomination of Judge John J. Parker as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. You say that it should improve my opinion of the Senate that so many of its members are willing to look upon this question from the national point of view, and are ready to refuse a seat on the highest bench to a man who has publicly evidenced his readiness to deny to an entire group of our fellow-Americans participation in elections and in the administration of the country. Well, I can only reply that I am happy, of course, that more than seventeen Senators are already on record as opposing the confirmation of Judge Parker because of his views on the colored race. But I should frankly take greater pride in this showing if it were not for the fact that many of these Senators are up for reelection next fall, and that they come from States where the Negro vote is now so large that they fear the loss of the election if the colored people should take it into their heads to rise in rebellion against the Republican Party. In other words, I shall be more impressed if men like Borah of Idaho and Nye of North Dakota, in which States there are few Negroes, oppose confirmation.

That Judge Parker should be defeated admits of no question. There are constantly coming before the Supreme Court of the United States questions vitally affecting the liberty and the pursuit of happiness of our colored Americans. The city of Richmond, for instance, recently enacted an ordinance segregating the Negroes residentially despite the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held such ordinances unconstitutional and invalid. Other equally important decisions have been in regard to the right of Negroes to participate in primaries and of the political parties to restrict their membership on the basis of color. There are now several important cases on the way up to the Supreme Court which will settle the question whether private covenants arrived at by property owners binding themselves for a period of years, or in perpetuity, not to sell their property to Negroes will or will not be upheld as constitutional. Such cases will ere long come before Judge Parker if he is confirmed. When Judge Parker stated that the colored people of North Carolina did not wish to participate in elections and were ready to be eliminated from politics he uttered a falsehood. When he committed the Republican Party in that State to the lily-white policy he led that party in a complete break with the traditions of its founders. He was certainly traitorous to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and what Lincoln and his war-time associates achieved. How could he conscientiously take the oath that would be administered to him by Chief Justice Hughes to support and uphold the Constitution when he is already on record, as a gubernatorial candidate, in favor of nullifying it in the case of Negroes?

This issue is so vital that it would be a disgrace to the Senate if there were not men in plenty to rise up and protest against Judge Parker's nomination. Beside it the question of Judge Parker's upholding the so-called "yellow-dog" contract is of small moment. Beside this issue it is of far less importance that none of his work as a judge has been marked by the ability or the distinction usually considered essential before a man can be appointed to the Supreme Court of the United States. It would be bad enough to face the fact that we might have thirty years of a judge on this bench who was appointed merely to strengthen the Republican Party in a State which voted for Herbert Hoover. The amazing thing is the prospect that a man who does not propose to permit the Negroes to remain under the protection of the Constitution of the United States may for thirty years to come be voicing in the Supreme Court his race prejudice and antagonism whenever the opportunity offers.

I repeat that every Senator who believes in the Constitution and in simple elemental justice to every American citizen irrespective of race, creed, or color ought to vote against Judge Parker. On the merits of the case, however, and not because of any fear of the immediate political consequences! I notice that the State Chairman of Missouri, Mr. Voorhees, has sent a strong telegram to Washington declaring that "the confirmation of Judge Parker means that the Republican Party might just as well say goodby to Missouri for the next two or three elections at least. . . . It was a long hard pull to put Missouri into the Republican column. It seems a pity that the fine results achieved through many years of unremitting effort in Missouri on the part of the Republican State organization should be thrown away in two short years." Here again we have the politician's way of looking at the problem. As I have pointed out to you before, you and your associates are prone to look upon every question from the point of view of its immediate effect upon your home fences, or somebody's local political conditions. From the tariff up or down, the whole gamut is run in this spirit. It has, for example, been consistently stated in Washington that the reason why President Hoover has not yet asked the Senate to ratify the new World Court convention was his desire not to embarrass Senator Deneen in his recent and unsuccessful primary contest with Mrs. McCormick. Personally I am not sure that the colored people are united enough to make quite certain the punishment at the polls which the Senators from the border States and those having large masses of colored voters fear. But more important by far than the willingness of some Senators to bolt in fear of punishment is the fact, now established, that the Senate hereafter will take a different attitude toward nominations for the Supreme Court than the purely negative one it has held to heretofore, and the truth that the Negroes for the first time since emancipation have demonstrated to the entire country that they propose to use their political power hereafter in safeguarding their rights. If they succeed in defeating Judge Parker it will be an epoch in the history of the race.

Yours very truly,
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

The Latest Bolshevik Zigzag

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, March 27

NOTHING must be allowed to create the false impression that the Soviet Government has abandoned its program of completely collectivizing agriculture. The recent very radical shift in policy, first announced in Stalin's article on March 2 and finally formulated in the March 15 circular of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, in no way signifies a change of principle. The Bolsheviks have no choice. They can (1) allow village productivity to continue at its present low level, or (2) give the individual mujik freedom to become rich, rent land, and hire labor, or (3) organize agriculture cooperatively. But the Russian village cannot today yield sufficient surpluses for feeding the cities and for export; the rise through personal enrichment of a class of private capitalistic farmers would constitute a political and, more particularly, an economic menace to bolshevism. There remains the third alternative of land cooperatives.

After 55 per cent of all arable land in the Soviet Union had been collectivized within some six months, and after millions of mujiks had entered the kolkhozi, or cooperative farms, the party and the government in March suddenly called a halt. Compelling circumstances made retrenchment imperative. This retrenchment along a second line of defense represents one step backward after three or four steps forward. It was accompanied by moderation in the treatment of the church, and by the interdiction of arbitrary, oftentimes illegal and unjustifiable, suppression of private traders and other disfranchised elements. The headlong dash toward socialism which commenced in September, 1929, or thereabouts and developed its full momentum in December has now slowed down to a steady trot. NEP was in the death house impotently awaiting the hangman. But a reprieve arrived at the eleventh hour, for the government still needs the services of the "criminal," private capitalism.

The economic system in Russia is working at maximum pressure. Never was the tension so great; never were such colossal, almost inhuman efforts being made. I sometimes think that the officials, the party leaders, the activists must simply collapse from sheer physical and mental exhaustion. They rarely rest or relax. Yet where man did not complain, the machine began to creak. The weakest section of the machine proved to be that which fed the cities. The food problem had already become aggravated by reason of the fact that products needed within the country were exported to pay for foreign mechanical equipment and tractors. Collectivization complicated matters. Since the government's chief concern is the poor peasant, he was admitted into the kolkhoz whether or not he owned a cow or sheep or horse. The mujik who possessed such animals therefore quickly sold them or slaughtered and ate them, for he knew that even without live stock he would not be barred from the collective. Threats from Moscow did no good, for Moscow had committed the grave error of socializing all the peasants' effects at the moment of organizing a collective (thus forming a commune) instead of merely socializing the wherewithal of production—land, seed, machinery, and draft animals (thus forming an artel). This mistake was corrected by Stalin on March 2, but not before a very appreciable percentage of the Soviet Union's live stock had been destroyed. Now the order has gone out that collectives take the form of artels, and not communes. Accordingly, cows, goats, geese, chickens (but not horses) were returned to their owners, and immediately more milk, butter, cream, cheese, and poultry appeared on the urban market.

By socializing all the sources of the mujik's salable surplus, the kolkhoz movement had almost made superfluous the essential feature of the NEP—the free marketing of peasant goods. It was possible therefore to suppress the city Nepmen by economic and administrative means. Thus, private capitalism on the land and in the metropoles seemed doomed. Contrariwise, the recent resurrection of NEP potentialities in the village by the restoration of live stock inevitably brought with it a relaxation of the persecution of urban private merchants, and both measures are part and parcel of the less militant attitude toward the church. This is the latest Bolshevik zigzag. For a time the curve of socialism went extremely high—almost to the peak of 100 per cent. Today a drop is registered, but not to the former level, for the collectivization of 50 per cent of the acreage under grain and technical cultures withdraws from the Nepman's activity just that much marketable produce. Between the kolkhoz and the government there can be no private middleman. Moreover, since there is and could be no guaranty that the Nepman will not again be exposed to suppression, expropriation, and exile at some future upward trend of the socialist curve, he will doubtless refrain from excessive or ostentatious expansion. The city Nepman must grasp the present new opportunity because it is his only straw, but he can have no trust or hope in the future. Gradually, therefore, the utility of private trade to the government may fall so low as to justify complete and irrevocable proscription. Before that consummation, however, the kolkhozi must improve and multiply, the cattle and vegetable state farms now organizing or planned must begin to throw their produce on to city tables, and the city cooperatives and state stores must attain greater efficiency, show more initiative, and increase their stock. In the interval, which may last years, private capitalism in Russia will remain anemic, lack resistance, and play the role of a Bolshevik pawn.

The future of socialism in Russia depends on the collectives. During the past six months, however, the Communists behaved as if their life's purpose consisted in embittering the biggest possible number of peasants against this form of economy. They seemed bent on making unpalatable a really attractive type of agricultural organization. Had the government and party waited a single semester, clever agitation and the example of improved conditions might have been sufficient to stimulate a flood of mujiks into the kolkhozi. Instead, officials used violence and threats to obtain quick quantitative results. But there were not enough tractors, trained agronomes, and machines for all the new collectives. The socialization of live stock, poultry, homes, and even rickety furniture violated the deep private-capitalistic instincts of the peasant and blinded him to the advantages of the artel. He was ready to resist forced collectivization with arson and murder, if need be. He retaliated, moreover, by massacring cattle wholesale. The city's food supplies diminished. The situation commenced to divert to the village precious governmental energy, care, and man power. The precipitate character of the recent change and the manner in which the government and party introduced it prove that it was highly necessary and long overdue. Stalin displayed fine statesmanship in making the move. But a greater statesman would have made it three months earlier and taken to himself part of the blame for the errors committed by his followers at his instructions or with his approval or at least with his knowledge.

The shift in policy represents a rightward zigzag. It delights those who insist that the tempo of Socialist progress has been excessive. It probably pleases men like Bukharin who urged peasants to enrich themselves and who logically would have opposed rapid collectivization. But the Right wing will not trust Stalin to pursue a Right policy very long; and the Lefts are sour. Already, although the ink of the reforms is scarcely dried, the more radical faction seeks to obstruct them. Pravda did not print the government ordinance providing for better treatment of Nepmen. In some provincial districts, Stalin's article and the Central Committee's circular were suppressed by zealots who either objected in principle or feared the effect of furnishing the mujik with the Kremlin's unbridled strictures against themselves.

These facts and many of a similar nature testify to a large potential of "Leftness" which may act as a guaranty against any permanent or far-reaching swing to the Right. Like much else in Russia, a great deal will be determined by the coming crop. The recent reforms came at the height of preparations for the sowing campaign and occasioned considerable chaos. Stalin swapped horses while fording a stream. But gigantic efforts are being made today to strengthen the collectives and to persuade the peasants outside the kolkhozi to plant all their land and to work hard. Those who have faith in the collective will wait hopefully till harvest time and pray for favorable weather.

Apart, however, from the politics and possibilities of the more immediate future, the advantages of collectives over private peasant farming are too obvious in Russia to be doubted. Whoever knows the miserable hut of the mujik, his almost animal standard of living, and his primitive methods of production will realize that practically any change must be an improvement. The kolkhoz is a rationalized, scientific substitute for the most backward economic unit in Europe—the Russian village. It will use more machines; it will make better use of its horses; its land will not lie fallow after the time-honored system of pre-Petrian times. In productivity, the collective should be to the mujik's holding as a modern, electrified textile factory is to the hand loom. Soviet authorities tell me that in this first big collective year the average yield per acre in the kolkhozi will exceed that of the private farm by 30 per cent. If this is so, then collectivization has won, and Left policies must conquer.

The Modern Critic's Point of View

By C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

I

THE opponents of humanism, if I interpret them rightly, agree that literature is a serious concern of thinking men. But they have a keener sense than the humanists of the fact that literature is but one of the many interests that go to make up a complete intellectual life. Literature provides but one kind of experience. It is not the epitome of all the intellectual interests to which contemporary man is the heir. One who studies literature alone will not thoroughly understand life. The exclusively literary discipline is one of the most narrowing and least productive of all intellectual disciplines.

A major intellectual disaster of our time is the compartmentalization of the minds of the so-called leaders of thought. They tend to be superlatively well informed about their narrow specialty and actively resist the intrusion of uninformed non-specialists into their domain. But they do not hesitate to affirm the truth of traditional and outworn ideas in fields other than their own. This characteristic is excellently illustrated by those physicists now so actively engaged in supporting antiquated ideas in the field of religion. But nowhere is this compartmentalization more evident than in the field of literary criticism. In reading some of the narrowly educated young critics whose minds have been sharpened and polished by a particularistic discipline, you feel that a needle is being applied to the probing of a haystack. It is one of the major ironies of current literary disputation that however high the ideals of the younger critics may reach, their practice is earthbound by the fact that they are, after all, men living in a man-made world. And if we compose our ideal of perfection from literary materials we are apt, by the very nature of the exercise, to arrive at a formulation considerably at variance with the possibilities of the human animal.

The modern necessity is to integrate our minds and buttress ourselves against the tendencies toward diffusion, disorder, and discontinuity. This applies in all phases of intellectual endeavor. Consequently, it is the first necessity of a rounded literary criticism that it be grounded in as wide a knowledge of the ancillary sciences dealing with man and culture as is compatible with an exhaustive knowledge of the writer or the literary object being criticized. As has been remarked, literature is but one phase of the experience open to man. This statement locates literature where it belongs in the total life of the individual. And since it is integral to man and culture it must be approached with all the weapons available for the understanding of both man and culture. To define it as something apart from both is to make it something irrelevant to man and the concern of nobody but a group of literate eremites.

The view of the position of literature here set forth does not translate it into a subordinate part of psychology, sociology, or anthropology. It simply advocates the placing of the findings of these and all other contributory sciences in the hands of the literary critic. Superficially this ideal would seem to be at wide variance with the opinion of the most conspicuous advocates of the newer approaches to criticism, but it is recognized as valid by T. S. Eliot. In the Bookman for November, 1929, he wrote: "There are other branches of knowledge (or at least of science) some acquaintance with which you take for granted in any applicant whom you may employ as literary critic [he has previously named biology, anthropology, and philology], especially, of course, psychology, particularly analytical psychology. All of the studies I have mentioned and more do themselves touch the edges and handle some of the problems of criticism; so conversely the critic is distinguished, first, by the current notions which he shares with all educated or half-educated persons, such as the notion of evolution, and by the number and variety of sciences of which he has to know a little. And he has to know them not in order to do their work for them, but to collaborate—and also in order that he may know where to stop. We require much general knowledge in order to see the limits of our particular ignorance." The upshot of this is that, though literary criticism need not be written in terms derived from any one or even all of these disciplines, the light they shed upon the central problems of criticism must become available to the critic.

II

The conception of literature as a phase of experience requires elaboration. Experience, to borrow I. A. Richards's usage of the word in this connection, is "any occurrence in the mind. It is equivalent to 'mental state or process'." The ultimate purpose behind all intellectual activity is the clarification of experience with the object of understanding it and giving it meaning. Literature serves the purpose of giving us vicarious experience, of clarifying experience, and of lending it meaning. In addition it offers a peculiar sort of pleasure. It offers us in concentrated form a range of experiences which, in all probability, would not otherwise be open to us in the circumscribed lives we are forced to live, even in such a mobile civilization as the present one. Furthermore, the complete artist (in contrast to the reporter of life, whose work, particularly in the novel, is ubiquitous at present) has exercised some definite principle of selection in which the guiding light has been his idea of what the material signifies. By selection he interprets life; he bodies forth his peculiar view of life by bringing to the reader's attention those aspects of the limitless range of material he might use which seem to him to carry the highest emotional and intellectual implications. The reader, then, lays himself open to an experience which is heightened beyond life and which yet is life. It is a legitimate abstraction from the flux and flow of life. And it is an inescapable aspect of art. Even the artist who expends his highest powers in attempting to render a welter of "meaningless" episodes, a discontinuous flux of events, has arbitrarily selected those elements in experience which best objectify his vision. There never yet has been a complete, exact, unbiased reproduction of actual life in literature and it is inconceivable that there ever will be.

Faced with a literary object the critic may approach it from two angles and he may choose to write from either or both in any given essay. I. A. Richards states the angles as follows: "In a full critical statement which states not only that an experience is valuable in certain ways, but also that it is caused by certain features in a contemplated object, the part which describes the value of the experience we shall call the critical part. That which describes the object we shall call the technical part." Naturally the bulk of what is generally written as criticism consists of the first kind. And into that part of the statement which is the "critical" part the critic incorporates his sociological and psychological diagnosis of the artist as a man in society and of the work of art itself.

The crux of the problem, however, lies in the matter of the "value of the experience." It is in the attribution of the value of a work of art that critics disagree. For the attributed value is, and of necessity must be, contingent upon the complexity of the mental development of the critic. By complexity I do not mean intricacy; I mean the totality of the intellectual experience of the critic. And it is precisely at this point that the matter of the possible contributions of the ancillary disciplines reenters. For since these disciplines are to serve the critic as tools for understanding, tools with which he is to conduct his critical operation, it naturally follows that a critic provided with such tools will render a quite different verdict from the critic lacking them. And in the opinion of the writer the verdict of the former will be much more sound. Into this complexity of mind there will enter (it almost goes without saying) all the literary information, biographical knowledge, and sociological erudition of which the critic is possessed.

The resultant criticism will be a long way from impressionism and equally distant from dogmatic criticism, which I take to be an exercise in measuring the agreement or disagreement of the literary object with a predetermined set of arbitrary rules. It will differ from impressionism in that it will not be grounded in the emotions but will be the product of controlled knowledge operating to determine the worth of the experience offered by the literary object. And it will differ from dogmatic criticism in that the critic will not have any fixed preconceptions as to what the experience offered should be nor about the technical means by which the experience is rendered.

A critic of the type I am describing will be above all experimental in his attitude. The very nature of his equipment will make that attitude inevitable. He will be receptive, eclectic, and as sympathetic to the traditional as to the experimental. On the other hand he will not tend to accept the traditional because it conforms to certain forms of value which have been adjudged as of significance in the past. He will, indeed, be highly discriminative of the traditional as it appears in his time, because he will, in so far as it is repetitive in value, recognize that the author has presented nothing new. And he will be equally skeptical of the experimental because he will demand from it new and valuable experience as well as technical virtuosity. With regard to the latter matter, he will examine technical innovations and adjudge them according to their merits as vehicles of communication.

As an eclectic he will not be tempted to stand forth as the apologist for one particular mode of literary practice. He will find valuable experience in realistic works as well as in romantic works; in the classics as well as in contemporary writings; in the traditional as well as in the experimental. Indeed he will have to face but one constant temptation and that is a too great receptivity to the "classics" written in his own time, which will, inevitably, embody those values with which he is intimately familiar from living in constant contact with them. His judgments of these writings will be the final test of his merit as a critical guide.

The written conclusions of a critic operating in this fashion will be a record of the peculiar value of the experience offered by a given object or group of objects, a statement of the skill or lack of skill with which the author has communicated the experience to the reader, and frequently a statement of how the strengths or deficiencies arose out of the unique situation in which the author functioned and the peculiarities of his personality. Such a statement will be fairly inclusive, for the critic will have defined (a) the value of the experience; (b) the skill of the communication; (c) the sociological setting in which the work was produced and its effect on the object; (d) the psychological constitution of the author and its relation to his work. Naturally the reports of such a critic will have literary significance in themselves in so far as his own skill in communication is developed and in proportion to his ability to detect and express the values in the object; and the latter will have direct relation to the complexity of his mind.

III

It may prove revealing to examine this program in the light of the issues raised by Gorham B. Munson writing in the Bookman for December, 1929. What audience will such a critic have in mind? He will have the only audience any critic can hope to have—those persons intelligently interested in books and to whom reading is one of the modes of deepening, strengthening, and clarifying experience. He will not appeal to those who read to kill time. Neither will he appeal to those to whom literature is a source for moral precepts or to whom the study of literature must result in a pseudo-religious discipline. Nor will this critic appeal to those whose interest in literature has been particularized by allegiance to some literary cult or program, except as they are interested in literature in general. In fact, such a critic will appeal to a decided minority in any social group. Critics have never had a wide appeal. It is idle to suppose that they ever will have.

What will be this critic's practical object? I think that this question has already been answered by implication. His practical object will be the bringing to the attention of his readers the values he has detected in the writings he has subjected to scrutiny. In dealing practically with current literature, he will serve a selective function. And by the very seriousness of his point of view he will disagree as frequently as not with the judgments of the critics who write of books chiefly as news. This critic will not advise his readers about the fashionableness of this book or that. He will be concerned only with its worth. Anything else is mere by-play, though the writer would be the last one to minimize the importance of literary by-play.

What scheme of values will he support? He will not support any rigidly formulated scheme of values. He will point out that he has already ruled such rigid schemes out of his literary interest by placing the emphasis on the value of literature as experience. This change of emphasis relieves him of the necessity of measuring a work of art by its agreement with a predetermined scheme of values. It concentrates his attention upon the worth of the experience.

Finally, we may examine this critical position in the light of three dominant concerns of American criticism as formulated by Dr. Norman Foerster. First, what is the relation of literature and morality? Our critic will dissociate his criticism from any rigidly formulated code of morality. The judgment of the value of literature as experience does not necessitate a judgment of its "morality," for he will have escaped the confusion of mind which identifies contemporary folkways with what is moral. He will be keenly aware of the fact that all valuable experience to be derived from literature is not to be confined within the conventions of the group of which he is a member. He will recognize the relativity of morals and also that what his group may regard as a presentation of most "immoral" conduct may offer him more valuable experience than endless perfectly "moral" objects. On the other hand he will recognize that a true work of art has an inherent morality of its own—a morality which proceeds from the fundamental integrity of the artist. But it is impossible to measure this by external codifications.

What is the relation of literature to reality? Our critic will maintain that literature has a close and intimate connection with reality. But he will not be blinded by the apparent dissimilarities of authors. To use examples with which all readers will be familiar, he will find it within the range of his interests to examine closely the work of both Theodore Dreiser and James Branch Cabell. He will not consider it proof of a lack of discrimination if a critic or reader admires both of these writers, for he will recognize that both proceed from the same reality and both offer a selective presentation of that reality. He will see that both are creators of valuable literature for their times (to keep close to the ground). Dreiser happens to project his view of life on a plane which we call realistic, and consequently his novels contain a great deal of material from which we derive the secondary pleasure of recognition. Cabell, on the other hand, prefers to offer his criticism of life in romances, in "flights from reality" more apparent than real, for if closely read he offers as much criticism of life as Dreiser.

What is the relation of literature to the national spirit? Our critic will differ from the critics who came to notice in this country after 1910 in not emphasizing the elements of "nationalism" in literature. He will, however, recognize that every country produces its peculiarly national writers and that all writers within a given country respond to and embody in their work the national ethos. In considering the relation of a work of art to its sociological and psychological genesis, he will isolate and define its embodiment or rejection of the national ethos. But he will not be inclined to praise or condemn a work of art solely because of its peculiarly national quality.

In essence, what this critic will do is to return to a position roughly resembling that of the critics in English up to the beginning of the nineteenth century. Those critics specialized in plain good sense. The modern writer of criticism will buttress his good sense with the solid and relevant contributions of the sciences ancillary to literature. He will take a comprehensive view of his task. But his primary purpose, on the positive side, will be to communicate to his readers something of the peculiar pleasure which is to be derived from writers of merit.

In the Driftway

NO census-taker has yet snared the Drifter, nor is one likely to, for a census-taker must have some definite clue as to the whereabouts of his quarry and the Drifter's trail is hard to follow. He has neither a palpable home of his own, nor does he command on his wanderings that attention which would remind his pro tem host to point him out when the census man comes round. The Drifter is almost sorry, as he would enjoy answering a few questions. He is nearly tempted to break the laws of his nature and put down roots somewhere—small, tentative roots which need not bind. But he is deterred by the knowledge that, for him, the putting down of roots would have as questionable results as the instinctive home-making of a dog when he turns himself about on the floor before lying down to sleep.

* * * * *

THERE was a time when a sudden question would have alarmed the Drifter as being too reminiscent of a certain stuffy schoolroom presided over by a benign man, whose benignity had limits. But there comes a time in everyone's life when questions are likely to change from a form of persecution to a form of flattery. The Drifter, though he has long since quitted the former state, has never properly arrived at the latter, for no one ever thinks to ask him anything. It is years since he has been asked a question more serious than "Light or dark meat?" or "How will you have your tea?" People never ask him the time, and even those who have lost their way in a strange town do not turn to him for help. They seem to know by instinct that he, too, is generally a stranger here. Once, indeed, some one asked him whether it was difficult to get to Abyssinia. "Why, no," he said, "you just go down the Red Sea and turn to the right." But the next week the man left for Alaska, without asking for directions. He is still there and sends an occasional post card, crisply informative.

* * * * *

IN all fairness, though, the Drifter must admit certain printed questions that find their way through the mail. These, indeed, are rarely of the flattering kind. Some are calculated to inspire terror: "Are you prepared for the Judgment Day? Buy our Bibles." Some allow a note of hope: "Are you a social failure? Learn to play a musical instrument by mail." The ones that the Drifter likes best, however, are the simple ones such as those which come patiently, year in and year out, from a shop which he has never visited: "Have you lost your umbrella? Let us replace it." He has never kept an umbrella and can hardly begin now.

* * * * *

TO return to the census, there are two questions which it would give him the greatest pleasure to answer. They are: "Were you at work yesterday?" and "Have you a radio?" The answer to both is No.

Correspondence

Thanks from Haiti

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: To the genuine regret of all those who have had the privilege of coming in contact with her, Mrs. Helena Hill Weed is leaving Haiti tomorrow.

This third visit that Mrs. Weed has paid our country has appreciably strengthened the admiration and gratitude of the Haitian public in general, and of the Haitian press in particular, for the fearless and generous manner in which The Nation has championed Haiti's cause ever since its first protests aroused your attention and indignation. And now that President Hoover's commission has so well fulfilled its mission we wish to assure you of our conviction that it is in no small measure due to your publication's whole-hearted and untiring defense of our interests that certain of our most pressing problems are about to be satisfactorily solved.

By her keen insight into these problems, combined with her unerring tact and genuine human sympathy, your able collaborator, Mrs. Weed, is more firmly intrenched than ever in the esteem and affection of the Haitian people. Her keen intelligence, which gave her a thorough grasp of the Haitian situation, is no less the subject of our admiration than is the sympathy she has invariably displayed toward our oppressed nation. Such finely balanced qualities of head and heart are as admirable as they are rare, and we congratulate The Nation upon having so invaluable a collaborator as Mrs. Weed.

To you and to her, and through you both to The Nation, the Port au Prince press voices Haiti's deep appreciation of the moral and material support you have unstintingly given its cause, and it is convinced that time will only serve to strengthen the bonds of friendship existing between us.

"My Dear Senator"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If I am right in assuming that "My Dear Senator" in The Nation of March 26 was addressed to Senator Dill there is a little discrepancy to which I should like to call your attention. I refer to the two sentences: "You repeat that the sugar-beet industry is highly important to your State, and that the existing tariff does not enable the sugar-beet farmers to make a living"; and "Can you complain if people ask whether it is merely because you wish to get a few thousand dollars for the lumber men and beet growers of your State?"

Now look at the statistics of the United States Department of Agriculture for 1925 and 1927 and see how "highly important" sugar beets are in the agriculture of the State of Washington. These statistics show a total of 1,287 acres in sugar beets in the State, with a production of only 8,263 tons yearly. There are only two small areas in the whole State where farmers even try to grow them and they don't do a very good job of it compared with Colorado sugar-beet farmers, who get eleven tons to the acre and produce more than two million tons a year. No one familiar with farming in the State of Washington would be likely to tell you that sugar-beet growing is very important; and if you want to run your finger still farther down the statistical table, you'll find that except for Arizona, Nevada, and Oregon, which grow no sugar beets worth tabling, Washington has the lowest production among the Western States.

But in the same breath with sugar beets you mention lumber interests. Now you're talking! Run down the list of lumber-producing States in the West (according to the 1929 Yearbook) and notice that Washington topped the list with a production of 7,324,862 board feet during 1927, more than three million board feet in excess of its nearest competitor and neighbor, Oregon.

Beet growers and lumber men, indeed! Might as well group salmon and wheat together in Kansas!

Detroit and the Reds

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On Thursday, March 6, I was on the streets of our downtown section to watch the demonstration of the unemployed. Many citizens, myself included, had previously waited on our mayor, our police commissioner, and our superintendent of police with the request that the crowd be handled sympathetically and no violence done by the police force.

There were many acts of violence committed by the police on that day, including the usual clubbings, but what struck us observers as being both new and amazing, and therefore worthy of comment, was the fact that at point after point mounted policemen in groups of three, four, and five rode on to the sidewalks and charged straight into the crowds of orderly, peaceful people.

The Detroit branch of the American Civil Liberties Union has sworn affidavits of these and other brutalities of the police on that day.

Detroit, March 12 CAROLINE PARKER

President Masaryk

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In an editorial in The Nation of March 12, on page 285, you charge President Masaryk of Czecho-Slovakia with "the forcible wiping out of all traces of German influence and culture in Prague." That is a charge which, it seems to me, disproves itself by its very enormity. According to recent reports the German university and the German institute of technology at Prague are still in existence; in the winter semester of 1927-28 the former had 4,073 students and the latter 2,087. German schools, theaters, newspapers, German speech—all these are still to be found in Prague, although the Germans represent but a small fraction of the population of the city. The only monument of German culture in Prague that has really been "forcibly wiped out," so far as I know, is the tall Pillar of the Virgin Mary, erected by the Hapsburgs as a memorial to their victory over the Bohemian Protestants in 1620. When the Hapsburgs fell, their pillar fell with them.

On February 15 when Dr. Ludwig Czech (a German, in spite of the name), the Minister of Social Welfare, celebrated his sixtieth birthday, President Masaryk in a personal letter wished him good health and long life, and concluded with the following words: "By entering the Cabinet you have contributed to the rapprochement not only of the two Socialist parties but also of the two races, on whose mutual amity the future happiness of our Republic is largely dependent." I do not know that President Masaryk has ever been faithless to his professions.

A Trip to Russia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation has become so much the source of information to which all who are interested in Russian affairs look for authoritative news and significant comment that I thought you might be willing to bring to the attention of your readers a cooperative trip that is being planned by a group of economists, primarily to learn at the source more fully about the Gosplan and the progress that is being made under it.

The party will start from Berlin July 7, reaching Moscow July 9, and will devote thirty-five days to the study of conditions in Moscow, Leningrad, the leading cities along the Volga between Nizhni-Novgorod and Stalingrad, and the iron, steel, and coal region of the Donetz basin, ending the journey at Kiev. Full information may be obtained by writing to me in care of Columbia University, Department of Political Science.

THE LOVE POEMS OF JOANNES SECUNDUS

Translated by F. W. Wright

AN unabridged and unexpurgated edition of these famous love poems, translated for the first time from the Latin. Through the lines of these frank and rhythmic litanies of love can be heard the irresistible chuckle of the dextrous author as he thumbs his artistic nose at the pedagogues. The poems are presented in four groups: "The Kisses," "The Loves," "Occasional Poems," and "The Bridal Night." Beautifully bound, jacketed, and boxed for gift purposes. $5.00

IS PROHIBITION DEMOCRATIC?

The editor of Democratic Youth examines important questions of public interest each month, draws his own conclusions, and invites his readers to do the same. Of prohibition he says, in the April issue, "The important question for the voter is not whether he wants to drink. . . . The liquor question alone is comparatively trivial; if there were nothing else to consider I would be a prohibitionist."

If you are young in years or in spirit you will enjoy the refreshing discussions in Democratic Youth, published at West Liberty, Kentucky, for young idealists who still believe in democracy. The subscription price is only $1 a year; three years for $2.

Of Changing Seasons

By EDA LOU WALTON

Darkness was symbol. Now the low full moon
Lifts a white grail above the stony hill,
And where the lips denied, they must affirm,
And where the heart was stoic, it must turn
Tearful from out its fortress. All too soon
The frail leaves feather the far trees and burn
On the near maples; this, the sweet hour, will Shelter within the valley while the air
Gathers again to snow. And heart compelled
Now by the downy forest soon is knelled.
And heart and moon and stony hill must quell
Always their earliest singing, black their glow
Even when the smothered choir shall swell, and slow
Flowering become a madness to unfurl
The bright cocoon of summer, to unwind
The silver-threaded orchards, and trees twirl
In radiance down the valleys. Alas, the mind
Delirious then with fragrance and delight,
Even in its ripest hour thinks on night,
Recalls a stark December, and remembers
Darkness was symbol.

Last Testament

Assorted Articles. By D. H. Lawrence. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THE fugitive pieces gathered here add little to Lawrence's message to the world. Had he lived longer it seems unlikely that his reputation would have greatly increased. His future writings would probably have been mere repetitions of his earlier work, would have come as anti-climax. He had shot his bolt.

Among the articles in the present volume the two that I find most attractive are a portrait, at once delightful and scathing, called Laura Philippine; and the autobiographical sketch. The latter tells of the "pneumonia illness" which attacked Lawrence at seventeen and at twenty-five, damaging his health for life; and it gives also the reasons why he felt that he could not "rise in the world and become even a little popular and rich." The other articles are, in the main, preachments, passionate declamations. No matter what his ostensible topic may be, Lawrence keeps returning to his central doctrines—that life must be a direct sensuous contact with people and with nature, that life must be a flow, that sex must be a flow, a real flow of sympathy, generous and warm, that we must stick up for our own instinctive feelings against the things we are taught, that we have shut Life out from our living, and that we must struggle down to the heart of things, where the everlasting flame is, and kindle ourselves another beam of light.

Lawrence sometimes talks in the terms of the social reformer, but we cannot deal with him as we can with the usual social reformer. We are not to pin him down to particulars, to expose his contradictions, to ask him what, concretely and specifically, his passionate phrases may imply. For Lawrence's strength surely did not lie in any ability to reason closely and carefully. I do not believe he ever once hesitated before making a sweeping generalization to think whether or not it was quite true. Indeed, I suspect that for what is called reasoning he had at bottom very little respect; temperamentally he must have despised logic, or the exact mathematics, the patient verifications, that are necessary for the conclusions of science. Much of his influence came from his "mysticism," but this mysticism often reduced itself, on examination, to mere vagueness and unintelligibility, a persistent inability or refusal to reduce his sweeping indictments to specific terms. What does he mean, for example, when he says: "So intense and final is the modern white man's conviction, his internal conviction, that he is not a man, that he dares anything on earth except be a man"? Or what does he mean when he tells us that "people flaunt their bodies to show how unphysical they are," or that "the young are, in a subtle way, physically repulsive to one another, the girl to the man and the man to the girl"? How did Lawrence know all that? What reason have we for supposing any of these statements, as generalizations, to be true? Are we being asked to apply the principle of "credo quia absurdum"? Must we assume the mystical truth to be the exact opposite of the literal truth? We are obliged to come back to the conclusion that we cannot judge Lawrence's message by any literal standards. Or rather, we must adopt the standard that Walter Lippmann once applied to Mencken—we must judge him as we would a barrage of artillery, for the general destruction rather than for the accuracy of the individual shots.

Lawrence thought of himself as a rebel against tradition, but he wrote in a tradition with deep historic roots. Irving Babbitt would have little trouble in showing, for example, that a part of Lawrence's attitude and many of his ideas stemmed ultimately from Rousseau. But we need not go so far back. He was essentially in accord with Pater's doctrine that the artist should burn with a hard gemlike flame; and in form of utterance if not in doctrine he belonged in the tradition of Carlyle and Nietzsche. In brief, he was a prophet of our day. He impressed his personality and his doctrines on his generation by returning with passionate insistence to the same everlasting preachments. He was against routine, against mechanization, against stock emotions, against everything that was sheeplike and safe and "nice" and dull. He was a prod and a gadfly, and he set an example of splendid courage. He felt that we were all somehow trapped by civilization, and he shook the bars of the cage and shouted for release.

HENRY HAZLITT

The Sensibility of Proust

The Sweet Cheat Gone. By Marcel Proust. Translated by C. K. Scott Moncrieff. Albert and Charles Boni. $3.

"MADEMOISELLE ALBERTINE is gone!" With this exclamation the penultimate volume of Proust's great romance begins, and though the author is not accustomed to commence in any fashion so simply dramatic the sentences which follow instantaneously recapture for the reader that particular mood of elegiac contemplation which has been, throughout, so consistently and so charmingly maintained.

> A moment ago, as I lay analyzing my feelings, I had supposed that this separation without a final meeting was precisely what I had wished, and, as I compared the mediocrity of the pleasures that Albertine afforded me with the richness of the desires which she prevented me from realizing, had felt that I was being subtle, had concluded that I did not wish to see her again, that I no longer loved her. But now these words: "Mademoiselle Albertine has gone!" had expressed themselves in my heart with an anguish so keen that I would not be able to endure it for any length of time. . . . Tender toward myself as my mother had been toward my dying grandmother, I said to myself with that anxiety which we feel to prevent a person whom we love > from suffering: "Be patient for just a moment, we shall find something to take the pain away; don't fret, we are not going to allow you to suffer like this."

Proust has many remarkable excellences, but there is no passage which better illustrates one of the most striking—which is his power to communicate an egotistical absorption in the poignancy of a cherished pain. Nor does he, in the whole of the present volume—devoted exclusively to the history of the gradual fading of the narrator's love for Albertine—once fail to maintain in the reader an interest, almost equal to his own, in the intricate involutions of a spirit which is nursing its sorrows in order that it may note and describe the effect of each fluctuation of pain.

In the tenth volume of a continuous novel one would hardly expect to find anything which is strictly new, and indeed one does not, but one seems almost to do so, for so rich is the originality of Proust that, as one reads the successive sections of his work, it is almost impossible to refrain from concentrating one's attention upon different aspects of his originality and from taking each individual volume as an illustration of the particular quality which one has in mind. Certainly, for example, nothing about his work is more striking than the particular form assumed by the sensibility which informs it, and certainly "The Sweet Cheat Gone" is at least an example as striking as any other of the nature of that sensibility peculiar to him. It is obvious that Proust finds in contemplation the meaning of life, and that of all things Love is, for him, the one which can be made the most fruitful object of contemplation. But he has achieved his own selection from among those many simples from which love is said to be compounded, and no little part of the unique experience of reading his work is the result of sharing with him the emotions of that very particular kind of love which he celebrates.

The value which he puts upon it is as high as the value assigned by the most extravagant of romantics, and yet Proustian love shows not a trace of many of the elements which usually accompany and which are, perhaps, usually thought necessary to a love so romantic. It has no reticences, for Proust analyzes even the most intimate of its sensual aspects; it has no selflessness, for it makes little pretence to unselfish desire for the happiness or welfare of the beloved object; and it is, moreover, completely dissociated from the idea of permanence, for Proust, even in the midst of his transports, never fails to remember that the time will come when the desire which masters him will seem distant and incomprehensible. Proustian love has then no rational element and no rationalized value, yet it has a power to absorb and a power to torture which cannot belong to sense, simple and unadorned. To the making of it has gone (besides sense) only sentiment, but it has become, without the aid of moral ideas, something marvelously elaborate and something well-nigh unique in literature.

Perhaps this love of his, this emotion which is so obviously neither the sacrament of the romanticists nor the devaluated amusement of the cynic, might indeed be made the type of his sensibility, for in many other respects also he manages to achieve an attitude poised somewhere between the extremes which have so often seemed inevitable alternatives. Disillusioned enough he was with many things, with morals for example, and he had neither any code nor any standards besides those which his tastes supplied. Yet there were capacities and faiths which he still retained. He still believed, for example, in the sufficiency of the senses and in the value of art. He never, like so many moderns, found himself in a world limited and debased by the impossibility of escape from psychology, anthropology, and Freudianism. The world was still absorbingly, still amazingly, interesting. Women, most women, were to him magical and mysterious. Conversations were witty, salons were thrilling, and artists—even contemporary artists—incalculably great. In a word, he respected his desires, his tastes, and his amusements, and hence, though experience might be predominantly painful, it was neither meaningless nor mean. And that perhaps is the secret of the individual charm of his world. It is one viewed with the critical freedom of modern thought and one in which skepticism rules. Yet it is somehow glamorous as well.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Rediscovery of America

The Bridge. By Hart Crane. Horace Liveright. $2.50.

THOUGH a number of critics have "discovered" Hart Crane, his has been one of the esoteric names. "The Bridge" should change all that. There is no good reason why he should be the private property and more-or-less-patronized poet of a few of the intelligentsia. His work is difficult, but it is not obscure in any cheap or wanton fashion. Much contemporary poetry is more difficult, and there is very little that is so rewarding.

Perhaps a reviewer can perform no better service than to outline the poem. The opening stanzas of the proem, To Brooklyn Bridge, suggest the nature of Mr. Crane's vision and its elusiveness:

How many dawns, chill from his rippling rest
The seagull's wings shall dip and pivot him,
Shedding white rings of tumult, building high
Over the chained bay waters Liberty—

Then, with inviolate curve, forsake our eyes
As apparitional as sails that cross
Some page of figures to be filed away;
—Till elevators drop us from our day . . .

The seagull, it is to be noted, remains a seagull and yet fulfils another purpose. This is the way Mr. Crane uses symbols. The picture of the bridge at night, sharp in its compact imagery, reveals the same quality:

Again the traffic lights that skim thy swift
Unfractioned idiom, immaculate sigh of stars,
Beading thy path—condense eternity:
And we have seen night lifted in thine arms.

The final stanza indicates that the bridge is a kind of cosmic symbol as well as a symbol of the American spirit:

O Sleepless as the river under thee,
Vaulting the sea, the prairies' dreaming sod,
Unto us lowliest sometime sweep, descend
And of the curveship lend a myth to God.

With Ave Maria, the soliloquy of Columbus as he returns from his first voyage, the lines swell in somber dignity. Columbus, bringing back Cathay, remembers that the secret may yet be buried at the bottom of the sea. He recalls his thoughts when land was sighted and warns Ferdinand against reckless exploitation of the new continent. Finally his voice lifts in prayer, which becomes a petition on behalf of the questing mind:

O Thou who sleepest on Thyself, apart
Like ocean athwart lanes of death and birth,
And all the eddying breath between dost search
Cruelly with love thy parable of man,—
Inquisitor! incognizable Word
Of Eden and the enchained Sepulcher,
Into thy steep savannahs, burning blue,
Utter to loneliness the sail is true.

The next section, Powhatan's Daughter, is divided into five poems. The basic symbolism here, as suggested by the first poem and the marginal annotations, is sexual. The theme is the American continent, the very soil itself, its traditions and potentialities. One of the poems, The River, begins with an expressionistic treatment of a railroad train, turns to a passage on the hobos, "born pioneers in time's despite," and ends with a description of the Mississippi, which is also a description of the flow of these wanderers. The hobos, "who have touched her, knowing her without name," are unconsciously in love with this America. The Dance, which follows, celebrates a conscious love, such as was possible in the "tribal morn" of the Indians.

Cutty Sark, a short poem with a dream organization, sings of the sailing-ship days. But this is little more than a preface to Cape Hatteras. Here, taking Whitman as his inspiration, Crane grapples directly with the theme of contemporary America. He tells how after our wanderings we return home:

. . . to read you, Walt,—knowing us in thrall
To that deep wonderment, our native clay
Whose depth of red, eternal flesh of Pocahontus—
Those continental folded eons, surcharged
With sweetness below derricks, chimneys, tunnels—
Is veined by all that time has really pledged us.

He speaks of the machine age and the dual effect of science:

Seeing himself an atom in a shroud—
Man hears himself an engine in a cloud!

America is not "our empire yet, but labyrinth," and Whitman's eyes, like Columbus's, ferret out the path. We have our machines, such as the airplane:

The soul, by naphtha fledged into new reacnes
Already knows the closer clasp of Mars.

But as Columbus saw the possibility of evil in the discovery of the new continent, so the poet perceives the potential menace of aircraft:

While Iliads glimmer through eyes raised in pride
Hell's belt springs wider into heaven's plumed side.

Crane describes the airplane and the dirigible, "enormous Lounger of pendulous auroral beaches." He reminds the flier that he is commissioned "to conjugate infinity's dim marge anew." He describes, once more using the aid of typographical arrangement, the fall of a plane. Then he returns to Whitman, speaking of Whitman's meaning to him, comparing Whitman to the bridge, defining Whitman's message to the American people:

O, something green,
Beyond all sesames of science was thy choice
Wherewith to bind us throbbing with one voice,
New integers of Roman, Viking, Celt—

The poem ends with the poet going—onward without halt,—

Not soon, nor suddenly,—no, never to let go
My hand
in yours,
Walt Whitman—
so—

Three songs follow. After them comes Quaker Hill, contrasting the mystic and poet with the American business man, calling on the poet to transmute silence with "that stilly note of pain that Emily, that Isadora knew." Then The Tunnel brings us again into the confusion of urban civilization. In the subway train comes the apparition of Poe, and the poem ends with the contemplation of the bridge.

The last stanzas of The Tunnel provide the transition from the hectic, expressionistic description of subway hubbub to the noble, chorale-like movement of Atlantis. Here is the bridge again:

Through the bound cable strands, the arching path
Upward, veering with light, the flight of strings,—
Taut miles of shuttling moonlight syncopate
The whispered rush, telepathy of wires.

Up the index of night, granite and steel—
Transparent meshes—fleckless the gleaming staves—
Sibylline voices flicker, waveringly stream
As though a god were issue of the strings.

Slowly, with dignity, in lines compact with thought, in phrases soaked with implications, the poem moves to its ultimate, mystic vision, in which the bridge, symbol of all that America may be, is symbol also of that union of the individual soul with the eternal reality which is the goal of every mystic's quest.

Long essays could be, and one trusts will be, written about "The Bridge." There is not an angle from which it cannot profitably be scrutinized. Its technique should be studied, to bring out the principles by which the variations of rhythm and rhyme are determined. Its imagery, as even a few quotations show, is sound and amazingly original. The methods of its symbolism should be considered. Its philosophical implications are worthy of comment. Its affirmativeness should be contrasted with the elegiacism of most contemporary poetry. But we need not worry; all this will be done, for "The Bridge" is not a poem to go unrecognized.

GRANVILLE HICKS

Wisdom of an Elder Statesman

Africa and Some World Problems. By J. C. Smuts. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

THIS book contains a collection of addresses about subjects superficially at least very heterogeneous—Livingstone, Africa, the League of Nations, Democracy. Anyone, moreover, who would detect an inner unity, believing that a man's attitude to African native problems will excellently indicate how truly he is a democrat, may well be deceived. When he is discussing matters non-African General Jan Christiaan Smuts is the great liberal Elder Statesman, the show-piece to prove the success of the British Commonwealth idea. When, however, he is discussing Africa, local politics come into play, and General Smuts becomes very definitely a South African advocating the territorial segregation of the black and white races. This policy is quite impracticable in view of the labor situation. Hence General Smuts would make the rather significant exception of the Negro engaged in industrial labor. But at least his wife and children are to remain territorially segregated under tribal conditions; the Negro laborer will presumably see them, a few hundred miles away, in his spare moments. As General Smuts says, "The new policy of native self-government [by disfranchised and segregated natives] will provide the natives with plenty of bones to chew at and plenty of matter to wrangle over." It surely will. About the desirability of instantaneously industrializing the African (although, left alone, he is "the happiest of humans" and, moreover, obligingly decreasing in numbers) in order to make Africa materially productive and full of a resentful black population, General Smuts appears to have no doubts. The General is a good Occidental, all out for doing something—as is indeed the habit of generals.

The same masterful passion for organization can be detected even in Smuts the liberal philosopher and world statesman. A "mere declaration of policy" such as the Kellogg pact—this moral gesture which declares: I will enter into no entangling commitments with my fellow-world-citizens but I declare that I, at least, am righteous—is not sufficient. Wisely enough Smuts insists on an institution; for institutions, not declarations, change the course of history. "The function requires a structure." He denounces the French demand that "teeth" be put into the League—a new war association to fight war, "Satan enlisted to fight sin." But he insists that the condemnation of war for national ends as a legitimate expedient for sovereign states to use at discretion involves, in theory, a distinction between "public war" (not for such ends) and "private war." It involves, in practice, an undertaking among the nations of the world to confer to prevent these private wars.

Perhaps the most important chapter in the book is that on Democracy. Here, not unexpectedly, we find General Smuts insisting upon the importance of the expert, while admitting the danger of the bureaucrat. He sees the work of the financial advisers of the Dawes and Young commissions as constituting a significant departure and precedent in removing the thorniest questions of politics from the sensational arena of inflamed and ignorant public opinion. The statesman is cowed by this public pressure. If democracy is to cope with these infinitely complex new problems of politics and to survive, "science should have its functional relation to the state." "The scientific expert should come in as a new additional organ of the modern democratic state." "Political democracy is in essence unassailable . . . but democracy is not enough." Would that these words of a statesman mellowed by experience and ripe with the fruits of a trained mind could be blazoned over every polling-booth in the civilized world. One of the most far-reaching revolutions of our age is that responsible statesmen are pointing out that politics is a department of science, not a branch of rhetoric.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN

Fiction in Brief

The Kramer Girls. By Ruth Suckow. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

In Miss Suckow's latest novel, along with her usual excellence in pure representation, there is, perhaps, a stronger emotional current than in any of her previous books. She has yielded a little of her aloofness, and she has gained in power and depth. The story is of three sisters in the familiar Iowa environment. Miss Suckow's characters are never to be summed up in a sentence. It is only at first glance that they seem to be types. For she has developed to perfection her own technique of word portraiture—that of approaching a character from many angles, disregarding inconsistencies, until the figure emerges, three dimensional, astonishingly like life. If Miss Suckow has not achieved as yet in sustained power all that her admirers have hoped from her, the fact remains that she is one of the few of our important novelists whose powers are still on the increase.

The Excursion to Tilsit. By Hermann Sudermann. Translated from the German by Lewis Galantière. Horace Liveright. $2.50.

The four long stories of Lithuanian peasant life included in this volume belong with the best of Sudermann's work. They are realistic, even to the point of being ethnological studies of a little-known people. At the same time they are much more. The characters are warmed and brought to life by a detached but loving understanding, and the events are selected and woven together into splendid dramatic fragments. The longest story, Jons and Erdma, is a little "Growth of the Soil," without the starkness of that great novel. It is touched with humor and humanity. The shortest, the title story, which tells the tale of Ansas and Indra, of how Ansas, led astray by another woman, takes Indra with him on an excursion intending to murder her on the way home but ends by saving her life at the expense of his own, belongs with the greatest of its kind. So fine a book should do much to revive interest in an author whose prestige, in America at any rate, has been for some time on the decline.

The Hoax. By Italo Svevo. Translated from the Italian with an Introduction by Beryl de Zoete. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

This novelette, published in Italy in 1928, the year of the author's death, is the first complete story by Italo Svevo (Ettore Schmitz) to appear in English. Svevo was an obscure Italian writer whose two novels, "A Life" and "Senility," had long been forgotten when James Joyce, who had known him since 1906, succeeded in convincing the literary world that a great novelist had been overlooked. His novels were revived and in 1923 he published "Zeno," his best-known work. "The Hoax" tells the story of a single incident in the life of a dreamy office worker who in his youth had published an unsuccessful novel, and who now satisfies his creative longings by writing, for his own pleasure, fables based on the antics of the sparrows whom he feeds outside his window. A practical joker convinces him that a foreign publisher is eager to purchase the rights to his forgotten novel for a large sum of money. Mario is completely taken in; but his gentle character stands the test of the humiliating ordeal through which he passes. It is a pleasant but not particularly important tale. One looks forward to the translation of one of Svevo's major works.

The Trough of the Wave. By Olaf Duun. Translated from the Norwegian by Arthur G. Chater. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

This is the first volume of a six-volume translation of Olaf Duun's Norwegian saga of a family of peasant freeholders, the whole to bear the title, "The People of Juvik." The volumes are to appear separately from time to time. The tale opens on an epic note with its recital of the traditional lore of the Juvikings of olden time, goes on to tell of Per Anders, the last of the "old men," and then takes up the story of his two sons, Jens and Per, who bring the family fortunes down with them into the trough of the wave. As befits a prelude to so long a work, the movement is slow, the acceleration gradual. Standing by itself "The Trough of the Wave" evokes a mood and portrays a background—and does little else. But further criticism had best be withheld until more volumes have appeared.

"Journey's End"

IS "Journey's End" the masterpiece that it is claimed to be, or is its popularity merely a passing vogue? Whatever the answer it is clear that the story owes its present success not so much to the fidelity with which it reproduces the life at the front line (its picture of that life sinning rather on the side of idealization), as to the moral appeal of the unobtrusive and matter-of-fact gallantry that culminates its action. But having already asked: What price glory? it is quite possible that some day some of us may also ask: What price gallantry? We may become critical not only about the business of killing, but no less so about the business of being killed. For it is true that we admire gallantry in others because we recognize the ordeal that being in their place would be to us; because, too, as a rule we are directly or indirectly benefited by these feats of heroism, and therefore cannot possibly regard them as deserving anything but our greatest admiration. Hence, as long as society is conceded the right to call upon the individual to perform the supreme sacrifice, so long shall we have this far-from-disinterested cult of heroism, and so long will the "gentlemanly" Anglo-Saxons glory at the spectacle of gallantry that is unobtrusive and self-effacing. To brand the specific code of honor which permeates

"Journey's End" as bourgeois (which it undoubtedly is) will no more solve the problem than to invoke the same code, with appropriate adjustments, in behalf of proletarian class rule or the Nietzschean superman. After all it does not really make much difference whether one is invited to destroy oneself for the greater glory of a nation, of a class, of the human race as a whole, or of the improved human species of a million years hence.

With these reservations concerning the fundamental values embodied in "Journey's End," one must admit that the actual spectacle of guiltless men walking docilely their "last mile" is in itself stirring enough to hold one in its grip from first scene to last. In this respect the film version of "Journey's End" (Gaiety) is even more tense than the original stage play, for it is less diluted by the orderly's amusing remarks on food, and unlike the play provides a few scenes of actual fighting. It also gains in comparison in the greater detail and relief which the cinematic treatment bestows on its characters. On the other hand, tensely as the story is told on the screen it lacks the more subtle play of contrasts which marks the progress of action on the stage; and it also fails to create that atmosphere of uncanny ordinariness and uneventfulness hiding the inferno of war horrors which the stage somehow succeeds in suggesting. Nevertheless, of its kind the film is a remarkable achievement, notable for the success with which it has preserved the dramatic qualities that went into the making of the original play. It would be an exaggeration to say that it is a cinematic masterpiece, for it never attempts to assert its independence of the stage and to express itself entirely in terms of the cinema; but it is skilful and intelligent as far as it goes, and this is no small merit for anything that comes out of Hollywood.

"Under a Texas Moon" (Winter Garden) is as different from "Journey's End" as a light extravaganza can be from the grim realities of life. Unlike the latter picture, too, it shows a divided mind in both its story and direction, with the disastrous result that inevitably follows such indecision. The trouble with the picture is that its producers could not make up their minds whether it was to be a piece of exaggerated romanticism or a satire on such romanticism. Had the satire been left out the picture would have gained immensely, and Mr. Frank Fay would have been able to make the character he plays with such penetration and charm a piece of truly unique and subtle portraiture.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Drama

Weltschmerz on the Riviera

PHILIP BARRY is the author of two extremely successful light comedies and of a group of more pretentious plays which range in manner from the whimsicality of "White Wings" through the somewhat preachy emotionalism of "In a Garden" to the tragic earnestness of "John." The two comedies are as fine as anything of the kind ever written in America, but Mr. Barry seems much to prefer his less successful efforts, and his opinion is seconded by a considerable number of critics who never tire of repeating that "White Wings" and "In a Garden" failed because they were too good for the public.

Now I have never been one to subscribe to the opinion that theatrical audiences are more nearly infallible than any other section of "the general," but in the particular case of this playwright I have always believed that the public was right both when it acclaimed "Paris Bound" and when it turned thumbs down to the plays which were supposed to be above its head. I have never seen any reason why a social comedy replete with urbane wit should be necessarily inferior to anything whatsoever, and the production of "Hotel Universe" (Martin Beck Theater) has only served to confirm my opinion that such plays as this are artistically much inferior to what their author apparently regards as his insignificant potboilers. In the new piece he tries once more to deliver an extremely hazy "message," and succeeds only in revealing to his audience what an ill exchange he makes when he trades the clear good sense of his wit for the pompous platitudes of a sentimental and second-rate mysticism.

The idea behind "Hotel Universe" is simple enough, once one has been permitted to glimpse its outlines behind the mist which envelops it. It seems that a collection of ever-so-rich and ever-so-sophisticated people has gathered at a house party given by a young girl devoting her life to the care of a semi-insane father who used to be a physicist but who appears to have lost his wits as the result of some very loose thinking about space-time—a subject which, by the way, may be all very well for mathematicians but which is disastrous for those who, innocent of mathematics, are prone to suppose that Professor Alexander is promising us all a kind of second chance (vide "Dear Brutus") in life. It seems, still further, that each member of the company suffers from one kind of Weltschmerz or another because each has got himself "fixed" by an emotional experience in the past. Fortunately, however, there is something in the atmosphere generated by the physicist which liberates everybody. Each goes into a kind of trance, relives the crucial scene of his existence, and then awakes so completely purified and liberated that the whole party leaves, ready to begin a new life in the great world, while the physicist, his task completed, lies dead in a very comfortable chair.

The idea is passable and, I believe, sufficiently good Freudianism; but what the play needs desperately is more matter and less art. Every incident loses its outlines because every incident is swathed in layer after layer of fuzzy verbiage about Life, Death, the Great Beyond, and the fact (announced by a mysterious white cock given to apparently untimely crowings) that "somewhere it is always dawn." The dramatis personae are supposed to represent the intellectual as well as the social elite, but they indulge in the most appalling mystical chit-chat and are responsible for a stream of discourse upon the surface of which float fragments of mangled Einstein together with all sorts of spongy, half-digested or completely indigestible bits which seem to be the remains of a meal formerly made upon some of the more repulsive varieties of New Thought. Such ideas pass current in Village salons when dusk and cocktails have combined to elevate the spirits and depress the judgment, but they are not taken seriously by captains of finance and other authentic bigwigs, unless the upper classes have degenerated farther than even the Michael Arlens maintain.

Cannot something be done to persuade Mr. Barry to respect and to cultivate the very considerable gifts which the gods have been good enough to give him? Cannot he be made to see that the "message" of wit, of urbanity, and of comic good sense may be just as valuable and just as profound as that delivered by any other kind of philosophy? If his "Holiday" is mere commercial entertainment and "Hotel Universe" is art, then I have made a discovery. I proclaim myself from henceforth a lowbrow, unrepentant and unashamed.

I have all but forgotten to add that the production is extraordinarily polished—rather more expert indeed than the play deserves.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"Three Little Girls" (Shubert Theater) is an extremely elaborate Viennese operetta mounted lavishly upon a revolving stage and unusually well sung by a very large company. It offers a very full evening of the kind of entertainment it undertakes to provide.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Owing to an unfortunate error on the part of the publicity manager for the World Tourists, Inc., an "ad" advertising Dr. Joshua Kunitz's tour has appeared in the issue of April 23, 1930, before it was seen or approved by any one responsible in the World Tourist Office or by Dr. Kunitz himself.

We regret the personal tone in which the "ad" was written, and we apologize to Dr. Kunitz for this slip.

We wish, however, to state that the second World Tourists, Inc. tour under the leadership of Dr. Joshua Kunitz still continues and from time to time announcements with reference thereto will appear.

Very truly yours,

An Analogy

If 114,000,000 of the 115,000,000 population of the United States should adopt the practice of snapping at other people's ears at home and in public places—

And if the snaps often reached their mark—

The one million non-snapping minority would be faced with a tremendous problem.

Attempts at legislation would accomplish little. The non-snappers would have to educate that overwhelming majority to the social and economic disadvantages of mayhem.

To be sure, the thoroughly patriotic non-snappers would suffer attack, disfigurement, and abuse. Yet their devotion would carry them through, eventually, to some measure of success.

Though its problem is vastly more complex, The Nation is in a position comparable to that of the non-snapper. It champions the cause of individual sanity and corporate fairplay in a world that has never been celebrated for a preponderance of either.

Everyone who is willing to think should read The Nation. Each week it brings to light important but elsewhere neglected news. Also it sifts the fiction out of such news as is not neglected, and sets up a comprehensible structure of truth.

"HERE one experiences constantly the fine rapture of discovery"

Between the covers of THE AMERICAN MERCURY one finds some of the best writing in America. The magazine speaks for the civilized minority. Here the submerged tenth receives a hearing. The price carries it beyond the reach of the majority—the tabloid thinkers. Here one experiences constantly the fine rapture of discovery. Here one finds, on every page, writing of marked quality. In the field of clinical criticism it is for the moment supreme. There is no avenue of approach like it in a world where and an era when, in places, one may walk for days and encounter of intellectual life no trace.

Ferment in Spain

WE reprint the following comment on the situation in Spain from the Manchester Guardian. It has become apparent since this article was written that the relaxation in the censorship was only temporary. For domestic news it is stronger than ever. Several newspapers have been altogether suppressed and many others fined. The early edition of the newspapers of Valencia was recently confiscated because it carried the speech of Señor Niceto Alcalá Zamora, prominent liberal, who declared himself in favor of a conservative republic in a meeting that had to be held in a small theater seating 2,000 while more than 50,000 stood outside. The censorship of foreign dispatches, on the other hand, was at the same time lifted once more, for the speech of Alcalá Zamora was reported in the American press.

General Primo de Rivera, Dictator of Spain, was removed from office in much the same ignominious way in which an unwanted petty official is retired. The King decided that he must go, and go he did, without fuss, trouble, or dispute. Dictatorships are not accustomed to disappear so quietly, nor does Spain seem destined to furnish an exception to that rule. On February 28 the Cabinet held a meeting and decided that it would be inopportune to hold elections at present; that the censorship should be continued and possibly be made more stringent. Spain, then, despite General Berenguer's fair promises, is as far from democracy as ever. The instrument of dictatorship, General Primo de Rivera, has been changed; the royal dictatorship continues. At the time of the removal of General Primo de Rivera it was still permissible to hope that King Alfonso had learned from the universal unpopularity of his dictator that personal rule was folly and might end in disaster. One might still hope that he would realize that his best course was to place himself at the head of the movement back to normality. A true Bourbon, he has chosen the other way. Only the minimum concessions to popular feeling have been made, and they have plainly been made in a grudging spirit. To what do they amount? Political exiles have been allowed to return, and they have been allowed a carefully limited number of opportunities to speak. Local self-government has been restored on a basis that makes nonsense of the word; the new councils are composed partly of the richest taxpayers and partly of those candidates who headed the polls at the last elections before the dictatorship. The censorship has been relaxed but it still exists. Very significant here is the fact that while the correspondents of foreign newspapers were at first, under the new regime, entirely free of restriction, latterly a measure of censorship has been reimposed. This is the sum of liberty reintroduced by General Berenguer and King Alfonso. It amounts to little if any more than that promised by General Primo de Rivera in his program of a gradual return to normal government. Can Alfonso wonder that his people demand an account of his responsibility for the dictatorship? Has not his action during the past month made it abundantly clear that he is no reluctant victim of circumstances but a full-blooded believer in personal, irresponsible government?

King Alfonso, then, has set his hand to hinder the return of freedom. Is he likely to succeed? The most important force behind him is undoubtedly the church. The Spanish church is still on the whole a great pillar of reaction. The dictatorship of General Primo de Rivera long enjoyed the support of the great Catholic newspapers, while the ineradicable hostility of the universities to the government was largely due to the favoritism of Catholic student societies in which that government indulged. However, even in this ecclesiastical stronghold of absolutist sentiment there are groups who would not imperil their church's future by identifying it with an unpopular and anti-social system of government. There has of recent years been a great growth of Catholic Social groups, who have tried to introduce into organized Christian life a spirit of reforming tenderness. Prominent among their leaders are men like Señor Ossorio Gallardo, the president of the Madrid Association of Lawyers and a well-known Conservative leader, who has been making speeches deeply critical of the dictatorship and of the King's share in it. Have these men any chance of influencing the great body of parish priests? It is a question of supreme importance, for on the attitude of the great mass of ill-educated, silent, non-political peasantry depends the stability of any form of government. It is not that they will take any active part in deciding the fate of their country, but rather that no government can survive without their passive tolerance. Their attitude is to a large extent determined by the opinion of the miserably underpaid parish priests, who looked in vain to the dictatorship for any alleviation of their position. Would they now be willing at least to tolerate a republic, or is the very idea of free government so associated in their minds with anti-clericalism that they would withhold their support? They have as yet given no sign. . . .

The forces making for a republic, or at the very least for a change of king, are more active and virile, even if less numerous, than those which tend to support the present form of government. The concentration of almost all political opinion in favor of a thorough scrutiny of the King's behavior is a remarkable sign. Naturally one would expect Señor Unamuno to be of this opinion, but one would hardly have supposed that he could become, as he has, the voice of all awakened Spain. The Socialists, of course, are republicans, but there is real significance in the conversion of Conservative leaders to a skepticism of royal government. Señor Sanchez Guerra has accused King Alfonso of having brought in the dictatorship, and declared that in consequence the King can no longer take refuge behind his constitutional irresponsibility, as he has violated the constitution. That is a sign that the most responsible and the most moderate section of Spanish opinion no longer believes that the monarchy can safeguard its interests. These men are the most timid in the face of change, because they have most to lose by revolution. They are men of loyalty and honor, who would never leave a sinking ship unless it had first been deserted by its captain. . . . But why is it . . . that General Berenguer is still able to rule without a Parliament? So far there have been a few demonstrations and rumors of several political strikes, but nothing that has given the police any trouble. Spain is quiet today because the army has not yet spoken. It spoke once and General Primo de Rivera was dismissed. Since then it has been silent. But the army is the greatest political force in Spain. It can make and unmake ministries and kings. That is a very unhealthy condition, and the first business of any democratic government would have to be to take the army out of politics. But does the army wish to become less political and more professional? Until it has answered that question it is idle to speculate on the chances of free government in Spain. Monarchy or republic, as long as soldiers are politicians, citizens are at a discount.

SENATOR BORAH was at his best when he opened the attack upon Judge Parker's confirmation. He showed that the judge's reasoning was faulty in the Red Jacket case; that the precedent he cited, the Hitchman case, was not a proper one, thereby demolishing the Parker contention that he was compelled to follow the Supreme Court's reasoning. As for the judge's own defense in his letter to Senator Overman, we find it distinctly weak; indeed, the press dispatches report that it did not help but injured his case. Meanwhile, in addition to the letter we publish elsewhere, we have letters from Congressman Charles A. Jonas of North Carolina and Wyndham R. Meredith, a former president of the Virginia bar, pointing out that the editor of The Nation in his letter to "My Dear Senator" on the Parker case failed to note that it was Judge Parker who declared the Richmond anti-Negro segregation ordinance unconstitutional. This is true; it was an oversight. But Judge Parker was clearly bound by the Supreme Court precedents because that body had twice unanimously outlawed two such ordinances. There was no possibility of misinterpreting this precedent. Nor does this affect the fact that in his campaign for the governorship of North Carolina he took the familiar Southern position that Negroes should not be permitted, and do not wish, to participate in politics. We are glad to record the fact that Mr. Jonas and Mr. Meredith praise Judge Parker in the highest terms.

THE AMERICAN DELEGATION has arrived from England blowing its own horn, more than content with its achievements. Let no one, however, be so unkind as to ask any member, publicly or privately, just what contribution or concrete proposal the American delegation advanced beyond Mr. Stimson's fortunately abortive suggestion that by way of disarmament the United States build one more battleship. It is plainly not his fault that we are actually to destroy two of our older vessels of this type. Mr. Stimson himself is coming in for severe criticism from members of the press for his mishandling of the American press representatives in London. Karl Bickel, head of the United Press, has taken the most unusual course of publicly protesting because during the entire conference the American delegates never gave a single "formal interview revealing to the American people any important news facts or affording them to any degree important interpretative background material," although they gave a number of radio talks to the entire country—talks which could not appear in the press for from twelve to thirty-six hours thereafter. Frank Simonds, too, declares that Mr. Stimson held to "a policy of complete and uncompromising silence," and "refused all access to himself in press conferences such as MacDonald gave occasionally and Grandi, Tardieu, and Briand frequently."

BUT THE WORST PERFORMER among our American officials of the London conference is Rear Admiral William A. Moffett, chief of the navy bureau of aeronautics. Having come from the gathering which, so President Hoover, the Admiral's Commander-in-Chief, has informed us, "has been able finally to turn the tide of constantly increasing naval arms and to end the poison of suspicion and ill-will generated by constant rivalry in construction," the Admiral backed up his chief by demanding

> . . . parity in merchant marine. A merchant marine is a large part of sea power. A navy is only part of it. As long as we have a merchant marine inferior to any other nation we will not have parity in sea power. We can gain it by building merchant ships precisely as we build cruisers.

Nothing could, of course, be more calculated to increase "the poison of suspicion and ill-will" than for us to embark upon such a policy—especially in advance of an economic need for any such vessels. As to naval parity, the Admiral had the effrontery to assert that our people, with no previous thought of naval parity, "have recently demanded it, and there is every indication that we will have it by 1936. It is necessary in order to retain our self-respect"! Could anything more completely justify our statement of last week that the conference has probably done nothing really to chasten the naval mind?

HERBERT HOOVER, ECONOMIST, certainly plays the part powerful poorly by comparison with Calvin Coolidge. The latter consistently gloried in the title of penny-pincher, and the public service often suffered grievously in consequence. But President Hoover preaches alternately the gospel of salvation from depression by spending and salvation from deficit by saving. First we were treated to a public-buildings program that was to give every unemployed man a job by spending $175,000,000 additional over a period of ten years. Then on February 24 Congress was solemnly warned not to pass bills (which it had not the slightest intention of passing) which would involve expenditures of $1,735,000,000 in excess of the budget. Next day Congress expressed its opinion of the President, who in reply assured Congress that he referred, not to Congress, but to the extravagant folks back home. On April 4 he signed (with two pens) a measure appropriating "the largest amount for road-building ever sanctioned in a single measure," and on the same day forecast a deficit for 1931 and called for the "most rigid economy and deferment of otherwise justifiable expenditures." On April 22 he again scolded Congress for 125 bills that it has not passed but that would increase his deficit by $350,000,000 if it did pass them, and in the same breath expressed approval of supplemental public-buildings appropriations for 1931 totaling more than $28,000,000. There is certainly nothing like having an economist for President—except having a juggler.

THE WILY AND INDEFATIGABLE M. Briand, if a recent Paris dispatch to the New York World is to be believed, found time during the naval conference at London to push forward the United States of Europe project. One of the objects of M. Briand's diplomacy at London, according to this authority, was to force Ramsay MacDonald to admit, in the presence of the American delegation, that Great Britain was after all one of the European Powers, that it had, like France, rather definite and important obligations to the League of Nations, and that it was not, because it could not be, an independent umpire in European differences—a job open to the United States. Meantime, presumably in the long intervals in which there was nothing else to do, M. Briand and his associates worked out a questionnaire which will shortly be sent to some twenty-six European states, asking them what they are prepared to do in the way of lowering tariff duties, furthering the cartel movement for the grouping and control of industries and natural resources, and so on. Of course there is nothing in this, not a single thing, antagonistic to America. But if the astute French diplomatist does not give his proposed U. S. E. a twist that will make American business penetration of Europe much more difficult, he will be a bigger altruist than his warmest friends have ever asserted that he was.

ALL TANGLED UP and nowhere to go was the happy state of the Senate recently after a two-days' bout with the national-origins provision of the pending immigration bill. On Tuesday, April 22, it voted to repeal the national-origins clause, thereby automatically reestablishing the quota basis, but an unamended part of the bill was also changed so as to cut the quota basis from 2 per cent to 1 per cent. It was also proposed to reduce the total annual immigration from about 150,000 to 80,000. The supporters of the national-origins clause, who see in it a greater obstacle to immigration than the quota basis presents, thereupon rallied their forces and on Thursday, by a margin of a single vote, the Senate voted to send the bill back to the Committee on Immigration, thereby putting itself on record as opposed, at least until it has another thought, to doing away with the national-origins stipulation. As the matter stood at that stage the bill appeared to provide for both systems, with the promise, according to immigration officials, of chaos in administration. The national-origins provision is tolerably acceptable to old countries which for years have furnished large numbers of immigrants, and highly objectionable to new countries some of which have not been many years in existence. As the bill that was recommitted is especially obnoxious to Latin America and has hanging over it the intimation of a veto, the committee may decide to put it in cold storage until December.

PUBLIC UTILITY REGULATION is to be the issue in New York State if Governor Roosevelt has his way. The Republican majority in the legislature passed a whole flock of little bills tinkering the Public Service Commission Act in minor particulars, but rejected out of hand the recommendations of the minority of the Knight Commission, put forward with the Governor's tacit approval, proposing a really serious scheme of rate control. This minority would set aside by legislative declaration the slippery concept of "reasonable return on a fair value of the property." Providing for an initial valuation of property now in use, which once accepted is to be final, it would have further additions to the property valued at actual cost. The rate of return, to be determined by the commission, is likewise to remain fixed. Utility investors will then know what they may expect to get and consumers what they must pay, and utility properties will cease to be the happy hunting grounds of financial pirates. As John Bauer demonstrated in his notable book, "Effective Regulation of Public Utilities," regulation, if it is ever to be effective, must take some such form as this. The companies promptly smashed the minority proposals and at the same time accepted innocuous amendments to the existing ineffective law, thus affording additional evidence in support of the growing conviction that effective regulation is impossible. We sincerely hope that Governor Roosevelt will push his campaign for the minority utility program with all vigor.

EVERYTHING that comes out of Columbus makes worse the calamity at the Ohio State Prison. No one asserts now that the fire which killed 320 convicts was started by them. The city firemen have testified that every life lost could have been saved if there had been prompt efforts to release the prisoners. There have been vigorous convict protests against the regime of the warden, who is charged with brutality, with the result that he called in the National Guard on April 28 and put fifty prisoners into punishment cells. As we go to press news dispatches state that after guards had fired on unruly prisoners in their cells, State troops were called out to quell the riot. Warden Thomas has put the blame on the Ohio Legislature for its refusal to heed his demands for additional and adequate accommodations, and there can be no doubt that his censure is merited. It is the State of Ohio which is arraigned at the bar, and the only question is whether its public conscience will demand action or whether the Executive and the legislature will wait until the storm blows over and then do nothing. Meanwhile, in Dannemora, leaders of the last riot have been for nine months in solitary confinement with no work to do, and the warden of the New Jersey State Prison at Trenton declares that "no power in God's heaven can prevent rioting under conditions we are facing at the prison." There are 1,658 prisoners there confined in 1,115 cells. There are 700 idle men occupying cells twenty-two hours out of the twenty-four, and the warden declares that "nobody knows when the lid will blow off."

LORD IRWIN has revived press censorship in India. It is true that the native nationalist press is very sensational and provocative, but it has been so for a long time, and the fact that the Viceroy feels that he must employ the weapon of suppression indicates the seriousness of the present situation. The report of comparative quiet on the Afghan frontier, where twenty Indians were recently killed in a riot, may be as much the result of censorship of foreign dispatches as of any actual calm. Meanwhile, the sparks of revolt grow thicker and more widespread. Each day brings news of more deaths, more arrests, and more ominous fervor, particularly on the part of Gandhi's immediate followers. At Karachi, as a British war plane circled overhead, a pile of foreign cloth fifteen feet high went up in flame and smoke while women chanted hymns of sedition. V. I. Patel has resigned his post as Speaker of the Indian Legislative Assembly and it is reported that government has practically ceased in the Gujarat district where Gandhi's campaign was inaugurated. Now Gandhi, in a statement which seems hardly consistent with his program of non-violence, threatens to capture a government salt depot, a move which the government could hardly ignore. Latest and most significant news declares that a mutiny has occurred in at least one of the native regiments.

EFFICIENCY and conservatism have marked the first month of the Bruening Cabinet in Germany. The ministerial declaration, read to the Reichstag on April 1, was a clear intimation that unless the wrangling and dilatoriness that had characterized the regime of Chancellor Mueller were promptly replaced by attention to government business, the Reichstag would be dissolved and a new election ordered. The accomplishments since then have been remarkable. Only about two weeks were needed to force through the Reichstag the Government bills imposing new taxes and laying new import duties on food—a record speed in German parliamentary history. Incidentally, Chancellor Bruening has abandoned the secrecy which the Mueller Cabinet affected, and has carried issues of policy directly before the Reichstag and fought them out on the floor in open debate. It is significant that the Hugenberg Nationalists have felt compelled to excuse and defend the thirty-one members who supported the Government on the food duties. The swing toward the Right, on the other hand, is evident not only in the decision of the Government to go ahead with a second cruiser of the Ersatz Preussen type, but also in the virtual dropping of the quarrel with Thuringia over Fascist control of the Thuringian state police. The Left parties, of course, are unhappy, but the Socialist opposition has been a good deal discounted by the apparent disposition of the Nationalists to give the new Government a chance.

A TRANSCONTINENTAL railroad 1,700 miles long, built from Siberia to Turkestan in four years and finished three months ahead of time—this is the latest feat of the Bolsheviks. It ought to give pause to those who portray the Soviet leaders as mere wild visionaries, for it dramatically illustrates the creative powers of the men in charge of the Soviet government, their grim determination to drive through with their tasks, and the speed with which they are modernizing Russia. Had such a railroad been undertaken by the Czar it would certainly have been financed by French money, would have taken a dozen years to finish, and would have reeked of graft and corruption. More interesting still is the fact that this railroad has been put into operation ahead of time by "Bill" Shatov, a former Chicago hobo, I. W. W., and Communist, who worked at a dozen different trades in this country and saw the inside of numerous American prisons. Yet he has successfully commanded an army of 500,000 laborers and 200,000 camels. The road, whose entire equipment from rails to engines has been made in Russia, parallels the Chinese border for 700 miles, unites Siberia with Turkestan, and meets the trans-Siberian at Novosibirsk. As a whole it staggers the imagination.

ANOTHER AMERICAN INVASION of Europe! This time it is the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Arturo Toscanini. We have no doubt that the orchestra will win golden laurels and will be acclaimed with that generous appreciation which forgets national boundaries. Undoubtedly Europe will be amused that there are only two purely Anglo-Saxon names on the roster of the orchestra, but at least 58 per cent are American citizens and the balance have taken out their first papers. They represent well what private American generosity can do and is doing for the fine arts. Incidentally, it is interesting to note the remarkable experience that the orchestra had at a reception given to the players by Mrs. Vincent Astor just before they sailed. She employed a jazz orchestra to entertain them and it is reliably reported that some of the orchestra heard this strange music for the first time and that Toscanini himself looked at the jazz performers with puzzled curiosity and said: "What is it they are trying to do?" He was deeply impressed when told that one of these performers may earn as much in a night as some of his Philharmonic musicians do in a week.

SCHOLARSHIP SUFFERS a severe loss in the death of Horace H. Furness, Jr., editor, as was his father before him, of the Variorum Shakespeare. Dr. Furness began his career as an instructor in physics, shortly after his graduation from Harvard in 1888. Although his father, with his mother's constant help, was occupied year in and year out with the great dramatist, the son for more than ten years resisted that powerful influence. But in the end he succumbed. In 1901 he gave up his teaching and became coeditor of the series. The first play he edited was the revised edition of "Macbeth"; subsequently he issued "Richard III," "Julius Caesar," and "King John." Nineteen plays, including two volumes on "Hamlet," have now been issued in this careful, exhaustive, and definitive manner. And what a tribute to a poet and dramatist that for more than fifty years a family of scholars could be busy on half of his work, not forming opinions in a windy way about what he meant when he wrote a certain passage, but collating all the multifarious things that had been written about him since his plays first appeared in print.

Law the Servant of Life

THE strong opposition to the appointment of Mr. (now Chief Justice) Hughes and Judge Parker to the Supreme Court of the United States is highly encouraging. It indicates at once the profound respect that the people have for their highest court and the growing understanding of what it is that this great tribunal actually does. Spokesmen for the property-owning groups that profit by recent decisions of the court have tried to instil in the popular mind a bogus reverence for that body, picturing its members as a race of legal demi-gods that move through an atmosphere of rarefied abstract justice to decisions that are therefore immune from criticism. The present revolt is a measure of the failure of such special pleading. What the American people respect, and respect profoundly, is not this fiction, but the reality of the court—a group of honest and wise old men learned in the law, applying their collective knowledge and wisdom to the settlement of the controversies that arise in a complicated modern industrial state, at the same time that they maintain the continuity of legal development. Whatever the weaknesses of our government machine, our Supreme Court has served us magnificently. The current opposition to President Hoover's nominations is a tribute to that service.

No opponent of the appointment of Mr. Hughes questioned for a moment his eminence as a lawyer, his integrity as a man, or his experience as a public servant. The objection to Judge Parker has not been based primarily on legal grounds, though there is frank and outspoken doubt that he possesses either the intellectual distinction or the legal learning necessary to a great judge. Essentially his critics maintain that on two great questions of social policy, the Negro question and the labor question, he has taken a stupid and reactionary position, and that he cannot be trusted, therefore, to perform intelligently the exacting duties of a justice of the Supreme Court. Similarly, Mr. Hughes was opposed for his narrowly legalistic defense, during all his recent years, of the giant property interests that rule us today and threaten to ruin us tomorrow. The opposition is thus, to a certain extent, a protest against an undue conservatism on the part of the court, and we trust that President Hoover will heed the warning against a further packing of that tribunal with hard-shell economic and social conservatives.

But the real question goes much deeper than that. Since Woodrow Wilson left the White House there have been seven nominations to the Supreme Bench, including Judge Parker. Of these, Justice Stone, no radical in economic theory, is yet a profound student of social life, who may be trusted to weigh wisely and comprehendingly the varied economic, political, and legal considerations that actually enter into the determination of the important questions faced by the court, and to go skilfully through the necessary legal motions of making the decisions and rendering the accompanying opinions. He is of the stuff of which great Supreme Court justices are made. Of the other six selections of the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover era it is scarcely too much to say that not one of them has displayed any real understanding of what he is actually doing. We do not say this because we disagree so commonly with the economic and social theories and prejudices of these judges. Those theories and prejudices in themselves are relatively unimportant; what is enormously important is that they be not unconsciously and in good faith written into the law, for the political consequences of such action may be grave in the extreme.

The Supreme Court in fact, as opposed to theory, is constantly deciding economic and political questions of the highest moment and is deciding them, to put the thing flatly and extremely, just as other men decide them, on the basis of the best judgment it can form of all the probable consequences involved. It uses so-called legal principles as tools in helping it decide these questions, but the principles do not automatically decide the questions, as some uninformed persons would have us believe. May a State restrict hours in mines to eight per day? The court thinks such a restriction good and justifies it on the ground of the State's police power. May a State restrict hours in bakeshops to ten per day? The court thinks such a restriction bad, and invalidates it on the ground that it interferes with freedom of contract. There is absolutely nothing in the legal principles of police power and freedom of contract that required the cases to be decided as they were. The decisions might equally well have been the opposite, and then the court would simply have reversed its choice of principles in support of its decisions. Take the long list of tax cases, trust cases, railroad and utility valuation and rate cases, labor cases, cases on social protective legislation, cases on the civil rights of Negroes, aliens, Communists, pacifists, what you will. In each case the court is deciding a controversy in such a way as to bring, if possible, a reasonable equilibrium of clashing forces, and thus to keep peace and order. As Justice Holmes has repeatedly pointed out, such matters are not to be settled by any debate over abstract legal principles; for they are questions of public policy, on which the court finds guidance, indeed, in the acts of legislatures and other indications of public opinion, but which are not in themselves legal questions. It is to questions like these that the Supreme Court gives the final answer, and its supreme task is to give an answer that fundamentally represents the will of the people, the actual distribution of power in the state.

In performing this function the Supreme Court must also insure the continuity and development of the law, and the great judge is he who does his appointed task in full understanding of all his responsibilities and powers. He must possess not only sound legal learning, but also intelligence, understanding, broad sympathy with all classes of men, social awareness. It is the possession of these qualities, not the holding of radical theories, that makes of Justice Holmes the great judge he is; in fact he does not hold radical theories. We do not ask for radical judges; we do not need them. We do ask for understanding judges; we need them sorely for the salvation of the court itself and the continued performance of its all-important function in our constitutional scheme. May Mr. Hoover in his further appointments seek out judges who understand that law is the servant of life; that the court is the servant of all the people.

Political Discount Rates

MR. PAUL M. WARBURG is one of our leading bankers; he is one of the fathers of the Federal Reserve Act, and he served for four years as a member of the Federal Reserve Board. For these reasons alone the recommendations in his new work on the Federal Reserve system* would deserve serious consideration. The most important of these recommendations is that the Secretary of the Treasury should cease to be a member ex officio of the Federal Reserve Board, much less its chairman. With great moderation of statement Mr. Warburg offers the a priori reasons which make such a change desirable. Dominant political parties, he points out, have always been known to pray and work for "good times" and "prosperity" during the period in which they are in power. The Federal Reserve system, on the other hand, must be willing to check a wave of unhealthy overspeculation threatening to disturb the stability of prices and credit and bound ultimately to inflict severe losses upon the country. The success or failure of the system lies in a timely grasp and in a fearless handling of such dangerous conditions. Yet it is impossible to hope that a party administration would be found willing to undertake the painful and ungrateful task of temporarily checking "prosperity"—even though it were only a sham prosperity—for the purpose of preventing a grave disaster threatening to occur in the future. The reserve board, therefore, should above all be politically independent.

Yet the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury is chairman of the reserve board gives him, in addition to the prestige to which his office entitles him, a dominant position in discussions of the board's affairs, and as the prestige and importance of his office increase, that of the governor loses in importance, not only in the estimation of the public, but also in that of his colleagues and the officers and directors of the reserve banks. Further, the President's power to reappoint or dismiss members of the board, and to make or unmake its governors and vice-governors, is one in the exercise of which he is, naturally, largely guided by his Secretary of the Treasury, and this makes it doubly difficult for board members to maintain their independence in the face of the Administration's wishes. The influence of the Secretary of the Treasury is still further enhanced by the ex officio membership of the Comptroller of the Currency, who administers his own department as an appointee of the Treasury and under its control.

As a result political leaders have come to consider the reserve system as, in Mr. Warburg's words, "an instrumentality of the government":

> From the beginning, achievements of the reserve system in operation have been hailed as accomplishments of the party in power, or of a secretary of the treasury. Some administrations have even gone so far as to claim credit for the lowering of discount rates, and secretaries of the treasury have spoken as if the policy of the board were a concern of the President's Cabinet.

Mr. Warburg points out that as one of the consequences of this condition it has become difficult to secure men of the highest type to serve on the board. Among the changes he suggests are that the Undersecretary of the Treasury, instead of the Secretary, serve as ex officio member of the board; that the Comptroller of the Currency be either removed entirely from the board or that his office, in so far as it deals with the affairs of the member banks, be put under the control of the reserve board; and that the board itself appoint its governor and vice-governor, preferably by a system of rotation which would allow every appointive member to serve during the last two years of his term. Another suggestion is that the reserve banks be given the power to delegate four men to the reserve board, each of these to be elected by the combined directorates of a group of three reserve banks.

As if to point the need for these or similar changes comes the Federal Reserve Board's latest annual report. It makes official admission of what had already been commonly known—that in the early part of 1929 the board "did not approve the discount-rate advances voted by some of the Federal Reserve banks." Put bluntly, this means that the board, dominated by political timidity, refused to allow the best banking opinion of several districts to apply the one remedy that could possibly check one of the most flagrant orgies of stock speculation in our history. Conservative banking opinion recognizes that again and again rediscount rates have been kept artificially low, to encourage, or at least not to discourage, a rising stock market. It is time that the Federal Reserve Board was thought of as something more than a convenient instrument to help win the fall elections.

Labor in Travail

HAVING himself cut loose from the Independent Labor Party a short time ago, Ramsay MacDonald now finds the party trying to cut loose from him. At the Birmingham congress of the party, on April 22, the "rebels," as they are called, drew their garments about them and announced that they could have nothing to do with the financial policy of the Government. There was nothing surprising in this, for the revolt had been for some time foreshadowed. The unemployment bill and other Government measures have repeatedly been opposed by Independent members of the House of Commons, and on April 15, four days before the Birmingham congress met, the leader of the party, James Maxton, arraigned the Snowden budget as something which would have been quite respectable if the Tories or Liberals had produced it, but which as a Labor Party document was a "flat betrayal" of Socialist principles.

Whether this open defection involves any immediate danger to the MacDonald Government is not clear. Nearly 200 of the 289 Labor members of the House are claimed by the Independents, but only 37 candidacies were directly supported financially by the party in the last election, and the Maxton group in the House numbers only 30. As the Lloyd George Liberals are preparing to support the Government on the budget, the loss of thirty Independent votes should be more than made good from the fifty-nine Liberals in the House even though some of the Liberals remain in opposition. Moreover, the Maxton following is not entirely dependable, as appeared when only eight of the number voted against the recent appropriations for the army and navy notwithstanding the instructions of the party.

* "The Federal Reserve System." By Paul M. Warburg. The Macmillan Company. 2 vols. $12.

Nevertheless, the congress sharpened a line of cleavage which Mr. MacDonald cannot safely ignore. The temper of the congress was aggressively radical—more radical, in fact, than that of Mr. Maxton, who is a good deal of a fire-eater. The Government was attacked for not living up to the slogan "Socialism in Our Time," and for aiding capitalism by inviting bankers and corporations to assist in reorganizing industry. Mr. Maxton and his supporters want socialism here and now, not in some indefinite future, and they believe that it can be had without bloodshed. Insurance and pension benefits four times greater than are now available, heavier taxes on large incomes and confiscatory death duties on certain large estates, and government operation of the Bank of England are among their radical proposals.

Such a program is hardly likely to make much headway in the Commons or in the country, but it points to a fundamental weakness in Mr. MacDonald's position. Mr. MacDonald is very much more of a Socialist in theory than he has shown himself to be in practice. A Socialist England may still be his ultimate aim, but he is willing to wait a long time for it. The ease with which the Liberals have made a working peace with the Labor Government suggests that labor is not regarded as offering a serious menace to capitalism. If the Government should meet defeat on the budget it will not be, we may be sure, because the budget does not go far enough in extracting money from the rich or near rich, but because its burdens are greater than the Liberals, who must vote for it if it is adopted, will stand.

Mr. MacDonald's position on the eve of the budget debate is one of mingled weakness and strength. He will profit a little from the dissensions in the Independent Labor Party, and from the inability of that party to go much farther in the direction of radicalism without identifying itself, in public opinion, with communism and revolution. The fact that the naval conference did not actually go to pieces, that a British guaranty of French security has been avoided, and that the financial burden of naval armament for the next few years will not be any greater and may be somewhat less, is all to the good as far as the MacDonald Government is concerned. The recent commercial agreement with Russia will please some of the Labor Party supporters and some sections of the British public, and the negotiations with Egypt may turn out happily. None of these props, however, will bear much strain. The uprising in India is a heavy and sorrowful load for the Government to carry, especially with a pacifist Prime Minister who knows that India can be kept down only by using force. The naval treaty at its best offers only poor pickings for an optimist, and the so-called safeguarding provision opens the way to sending to the scrap-heap at any moment the whole arrangement of parity, reduction, limitation, and the like if Italy or France raises the cry that its security is threatened and starts building. One would indeed be venturesome who asserted that the recent unemployment legislation will banish the unemployment nightmare or that the coal bill carries an assured solution of the problems of mine workers or mine owners. It is an uneasy situation, and one that will test Mr. MacDonald's leadership more severely than it has been tested hitherto.

Poetry and Laurel

WE do not envy the man or men whose duty it will shortly be to name the successor of Robert Bridges as poet laureate of England. If the office is taken at all seriously, as perhaps it should not be, the difficulty of filling it should be taken seriously, too. For the incumbent needs to be something else besides a good poet; he needs to be an equivalent of what in the old days before Elizabeth was called a court poet—a poet attached to the royal household and suitable in every way to its temper. Now that the English court is less important than it used to be, he should be at least a poet understandable by the people upon whose sentiments the sun never sets. He should be, shall we say, an empire poet—or at any rate some very good sort of Englishman whose behavior in his books, not to speak of his life, will cause no discomfort in the high places of the national heart.

But good poets are likely not to be conforming men, though of course they may be. Poetry and laurel do not always mix, especially when by some mischance a branch has been broken from that kind of laurel whose leaves give off a bitter odor when bruised, and exude a deadly poison. One horn of the dilemma is a brilliant poet whose ideas would be offensive to respectable persons; the other horn is a respectable poet whose work would be called contemptible by the knowing few. How to choose, or rather how to avoid the necessity of such a choice? Wordsworth and Tennyson were both good poets and blameless men at the time of their appointment. Is England so lucky now?

At least there are plausible candidates. The suggestion will probably not be made, as it was made after the deaths of Thomas Warton, Wordsworth, and Tennyson, to abolish the office as a compliment to the laureate late deceased. Robert Bridges was not that great; and besides there are worthy men in sight. Ruling out T. S. Eliot, who is in all likelihood the best poet living in England today but who is an American, and passing over Robert Graves, who is an especially gifted Englishman but who would certainly prove embarrassing through his indifference to decorum, there is first of all Mr. Kipling. There may be reasonable doubts of his importance to poetry, yet he has an importance of a kind, and he has the advantage of being universally known. There is the practical advantage also of his being patriotic—this in spite of certain indiscretions which are said to have prevented him from appointment after Alfred Austin's death, and which he may have managed to live down. Certainly he would be preferable to Sir Henry Newbolt, another patriotic poet who has been suggested.

There is A. E. Housman, of course, who perfectly fills the narrow niche of elegy. There is Alfred Noyes, who in his youth was promising and who of late years has been talking like a laureate in his lectures and his essays. And there is John Masefield. It would not surprise us to see Mr. Masefield crowned, for although he has passed his prime he has passed it with honor, and his sentiments are unexceptionable. But we shall make no predictions. We shall only rest in the assurance that the laureateship need not sink this time to the level to which it sank with Nahum Tate, William Whitehead, H. J. Pye, and Alfred Austin.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

A LABOR controversy of great interest is simmering at the moment and yet you will find it but meagerly reported in the columns of the newspapers. Mention is slight because this dispute happens to concern the publishers and the printers. Journalism has not yet quite grown up to the realization of the fact that even things which happen within the shop deserve to be classified as news and treated as such. The controversy has elements not usual in the clashes between capital and labor. For instance, this time it is the employers who are offering an advance in wages while the workers, refusing that, are endeavoring to gain something a little different. The fight centers around the demand for the five-day week. This would include the provision for the six-day wage scale to be paid for the shorter period, so in a sense it does represent a request for higher pay. It is quite true that the new arrangement would add something like 15 per cent to the costs which the publishers would have to shoulder.

There need be no question that the typographical union is in earnest. Among the oldest of the organized trades, it has become within the last twenty years one of the most conservative. Indeed, it would not be unjust to say that the printers have been a trifle timid. At one time this body numbered in its ranks the intellectuals of the labor movement and it contributed many of the aggressive leaders of trade unionism. Of late years it has lost prestige. Somehow or other the practice of setting up fine, whacking stand-pat editorials had a subtle effect upon the compositors themselves. The ink of let-well-enough-alone seeped into the pores and finger tips of employees.

But things are no longer well enough in the printing trades. I am not in a position to predict whether the members of the union will vote for a strike if and when they receive permission from their international officials to take such action. I think that such a contingency is likely. In that event New York, and possibly Chicago, Boston, and Philadelphia, will be reduced to the necessity of getting along with small-sized leaflets representing the enforced cooperative effort of all the publishers in each city. If the issue is not drawn now it must be soon, because the printers are increasingly being forced into a position where they must fight for existence. What was one of the strongest unions in the country now finds a vast number of its members out of work. They are the victims of efficiency. Did you ever stop to think what became of the printers as a result of the merger movement among American newspapers?

Nor is the end of this policy of large-scale production in sight. When two papers merge, the combined mechanical staff can be cut almost 50 per cent. In every shop today hundreds of subs are hanging about eager to pick up part-time employment. Moreover, one or two labor-saving devices are close to practicability which would still further cut down the jobs open to typographers. Accordingly, the union must face the necessity of creating more jobs. Already it has tried to do that by urging its members to avail themselves freely of the privilege of taking a night off in order to make work for the men upon the fringe. But such voluntary effort cannot take up the slack. It is well to remember that if the five-day week is put into effect it will not merely be a proposition of the printer's working on the sixth day and collecting overtime. Even now the practice of working seven days for the sake of the extra stipend is rigorously forbidden and you can depend upon it that the five-day week will mean just that. The extra day will mean extra employment for men now working with great irregularity.

Some of the publishers are willing to admit that conditions justify the logic of the union. Many are willing to concede the possible utility of the five-day week, but the argument of the employers runs: This still remains an economic experiment. Why should it be made at our expense? The public has been informed through the medium of the official statement of the publishers that arbitration was offered and refused by the union. This is a somewhat misleading statement. Certain rights already won and certain organic laws of the typographers would come into the scope of such arbitration and the union is loath to expose privileges already gained to new decision. Nor is there any acute willingness to arbitrate the five-day week itself, which is the crux of the argument. It is well to remember that this demand is by no means brand-new. As far back as 1922 the demand was first introduced and again, somewhat more emphatically, in 1925.

Nor is the five-day week wholly within the experimental stage. The needle trades and the building industry have already ceded the principle and Henry Ford, whose shops are not organized, has also recognized its utility. In the long run I feel certain that the wide introduction of the five-day week would be a very vital tonic for the restoration of national prosperity. Newspapers are peculiarly sensitive to business conditions in general, and though the original cost of the new arrangement might be high the final and very speedy result would be increased profits for the counting-rooms.

Sooner or later, and much better sooner, industrial leaders must recognize the fact that our present unemployment situation is not going to get better over night. The original belief that the whole thing might be cleared up by a few cheerful words from Washington is no longer tenable. We have begun to deal with technological unemployment. Mergers and new inventions have done their work. They are useful only if the labor saved goes directly into a shortening of working time all along the line. As a matter of fact, newspaper publishers are not without opportunity to compromise. I have reason to believe that the printing trades might be induced to accept a three-year delay in the granting of the five-day week if only the promise is definitely made that it shall become effective at the end of that time. Also the union would probably accept some slight reduction in the wage scale if the five-day week were granted. Publishers should not think of themselves as the "goats" in the matter. It would be better to accept the opportunity to assume leadership and adopt a new standard of working time which is actually vital to the welfare of the country.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Washington Grinds On

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, April 26

DAY and night a dread specter haunts the White House, deepening the fears and forebodings which in recent months have transformed a naturally sunny and scientific nature into one pervaded by gloom and disillusionment. The specter is the memory of what happened to the Taft Administration. If there was a rift in the clouds when the Sage of Northampton announced himself as being definitely out of the picture, it was but momentary, because the present disposition in Presidential circles is to trust nobody, and especially to trust no professional politician—such as Calvin certainly will be until the inevitable day when God calls him home. Hoover realizes definitely, and at last, that he is "in bad" with the country. He has lost, to a very large extent, the confidence of the business community to which he always made a special appeal for support, and, what is more alarming, he has lost the confidence of local Republican leaders throughout the country. Among the latter the impression is spreading that the President is a poor judge of men, that he is unlearned in the elemental rules of the political game, and that he has no talent for avoiding embarrassing situations and no skill in disentangling himself from them. Among the former there is a growing suspicion that his reputation as an economist is largely founded on bluff and ballyhoo. I should not marvel if there were some truth in these conclusions, and I shall not be surprised if they come to be more widely held.

THE Muscle Shoals lobby, defeated in the Senate and discredited before the public, still has powerful friends in the House of Representatives, where men are sheep and representative government is a humorous phrase. There a neat conspiracy is in progress to smother the Norris resolution, recently adopted by the Senate, providing for public operation of that great public property. The well-packed Committee on Military Affairs has laid aside the Norris measure and designated a subcommittee to draft a substitute plan for leasing the plant to private interests. Since everyone knows there is not the faintest prospect of getting such a bill through the Senate, the purpose obviously is to delay a settlement until public indignation subsides sufficiently to permit the power and chemical interests to take another crack at the proposition. It will be interesting to observe the course taken by the Rules Committee, of which the Honorable Bertrand H. Snell, himself a power magnate, is chairman, when the question of permitting a vote comes before it. The one man who can upset this scheme of obstruction and delay is President Hoover. Failure to upset it will be adequate proof that he concurs in its object.

THE immensely diverting crusade of Senator Joseph R. Grundy to rescue his beloved Pennsylvania from boss rule and corruption soon will have issue in the form of a Senate investigation of campaign methods and expenditures in the Republican Senatorial primary there. To outsiders it may be explained that boss rule and corruption are represented, in the Grundy dramatization, by the Vare Gang and Secretary of Labor Davis, while purity and democracy are personified by "Holy Joe" himself and Secretary of the Treasury Mellon. Since the ironic gods have elected to have the investigating committee headed by Senator Nye, a "wild jackass" from the extremely "backward State" of North Dakota, the members will have no choice but to don gas-masks and dig in. Horrifying charges of venality and intimidation already have been exchanged between the hosts of "Holy Joe" and the hordes of "Puddler Jim"; investigators are ready to proceed to the scene; and presently the less important sections of the country will have an object lesson in political morals as held and practiced in enlightened Pennsylvania. Incidentally, the committee possesses information of certain curious activities in Nebraska. Somebody out there has taken the unusual trouble of conducting a State-wide straw vote to determine who would make the strongest campaign against Senator Norris in the Republican primary. As readers of the Literary Digest know, such polls are expensive, and it is widely reported that $60,000 was made available to defray the cost of that in Nebraska. The Senate committee will want to know who paid for it. My guess is that the money came originally out of the pockets of consumers of electric power, and that it was relayed through the treasuries of interests desiring to eliminate the most effective opponent of their far-flung forays on the public water-power domain.

MISFORTUNE continues to pursue all the efforts of the Department of Justice to prosecute the radio trust. An "investigation" which had extended over uncounted years was nearing completion several months ago, when the department lawyers in charge of it suddenly resigned in a body. Under considerable prompting from the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce a new start was made, and the department was on the verge of filing suits, so it is said, when the trust unexpectedly announced an entirely new set-up, involving an exchange of stock and patents among the Radio Corporation and its parent companies, General Electric and Westinghouse, and now the poor department doesn't know where it stands. Of course, it might appear to a mere layman that the same persons and corporations are involved in the new arrangement as in the old. The fine Italian hand of Owen D. Young and the bolder strokes of Dave Sarnoff are quite as discernible as when the notorious "tube clause" was being rammed down the throats of the struggling independents. The performers have simply begun the next act without taking the pains to change their false whiskers. But to the great legal minds intrusted with enforcing the federal statutes against monopoly a wholly new situation has been presented—and one that calls for further delay.

HOWEVER, candor, coupled with a distinct sense of shame, compels me to report that the most cowardly and pusillanimous exhibition which Washington has witnessed lately was staged, not by an official body, but by an organization containing the leading members of a profession to which I have the sometimes doubtful honor of belonging. The American Society of Newspaper Editors, assembled in annual convention here, has just rejected, for the fourth or fifth time, a proposed amendment to its constitution enabling it to censure, suspend, or expel members for disgraceful conduct or gross violation of ethics. The members of this society are daily engaged in scrutinizing and judging the conduct of persons in every other occupation. They neither hesitate to denounce breaches of ethics by members of other professions nor to demand the infliction of penalties. Yet nine years after adopting a high-sounding code of their own they refuse to adopt the only measure by which that code could be enforced. "Disgraceful" was the adjective used by one member to characterize this refusal, and disgraceful it was, without a doubt. The unsuccessful fight for adoption of the amendment was led by Willis J. Abbot of the Christian Science Monitor, and the opposition was championed by the learned Caspar S. Yost of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, long celebrated in his home town as the foremost living sponsor of literary compositions received through the medium of the ouija board. I have read the transcript of the debate which preceded rejection of the amendment, giving particular attention to the speeches in opposition, and I recall no occasion when so many flabby, transparent, shoddy, and specious arguments were uttered in an equal space of time. There were two in chief. The first, and most nonsensical, was that the power to punish unethical conduct on the part of members was equivalent to the power of "censorship" over their newspapers. The second was that such disciplinary action might disrupt the society—although it is practiced by every country club in the United States. It is but fair to say that the proposal was defeated by a minority vote, two-thirds being necessary for adoption. Nevertheless, the humiliating fact remains that among fifty-two of the foremost newspaper editors of the country there were twenty-three who voted against it. Tom Wallace of the Louisville Times proverbially likened their attitude toward offending members to that of the shiftless farmer toward wild onions: "The only way to get rid of them is to die and leave them." And these are the gentlemen who cannot restrain their professional indignation over the quality of the ethics displayed by Senate investigating committees!

The Press Today

III. The United Press*

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

IN the history of the Associated Press the year 1929 will surely rank with 1914 as one of the darkest of all. For it was during this period that a dreadful blow descended. Incredible as it seems, the New York Herald Tribune and the Chicago Daily News subscribed to the news service of the United Press. If Mr. Hoover were to hoist the red flag on the White House some morning and Secretary Mellon were to denounce the right to hold private property, the Associated Press would surely not be more startled. The Herald Tribune blazoned forth its treachery in full-page advertisements. And the Chicago heresy must have been particularly distressing, for the Daily News was the organ of the late Victor F. Lawson, one of the men who took the lead in founding the Associated Press, of which he was for years the most powerful director.

What is this United Press that is fluttering the dovecotes of the Associated Press in such an agonizing way? It is a purely mercantile undertaking designed to make money, and it has been doing just that for the past twenty years. By its aggressiveness and enterprise it has built up a clientele of 1,250 papers—as large as that of the Associated Press—with this difference, that only 900 are in the United States while 350 are outside our boundaries. The United Press was founded originally to supply news only to evening papers. Ten years ago it enlarged its service to include morning papers, though the bulk of its clients are still evening newspapers. Within the past twelve months it has added no less than sixty-nine dailies to its list, some of them extremely important, such as the Philadelphia Record, the Houston Post-Dispatch, the Louisville Times, the Wheeling News, the Mobile Press, and the Springfield (Mo.) Press. With two such dailies as the New York Herald Tribune and the Chicago Daily News surrendering to the charms of its service, the United Press may well look forward to capturing many other Associated Press strongholds. Indeed, one may even ask whether the competition of the Associated Press and the United Press will not eventually be within the pages of all leading dailies, instead of, as at first, between two groups of dailies each taking one service only.

The United Press lacks every one of the cooperative features which distinguish its great rival, the A. P. It reports news for purposes of sale only. Its members have no more control over it than the subscribers to a circulating library have over its management. In either case, the subscribers can give up the service if it is not up to the standard desired; they have no other direct way of modifying its policies. Whether this is or is not an effective veto every journalist will judge for himself. The members of the United Press are never even called into its councils. Whereas the Associated Press is what its directors and members wish it to be the United Press is today what Robert Paine Scripps, Karl Bickel, Roy Howard, and their immediate associates say it shall be. Mr. Scripps is the controlling owner. In practice the management rests with Mr. Bickel, James H. Furay, Hugh Baillie, Robert J. Bender, James I. Miller, and the other United Press executives, all of them part owners. To them belongs the credit for its good features and to them the blame for its weaknesses. They say for what and how the $6,000,000 disbursed each year for the gathering and distribution of news shall be expended.

* This is the third in a series of articles on the American press. The fourth, on the chain daily, will appear in our issue of May 21.—EDITOR THE NATION.

They do not pretend that theirs is a public-spirited enterprise; on the contrary, they constantly declare that it is just another commercial, profit-seeking institution. They rarely speak of themselves as journalists, but usually as business men. With equal frankness they declare that the United Press has no policies of any kind and no desires save "to present to its clients throughout the world a world-wide service of news, objective and impartial, without prejudice of any kind, national, sectional, economic, social, or religious."

Theoretically, then, the organization of the Associated Press is, as I have already pointed out, far superior to that of the privately owned United Press. Yet the latter happens to be the more liberal agency for gathering news, happens to have much more sympathy for the under-dog, happens to be far less sensitive to the great capitalistic press influences which gather around the directors' table of the Associated Press. This is purely accidental, for it was only by chance that the United Press was founded by the late E. W. Scripps, who was opposed to a monopoly in news and faced American problems from the good, old-fashioned liberal point of view. Nor is there any guaranty in the form of its organization that twenty-five or fifty years from now, when the present managers and owners have passed from the scene, the United Press will not be an entirely different affair run with a totally different spirit.

For the steady progress of the United Press there are several explanations. In the first place, no one can question the unusual ability of Roy Howard and Karl Bickel. They have been fortunate in having the complete confidence and the unlimited financial backing of the Scripps family with their liberal point of view, which is also the actuating spirit of the twenty-five Scripps-Howard newspapers. They were untrammeled by conventions. The very fact that they were the dictators of the organization made it possible for them to go ahead rapidly without first having to consult the heads of a number of their member dailies. They could snap their fingers at any dissenter. In order to establish their service they had to avail themselves of every new device and to think up new ways of getting their news cheaply and quickly. Thus, they were first to utilize the facilities of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company for telegraphic news transmission. Mr. Bickel boasts that it was the United Press which first developed the use of the telephone for the transmission of a "pony" (i.e., small) news report; this made it possible to provide a larger service than by telegraph and for less money.

It was the United Press which first extensively used the printer-telegraph machine, operating extensive circuits without any operator attendant on a one-way basis—something that had been said to be impossible. It was quick to welcome the radio, in which it saw not a competitor, but a valuable ally, and it lays the unction to its soul that its use of a national hook-up on the occasion of the general election in 1924 brought about the final acceptance by its rivals of the radio as a necessary adjunct of any news service. Mr. Bickel himself attributes the remarkable expansion of its world service to the fact that it has not belonged to the so-called "official-agency" group, and that it has always been free from nationalistic bias. This may have been accidental; that is, if the Associated Press had not already been linked up with Reuter, Havas, and the other official or semi-official foreign agencies, the United Press might have been happy to make use of their services. But undoubtedly it was a blessing both for the United Press and for the general public that it had to be independent. There are only a couple of exceptions to this rule. It has a connection with the Nippon Dempo Tsushin Sha, the largest agency in Japan, and a slight one with the Australian Press Association. It covers Japan, however, with its own separate correspondents as well. There is a widely held belief that in South and Central America the United Press has done much to improve our relations with our southern neighbors and has gone out of its way to do so.

At home the United Press collects its news not from member newspapers, as does the Associated Press, but by means of correspondents appointed in various localities. Its officers, of course, believe that this is a better system; that it does not place them at the mercy of the news standards and facilities of their members. On the other hand, it places upon the United Press a very heavy responsibility in picking its representatives. Most of them are paid only for what they send in. In the South, for example, their representatives are just as much subject to local prejudices as are the representatives of the Associated Press. The United Press, however, can change its correspondents as rapidly as it pleases, and its officers are bound to realize that the quality and reliability of their service depend upon the care taken in the selection of their local representatives. In Haiti, by the way, the United Press also chose an American officer as its correspondent but mitigated the offense by using a Haitian too.

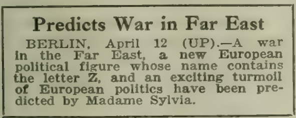
It would be ridiculous, of course, to assert that the United Press service has been all that it ought to be. It has suffered from growing pains, from the errors made in the building up of a new organization, and there have been big gaps in the territory it has tried to cover. One who was for years a trusted United Press representative abroad is of the opinion that its sense of values has not always been of the best, for the reason that it is an attacking organization, whereas the Associated Press has been intrenched in its position. He adds this in explanation:

> The A. P. can take aim before firing, but the U. P. must be quick on the trigger and must sometimes fire from the hip. I think this explains why the U. P. occasionally fires a whole broadside at a fleeting target and lays down a barrage on subjects not worth a pot shot. It is apt to be more interested in providing entertainment than instruction, in surprising rather than in being profound. I suspect that sometimes it chooses not to verify a good story too exactly, lest it [the story] should blow up and disappear.

It is interesting to note his belief that since it is the more commercially minded the U. P. feels more responsibility toward its client newspapers than toward the ultimate public. He adds that if he were a publisher he would prefer the U. P. service, but if he were a careful and thoughtful reader of newspapers he would prefer the Associated Press because its news, though sometimes slower, would probably be more thoughtfully prepared. These, he declares, are not unfriendly observations: "I got a great kick out of working for the U. P. I am enthusiastic about it, its people, and its purposes, and I think it is a most necessary and precious stimulant to the A. P." It seems as if the case could hardly be stated better.

I find, however, other criticisms from worth-while sources. One is that the United Press does not pay its correspondents enough.* This charge is emphatically denied by the United Press. The belief is probably due to the policy of the whole Scripps group of organizations of paying low salaries to those at the bottom and rewarding the executives and key men with stock as well as large salaries, which makes them interested in keeping expenses down and profits up. Otherwise they might be more interested in building for the future, for the day when they will be established beyond injury by competition and can set themselves primarily to making their news service as authoritative as that of their chief rival. It is an interesting fact that while the A. P. has been letting down its standards the U. P. is being compelled by the logic of events to move in the opposite direction. Evidence of the way the United Press has been drifting in the direction of the Associated Press is the fact that its executives have been for two years working on the question of broadening its contractual relations with its clientele to give "due recognition of the values that a client confers on the United Press locally as a result of long-time relationship." This means that although founded for the express purpose of preventing a monopoly in news, and as a protest against the Associated Press policy of permitting a member newspaper to prevent others in its immediate territory, under given conditions, from obtaining the Associated Press service, the United Press is now trying to find some way of protecting a client without at the same time violating its policy of "non-exclusivity"—to use its own awkward word.

In Washington the United Press at times seems weak. Sometimes inexperienced men are found in foreign positions of great importance—good men who have to learn their jobs at the cost of the service. Sometimes, as it would be easy to prove, these men "force" their stories because of their desire to get in the human-interest note. It certainly seems hardly worth while to thrill the world with the following dispatch here printed entire:



Predicts War in Far East

BERLIN, April 12 (UP).—A war in the Far East, a new European political figure whose name contains the letter Z, and an exciting turmoil of European politics have been predicted by Madame Sylvia.

In its Washington service, also, there is too much hitting of the high spots, just as there is too much banality throughout its news reporting, though that is more excusable in a new service than in the Associated Press, which under Melville E. Stone denounced that sort of thing and at all times has boasted of its high standards, its superior virtues, and its shining rectitude.

Like the Associated Press the United Press has stooped to conquer. It was the pioneer in adding to its service such features as sports, women's-page matter, cartoons, comic strips, and "human-interest" stories. It gave, in fact, the poor example which the Associated Press followed in this field. It, too, has found it necessary to cater to that recent development in accordance with which the daily newspaper is getting away more and more from the original conception that it was solely a purveyor of news and opinion and is entering the amusement field in competition with the movie and the radio. Cross-word puzzles, children's corners, bedtime stories, advice to the lovelorn, news pictures, and sport pictures—these are all part of the effort to meet the new and threatening competition from outside the business and the never-halting demand for larger and larger circulation.

It was the ill fate of the United Press to perpetrate the greatest hoax in modern press reporting—the fake armistice announcement of November 7, 1918. The world literally went mad with joy when the premature news was flashed that hostilities had ended. In a sense the false report served a useful purpose in that it made officials everywhere realize how deeply the people desired a cessation of bloodshed. Naturally the Associated Press made full use of this bad break of its rival. A careful examination of the evidence in the case plainly proves that the United Press, in the person of Roy Howard himself, was the victim of an error of the naval attache of our Embassy in Paris who telegraphed to Admiral Henry B. Wilson at Brest as follows: "Armistice signed this morning at eleven. All hostilities ceased at 2 p. m. today." When Roy Howard called upon the Admiral on November 7 the latter casually showed him the telegram. Not unnaturally Howard made immediate use of it. It seemed as if the biggest news scoop in history had fallen into his hands by accident, for he was then at Brest not to obtain news but to take ship to the United States. Had the Paris dispatch been a truthful one, Howard's fame as a journalist would be supreme. As it was, there came down upon his head and upon the United Press an avalanche of abuse and denunciation enough almost to wreck them both. It took a long while for the United Press to work out from under the shadow of this victimization.

Since then Mr. Howard has gone on to the active headship of the Scripps-Howard newspaper syndicate, with Karl Bickel taking his place as head of the United Press. Both are still comparatively young men, respectively forty-seven and forty-eight years old. They have already made their mark upon the journalism of this country and of the world and they may continue to do so for years to come. As long as they are at the head of their respective organizations the United Press service will be the one to which reformers and all interested in liberal causes and better human relations will turn first in the belief that they will be received with sympathy and understanding. There are those who think that this liberal attitude is in part inspired by recognition of the fact that it is good business for the United Press to be liberal in contradistinction to the Associated Press. I prefer to believe that the main motive lies in their own convictions and their attitude toward the problems of mankind. Whatever their motives, the fact that the United Press under their leadership is what it is is of enormous importance to all who believe that the America of the future should be something different from the self-satisfied and socially and politically reactionary country in which we live today.

[Mr. Louis Wiley of the New York Times has telephoned to me since the appearance of my second article on the Associated Press that Mr. Adolph S. Ochs has no recollection of the incident, related by me in that article, according to which Mr. Ochs had contemplated placing his editorial page in charge of a national committee, negotiations breaking down because of his unwillingness to give assurances that the committee might feel free to criticize even the President of the United States. I can only say that the information came to me from a source as distinguished and trustworthy as the words of Mr. Wiley and Mr. Ochs. Mr. Wiley also assures me that Mr. Ochs does not approve of the lowering of the standards of the Associated Press in printing banal and vulgar human-interest stories and comic strips, and has always voted against it. This is valuable testimony that in his estimation the service has gone down, and I am the more happy to have it because it is entirely consistent with Mr. Ochs's admirable policy in keeping the Times free from that sort of thing, especially from comic strips and cheap Sunday supplements. As I have said before in writing, there is nothing in Mr. Ochs's remarkable journalistic achievements more praiseworthy than this.—O. G. V.]

France Wins at London

By ROBERT DELL

Paris, April 15

BRIAND returned from London last night, covered with flowers by the French semi-official press. The French have got what they wanted and prevented what they wished to prevent. As Paul-Boncour said in the Chamber some months ago, they accepted the invitation to the naval conference most unwillingly, because in the circumstances they could not do otherwise, and the French delegates went to London with the firm intention of preventing, if possible, any final agreement for the reduction or limitation of naval armaments. The French official view, openly stated again and again by the Temps, was that the conference should merely lay down principles for the guidance of the preparatory disarmament commission at Geneva. As the Temps said again only three days ago, the French viewed with uneasiness the possibility that the question of naval disarmament might be settled separately from those of land and air disarmament. One reason was that there is more room for bargaining when armies and navies are being discussed together. The other, frankly avowed by Paul-Boncour, that strange militarist excrescence on the French Socialist Party, was that in London they would be alone, whereas at Geneva they have behind them what Paul-Boncour called their "retinue" of allies.

The French have succeeded in their chief aim, thanks to the Italian demand for parity with France, which enabled the French delegation to refuse the smallest reduction in the French naval program. The French were just as much justified in refusing to consent to the Italian demand, which would mean Italian superiority in the Mediterranean, as were the Americans in refusing to grant Japan parity with the United States, and much more justified than was the British Labor Government in insisting on a two-power standard for the British fleet in European waters. That insistence, which shows how completely MacDonald and Alexander are under the thumb of the Admiralty, implies the crazy hypothesis that there is a danger of a Franco-Italian alliance against England.

Thus Tardieu and Briand come out of the conference with a perfectly free hand. France has not yielded a single ton of her naval program and need not slacken her naval building for a single week. Official France has had her way about submarines, and indeed on every point, and as a naval disarmament conference the conference is an utter failure, as official France wished it to be. The diplomatic victory of France, however, is due more to luck than to skill, for it is not the fault of France alone, nor even of France and Italy together, that the conference is a failure. It has been run on wrong lines from the very beginning. It has never been a naval disarmament conference, but a competition between the Powers represented at it to maintain respectively their present naval strength relatively to the other Powers, at the smallest possible cost. It is plain now that both the American and the British governments were actuated solely by financial considerations. The French delegation went to London in fear and trembling, expecting to be met by a sweeping program of naval reduction. When they found that Hoover and MacDonald, having summoned a conference, had no concrete proposals of any kind to put before it, their surprise was equaled only by their joy. Jacques Kayser, the young secretary of the French Radical Party, is quite right: the real cause of the failure of the conference has been a lack of sincerity on the part of all the governments represented.

Logically, it would seem, the failure of the conference should have greatly strengthened the position of the Tardieu Cabinet, for the policy of the French delegation at London was even more Tardieu's policy than that of Briand, who has made himself the prisoner of the nationalists. His conduct in London, which has won him the admiration even of "Pertinax," has justified what Léon Blum wrote in the Populaire when Briand joined the Tardieu Cabinet: "He cannot continue his policy without us. We can continue it without him." MacDonald's blunder in embarking on the abortive negotiations about "security" is another feather in the cap of Tardieu and Briand and the opponents of disarmament generally. As Léon Blum said the other day, the negotiations will be exploited in favor of the thesis that the present guaranties of security are insufficient to justify any reduction of armaments, and it will be said that the British government has implicitly admitted this. Here again Briand was taken by surprise. There can be no doubt that he went back to London with his demand for further guaranties of "security"—in other words, the revival of the Geneva Protocol—expecting that it would be at once refused and that the refusal would give him an excuse for declining any further discussion about the reduction of the French naval program. MacDonald's consent to negotiate about a formula defining the obligations of Great Britain under Article XVI of the League Covenant perhaps disconcerted Briand for a moment, for neither he nor Tardieu intended to make any concessions in return for such a formula, but Italy came to the rescue by insisting on parity. Then the French delegation declared that France must have

Nevertheless, the Tardieu Cabinet is in as unstable a position as ever for reasons of internal politics. Now that the Young Plan is ratified by France and the naval conference is over, the days of the Cabinet are numbered. Tardieu has no majority in the Chamber without the support of the Left Center and that support is dependent on his pursuing a policy more or less to the Left on questions of internal politics, by which he inevitably indisposes the bulk of his supporters, who belong to the Right and the Right Center. He has avoided a fall hitherto by abstaining from putting the question of confidence and accepting hostile votes even on matters of importance. Any day an accident may happen. A ministerial crisis would not, however, change the situation for the better. The only alternative to the present government is a so-called Government of Concentration, that is, a coalition of the Radicals with all the groups of the Right and Left Center, excluding the Right on the one hand and the Socialists on the other. Such a government would have a small majority on paper, but its existence would be as precarious as that of any other government with the present impossible Chamber. Moreover, it would compromise the Radicals, whose real interest it is to remain in opposition with the Socialists until the next general election, although they do not all recognize it. The only solution is a dissolution of the Chamber, for which the constitution provides with the consent of the Senate, but although many of the Radicals and Socialists are now in favor of it they do not yet carry their parties with them. Circumstances may, however, compel a resort to a dissolution before 1932, when the general election will be held in the ordinary course. All the reports from the provinces suggest that a general election now would result in a victory for the parties of the Left and the results of the recent by-elections point to the same conclusion, but there is an ancient prejudice against a dissolution, and the Radical and Socialist Parties as a whole cannot make up their minds to defy tradition and take the plunge.

There can be no change for the better in French policy so long as the present Chamber lasts. The London conference has made still worse the prospects of any real progress toward disarmament, bad as they were already. No conference at Geneva can have any better result as things are at present, and a window-dressing agreement like that of London will still further damage the reputation of the League of Nations, already badly compromised. It is a deplorable fact that faith in the League as a means of getting rid of war is steadily declining, especially among the young, but the high priests and apostles of the League do not seem to recognize it, still less to recognize their own responsibility for it. Perhaps it is hardly too much to say that nothing has done more harm to the League of Nations than the League of Nations unions with their dogma of Geneva's infallibility, their denunciation of all criticism of the League as due to ignorance or prejudice, and their fondness for the policy of evading problems by window-dressing solutions, which has been and is the curse of Geneva. Some of the energetic propagandists in the League secretariat have also much to answer for. Far better to admit frankly that one cannot solve a problem in existing conditions than to try to deceive the world with a fake solution. It is useless to go on with disarmament discussions in present conditions, and the meeting of the preparatory disarmament commission at Geneva ought to be adjourned sine die. Nothing can be done until there is a fundamental change in French policy, and such a change can be possible only after a French general election that has resulted in the formation of a government of the Left in which the Socialists predominate. That is to say, barring a dissolution, there is no chance of it before 1932. The chance of it then depends to a very great extent on the policy of the British government. Official France, as it is at present, is hopeless, but the French people are not at all hopeless. They need to be enlightened and to be given a lead. The business of English Laborites and Liberals is to give a lead to the elements in France that sincerely desire peace and disarmament, instead of trying to satisfy the demands of the French nationalists for more "security," which means nothing else than security for the peace treaties. Léon Blum has told them that no guaranties of security for France will satisfy official France and the French general staff, because, of course, it is not guaranties for France that they are after. They know that France is secure enough already. What they want is to stereotype all the existing territorial arrangements in Europe and to induce England—and Germany—to guarantee unjust and impossible frontiers. But the British Labor Government and most of the leading men in the British Labor Party pay no attention to Léon Blum, although he may quite possibly be prime minister of France in a couple of years. It is really deplorable to see men whom we all respect and admire, such as Norman Angell and Brailsford, actually, with the best intentions, playing into the hands of the nationalists and opponents of disarmament in France by pandering to their demand for "security."

What Europe needs is a strong and bold leader—somebody with the courage to throw a very big stone into the stagnant pool of Geneva and make a very big splash. I am afraid that the present British Labor Government have not that courage, although they could be sure of the support of the Liberals if they gave a bold lead. It is time to say publicly in the Assembly of the League of Nations that England can join in no further guaranties of the status quo unless and until all alliances have been abolished and effective arrangements have been made for the peaceful revision of the peace treaties where they are unjust or absurd or both. The Polish frontiers, for example, ought not to be secure and the Poles ought to know that they are insecure. If these and other impossible frontiers are not altered by peaceful means, they will sooner or later be altered by force, protocol or no protocol. If the French system of alliances continues, a rival system will be set up against it sooner or later and the continent of Europe will again be divided into two hostile camps. Briand himself said in the Senate last month that "the conception of the old alliances" inevitably leads to hostile groups of Powers. And France is the foremost advocate and supporter of that conception! As regards disarmament there is only one honest and safe course—that the victorious Powers should accept the conditions that they imposed on Germany and the other conquered Powers. The day when a British prime minister declares to the world that England recognizes that moral obligation and proposes disarmament on that basis, there will be a response in France that will astonish him.

War on the Chain Store

By HARRY W. SCHACTER

A NEW battle on evolution is raging in the South. This time, however, the issue is not religious but economic; it has to do with the theory of the economics of distribution. The battle, which is being waged on many fronts, is between the small retailer, taking the fundamentalist position, against the chain store, an exponent of modernism in distribution. Within the past few months the immediate fight has been crystallized by one crusader, W. K. Henderson of Shreveport, Louisiana, who has sallied forth through his radio station KWKH to give battle to the chain-store devil and to the "evil hosts in Wall Street." The thing, however, has been a long time in coming and can be traced back to the vast economic revolution that began in this country ten or fifteen years ago. Let me trace it briefly.

Shortly before the war the term "mass production" began to be heard, mostly in connection with the name of Henry Ford. Then came the war, with its vast need for goods coupled with a shortage of man power to produce those goods. By the time the war was over "mass production" had become a definite part of our national economy. After the war manufacturers continued to produce tremendous quantities of merchandise only to find the outlet for this production impeded by the small, incompetent, independent retailer. A new means had to be found for increasing distribution. The answer was "mass distribution" through the chain stores.

In a comparatively short time—within the past five or six years to be exact—the chain store has completely altered the economic life of the American community. Louisville, Kentucky, affords a typical example of what has been happening. I have recently made a survey of the retail establishments on the main shopping thoroughfare of Louisville. I have found that from 85 to 90 per cent of the retail business done on this thoroughfare is done by chain stores. Five years ago the condition was exactly the opposite, with 85 to 90 per cent of the business carried on by locally owned establishments. The picture of Louisville can be duplicated in every fair-sized city or town in the United States. In many sections of the country this revolution has been accepted and its benefits recognized without much thought as to consequences. In the South local sentiment persists, and resentment against chain stores has risen with much greater force.

This feeling had been smoldering for a long time and needed only some forceful leadership to make it blaze forth. This leadership was provided by W. K. Henderson. Mr. Henderson, who owned an iron foundry in Shreveport, Louisiana, thought it might be a good idea to build himself a radio station as an adjunct to his business. He disported himself by broadcasting nightly on various subjects, and either because he was very uncouth or because he was a good showman or both, he decided that a little profanity and obscenity added to his remarks would give him plenty of publicity. Mr. Henderson happened one day to hear a local retailer making a speech before the Shreveport Chamber of Commerce in which the speaker told how the chains were cutting in on the local dealers. Henderson liked the speech and invited the man to repeat it that night over KWKH. After it was finished Mr. Henderson himself spoke as follows:

> I am going to tell you what that address means. It means that these dirty, sneaking chain stores are coming into your home town and taking your money and sending it out to a bunch of crooked, no-account loafers in Wall Street! That's what it means.

That night and the next day Mr. Henderson received hundreds of telegrams and in a few days several thousand letters from all parts of the country. The comments struck every note from commendation to abuse. For several hours each night Henderson read these comments to his radio audience and briefly sermonized upon each in a very entertaining way, mixing wisdom with profanity and abuse, and greeting his audience with the now well-known cry: "Hello, World, don't go away, doggone your buttons!"

The more he spoke, the greater the interest he aroused. So widely did his name and influence spread that when Senator Dill of Washington suggested that his broadcasting license be revoked thousands on thousands of letters and telegrams of protest poured in on the Radio Commission, with the result that Mr. Henderson was permitted to continue after he had promised to curb his obscenity. Throughout the South the name of Henderson was on everyone's lips, and the question of the chain-store menace was, and is today, the question most talked of below the Ohio.

Mr. Henderson now began to send out organizers to small towns through the South. Independent merchants were urged to band themselves together under the title of Merchants' Minute Men. The sole requisite for membership was the payment of $12 a year to Mr. Henderson. It is estimated that there are today from ten to twenty thousand members of this organization, and in the smaller towns women who trade at chain stores are becoming unpopular. While Mr. Henderson's attacks have been centered on chain stores in general they have been particularly directed against chain grocery stores, because in that field the chains have made their greatest progress. It is estimated that the total retail sales in this country amounted to approximately eighty billion dollars in 1929. About fifteen billion dollars' worth of this business was transacted by chains; and half of the chain-store total was done by the grocery chains.

Mr. Henderson's attacks are having some very concrete results. In Birmingham, Alabama, it is estimated that a large chain grocery concern has lost about one-third of its business directly because of his crusade. Everywhere through the South the sales volume of the chains, particularly the groceries, has fallen off to a greater or less degree. The influence of Mr. Henderson has even made itself felt on a number of legislatures in the South. In Kentucky, for instance, the House of Representatives not long ago passed a sales-tax bill directly aimed at the chain stores. The bill provides for a sales tax on every retail establishment. It would be unconstitutional otherwise. The difference, however, is this: on up to $400,000 of annual sales volume the merchant pays only one-twentieth of 1 per cent; on sales above this figure the tax is graduated so steeply that by the time the sales volume reaches a million dollars the rate of tax is twenty times as high. It is specifically stated in the bill that any holding company for a number of stores pays on the combined sales volume of all stores in the State of Kentucky. Thus, the Atlantic and Pacific grocery chain, which has a sales volume in Kentucky of approximately sixteen million dollars, and the Kroger stores, which have a sales volume of approximately fourteen million dollars, must pay a tax proportionately about twenty times as large as the small grocer. Just before the vote was called in the House one legislator gave Mr. Henderson's war cry, "Hello, World, don't go away," and amid uproarious laughter the bill passed by a vote of 85 to 4.

On February 27 I was present at a hearing on this bill before the Senate Committee on Revenue and Taxation at Frankfort. There were present more than a thousand people, who jammed the Senate Chamber to its very doors. A Louisville attorney representing the Retail Merchants' Association of Kentucky presented the argument opposing the bill, while the secretary of the Louisville Retail Grocery Association defended it. It was evident from the beginning that a number of the Senators on the committee had made up their minds in advance. The most interesting element in the hearing was the temper of that portion of the crowd, about six hundred strong, who represented the independent retailer. The appeal of the representative of the small merchant was highly emotional; and it aroused such fervor among his adherents that at times the gathering took on the appearance of a religious revival. When the speaker was in the midst of calling the chains all the names in the category a small merchant standing next to me kept yelling at the top of his lungs: "Get at 'em, boy, hit 'em hard, Glory Hallelujah!" Needless to say, the bill was reported favorably by the Senate committee and passed by the Senate by a vote of 27 to 11.

One of the more amusing skirmishes in the war on the chain store began only recently and is still going strong. Mr. Henderson has been particularly uncomplimentary in his attacks upon Clarence Saunders, the founder of the Piggly Wiggly grocery stores. Saunders, it will be recalled, went down to inglorious defeat at the hands of Wall Street several years ago and is now operating a chain of grocery stores under his own name in a number of cities in the South. Mr. Saunders, who is apparently as outspoken as Mr. Henderson and as picturesque, has taken it upon himself to answer Mr. Henderson's attacks in half-page and full-page advertisements in various newspapers. In one advertisement headed "Eat Your Cotton—Don't Sell It to a Foreigner," Mr. Saunders advanced the argument that if nothing should be purchased from any except strictly "home" merchants then nothing should be sold to any person outside the community. Another paragraph began as follows: "Ole Man Henderson's racket of arousing prejudice is as old as the first man who undertook to capitalize the ignorance of his fellow-men for his own personal end"; and ended thus: "So that there would be no mistake as to who wrote this article, I, Clarence Saunders, wrote every word of it . . ." Mr. Henderson undertook to answer over the radio. Apparently a number of people were gathered at his side as he spoke over the microphone. His answer went something like this: "Clarence, you bankrupt, you try to tell me what to do? Ha, ha, ha!" In the laughter Mr. Henderson was joined by his chorus. Henderson's entire answer to Mr. Saunders consisted of calling him names.

Mr. Saunders has just fired the second shot in the form of a full-page advertisement. It is headed "A Shiny-Eyed Rat," and Mr. Saunders refers to his opponent throughout as Rat Henderson of radio station KWKH. He points out that Mr. Henderson is urging all the home folks to purchase from the home-town merchant and at the same time is selling them coffee over the radio at one dollar a pound, which yields Mr. Henderson the handsome profit of sixty cents a pound. Incidentally, it is estimated that Mr. Henderson receives orders for about 1,500 pounds of coffee a day. Mr. Saunders goes on to point out that while Mr. Henderson is claiming to be the champion of the poor and downtrodden, he does not permit union men to work in his iron foundry. He further calls to mind the time when Mr. Henderson personally undertook to operate a street car in Shreveport while the street-car employees were on strike. Some of the language is extremely picturesque, as for example:

> You said that if I were near you'd spit in my face. Now, listen to me, Rat Henderson, whenever you think you are skunk enough to try this let your spit spew on my face and there'll be a skunk hide that will know that something has happened to it.

Mr. Saunders goes on to call Mr. Henderson a hypocrite and a liar. There is a great deal to be said for Mr. Henderson's sympathy for the small merchant, who is faced with slow extinction. There is also considerable to be said against Mr. Henderson. In addition to his coffee sales at one dollar a pound, he is utilizing this crusade to sell insurance, trips to Mexico, and grapefruit, not to mention memberships in the Merchants' Minute Men.

That the independent retailers are sorely beset by the chain is without question true. The United States government through its Department of Commerce has been making a survey of the grocery situation in the city of Louisville, known as the Louisville Grocery Survey. It has been found that no fewer than thirty small grocery stores are going out of business in Louisville every month. In other words, every day one grocer is falling by the wayside in Louisville because he is unable to cope with this economic tide! The chain store is strong because it has made a definite contribution toward lowering the costs of distribution. So long as it does its job well and renders this economic service to the people no amount of abuse and no reasonable amount of taxation can curb it. Hope for the independent does not lie in calling names and trying to prevent housewives from trading in the chain stores. It does not lie in levying upon the independent a tax of $1 while the chain pays a tax of $20. The answer lies rather in the direction of organization. The small inefficient independent must perform his job of distribution both with the efficiency and with the low costs of the chain. If the independent can do this by aligning himself with other independents, he can beat the chains. If not, there will be a great to-do for a while with much calling of names and slinging of mud, but in the long run the housewife, who is finally to decide this battle by her patronage, will go where the prices are cheaper and the service better.

In the Driftway

ONE could hardly live in New Orleans three days, even if one fasted all that time, without knowing that the city rejoices in good cooking. Rejoices is the right word, because New Orleanians take justifiable pleasure in their cooking—and say so out loud. The law of supply and demand rules in food as in other matters. In order to have good cooking there must be a sizable public which knows good cooking from bad and insists upon having it. New Orleans has such a public. The visitor is made aware at once that he is among people who take cooking seriously. He is asked if he likes this or has ever tried that; he is admonished to go to a certain restaurant on a certain day for a certain dish. "Oh, you must stay to lunch," his host at the club says; "this is our day for chicken Creole." Even for a modest Sunday night supper his hostess will consult him in advance as to what he likes, and he is not expected to eat what is set before him in silence.

* * * * *

AS an illustration of the serious attitude toward food which one encounters, the Drifter recalls inviting a lady in New Orleans to lunch and asking her to suggest a restaurant. At the appointed hour she appeared and proceeded to recite the entire menu of the table d'hote lunch at two places. She had called up both by telephone that morning so that the Drifter, with full information before him, might make a choice. Of course, that might happen outside New Orleans, but the Drifter doubts it.

* * * * *

ONE cannot even read the newspapers without realizing the preoccupation of New Orleans with good cookery. Within a period of only two weeks, recently, the Drifter noted prominent accounts of the death and burial of two chefs. In New York City, with ten times as large a population, it is doubtful if there are half a dozen chefs whose death would occasion more than a paragraph, if that. Of the two New Orleans chefs whose deaths were chronicled, one was a Negro. As a rule the names of Negroes do not get into Southern newspapers except when the bearers of them get into the calaboose charged with crime. But the Negro who can cook—and hundreds of them still can—is honored as well as the white man. Neville Jarreau had been at one time the chef of the Boston Club, the oldest organization of its kind in New Orleans, and back in the eighties he had prepared a dinner for President Grant when the latter made a visit to the city. Jarreau's skin was black, but his cooking made the mouths of white men water, and the New Orleans press did not neglect his memory when he passed. The other chef to whose death the newspapers gave prominence was eighty-six years old and had retired from the kitchen twenty-five years previous to his end. Yet Pierre Marais was recalled as having been the chef at the famous Spanish Fort Hotel in the days of its glory, and the Times-Picayune said that in 1882 when a reporter was sent to write up the debut of a cornet player he almost forgot to mention the musician in the unrestrained eulogy he wrote of Pierre's cooking.

"Our Country,—"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Here is the examination of a candidate for naturalization by a judge in Louisiana. For the name and address of the authenticating witness see the Christian Century for April 9. The speakers are the judge and the candidate.

> JUDGE. What did you do during the World War?
> CANDIDATE. I served for three years in the British army and spent about fifteen months overseas in Salonika. (Exhibits correct discharge papers certifying record.)
> J. Supposing the United States engaged in a war that you considered was wrong, what would be your attitude?
> C. I would consider it my duty to protect and defend democracy.
> J. But supposing, to take a concrete case, California wanted more territory and decided to seize some in Mexico, and every man was drafted for some form of service, would you object or be loyal?
> C. I do not believe the United States would engage in such a war.
> J. I do not want any conditions. Under such circumstances, a war of aggression, would you object?
> C. In all probability I would. I would first have to consider my duty to God and to humanity.
> J. In other words, you cannot subscribe under any and every condition to the doctrine, My country right or wrong, my country?
> C. No.
> J. Then you cannot be admitted. What we want are citizens who are prepared to say, My country right or wrong, but my country.

This seems to beat anything yet published.

The Ancients Knew

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is generally supposed that distilled liquors were not known to the ancients. Let me cite the following passage from the Old Testament (Deut. 14:26):

> And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink, or for whatsoever thy soul desireth. . . .

In this passage the Hebrew word for wine (yayin) is contrasted with the word for strong drink (shechar). I am convinced that the "strong drink" referred to in this passage was a distilled liquor. If it had been merely a strong kind of wine it would hardly have been sharply contrasted with wine.

It is also supposed that anaesthesia is a modern discovery; but I once came across this passage in the "De Trinitate" of Hilary of Poitiers, a writer of the fourth century, A.D.:

> Also when through some grave necessity part of the body must be cut away, the soul can be lulled to sleep by drugs, which overcome the pain and produce in the mind a deathlike forgetfulness of its power of sense. Then limbs can be cut off without pain: the flesh is dead to all feeling, and does not heed the deep thrust of the knife, because the soul within it is asleep.—"De Trinitate," Book X, par. 14.

This passage shows unmistakably that the ancients were acquainted with anaesthesia.

Judge Parker and the Negro

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The editorial in The Nation of April 29 opposing the confirmation of Judge Parker and appealing to the race prejudice of colored people is indefensible. You say that Judge Parker should not sit on the Supreme Court bench because cases affecting the rights of colored people will come before that court; and you specifically cite a case involving the Richmond, Virginia, segregation ordinance. You must have known that Judge Parker, presiding in the Circuit Court of Appeals at Richmond, rendered the decision holding that ordinance void because it was violative of the Fourteenth Amendment. As counsel for the colored complainant in that case, I protest against your unfair attack upon an upright, courageous judge.

Russian "C. O.'s"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In Soviet Russia, as in other countries with compulsory military service, conscientious objectors receive scant consideration. The Russian government, unlike many others, recognizes them and provides alternative civil service for the members of religious sects historically opposed to war. They serve in what is known as the "Civil Battalion," doing public work. But those who refuse this civil service and those who are outside the historical anti-war sects go to prison.

We have recently heard from Tolstoyan friends in Moscow of the hardships which these men are enduring in prison. They are in need of relief, which the Russian government permits through one agency in Moscow headed by Catharine Petchkoff, first wife of Maxim Gorki. In all Russian prisons—and these men serve their sentences in the regular prisons with criminals—prisoners are allowed to have their own clothes, to purchase food from the cooperative prison store to supplement the coarse diet, and to have books sent in from outside.

In making this appeal we are not contributing to any propaganda for or against the Soviet regime. Gifts and contributions may be so designated, but made payable and sent to the Fellowship of Reconciliation, 383 Bible House, Astor Place, New York.

"YELLOW DOG" Contracts and labor cases involved in Judge Parker's appointment are fully covered in THE LABOR INJUNCTION

By FELIX FRANKFURTER and NATHAN GREENE

"The Red Jacket" case and the "yellow dog" contracts which have caused the opposition to confirmation of Judge Parker's appointment to the Supreme Court are discussed in this new book by two legal authorities. It will give you a clear understanding of the situation, in addition to a complete knowledge of the use and abuse of the injunction in labor disputes. Every phase of this important subject is covered and the authors present recommendations which should be of interest to everyone concerned with industrial relations.

I

Here is a name that anyone might sign,
A City which has covered up the track
Of anonymity more sure than mine
And given of reminiscence nothing back.
No letters are expected and no calls.
The elevator is a gilded trip
To ordered Heavens of softly padded halls,
And the glib welcome of a quarter tip.

Twenty-one stories, and the muffled click
Of a door closing. What a precious boon
Is privacy where concrete walls are thick.
The Silver Grill serves breakfast until noon.
"To sleep, perchance to dream . . ." of space not bound
By any cable anchored underground.

II

Let us prepare tomorrow. Men are flies
Whose wings have been plucked out with patient skill.
Tower upon tower these refutations rise
To prove the dream inviolable still.
One more light scaffolding, a scantling based
On one more promise cunningly defined;
A single step—there is no need for haste—
Night has a thousand eyes, but they are blind.

Moons look astonished at the glittering plume
Of a small comet plunging to some dark
Wedding of sun-dust with primordial doom;
Yet the sky closes over the dying spark.
This window is an eye whose yellow square
Faces the City blankly . . . Let it stare!

A Great Trilogy

The Way Home. By Henry Handel Richardson. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

WITH the appearance of this second novel, the full trilogy of Mary and Richard Mahony is now available to American readers. If we can consider the three novels separately, "The Way Home" is perhaps the least important, for it gives us neither the magnificent picture of pioneer Australia in the first volume nor the absorbing tragedy of "Ultima Thule." Yet "The Way Home" is much more than a mere connecting link; it is a solid and brilliant work in itself. The trilogy of which it is a part is probably the most important single piece of literature ever to come out of Australia; it takes its place among the handful of fiction masterpieces in English that have so far appeared in this century.

The title of "The Way Home" remains ambiguous, and is perhaps intentionally ironic. For Richard, dissatisfied with the raw and crude life of the colonies, has gone "home" to England. But he finds that he has been idealizing the mother country, and that he has become even more ill-adjusted to English ways than he was to colonial. In the charming little village of Buddlecombe, where he attempts to resume his practice, Mary and he encounter an almost incredible narrowness and snobbery, a wasps' nest of caste and prejudice, with social life divided into innumerable grades, a series of cliques, rising one above the other, and fitting as exactly as a set of Japanese boxes. The lower classes are as fawning as the higher are arrogant. The slightest breaches of etiquette—such as serving guests with somewhat too generous a supper—are not forgiven. It at length dawns upon Mahony that the very fact that he and Mary have lived in Australia has made them, in the eyes of these provincials, socially dubious, and the very fact that he has practiced in Australia has made his professional competence suspect. So once more he pulls up stakes and takes Mary back to the colonies, "home."

Arrived there, they learn that Richard's mining shares have enormously increased in value; he has become rich, is welcomed everywhere. He gives up his practice, only to become absorbed in his books, particularly in those on spiritualism, and to become, in time, more and more of a recluse. Their three children are born. Richard, growing restless again, takes Mary to England once more, and then traveling on the Continent. It is when they are at Venice that the blow falls which wipes out their fortune and compels Richard to leave again for Australia, this time alone.

The story seems commonplace enough when reduced to any blunt summary; but the importance of this trilogy does not rest on any originality of plot. It is a memorable picture, just, full, and unsparing, of pioneer Australia, its easy democracy, its energy, restlessness, vulgarity, its concern with the one aim of getting rich; and with the same impartiality it presents the contrasting picture of small-town English life. The character portrayal, particularly of Mary and Richard, but of many of the minor figures as well, is masterly. In "The Way Home," as in "Ultima Thule," we find Mary and Richard, after years of married life, still making discoveries about each other, subtly altering their relationship, slowly changing themselves, drifting apart in interests and attitudes. Their irritations, quarrels, reconciliations are handled with superb skill. Yet there are here virtually none of the ingredients that the average novelist thinks most essential for keeping his reader's interest alive, without which, in fact, he can hardly imagine a story at all—romance, adultery, or some variation of the everlasting triangle. Never once is Mary interested in another man, nor does she even toy with the idea of a flirtation; Richard indeed, at one moment, finds a woman who he imagines understands him better than Mary does, but the affair never drifts beyond the faintest platonic level. Despite the absence of this sexual element, despite an atmosphere of Victorianism that hangs over the novel, partly the result of its style and structure, partly because it is actually laid in the Victorian period, I can think of few English novels of our time which give so full and rich a picture of life. There is selection of incident and thought, of course, as there must be in all fiction, but it is a selection that reveals the two chief characters at last on all sides—their aversions, attachments, cultural interests, their most petty monetary worries and social anxieties, their daily routine, their friends and relationships—everything, in fact, that we know about our closest acquaintances, or that absorbs, fritters, directs, or inspires our own energies. Emerging from this work, we not only feel that we have almost lived the lives of these two people, but something more than that. Mahony, in the eyes of the world, never becomes distinguished; he dies a failure, even a madman; yet we never lose sight of his inner nobility and latent powers, and when we rise from this chronicle, life itself seems to have gained something in significance.

HENRY HAZLITT

The British State

English Government and Politics. By Frederic Austin Ogg. The Macmillan Company. $4.25.

"THE English constitution," says Sir William Anson, is "a somewhat rambling structure and, like a house which many successive owners have altered just so far as suited their immediate wants or the fashion of the time, it bears the marks of many hands, and is convenient rather than symmetrical." His simile remains apt, but since he wrote, in the eighties of the last century, and especially during and since the war, the owners of the house have been proceeding with alterations so rapidly that all descriptions of it, including his own, are badly in need of revision. A new edition of the first volume of his "Law and Custom of the Constitution" was published in 1922, but the other two volumes have not been revised for more than twenty years. The latest edition of President Lowell's monumental "Government of England" takes no account of any developments subsequent to 1911. Professor Ogg is surely justified in saying that a new book on English government is warranted by "the remarkable changes in mechanism, function, and method which recent years have witnessed, and particularly by the fluidity of political arrangements in Britain today and the probability of further significant experiments and reconstructions in times immediately ahead."

Mr. Ogg's textbooks and other writings on European and American government and history are well known to students and have given him high standing among the political scientists of the country. But his latest work is drawn on a larger scale. If I am not mistaken, it is decidedly the most important as well as the most comprehensive book that he has written, and even if it were not strictly up to date, as it is, it would still be easily the best one-volume treatise on its subject. In the laborious business of gathering material he has been systematic as well as tireless, and a clear and organizing mind has enabled him to present the results of his study in orderly and readable fashion. He has successfully accomplished his purpose, which is to give an account of the English political system "on lines which will render it not only a reservoir of data on principles and processes but a living reality as a going concern." His primary aim is to describe existing political institutions and practices, but he gives considerable attention to problems and tendencies. Such chapters as those on Civil Service Methods and Problems, Second Chamber Reform, and Parliamentary Tendencies and Problems remind us that the constitution we are reading about is very much alive.

The author exemplifies throughout and in high degree the quality of disinterestedness. He is never opinionated and appears to have no axes to grind. He devotes several chapters to the English party system, but they give us no hint of how he would vote if he were an Englishman. Even in his references to the general strike he betrays no emotion. And his attitude toward that unhappy hunting-ground of embittered controversy, the Irish question, is fairly represented in this sentence: "All in all, the system of government [under the Union] was neither so bad as it was generally painted by Irishmen nor so good as complacent Britishers were wont to regard it." Important currents of opinion concerning political questions are brought into view, but when the author presents adverse criticism of political conditions and institutions it is usually the criticism of others, not his own.

In a work of this scope it is almost inevitable that there should be some errors of fact and some statements that call for reconsideration. Such corrigenda and exploranda as have been noted can easily be rectified when the book goes to a second edition; they are submitted here with that object in view. What Sir Thomas Smith said about the supremacy of Parliament required no special boldness on his part (page 35); for him Parliament was not an institution distinct from and potentially opposed to the sovereign. James II was not "obstinate and intolerant" (page 40); it would be nearer the truth to say that he was obstinately tolerant. The name that George III gloried in was that of "Briton," not "Englishman" (page 46). The concept of fundamental law, superior to the ordinary law, is much older than the sixteenth century (page 62). The first Labor Government was not in office for "upwards of a year" (pages 70 and 528). It was not an "English publicist," but De Lolme, who made the humorous remark about Parliament paraphrased on page 78. The reign of Edward I was not reckoned as dating from the death of his predecessor, nor did he remain uncrowned for four years (page 84). Accurately speaking, the prerogative power of the Crown to create life peerages has not disappeared (page 87); in the Wensleydale case, to which the author refers, the right was admitted, but it was denied that life peers were entitled to sit in the House of Lords. The Lord Privy Seal is not required by "inflexible custom" to be a member of the House of Lords (page 138); the office has been held several times by commoners and is held by one today. Coke, having died in 1634, could not have "testified" to anything in 1648 (page 381). Dicey did not maintain that Parliament was actually omnipotent, as the reader would be likely to infer from page 448. In view of the present state of parties in the House of Commons it seems strange to say that the chances of a Ministry being ousted by the House "have of late been steadily diminishing" (page 460). The Liberals were not defeated in a parliamentary election in 1842, nor did they regain office in 1847 (page 487). It is not clear what the author means by saying that the personal union of England and Scotland was able to "withstand" the establishment of the Hanoverian dynasty (page 683). It was not the British Parliament but the Irish Parliament that repealed Poynings's Law (page 690). South Africa should be excepted from the statement that the Dominions have been peopled primarily from the British Isles (page 747). An assertion is made on page 753 regarding British influence over Dominion legislation that is not in accord with the principles laid down by the Imperial Conference of 1926 and would not be indorsed by any Dominion statesman.

ROBERT LIVINGSTON SCHUYLER

Harsh Words

An Anthology of Invective and Abuse. Compiled by Hugh Kingsmill. The Dial Press. $2.

MR. KINGSMILL has done his work here with great competence. His selections include all the more celebrated English philippics, his notes set forth adequately the circumstances which brought them forth, and he chooses discreetly when it is necessary to isolate the essential from the nonessential, as in the case, for example, of Robert Buchanan's "The Fleshly School of Poetry." All persons with any trace of malice in them—which is to say, all persons not immersed in Trappist monasteries—will rejoice in this handy compendium. It includes almost everything of a caustic nature composed in England in three and a half centuries, from Francis Bacon's denunciation of the Earl of Essex to Lloyd George's Limehouse speech, and from William Prynne's diatribe against bobbed hair to H. G. Wells's assault upon Napoleon Bonaparte.

Unfortunately, it seldom leaves the bounds of the British Isles, and then to small purpose. The American section, for example, is short, and its contents are mainly feeble stuff—Robert G. Ingersoll on the Bible, Whistler on Ruskin, Mark Twain on Titian, and a few extracts from the forgotten Lincoln Catechism. One looks in vain for Griswold on Poe, Stuart P. Sherman on Dreiser, Roosevelt on Harriman, Mark Twain on J. Fenimore Cooper, Sumner on Jeff Davis, the old New York Sun on Roosevelt, and Wilson on the little group of wilful men. Is Lloyd George actually a master of invective? Then what of James A. Reed? I recall a dozen speeches by Reed that are more blistering than anything in this volume—more blistering, and altogether better. And in particular I recall his funeral sermon on the Wilson idealism, preached before a packed Senate chamber on the night of March 3, 1921. If England can show anything more devastating, then surely Mr. Kingsmill does not print it here.

There is also a complete absence of Continental examples—a very serious lack. Certainly Schopenhauer's attack upon women is far better than Prynne's, as Zola's "J'accuse" is better than Burke's indictment of Warren Hastings. But most of all I miss the immortal Section 62 of Nietzsche's "Der Antichrist," unquestionably the grandest and gaudiest abuse ever penned. The words, as Nietzsche himself said, deserve to be chalked on every wall, wherever there is a wall to chalk them on:

> Ich verurtheile das Christenthum, ich erhebe gegen die christliche Kirche die furchtbarste aller Anklagen, die je ein Ankläger in den Mund genommen hat. Sie ist mir die höchste aller denkbaren Corruptionen, sie hat den Willen zur letzten auch nur möglichen Corruption gehabt. Die christliche Kirche liess Nichts mit ihrer Verderbniss unberührt, sie hat aus jedem Werth einen Unwerth, aus jeder Wahrheit eine Lüge, aus jeder Rechtschaffenheit eine Seelen-Niedertracht gemacht.

And so on, and so on.

But maybe Mr. Kingsmill will bring out a second volume of his anthology later on.

Conscience Makes Us Men

King Haber. By Alfred Neumann. Alfred H. King. $2.50.

A WRITER like Alfred Neumann, who deals almost entirely with codes, punctilios, quirks of honor, and the sharp tooth of conscience, strikes us at first glance as somewhat alien to his own times. We are forced, however, to put aside any suspicion that this author is trying to squeeze more drama than is legitimate out of human situations that are to all intents and purposes dead. His method is penetrating, beautiful, true, even though his kind of inner tribunal has been put to sleep by a generation that, while still perhaps admiring his English style, can make neither head nor tail of the high-minded motives that impel the characters of Joseph Conrad. Neumann bears a surface resemblance—but only a surface resemblance—to Mr. Thornton Wilder. In Neumann there is, however, less casuistry, and far more poetry and direct contact with people.

The present book contains three long short stories, two of which are laid in the beginning of the nineteenth century—one in Russia and the other in a small German ducal state. The third is narrated by a hunchbacked German schoolmaster who sees a sex crime committed by his assistant, a warped soul, and cowers away from the other as though he were (as indeed he is) his own tortured, devilish alter ego. Hounded by the evil within himself, the assistant at last shoots himself.

The two significant stories in the book are King Haber and The Patriot, both of which made the author's reputation in Germany, especially the latter, which was published before Neumann won the Kleist Prize for The Devil. King Haber and Conrad's Lord Jim have at least this in common: they are both predestined to follow an impossible ideal, achieving it in ways which they never even guessed at. King Haber is a Jewish banker who is ruthless in his purpose to set his son, borne to him by the reigning duchess, on the throne. His shall be the blood of kings. But the nobles rise up and conspire to thwart him. Cornered, hemmed in by a cordon of bloodthirsty enemies, with no possible egress, he causes the death of his own child (who had meanwhile been proclaimed heir apparent by the complaisant duke) and is himself the victim of a revolutionary mob. This form of death is self-chosen. Even the nobles recognize that by his courage, his fervent dream, his fearlessness before death he has become their peer.

The Patriot relates the murder of the Czar Paul as a result of a conspiracy headed by Count Pahlen. Pahlen has assured the Czarevitch that his father's death is not sought; only his abdication. He offers his own life as a pledge. The Czar is slain and Pahlen, waiting in an anteroom, kills himself.

In objectifying the subtle emotions and complex ideals of his characters Neumann uses a form of dramatic understatement that is highly charged with dire events. He is elliptical, but not monotonously so. He uses the sense of impendingness, which elsewhere I have noted in the dialogue of Mr. Hemingway, with the concision of a tragic poet.

The Southern Mill Worker

Some Southern Cotton Mill Workers and Their Villages. By Jennings J. Rhyne. University of North Carolina Press. $2.50.

CAPITALIST industry, when it bursts upon an economy of agriculture and small handicrafts, brings first an astonishing increase in production. Entrepreneurs rise to power and riches. Dislocations in economic life and exploitation of workers are forgotten in the swiftness and splendor of the spectacle of the new factories. A second stage is reached when the masters of industry, half sensing the inequities in the development, seek to enshrine their creed of individualism. Legislators, newspapers, clergymen, and economists agree with them heartily. The harshness of the doctrine is presently softened by acts of kindness toward the workers; when the fish begins to tug, a little more line is paid out to him, so that for the moment he forgets that he still has the hook in his mouth.

A third phase is reached in the democratic revolt against the operation of capitalism. This takes on many forms—abortive political protest, tardy legislative relief, an awakening charity in the middle class, growing demand for labor unionism, panaceas of social reform. Industry in the Southern States has unequivocally reached this third stage. The strikes which have occurred in the cotton mills in the last year, followed by the present widespread American Federation of Labor organizing campaign, leave no doubt of the arrival of the day of reckoning.

This makes Dr. Rhyne's realistic description of the life of the North Carolina cotton-mill workers in their villages important as a basis of judgment of future developments and policies. He has studied 500 families, with a total of 2,362 persons, in four types of mill villages of Gaston County. His sample is statistically adequate, and he has examined the social and economic characteristics of the groups and individuals with accuracy and ingenuity.

He seems to establish the fact, long suspected, that the workers are generally indifferent toward welfare work. He believes from his figures that the great majority of children in mill families go to work as soon as they reach fourteen. In

THE POWER AND SECRET of the JESUITS

By Rene Fülöp-Miller

At last a modern-minded scholar has written the true story of one of the greatest secret societies of all times. Catholics and non-Catholics alike are hailing this volume—a history, a biography, and a story of civilization. "Thoroughly scholarly and tremendously interesting."—John B. Watson. "One of the most powerful and interesting and graphic documents published for many years. To call it a document is accurate, but does not do justice to its thrilling quality simply as reading matter."—Michael Williams. 85.6 per cent of the families there were no dependent children over fourteen, and in only 0.2 per cent of the cases were there two or more dependent children over fourteen. This may be taken to put a definite limit to mental and economic development. He shows that there are fewer wage-earners to each family than has been supposed; practically half the families had only one wage-earner, slightly over one-fourth had two, while 23.8 per cent had three or more. The male head of the family was gainfully employed in 96.7 per cent of the families where the father was still living.

The cotton mills of North Carolina employ a larger percentage of workers below the ages of 25 to 44 than do industries as a whole in that State, in Massachusetts, or in the United States. The wage data, liable to error because supplied by the workers themselves, showed an average weekly income per family of $28.65, a median of $25.43, and the modal $16.07. Families moving from village to village oftener than once a year comprised 21.6 per cent of the total, and 7.6 per cent moved at the rate of more than twice a year.

Books in Brief

An American Jezebel. By Helen Augur. Brentano's. $3.50.
Unafraid: A Life of Anne Hutchinson. By Winifred King Rugg. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

It is a good thing, every so often, to reexamine the growth of various forms of toleration in America. We are too prone either to fall into the error of believing that intolerance is a result of the World War and did not exist in the old days, or to assert that as far as religious freedom goes it has always existed in the United States, and that we thereby shame every country so backward as to have an established church. Let it be said at once that in the Massachusetts Bay Colony in the latter half of the seventeenth century there existed one of the tightest, most unreasoning, and most merciless theocracies that ever flourished anywhere. Thither came Mistress Anne Hutchinson, wife of William Hutchinson, gent., of Lincolnshire, eager to hear again the preaching of her beloved leader, John Cotton. She was full of zeal not only for the performance of every housewifely task, including the bearing and rearing of some ten children, but for God and His son, Jesus Christ. She brought the fresh winds of direct and personal revelation into the Calvinistic rigidities of the colony. Her "Covenant of grace," as opposed to the more regular "Covenant of works" of the church's governors, got her into trouble, and because she was too brilliant an expositor of her doctrines not to be listened to she was finally excommunicated with all due infamy. Miss Augur has told Mrs. Hutchinson's story with great understanding and pity, as well as with appreciation of her gifts as a preacher and as a woman. She has written a stirring book without resorting unduly to fictionizing; she has made of her heroine a thoroughly sympathetic figure, difficult to live with, perhaps, but none the less admirable for that. Miss Rugg's is a much less competent book, spoiled in particular by long, imaginary conversations between Mrs. Hutchinson and her husband, her friends, and her God.

This Is My Body. By Margery Latimer. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

We have had no social revolution; but the sexual revolution has come irresistibly and has been won largely by woman. In "This Is My Body" Miss Latimer, whose early work showed promise and a certain eagerness, has given us in Megan Foster one of the heroines of this more or less perceived, but formidable, transition. Megan from the very beginning is simply and naturally imbued with the joyous principles of the irrepressible

Dr. Samuel Schmalhausen. She revolts against her family. She is a rebel at college. She says: "I love life—I want life. . . . Oh, oh, I have to know a man." And to the first man she meets: "I want to know about life . . . reality." At page 74 she has advanced to: "I feel white, I feel empty." And not long after: "Oh Gerald, I'm burning—I'm burning!" In her search for reality (life?), little Megan moves forward always in a straight line until she finds it; and then, obviously, the emptiness within her is filled.

Testamento Literario. Por Armando Palacio Valdés. Madrid: Victoriano Suárez. 4 pesetas.

Armando Palacio Valdés is a contemporary of Pérez Galdós, José Maria de Pereda, Emilia Pardon Bazán, Leopoldo Alas—the noble group which had made Spanish letters at the beginning of the century the peer of any in the world. All these other authors are gone, but the creator of "José" and "La Hermana San Sulpicio" has lived on to a hale old age, and still writes readable stories in his gentle nineteenth-century manner. His "Literary Testament" is a collection of essays on the writer's vocation, the attitude he should take toward such matters as family, friends, politics, hygiene, reputation, money, and the like, on Catholic orthodoxy, morality, optimism—all sweetened with naive humor and phrased in a calm and beautiful Spanish which is a welcome relief from the gallicized lingo of a large part of the younger writing generation in Spain. Valdés has a delightful gift of apposite allusion which is not seriously marred by his habit of inaccurate quotation.

Music

A "Spiritual" Concerto

THE Schola Cantorum ended its season with a noble display of new works. Although, like matrimonial advertisements, its concert was better on paper than face to face, it contained three exquisite madrigals of Monteverde excellently done, a folk song of Joaquin Nin for the brilliant voice of Adele Vasa and women's chorus (the most beautiful new piece on the program), and the much-heralded Spiritual Concerto of the Russian Arthur Lourié. This was scored for piano, barytone solo, brass, contrabassi, and chorus, with a text from the Exultet of the Ambrosian Easter Vigil and part of the Forty-second Psalm. It was called a "vision of mystical progression."

It proved exciting and baffling. For despite the superb playing of Denyse Molié and the careful direction of Hugh Ross the piece missed fire. It seemed loaded with significance that usually remained obscure. One felt it was often on the point of some astonishing revelation, that clouds would open and the God of Abraham, Kant, and Mr. Eddington be discovered in an atomic radiance. Indeed, to the text "deep calleth unto deep at the noise of Thy waterspouts" the mixture of terror and joy proclaimed in the program notes certainly took shape as, against shattering piano rhythms, the choral voices rose upon a prolonged and awesome crescendo. There was a sense of sundering dimensions, of the breaking through of strange lights and immense vistas, the swirling disintegration of normal perception attributed to the mystic before he loses himself in cosmic consciousness. Here the music should have stopped. No temple could have adequately crowned those stairs. Unfortunately it continued, and the work ended in throat-splitting and painful bathos.

This work is the opposite of Mr. Prokofieff's brilliant and empty concerto, recently mentioned. Mr. Lourié was obviously moved by what he had to say. Why then did he fail—save once—to move his hearers? Perhaps for one of two reasons. An artist's medium is the common denominator between his own emotional conviction and that of his audience. As he works over his subject, seeking to reduce its material to the simplest means that can support its content, he may pass the point of balance between creator and perceiver and go on to an exaggerated simplification. The medium becomes increasingly adequate to him through familiarity, and he pares it down until it is no longer rich enough to carry his ideas and emotions to the spectator. The result is understatement—a sufficiently rare vice to make us hope that if this is the concerto's fault, Mr. Lourié's future works will correct it. One hopes, too, that Mr. Lourié will not fall into the error of loading his music with arbitrary meanings, or push esotericism too far, for his sincerity is undoubted. It is too rare a quality to be shut away in specialized chambers for the mystically elect.

Lillian Gish Keeps a Secret

THE audience which gathered to see "Uncle Vanya" produced at the Cort Theater could probably be divided without great difficulty into two groups, the first being composed of those who came to see Chekhov's play and the second of those who were curious to learn if Miss Lillian Gish is really an actress or merely a puppet which happened to acquire renown in one of the various mysterious ways associated with the movies. The first of these groups was certainly rewarded, for "Uncle Vanya" is a play no less rich than the others which came from the same pen, but those who were anxious to answer the question about Miss Gish must have come away nearly as puzzled as they were when they went.

It is not, be it understood, that the performance is bad, for if it were then our doubts would at least be resolved. The fact of the matter is, however, that she manages most adroitly to sidestep the question, that the role which has been assigned her and the interpretation which she has been allowed to give to it are such that we are no more sure than we were in the days when she was the particular star of the great Mr. Griffith whether she has real talents or merely certain odd deficiencies which a skilful director can utilize after the fashion of the marionette master and the character doll. There was always something negative about her, and Helena, as Miss Gish plays her, fits all too well the personality of the actress as it has been hitherto revealed, for she is little except an enigma. No one knows why she married the aging and tedious professor, no one knows why she remains faithful to him, and no one knows what kind of character, if any, she has. She is beautiful in a quaint, angular, and anemic sort of way. She confesses gently that she has no intelligence to speak of and no particular interest in anything whatsoever. And though she is, to be sure, kindly enough, it is hard to say whether or not that kindliness is due to more than an absence of passion so complete that not even malice is possible. Helena, in a word, remains merely a shell, and so does the actress who portrays her. Chekhov never tells us whether or not there is anything positive behind the mysterious reserve of his character, and Miss Gish never allows us to see whether she is acting a role or merely behaving in her accustomed fashion—which is all very well so far as this particular performance is concerned, but which leaves the question of her ability as an actress exactly where it was before she made her first appearance upon the legitimate stage. One is merely reminded of the fact that some sphinxes have secrets and some have not.

As to the play itself, no one familiar with Chekhov's other work needs to have described again either his charm or his peculiar melancholy humor. This particular piece is called a comedy, and if by comedy one means a tale which ends in general happiness or lovers' meetings then the title is hardly deserved. But if, on the other hand, one means by the term a work which accepts human weakness as the basis of its effect and its philosophy then the right to the description is richly earned. "Uncle Vanya" exists in order that full-length portraits may be drawn of certain delightful but absurd eccentrics such as only Chekhov's tolerant but unrelenting analysis could make real—of the pompous professor who has spent twenty-five years lecturing about things which "the intelligent knew already and the stupid weren't interested in" and of the pockmarked dependent, Waffles, who boasts that he is happy only to be told that he lies, that, as a matter of fact, the reason everybody loves him is simply that he is unhappier than everybody else. Such company is neither brilliant nor exciting, but when seen through the keen, gentle, and almost passionless eyes of Chekhov it is as interesting as any company could be. He neither admires, nor lectures, nor despises them. He is neither sentimentalist, nor satirist, nor cynic. And yet there is something which inspires in him both a profound interest and a complete understanding. Is that something, perhaps, the fact that he was so much a part of the generation he described that he heard always in his ear a whisper which said, "There but for the grace of God go I"?

In a generally excellent production the work of Walter Connolly as Uncle Vanya and of Osgood Perkins as the doctor stands out—which is odd enough in view of the fact that the first has been associated chiefly with popular farces and the second with "hard-boiled" melodramas.

"Lady Clara" (Booth Theater) is a mild but amusing comedy about a cockney girl who discovers herself to be the daughter of an earl. For a time the audience is kept in pleasant doubt whether the plot is going to take its cue from "Pygmalion" or "Peg o' My Heart," but the girl not unwisely decides that a humble station is preferable to the course of discipline required to make a lady of her. Florence Nash plays the heroine with much humor.

"Penal Law 2010" (Biltmore Theater) is as unspeakably bad as plays produced by the author generally are, while as for "Room 349" (National Theater) it must try to get along without comment from me. A last-minute postponement on the part of the management made it impossible for me to attend. From the reports, however, I judge that the apparently unfortunate combination of events was a blessing in disguise.

A MORE BITTER FIGHT than that which has arisen over the nomination of Judge Parker to the Supreme Court has rarely been seen in the Senate. It reached its climax, perhaps, with the specific charge, by Senator Ashurst, that "judgeships, federal, are being offered, I will not say to Senators, but to a Senator, if he will vote for confirmation." "I stand on that statement," declared the Arizona Senator, "and challenge you to call the lobby committee on that statement." At the same session Senator McKellar charged that his office had been rifled, and suggested that Secret Service agents might be responsible. Two other Senators also declared that their offices had been entered. When things reach such a pitch as this President Hoover may well begin to wonder whether the nomination was after all the "master political stroke" that it was expected to be. Certainly the debate has failed to reveal one good reason for Judge Parker's appointment. His nomination by the President stands revealed to the country in all its nakedness as a bare political move. The Supreme Court is deserving of more respect.

NO FEWER THAN 1,028 MEMBERS of the American Economic Association, comprising the leading teachers of economics in the colleges and universities and economic experts the country over, persons who have no direct interest whatsoever in the tariff schedules, have signed a petition to President Hoover demanding that he veto the pending tariff bill. The statements they make are unanswerable: (1) that the bill would increase prices to domestic consumers; (2) that only a few wage-earners can hope to profit by the tariff bill; (3) that our export trade in general would suffer; (4) that American manufacturers as a whole do not need higher tariffs; (5) that our farmers will in no wise benefit by the legislation; (6) that the higher tariffs will not decrease unemployment; (7) that the new bill will tremendously increase foreign hostility to us; and (8) that "a tariff war does not furnish good soil for the growth of world peace." The signers might well have added that President Hoover cannot sign this bill without stultifying himself, since it does not do those things which he asked of Congress when he called the special session and does those things, notably a general revision of the tariff, which he specifically stated that he did not want. President Hoover may spend another seven years in the White House, but he will never have a more direct and searching test than will be afforded by this tariff bill when it is presented to him. How will his moral fiber react to it?

SPEED RECORDS for tariff-making appear to have been broken by the Canadian Government which on May 1, without taking the trouble to broadcast to the world that far-reaching tariff changes were in process, announced that the new duties would go into effect at nine o'clock the following morning. All this, be it noted, before the budget bill, in which the tariff changes are incorporated, had ever been acted upon by the Dominion Parliament. Pending the adoption of the budget, all customs duties will be collected subject to changes necessitated by the new rates. The new tariff, described in a Canadian press dispatch as "the most drastic and far-reaching customs revision of this century," will affect, it is estimated, some $300,000,000 of imports from the United States, while changes in the British preference duties will touch about $200,000,000 of imports from the mother country. Whether the new duties are expected to have any effect in mitigating the excesses and irrationalities of the Smoot-Hawley gouge is not, of course, divulged, but if Mr. Mackenzie King and his associates had been content to twirl their thumbs while the American Congress boosted the levies upon one of America's best customers, the outlook for a Liberal victory in the election that will almost certainly be held within a year would have been appreciably dimmed.

THE FARM DEBENTURE menace is not yet out of the way, although the House of Representatives has taken the commendable step of striking out, by a substantial majority of 231 to 161, the debenture provision from the tariff bill which it is considering. Whether the vote actually represents the majority opinion of the House is not certain, because the rejection was achieved under threat of a veto. Mr. Hoover, to be sure, in his letter to Mr. Tilson, the Republican leader, did not say that he would veto the bill if it retained the debenture feature; all he said was that he was still opposed to the debenture plan; but Mr. Tilson declared that he could not imagine that anything else than a veto was foreshadowed, the majority of the House accepted his interpretation, and the debenture monstrosity went overboard. It may still be saved, however, by the Senate, which put it into the bill and which has yet to act upon the House compromise. There is a fly in the ointment, too, because the same House yielded further to Mr. Hoover and retained the flexible-tariff provision which the Senate had stricken out. The warning of Representative Summers of Texas that "every single attempt in the history of government to delegate revenue powers to the executive has proved disastrous," that "it is as certain as human nature that a President will sooner or later violate such authority," and that "it is only a question of which one it will be," apparently went unheeded by the House. As Mr. Hoover wants the power which the flexible-tariff provision would give him, the Senate, which does not want it but adores debentures, will have a fine chance to play some more politics with the bill.

NAVAL LIMITATION, Italian style, has just been given an illustration which ought to disturb even Mr. Hoover's complacency. On April 27, five days after the signing of the London treaty, there were launched from Italian shipyards more than 30,000 tons of fighting craft—two 10,000-ton cruisers, two 5,000-ton cruisers, and one 800-ton submarine. These vessels, it was explained, were all begun one or two years ago and took the water now with no reference, of course, to anything talked about at London. Three days later the Cabinet approved plans for a further 42,900 tons—one 10,000-ton cruiser, two flotilla leaders of 5,000 tons each, four 1,240-ton destroyers, and twenty-two submarines, of which four displace 1,390 tons each, six 810 tons, and twelve 610 tons; altogether twenty-nine vessels. This is Italy's reply to what the Lavoro Fascista, referring to the London conference, calls "the intention of some to relegate us to the lowest rank of the world Powers." The new construction, the same paper remarks, "constitutes the best proof that, far from wishing to engage in a race for armaments, Italy will maintain and have recognized her incontrovertible right as a great sea Power." France, naturally, is a good deal perturbed, and some unholy critics of the London treaty have begun to ask how long it will be before Great Britain, with its long tradition of a two-Power standard, will feel compelled to invoke the safeguarding clause which allows any signatory to increase its fleet if it deems its own security threatened. At any rate, the outlook for an agreement about Franco-Italian parity seems somewhat dim.

PROSPERITY TOMORROW, still says President Hoover. We hope so. As for yesterday and today, that's a different matter, unhappily. Railroad gross earnings in February were 10.1 per cent less than in February, 1929, while March earnings were 12.5 per cent less than those of last year. Net earnings were off 29.8 per cent in February and 37.3 per cent in March. The Bureau of Business Conditions of the Alexander Hamilton Institute in its current summary points out that car loadings for the week ending April 19 totaled 893,000, against 1,004,000 a year ago, a decline of 11.6 per cent, "the most unfavorable comparison which has occurred in 1930." Orders for new freight cars in April totaled 1,843, against 6,983 a year ago. The steel industry during the past week has reduced its production from 80 to 78 per cent of capacity, against 97 per cent last year, and there is talk of further price-cutting. In the construction industry the F. W. Dodge Corporation reports contracts awarded during the first three weeks of April as 26.7 per cent below the figures of 1929. April figures this year were 3.4 per cent above March; last year they were 32.5 per cent higher than in March. Governor Roosevelt in a telegram to Secretary Lamont states that preliminary tabulations of factory employment in New York indicate a further decrease in April as compared with March and declares that the index of such employment, steadily declining since October last, now stands at the lowest point in its sixteen years' history. It will take a good deal of lung power to talk away figures like these.

CITIZENSHIP in the United States is becoming more difficult of access every day. Miss Averil Bland, a Canadian war nurse who saw service at Brest during the World War, has been reported unfavorably for citizenship because, although she declares herself willing to go to the front and nurse the wounded in the event of war, she will not take an oath to bear arms in defense of her new country. Miss Bland put her refusal on the ground of religion and claimed that the United States guaranteed freedom of religious belief to its citizens. Whereupon the presiding judge uttered the surprising doctrine that there was a difference between the rights of citizens and the "privileges accorded persons desirous of becoming citizens." It is high time that this matter was thoroughly threshed out in the courts and in Congress. In this connection every support should be given to the resolution introduced by Representative Griffin of New York, proposing that "no person mentally, morally, and otherwise qualified shall be debarred from citizenship by reason of his or her religious views or philosophical opinions with respect to the lawfulness of war as a means of settling international disputes." No one with such a belief who has yet applied for citizenship has declared himself unwilling to suffer the legal consequences during war time of refusing to bear arms. We cannot much longer continue the spectacle of refusing citizenship to persons in every way qualified except that they will not promise to kill a possible future enemy.

MAY DAY PASSED OFF, on the whole, quietly. In New York this was due in part to Mr. Whalen's commendable order to the police to leave their night-sticks at home and to his successful attempt to separate the meetings in Union Square held until 2 p.m. by the Veterans of Foreign Wars and after 3 p.m. by the Communists. It was due also to the considered second judgment of both groups that it would be better to avoid a row. Charges have been made by the American Civil Liberties Union that police kept spectators from attending the Communist meeting, but in spite of this upwards of 30,000 came while the Veterans welcomed no more than 10,000. New York City employees, for some unknown reason, were given the day off with pay. This enabled them to march in the Veterans' parade, run around the block, and come back in time to hear the Communist speeches. In other cities, on the whole, police officers maintained an air of amused tolerance and insisted on being protective, which, however irritating to the members of the Workers' Party, is far better than a series of broken heads. In all about 300 workers were arrested over the country for offenses committed on or in the week preceding May 1. Considering the previous temper of the police and the degree of general unemployment, this seems very modest. Commissioner Whalen's "secret Russian documents" turned out to be a good deal of a dud. Indications that they are the same old forgeries, or others like them, that have been making the rounds for years are widespread. Unfortunately these "documents" do make some impression on the more innocent of our hard-boiled business men, and on certain Congressmen like Hamilton Fish, but this is one of the chances that Soviet Russia must take in trading with America.

THE DIFFICULTIES of utility regulation are well illustrated in the ten-year struggle over utility rates in the State of New York. In November, 1929, a federal court allowed the New York Telephone Company a 7 per cent return on the value of its intrastate property. The company filed a new and advanced rate schedule effective February 1, 1930. The Public Service Commission, after slicing off 20 per cent of the increase, made the rates temporarily effective. On April 18, with the proceedings for permanent rates still pending, the company suddenly put forward a brand-new schedule, calculated to bring in $8,000,000 more han the present rates, on the theory that the business depresion requires such an advance in order to insure a 7 per cent return. In a unanimous decision handed down on May 1 he commission rejected this increase and actually readjusted rates to yield, it figures, $900,000 less than the present return, but still $10,000,000 more than last year's rates. It cut rom the valuation claimed by the company the entire amount of $35,000,000 in its depreciation reserve, but rejected the laim of counsel for the City of New York that the annual llowance for depreciation should be limited to actual proprty requirements for the year in question. The company nnounces that it will comply with the order of the commision, but under protest. The commission appears to be satisied with its own success in regulating telephone rates. The ubscriber may not wholly share that satisfaction.

GREAT BRITAIN may outrank France as a colonial empire, but it is just possible that the British might earn a thing or two from a study of French policy in North Africa. President Doumergue has been making an official isit to Algeria on the occasion of the celebration of the one undredth anniversary of the acquisition of Algeria as a French possession. The ceremonies have been imposing, beginning with a review of more than eighty vessels of the French fleet and four squadrons of airplanes, and including show by contingents from various tribes that contribute to he make-up of the colonial army. The interesting thing bout the celebration, however, is the evidence which it has fforded of Algerian loyalty. The New York Times, which ditorially cannot be accused of lack of friendliness toward Great Britain, pertinently remarks that with the exception of ome small disturbances in Indo-China the entire colonial emre of France is at peace. Algeria, in some respects the most mportant of the French possessions, is organized on a deartmental as well as a colonial basis, with three senators nd nine deputies in Parliament, while in the framing of the budget, which is separate from that of France, the governor-general is assisted by delegations representing the Mussulman natives as well as the French, and by a superior council composed in part of elected members. In comparison with Great Britain, which faces today a seething discontent in South Africa, Egypt, and Iraq, as well as in India, France may well feel content with the result of its administrative efforts.

BANNING A TEXTBOOK because some parent doesn't like it is pretty poor business for any school authorities anywhere, but exactly that has lately happened in New York. "Modern History," written by Professor Carlton J. H. Hayes and Professor Parker T. Moon, both of Columbia University, and listed for some seven years among the history textbooks which teachers in the New York City schools might use, has been stricken from the list by Acting Superintendent Harold G. Campbell on the ground, as alleged by the Reverend Lefferd M. A. Haughwout, an Episcopal rector, that it is pro-Catholic, radical, and anti-patriotic. Professors Hayes and Moon are Roman Catholics, but their book, as far as appears from the passages cited as objectionable, embodies the views now commonly held by historical scholars about such subjects as the Reformation and democracy. Needless to say, the views are not altogether acceptable to thick-and-thin Protestants and embattled hundred-percenters. It seems pretty late in the day, however, to challenge the book on those grounds, and entirely arbitrary to strike it from the list by the fiat of a single official. If at any points the book is erroneous or injudicious its mistakes should be corrected, but we hope that neither authors nor publishers will allow themselves to be coerced into "revising" the book to still patriotic or religious clamor. The country had a dose of such "revision" during the World War, and it does not need another.

THERE IS ONE SOUTHERN MAYOR who believes that he is the mayor of all the people in his town and not of one race alone. This phenomenon is twenty-seven years old; he is mayor of a town in Oklahoma. When he ran for office he promised a square deal to everybody, even to Negroes, and marvelous to say he was elected. The other day when William Pickens, a field agent for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, reached his city to make an address the mayor actually met him at the station and took part in the meeting. He even went so far as to address his Negro audience as "ladies and gentlemen." He declared, in the presence of some white friends and relatives, that he belonged to the new order in the South and that he regarded colored folk as a part of the people of the community having the same rights as all others. As Mr. Pickens tells the story in the Crisis, the mayor publicly joined the association and subscribed for the Crisis. More than that, he told the audience that when an excited elderly white lady had stormed into his office exclaiming "What are you going to do about it? What are you going to do about it—the niggers—the niggers are taking our section of the town?" he quietly remarked: "Madam, I am not going to do anything about it. There is law in the land, and they are not violating it. They've a right to do what they are doing." This is, fortunately, one of the many signs that the new generation of whites in the South is not going to be bound by the cant and the prejudices of its seniors.

Ballyhoover

THE Hoover Administration is bankrupt—intellectually, morally, and politically. Lacking sturdy moral principles and a considered plan of action, it has failed to offer to Congress and the country a sorely needed leadership; and today, at the end of only fourteen months, it finds itself discredited in the eyes of all classes of people. The business men who put up the money to elect Mr. Hoover on the theory that they were getting a great business executive with "an engineering mind" are becoming disgusted with his inability to deliver the goods, though publicly they may place the blame elsewhere. The faithful party workers who run campaigns and win elections are disturbed and confused by his lack of political sense. The plain men who voted for him in the comfortable assurance of a continuance of Coolidge prosperity now listen resentfully to the blare of the loud speaker predicting good times just around the corner, while they study the red figures in their little profit-and-loss accounts or tramp the streets looking for a job. The farmers, granted the ineffable boon of the Farm Board, are trading in their dollar wheat for the stone of the Grundy tariff. The prohibitionists, who were going to see the prohibition law effectively enforced, see what they see. The peace-lovers and the taxpayers of the country, who looked forward to a Quaker President reducing needless military burdens, see the fiasco of London and the big-navy advocates planning to take advantage of it and build up to parity with Great Britain. There does seem to be a reasonable prospect of our getting out of Haiti if Mr. Hoover does not weaken; but if there is another substantial achievement to put to the credit of his Administration it is hard to think what it is.

What is the explanation of this political bankruptcy? To our mind it is a double one. Partly the situation is due to the defects of Mr. Hoover's own mind and character. Partly it indicates the hollowness of the political system that he represents.

During the whole of Mr. Hoover's public life he has shown an incorrigible tendency to substitute words for action, to become a hero by publicity, not by deeds. The disappointed millions who today still worship their image of the Hoover of the far-off days of Belgian relief might well remember the blistering words with which Mr. Leffingwell greeted Mr. Hoover's appointment as food controller on our entrance into the war. Never, perhaps, has any other person had a personal publicity machine as powerful and effective as the one that made Herbert Hoover President of the United States. Lauded as a great engineer with a broad knowledge of economic facts and a deep understanding of economic principles, he has displayed consistently a contempt for facts and an ignorance or indifference in respect to principles that would have disgraced a sophomore.

When Mr. Hoover entered the White House we were bound head on for a business smash due to insane stock speculation. The facts were notorious; even at that time it was not too late to avoid the worst effects of the speculative mania; the machinery of control was at hand in the Federal Reserve System; informed and conservative men in the banking world itself had been urging its use. No more imperative duty could have confronted an intelligent and economically minded President than to help put backbone into a weak Federal Reserve Board. For eight wild months the President did nothing, and then the catastrophe came. We do not say that President Hoover could have prevented that disaster. We do say that he did not lift a finger to prevent it, though he had, by virtue of his position and reputation, a unique opportunity and responsibility.

We are now in the seventh disastrous month of business depression consequent on that smash. What has been the contribution of the Administration during that period? First, a series of spectacular and enormously advertised conferences with business leaders out of which was to come an impossible stimulation of construction that would have been economically unsound if it could have been brought about. Second, a deliberate suppression of the facts of depression and unemployment, and a deliberate attempt to persuade the country that things were going well. Give the President full credit for believing that that is the way to make them go well, his theory and his action are still those of the publicity man, not of the economist and statesman; they bring scant comfort to the embarrassed business man or the desperate worker out of a job. On May 1 the President announced: "While the crash only took place six months ago I am convinced we have passed the worst and with continued unity of effort we shall rapidly recover." Two days later the stock market crashed again. And for the future? A commission, sometime, to study the economic forces behind booms and depressions; but it will not be appointed "until the present slight disorder has completely subsided and a proper perspective is afforded." What bosh!

The same weakness, disregard of facts, neglect of sound principles, and lack of leadership, combined with the same blatant and hollow publicity that have marked the President's handling of the business situation, have characterized also his treatment of disarmament, farm relief, the tariff taxation, prohibition, and all the other issues he has touched But then to crown the story he appoints as chairman of the national committee of his party his personal friend, a powe lobbyist who speculates with lobby funds, and when it i all made public the President, for some mysterious reason does not dare to kick him out.

It is not pleasant thus to criticize the Chief Executive but it is necessary; for President Hoover is only the perfec example of a bad system of government that the American people ought no longer to tolerate. It is a system of government by publicity and bluff, not by reasoned policie grounded in an honest study of facts. It is a system o expedients and compromises based on no moral, political or economic principles. It creates no genuine political issues it carries on no real process of public education. Both old parties alike are a part of that system, and both alike are bankrupt. We need today a new political group, respectfu of facts, brought together on real issues, holding real principles, ready to go out and fight for them and to suffe defeat for them if necessary. It is our only alternativ to government by ballyhoo.

Let India Go!

GANDHI has been arrested under an ordinance of 1827 under which he will be held without trial. The results of this action cannot be recorded as we go to press, but the situation will certainly not grow less acute. Censorship on press messages to and from India was put into effect shortly after the Mahatma's arrest.

According to one of the followers of Gandhi writing in an Indian journal, passive resistance, or satyagraha (literally, insistence on truth), will "succeed" in one of three ways. Gandhi and his associates may die in the attempt to stand by truth, but their deaths would be instrumental in the spread of the truth for which they died; forces of violence may be released which will sweep the British out of India; or the Mahatma will "convert" Great Britain, presumably to the point of giving India her independence. Another result which seems all too likely in view of Gandhi's arrest is that forces of Nationalist and other violence will be released; these in turn will be met with British violence; thousands of Indians will be killed and a few Britishers; India will be subdued.

But will it? The urge to govern one's self or at least to cease to be governed by someone else grows from a stubborn and deep seed. That urge cannot be killed, though it may be retarded, either by suppression and bloodshed or by kindness and sweet reasonableness. The Englishman, almost any Englishman, says: "If we withdraw from India there will be chaos. The peasants will suffer most." The Englishman also says: "The Nationalist forces in India are negligible. The masses do not care about self-government. Besides, there is no unity in India." And behind all these words is the economic fact—of which the Englishman may or may not be conscious as he speaks in favor of holding on to India—that England needs India; and the further fact that at several vital economic points what is good for India is not good for England.

There seems little doubt that if England should withdraw from India there would be chaos. But the Nationalist says, "We would rather have chaos under our own rule than have order imposed by someone else." And the Nationalist cannot be ignored. The argument that Nationalists are only a handful means nothing. There have never been more than a handful of revolutionaries in any revolution yet recorded. As for the masses, the "dumb millions" as Gandhi calls them, of what real relevance is their attitude if they have any? If it were relevant, who could claim their allegiance with more confidence, Lord Irwin or Mahatma Gandhi? Finally, with regard to the economic or real reason for withholding self-government, whether it be called dominion status or independence—and Gandhi has made it clear that the terms are interchangeable in his mind—England cannot forever weigh the scales in her favor with the artificial weights of regiments and cruisers.

The idea of national liberty is abroad in India for better or for worse. Censorship of newspapers will not affect it. Neither will the arrest of Gandhi. If England is wise and farseeing the Simon Commission, whose report is momentarily expected, will find that India is ready for dominion status.

The Five-Year Plan

THE daily press reports that the opening, three months ahead of time, of the new 1,700-mile Russian railroad, the "Turksib" road from Turkestan to Siberia, has led to increased confidence in the success of Moscow's proposal to compress the Five-Year Plan into four years. To us this proposal seems a great mistake. Even five years is too short a period in which to achieve as much as is planned without the heavy toll exacted by the inevitable waste of such extraordinary speed. That colossal blunders are being made at a great cost the Communists themselves do not deny; they declare, however, that speed is absolutely essential and the extra price thereof a secondary consideration.

This is not a complete answer. The very immensity of the plan creates a tremendous burden for inexperienced executives called upon suddenly to coordinate the elements essential to success. Those familiar with large industrial undertakings know that the real strain does not come during the period when plans are being made. This is largely the stage in which the Soviets find themselves today. Thus, the government recently signed a contract with Albert Kahn, Inc., of Detroit, to supervise the construction of plants upon which, if we may trust the all but unbelievable report of the New York Times, $1,900,000,000 are to be spent in 1930 alone. It remains, of course, to be seen how rapidly the 552 plants and factories to be started in this year under Kahn's supervision will actually progress. It seems impossible that the manufacturing facilities of the Soviets will be able to meet all the tremendous demand for steel, cement, lumber, power, and the hundreds of various kinds of material required for the Kahn program alone. Today we hear that, with relatively little of this work under way, the Soviets are not able to supply the necessary building materials on schedule time. If this should necessitate a sudden turning to foreign countries for additional materials, that would in itself disarrange the Five-Year Plan, its budget not being prepared for any such contingency.

That certain industries, such as tractor and automobile plants, can be expanded rapidly is perfectly true. The great basic industries, however, such as coal and ore mining, respond but slowly to new development. It usually takes from three to five years to develop mines to the point where they can achieve production. It is obvious that the new shafts ought to be driven with great speed, but it is a fact that production of iron ores and the non-ferrous metals is far behind schedule. There is a difference of opinion as to how much new construction has actually taken place in the steel industry, about which after all the whole industrial plan revolves. Statistics showing increased production in this and all other lines are impressive, but they start from a base seventeen years old. Similarly impressive figures could be shown in comparable lines in most countries. In Russia, so far, increased production has come essentially from more efficient use of hitherto existing equipment and man power. Future increases must come from new construction.

If it is, however, assumed that all the projected construction can be accomplished with enormous effort within the time-limit set, the fact remains that when plants and equipment are ready they cannot be operated unless there are enough trained executives and skilled workmen on hand. Can the Soviets obtain sufficient engineers and executives to run efficiently all their industrial plants as they are today, to say nothing about the 552 plants of the Kahn program alone? Yet it is on the operation of the plants that the Soviets will stand or fall. The Russian people will not complain if the Five-Year Plan is not finished on time provided they are getting some proof that mass production of the necessities they so sorely need is under way. The outer world will have no reason to sneer, for even if the Five-Year Plan should be lengthened to ten the achievement would still be nothing short of miraculous. Unfortunately, workmen cannot be trained over night to make accurate machine tools and to work with the precision that modern industry demands. The Russians will therefore have to rely more and more upon foreign engineering aid. But here the critical situation in foreign exchange has caused the Soviets to reduce the pay offered to foreigners for engineering services to 60 per cent of the former figures. This will compel American firms seeking to maintain their normal profit ratio to substitute cheaper engineers, or else reputable firms will find the lure of a high profit ratio in Russia disappearing and will turn their attention elsewhere.

As a final example of the dangers of the Five-Year Plan, when lately a huge electric project was started where it was impossible to market more than 30 per cent of its output, there was a tremendous strain on the finances of the government, which found itself compelled to create plants in cities to absorb the surplus power. All of these considerations will count heavily in the decision, not only as to whether or not Russia can instal mass production, but also whether or not it can deliver goods in mass of sufficient cheapness to bring the cost of living within the reach of Russian working men and women. If this can actually be achieved with such speed it will constitute a miracle.

Antique or Golden Oak

THE April number of the Theatre Guild Magazine contains an interesting article entitled Siam Prefers the Movies. It seems that on the occasion of a recent royal celebration the author, L. L. Robbins, had an opportunity of witnessing the traditional dramatic entertainments of the country, but he reports that the spectators were neither very numerous nor very enthusiastic. The ballet, the acrobatic pantomime, and the shadow picture were regarded for a few minutes with languid interest and then the crowd drifted away toward the cinema where Tom Mix was being lustily cheered as he galloped across the screen in the general direction of distressed virtue.

Siam is westernized. The royal garage is now far more important than the stables where the royal elephants are kept and westernization means more than improved sanitation and new means of transportation, for it does something to the psychology of the population. Formerly the people had delighted in the traditional representation of the familiar tale; now, like the westerner, they demand the surprise inherent in the new story and they find it in the products of Hollywood. In Bangkok today there is not, says Mr. Robbins, a single theater where the native drama is regularly performed, but there are half a dozen large picture houses.

What is happening there is, of course, happening in every out-of-the-way corner of the earth. Whenever primitive people are supplied with the products of the machine civilization they accept them with uncritical enthusiasm, and they value our vulgarities quite as highly as the benefits of our labor-saving devices. It is said, for instance, that the Japanese peasants now throw away the color prints so much sought after by collectors and replace them with gaudy lithographs supplied by the Singer Sewing Machine Company. But we do not, of course, need to go so far afield for illustrations of the same sort. Many a Park Avenue apartment is now furnished with the early American furniture which was thrown out of New England farmhouses to make way for the golden oak of Grand Rapids. The student of balladry who goes to the North Carolina mountains in search of the art which was kept alive from the seventeenth century down to the time when the railroad came will find in the cabin a phonograph blaring forth the ditties of tin-pan alley, while only the octogenarian dozing in the corner can be persuaded to recall a few fragments of the all-but-forgotten songs of his youth.

This process of vulgarization involves certain problems of psychology and of aesthetics which have never been satisfactorily solved. It is all very well to say cynically that it is in the nature of man to choose the worst and that, for example, a dignified table of maple was never accepted except faute de mieux, in the absence of golden oak. But the explanation will not hold water. It is far too obvious that the makers of even primitive furniture were artists with an instinctive sense of style and that the beauty of their work is not—at least entirely—either something imposed upon them by the limitations of their material or something merely imagined by us because we find the work "quaint." Yet it is not easy to reconcile the gift of the primitive cabinet-maker or the primitive minstrel with his willingness to accept, in the course of one generation at most, the wretched substitutes which he so readily comes to admire. Doubtless it is easier, and perhaps it is cheaper, to send to Grand Rapids; but there is no doubt that he actually prefers the uglier thing. And thus it seems impossible to explain away either the reality of his native capacities or the ease with which they are corrupted.

Various explanations have been offered. In the case of the Japanese and his pictures, it has, for example, been suggested that the lithograph does possess certain artistic virtues—a highly developed perspective, for instance—which the color prints do not and that these virtues, now banal to us, strike fresh on the eye of the peasant. Moreover, this type of explanation has been extended. There are, it is said, merits in jazz and movies and golden oak so familiar that we do not see them, but very real to the remote people who get them for the first time. But though there is doubtless something in the explanation it is hardly sufficient. The mystery remains and we must rest content with the conclusion that taste, though it may be a relatively feeble thing, is rarer than creative genius. It is lost on the first contact with the flashiness and variety of complicated civilizations, and it is only through long cultivation that the sophisticated man gets back as much of it as the simple man had before he was bewildered by the strangeness of the products dumped upon him from the factories.

THE next time that Mr. Hoover has an impulse to talk about national prosperity and the financial state of the country I trust that he will count ten before saying a word and then appoint a commission. Every time the President makes an optimistic speech the stock market breaks wildly. And that is no accident but a definite and tangible criticism of one of Herbert Hoover's cardinal faults. Wall Street has its own peculiar defects but in the main the stock manipulators are realistic men. The general public is romantic and can be moved to enthusiasm even in harsh times. But the bigger plungers have no illusions. They are not much moved by rosy dreams. Earnings statements are more important to them than epigrams of good cheer. And it seems to be their concerted decision that President Hoover is not a frank person.

Indeed, according to their interpretation his words are useful only when construed in direct reverse. When words of cheer come out of Washington they know that the Chief Executive is worried. His statement that the crisis is over means to them that stormy days are still ahead. It is not necessary, of course, that any President should mold his conduct in such a way as to please the gambling fraternity of the stock market, but it is hardly praiseworthy for the nation's leader to cloak himself in the folds of indirection. Nobody can say that President Hoover has faced the present economic situation with complete clarity and courage.

To be sure, he did not start from scratch. Like all his Republican predecessors he was elected to a large extent upon the potency of a lie. The voter, who sometimes seems a little less than bright, has swallowed the familiar fallacy that there is some peculiar magic in protection which makes for prosperity. So strong and widespread is this belief that a number of Democrats have been all but persuaded. Even Al Smith was a partial convert and tried to take the tariff out of politics by insisting that he had no desire to do more than maybe snip an inch or so away in certain of the most mountainous places. His decision to stoop a little in the house of Rimmon was among his most fatal flaws in tactics. He lost his home State of New York because even friendly followers felt that a Republican Administration would be better for business.

So faithful are the people of America to tradition that even now they cannot be convinced that there is something fundamentally wrong in the notion of prospering at the expense of the other fellow. Three-card-monte men continue to flourish at fairs in rural communities because they trick the farmers into believing that the player can put something over on the entrepreneur. It is a common custom for some accomplice of the professional gambler to turn the corner of a card when the principal is not looking. The eager farmer hen rushes in to bet and finds that he has been deceived. But he never seems to get wise to the catch in the Republican high tariff. Even though he pays prodigious royalties on all he buys he still sits back content in the belief that he is being protected against the pauper labor of Europe. The trength of the whole protectionist cause lies in this assumpion that we are putting something over on somebody. According to the theory we are to sell high to Europe and buy cheap. Never a tick of sympathy is aroused for this same so-called pauper labor in foreign lands. The poor peasant is to work for us.

The Republican Party is still acting as if we lived in the days of clipper ships and supported ourselves by the process of taking in each other's rum and homespun. Those same Republicans who argue against entangling alliances have the belief that isolationism may also be practiced in our business life. Or at least a one-sided isolation. We are to sell our surplus for a good round sum to the rest of the world and take in return no goods of any consequence. Possibly it is unfair to Mr. Hoover to make even a passing reference to rum. In all his public utterances he has been stalwart enough in preaching the creed of abstinence and strict enforcement. He does not seem conscious of the reproach inherent in his recent demand for more federal prisons and bigger ones. Apparently his conscience troubles him not at all over the fact that he is lord of the largest convict population ever known in these United States. The idea that it might be better to have fewer crimes and fewer criminals has not entered his head.

As an ardent Al Smith man, I may be unduly partisan in my feeling toward President Hoover. It would be foolish to deny him credit for certain considerable achievements. He performed excellent work in regard to the distressed conditions in Haiti. His efforts toward limitation of armaments, although indecisive, have been valuable and his espousal of the World Court has been far warmer than that of his predecessors. Nor would I deny for a moment that Herbert Clark Hoover is a man of far greater intellectual grasp than, let us say, Calvin Coolidge. There is no point in drawing the memory of poor Warren Harding into the discussion.

But Coolidge never made any claims for himself as a great liberal leader. And none were made for him. Mr. Hoover, on the other hand, was distinctly identified by himself and others as the white hope of a new social order. The World, at a time when its liberalism seemed more rampant than at the moment, seriously urged his candidacy upon either Democrats or Republicans. The Scripps-Howard papers, which supported La Follette for President and Norman Thomas for Mayor of New York, swallowed Mr. Hoover almost whole in the 1928 campaign. To the credit of this liberal chain of journals it is only fair to say that their serious digestive disturbances since the election have not been kept a secret from their readers.

And by what possible test can Herbert Hoover be considered a liberal now? Surely few Republican Presidents have used the power of nominating the members of the Supreme Court for political purposes in any way more brazen than President Hoover. Even a Tammany leader might have hesitated before sending in the name of John J. Parker. Nobody expects a man elected by Republican votes to act as a pure Marxian Socialist upon assuming office, but the time has come for every liberal who supported Hoover in the last campaign to rise to his feet and disown him.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Pennsylvania's Battle Royal

By RICHARD J. BEAMISH

THE protective tariff is a vital issue in the amazing Republican primary campaign in Pennsylvania. Let not those who hope for lower tariffs with increasing regard for international relations hurrah prematurely upon reading that statement. The battle is not for decreased schedules. The issue is Smoot-Hawley high tariff versus Grundy higher tariff.

James John Davis came from Washington into the sacred precincts of the Union League of Philadelphia for a luncheon rally on April 24 bearing this message:

> The tariff about to be enacted is absolutely satisfactory. A few schedules might have been raised a little but upon the whole the job is mighty fine. Prosperity will come immediately after its signing by the President. Unemployment will disappear from the land. It is the ideal Republican tariff. I sat in with the Joint Conference Committee of Congress during its final stages pinch-hitting for Senator Reed, who is in London, and aided in shaping the pig-iron and cement adjustments. I favor a tariff upon the products of all foreign industries competing with American industries.

Former Mayor J. Hampton Moore of Philadelphia, Justice John W. Kephart of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, Samuel M. Vauclain, chairman of the board of directors of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, and fifty other assorted capitalists applauded the last declaration rapturously.

Joseph R. Grundy read the Davis declaration half an hour later. He reasoned, as did everybody politically wise in Philadelphia, that the Secretary of Labor made his speech with the full knowledge and approval of President Hoover. That deduction gave significance to the comment of Pennsylvania's junior Senator:

> That talk by Davis [he said] is nonsense. The tariff bill we are about to pass is the worst in the history of the country. For the most part it is the work of mere theorists and half-baked economists. The expert who was the biggest factor in writing it is a Democrat and doesn't believe in the protective-tariff theory.
> No Republican who is a student of industrial conditions today is satisfied with the measure so sonorously praised by Secretary Davis. Immediately after it becomes a law I will set out to wipe it off the statute books. I will embark upon a campaign to elect delegates to the next national convention who will insist upon the adoption of a platform which will enunciate Republican demands for a real protective tariff and the nomination of a ticket that will square itself with that declaration.

The immediate effect of these pronouncements was the alignment of Pennsylvania Republicans into Hoover high tariffites on one side and Grundy higher tariffites on the other. The defiant Grundy statement is generally taken to be directed toward the White House. It is notice to the President that he need expect no Pennsylvania support for renomination if he continues to urge tariff schedules lower than the Grundy standards. The Davis statement was modified the following day when, after a Cabinet session, the Secretary of Labor was hustled back to Philadelphia by airplane to tell an amazed crowd at a meeting of the League of Women Voters that all the newspapers were wrong in quoting him to the effect that the Hawley-Smoot tariff is a good measure. "What I did say," he shouted, "was that the bill will be passed and that it will bring prosperity and remove unemployment"—which amounts to what he said the preceding day.

John M. Hemphill, Democratic candidate for Governor, defined the tariff stand of Pennsylvania Democrats at the same meeting to be adherence to protection that will care for the working people and will not be used to reward the friends and punish the foes of the Republicans who make the tariff. His pronouncement developed no applause. From no quarter comes any voice for lowering of tariff schedules. Sedgwick Kistler, Democratic candidate for Senator, is silent and Francis H. Bohlen, wet candidate for the same high office, makes the old-fashioned Republican declaration for a high tariff.

The Broadway Athletic Club a decade ago gave its patrons a battle royal every Saturday night. Ten husky Negroes fought for a ten-dollar bill offered by Diamond Lew Bailey, the generous promoter of the Broadway, the survivor receiving the total purse. It was gaudy and gory entertainment. Often the money went to some wily little fellow who did most of his execution by sneaking behind the more robust boxers engaged in trading punch for punch, and clipping each behind the ear with a boxing glove in which the hand had been reinforced by a bit of lead.

The Pennsylvania Republican primary brings Diamond Lew Bailey's idea into politics. The organization slate includes Francis Shunk Brown for Governor, James J. Davis for Senator, Philip H. Dewey for Secretary of Internal Affairs, George W. Maxey for the Supreme Court, and James Drew for the Superior Court. Deals are being made by which each of these will be traded off in various communities and by various interests in return for votes to be cast for anti-slate candidates.

Opposed to Davis is Joseph R. Grundy, sitting Senator through appointment by Governor Fisher. He is running alone. His running mate was to have been former State Treasurer Samuel S. Lewis of York County—but that's another story. Former Governor Gifford Pinchot is also fighting the organization slate in his campaign for the gubernatorial nomination. Charles Armstrong of Armstrong County is running with him for Lieutenant Governor. The Association Against the Prohibition Amendment has put a wet ticket in the field. Francis H. Bohlen, professor in the law school of the University of Pennsylvania, is its candidate for the Senate, Thomas W. Phillips for Governor, and Charles Dorrance for Lieutenant Governor. Judge Drew and Judge Maxey, the candidates slated for the Superior and the Supreme Courts, are opposed by Judge Graff and Judge McDade, while James F. Woodward and F. A. Godcharles are battling against Philip H. Dewey, former master of the State Grange, who is the slated candidate for Secretary of Internal Affairs.

To understand the tangle and its unlimited possibilities for throat-cutting, trading, and skullduggery generally, it is necessary to turn back to February, when Bill Vare was in the field as a Senatorial candidate demanding vindication and an indorsement by the Philadelphia and Pittsburgh machines. He was at St. Lucie, Florida, wintering luxuriously in the big house where Quay, McNichol, and lesser men had framed Pennsylvania tickets. (Incidentally, organization men are saying that neither Quay nor Penrose would have permitted the toils and broils in which the machine finds itself today.) The war board of the Philadelphia organization—Big Tom Cunningham, Councilman Charlie Hall, and State Senator Sam Salus—went down from Philadelphia with a demand that Vare withdraw his candidacy because the war board wanted to get behind another Philadelphian, Francis Shunk Brown, for Governor. Vare bluntly refused. Two weeks later he was summoned to Philadelphia and given "the works." The Vare Construction Company has a large and profitable contract with the Pennsylvania Railroad. W. W. Atterbury, president of the Pennsylvania, is the Pennsylvania member of the Republican National Committee and is overlord of the Philadelphia war board. Besides his contract with the Pennsylvania Railroad Vare has other jobs with the Bell Telephone Company and other public-utility corporations. The pressure applied to the partially paralyzed former boss of the Quaker City was too great to be resisted. He withdrew, Brown was slated, and James J. Davis, who had previously been a candidate for the gubernatorial nomination, was selected for Senator.

Here arose a complication. Pittsburgh, which Davis claims as his residence, is also the home of Senior Senator Dave Reed. Davis's election would leave eastern Pennsylvania without a Senator. So the busy little press clique that gathers around Davis in Washington circulated a story to the effect that he would resign the Senatorship at the end of two years if elected, to make way for a man from Philadelphia.

Another problem facing the war board and Atterbury was the candidacy of Samuel S. Lewis for Governor. To remove it, they argued, would be to assure Brown's nomination. A minor concern was the candidacy of Thomas W. Phillips for the same office on a wet platform. The fear and hatred of the Mellons for Gifford Pinchot were invoked to bring about the removal of Lewis, and Andrew W. Mellon's birthday dinner in Pittsburgh was the occasion for the announcement of his death sentence. Governor Fisher, who has occasionally been loyal to Grundy but always superserviceable to Mellon, then told Grundy that he would oppose Lewis, and the Mellons made the same declaration. Lewis withdrew from the race and Grundy left in a rage.

For twenty-four hours it was believed that Grundy also would withdraw his Senatorial candidacy. That expectation was shattered when in an explosive formal statement he denounced Atterbury as the head of the Philadelphia gang, said that he would remain in the battle to the finish, and named as the outstanding issue of the campaign the plot of the corrupt Philadelphia machine to take over the State administration. Immediately afterward came a declaration by Lieutenant Governor Arthur James that he was remaining in the fight as an anti-organization candidate for the Supreme Court against Maxey, who was generally said to be the hand-picked candidate of Atterbury. Vare was for James, but the pressure that had removed his own candidacy operated to blot out his advocacy of James and the latter finally withdrew from the field, nursing his grievance. The minor problem of a wet ticket assumed major importance when the Philadelphia Record printed a story telling of immense pressure upon seven wet leaders to bring them into line for the ticket headed by Davis and Brown. One wing of the wets said it would be satisfied if Brown would say he was for a State-wide referendum upon Pennsylvania's prohibition-enforcement measure, the Snyder Act. Others, led by Raymond Pitcairn, musician, poet, and multimillionaire, said that nothing short of a statement by Brown flatly opposing the Eighteenth Amendment would be satisfactory. Congressman James M. Beck, Charles B. Hall, and Brown himself mulled over this proposition for a day, and Brown finally made a declaration for a referendum. The reply of Phillips, Pitcairn, Bohlen, and Robert Kelso Cassatt to the Brown statement was withering. The candidate was called a straddler, and the wets went into the battle with a vengeance.

Misfortune after misfortune now came to the beleaguered Davis-Brown outfit. Gifford Pinchot declared that 100,000 of the 500,000 names on the registration lists of Philadelphia were illegally there and demanded their removal. The Committee of Seventy made a test canvass of 1,000 registrations and verified Pinchot's charge by conclusive proof that in some gang-controlled divisions the illegal enrolment exceeded 25 per cent. The registration commission got to work and more than 30,000 names were removed from the rolls. Pinchot served notice upon public-utility companies and corporations generally that contributions either openly or by indirection to the gang's war chest for this campaign would be followed closely and punished relentlessly. The effect of this was unprecedented drought and the dreadful prospect before the gang leaders that they would be compelled for the first time in their lives to operate with some of their own money. O.P.M.—other people's money—has been the motto of these gentlemen hitherto.

But a greater woe was to come. Grundy repeated before a Senate committee his charges that Atterbury is the real head of the Philadelphia gang and that leaders of that crowd have secret and corrupt arrangements by which they receive juicy contracts and shares in profitable secret deals. A special investigating committee of the Senate, with Gerald P. Nye as its chairman, was named to probe these allegations and others that poured in upon the committee. Three undercover agents of the committee are working in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh upon these charges.

The situation of the Davis-Brown ticket, the only complete slate in the field, is that of an army attacked from three sides. Pinchot, its principal opponent, appears to have the virtually solid support of the drys everywhere and the confidence of all who have noted impartially his administration of the governor's office from 1922 to 1926. Grundy is opposing Brown and the Philadelphia gang even more viciously and effectively than in his onslaught upon Davis. To the Philadelphia organization the success of Grundy in his battle means the dismemberment of their city committee with its "Band of Brothers," the loss of thousands of places now held by their followers, and the greater loss of millions of dollars in contracts and pickings by themselves. Grundy has some followers among Philadelphia ward leaders now, and others will come as his prospects for victory increase.

The wets are making a stirring battle. They are led by wealthy amateurs who are battling unconventionally. Charles Denby, Jr., son-in-law of Senator David A. Reed—who, incidentally, is remaining in Europe far from the primary snarl—and nephew of the former Secretary of the Navy, is chairman of the Philadelphia city committee of the wets. They are making their principal drive against Brown and what they call his "straddle referendum." Indications are that Phillips will receive 100,000 votes in Philadelphia, virtually all of which would naturally have gone to Brown.

When Gifford Pinchot announced his candidacy in February his chances appeared hopeless. Now he has better than an even chance to win. Besides the drys he will get the votes of thousands of miners and of other unionized workers. The tumultuous greeting when he arose in the meeting of the League of Women Voters was audible evidence of the support he will get from women throughout the State. Grundy's fierce opposition to Brown plus the inroads upon the Brown strength by the wets gives to Pinchot advocates basis for their prediction that he will be nominated. The battle between Grundy and Davis is more even, with Davis apparently the stronger just now. Indications are that the surprise of the election will be the wet vote.

Combinations are encountered everywhere. In South Philadelphia, where voters of Italian and Russian birth and descent abound, the opposition to the immigration policy of Davis and the wet tendency of the voters have produced a number of Grundy and Phillips clubs. The Pittsburgh Press of the Scripps-Howard chain has declared for Pinchot and Bohlen. The Committee of Seventy, Philadelphia's veteran reform organization, is generally following the lead of its chairman, Thomas Raeburn White, who declared for Pinchot and Grundy. In the anthracite region, there are Bohlen-Pinchot clubs, Davis-Pinchot labor committees, and Grundy-Pinchot groups. Organization wards in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh have Grundy-Brown and Davis-Phillips drives. The battle royal is on.

Safety Last

I. How Safe Is the Subway?*

By LOUIS RESNICK

I HAVE before me a letter from the vice-president of one of the largest publishing houses in America urging me to buy a book on accident prevention, which says: "The Union Pacific System cut its casualty losses almost 600 per cent" and "E. I. du Pont de Nemours and Company reduced its accident rate 175 per cent." I have before me also an invitation to visit the Interborough (New York City) Rapid Transit Company's safety exhibit, which says: "In spite of necessary overloading, the subway has killed in twelve years only twenty-seven passengers; making it not only the safest railroad in the world, but the safest place to be except home in bed." And there is on my desk a "Manual for Speakers," published by the National Safety Council, which advises the four-minute men of the safety movement to tell the world that "every two years—despite the automobile—we save enough lives, as compared with the 1907 rate, to replace our sacrifices in France."

In the face of these and other widely circulated claims concerning accident-reduction records, one should, perhaps, hesitate to ask: Has the safety movement failed? And one would hesitate if there didn't happen to come across one's desk, month after month and year after year, other records—less advertised, but more authentic—showing steady increases in the numbers of men, women, and children killed or injured by preventable accidents. The fact of the matter is that more people are being killed and mutilated by accidents in the United States now than at any time since the beginning of the safety movement twenty years ago. This will be shown presently from the records of government bureaus, employers' associations, insurance companies, and the several safety associations themselves.

It is true that the Union Pacific System, the United States Steel Corporation, the Pullman Company, and some other big industrial organizations have made accident prevention as important a factor as production or sales and so have brought about striking permanent reductions in their accident rates. It is equally true, however, that the bulk of American industry is made up of small plants (there are more than 100,000) and that the vast majority of these—more than 90 per cent, in the opinion of close students of the safety movement—pay little or no attention to accident prevention. The good records of a few big companies are given the most widespread and repeated publicity; the poor records of a hundred thousand little companies and of many of the big corporations are rarely mentioned. The same is true of accidents outside of industry, in our homes, on our streets, and in other public places. And so most of us are lulled into the belief that great progress is being made in the safety movement—if the day of no accidents isn't actually just around the corner.

Examination of the records brings to light a different picture. Let us see, for instance, how the Interborough's statement that the subways of New York City killed only twenty-seven passengers in twelve years compares with the facts. There is in New York a Transit Commission, appointed by the governor, which records data concerning subway accidents from sworn records submitted by the transportation companies. The records of this commission show that in 1928 alone 92 passengers were killed on the combined subway and elevated lines of New York City. In the same year 14,591 passengers were injured on these lines. The year before 103 passengers were killed and 13,386 passengers were injured. The 1928 total included 18 I. R. T. passengers who were killed and 100 who were injured in one accident in "the safest place to be, except home in bed."

Records of the Transit Commission show that during the twelve years from 1917 to 1928, inclusive, the subways of New York (including their elevated subsidiaries) killed not 27, but 870 passengers—counting only those who were killed instantly or who died within ten days of the accident—and injured 138,000 more. On the I. R. T. system alone, according to Transit Commission records, 542 passengers were killed and 117,089 injured in these twelve years. The commission's records bulk subway and elevated accidents, as both lines are operated by one company and what is subway in one part of New York becomes elevated line in another part of the city.

The figures given in this table are a matter of public record, being taken directly from the annual reports of the Transit Commission. The figures in the text, based on the first five columns of this table, apply to passengers only. The last two columns given above, showing all persons killed and injured, include not only passengers, but also employees and "others"—mostly employees, "others" probably being trespassers.

Analysis of the company's operating costs, however, discloses that 30 per cent of the expense on account of injuries is incurred on the elevated division and 70 per cent on the subway division. Applying this ratio to the casualty list of the combined system, we find that 379 passengers (not 27) were killed and 82,000 injured on the subway division of the I. R. T. alone during the twelve years from 1917 to 1928.

Incidentally, the Transit Commission reports show that "expenses on account of injuries and damages" among the New York City passenger-transportation companies have risen steadily from $3,202,000 in 1921 to $5,469,000 in 1928. In eight years these companies (or shall we say their passengers?) have spent $38,000,000 "on account of injury and damage." This went for such items as claim-department expenses, claims for injuries to employees, "other injuries and damages," salaries of attorneys, "court costs and expenses," and "other expenses."

The mathematical genius who decided that the Union Pacific System had reduced its accidents to 500 per cent less than nothing and that the Du Pont Company went 75 per cent beyond perfection in accident prevention is a piker when compared to the author of "Subway Safety," a booklet of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company, issued on October 5, 1928. This booklet says:

> To ride in the Interborough Subway is 22 times safer than to be on the streets of New York City. It is 28 times safer than riding in an automobile. It is about 400 times safer than going in swimming. Believe it or not, a subway ride is even 6 times safer than to stay at home and 14 times safer than merely to live in the United States. These are not guesses; they are comparisons of official records.
> The vividest way to express the hazards that accompany any human act is by the number of years needed by that mathematical window dummy, labeled the average man, to kill himself doing it. If no one died except by accident life in the United States would last 1,255 years, which figure is the present death-rate by accident divided into the population. . . . At present death-rates the average person using the New York City streets will die by accident after 1,600 years of spending eight hours a day on them. The average autoist will last only 1,200 years. Even the person who stays all day at home cannot escape a fatal accident for longer than about 2,000 years.
> But the average passenger in the Interborough subway, as is proved by comparing records of deaths, passengers, and minutes of average ride for the past ten years, could ride for twenty-four hours each day and three hundred and sixty-five days each year for 11,728 years before he would be killed in any kind of accident. The Interborough is not only the safest railroad in the world; it is the safest place in New York City except to be in bed asleep. It is even safer, statistics of home accidents show, than getting in or out of bed.

What more could one ask for a nickel?

This juggling of figures to give the appearance of great progress in accident prevention is not exactly characteristic of the entire safety movement; but it is not a rare instance. It is illustrative of a widespread tendency in the safety movement to be content with publicity rather than performance.

[A proof of Mr. Resnick's article was sent to the Interborough Rapid Transit Company. The company's comments on the article were forwarded to Mr. Resnick. We print herewith the reply of the I. R. T., together with a brief rejoinder by Mr. Resnick.—EDITOR THE NATION.

> The figures in the booklet "Subway Safety" of October 5, 1928, issued by this company are correct. The 542 passengers killed, referred to in your statement, are divided as follows:
> 27 were subway passengers who boarded the trains;
> 7 were elevated passengers who boarded the trains;
> 226 were suicides;
> 282 were trespassers and persons falling down stairs.
> You have properly stated that most of the deaths to passengers who actually boarded the trains were due to the serious accident in 1928. Of course, the tremendous increase in the number of passengers carried should also be taken into consideration.
> FRANK HEDLEY,
> President and General Manager

Mr. Resnick's reply to the statement of President Hedley is as follows:

> According to the reports of the Transit Commission, prepared on the basis of sworn statements submitted by the transportation companies themselves, during the years 1917 to 1928, inclusive, 542 passengers were killed on the I. R. T. system. During the twelve years, 1918 to 1929, inclusive, 613 passengers were killed. These totals do not include "employees killed" and "others killed," both of which groups are listed separately. Instead of reporting that 226 persons killed were suicides and 282, trespassers or persons falling downstairs, the commission simply reports 542 passengers killed. Mr. Freeman, of the Accident Bureau of the Transit Commission, has just confirmed by telephone what is apparent in the Transit Commission's annual report—namely, that fatalities to trespassers are included under the classification of "others," not under the classification of passengers.

Detroit's Crime Clinic

By J. A. FELLOWS

JUDGE FRANK MURPHY, of the Recorder's Court, since January first of this year has employed a new technique in handling all felony cases. In order that all factors bearing on the life or crime of the prisoner may be known, Judge Murphy refers every case to the Probation Department and the psychiatric clinic for complete examination and research. To minimize the effect of judicial temperament in passing sentence and to introduce more than one point of view into the judgment of the cases, he has established a sentencing board consisting of himself, the head of the Probation Department, and the chief of the psychiatric staff. These three meet in conference and decide on the sentence that will benefit most not only society, but the prisoner as well. At least one week is allowed for the tests and examinations and securing of information by the Probation Department. All significant data on the mental, physical, social, and economic status of the patient are included. The personality type and the presence or absence of criminal tendencies are established. When the investigation has been completed the sentencing board meets with the prisoner. At the end of this conference the prisoner is excused and the three members of the board decide what the sentence shall be. The sentence is later pronounced by the judge in open court in the regular way.

For the easy and accurate presentation of these case histories a most ingenious chart has been devised by Judge Murphy. It shows at a glance the hereditary and environmental influences at work on the individual and the frequent striking correlations between them. The general physical condition of the prisoner, past diseases, and diseases of ancestors which might have a bearing on the case are indicated on the chart. The mental age of the prisoner and all tendencies to insanity either in the prisoner or in his forebears are noted. His standing in society, his job or his lack of a job, his ability to cooperate, his economic condition—all are tabulated. One can learn instantly from the chart all the important influences in his life, from divorce to alcohol. The aid of such detailed and pertinent information in making a decision as to the probable future conduct of the subject cannot be overestimated. In fact, only with the help of such data, intelligently interpreted, can a fair, constructive sentence be passed. In the event of probation, the chart helps to solve the problem of environment. When a case is studied thus impartially and with a view to understanding all factors involved in the commission of crime, the harsh, punitive, and harmful element is automatically removed from the sentence. The prisoner feels that he has been fairly dealt with and is inclined to cooperate in bringing about his own rehabilitation. The resentment and hatred for society which most prisoners show are eliminated. The endless, destructive, and expensive chain of vengeance against the criminal and retaliatory vengeance on the part of the criminal against society is broken.

Judge Murphy's procedure of calm and unprejudiced inquiry is the only sure method of revealing the mentally sick and those unfortunate victims of circumstances who really have no criminal tendencies. The aim is scientific treatment of the former during their detention and probation for the latter wherever possible.

X was placed on probation after pleading guilty to the charge of Uttering and Publishing, one check for $74.25 furnishing the specific charge. Three checks in all had been written and the provision of his probation was restitution of the money. The case went through court in 1929. In February of this year X was arrested for violation of his probation, having failed to make his weekly payments. Commitment was recommended by the Probation Department on the ground that he was uncooperative and anti-social. The regular routine that has been established in Judge Murphy's court was carried out and the completed reports showed a very different situation. They revealed a real desire to cooperate, a valiant effort to care for his family during the hard times of the past winter, inability to obtain the necessary money for payments, and a lack of knowledge of the regulations of the Probation Department that required him to report when a payment was due, whether he had the money or not. As a result of the report of the psychiatrist and after a conference of the sentencing board probation was extended and X was allowed to continue to care for his family.

Y was tried for statutory rape with a count for indecent liberties. There was a disagreement of the jury the first time; the second time he was found guilty. His psychiatric examination brought out certain instabilities of character in connection with the use of alcohol. He has a family dependent on him. He was placed on probation with the provision that he cannot take a drink.

The scientific handling of criminal cases does not necessarily mean shorter sentences for those found guilty of felonies. Conditions that warrant longer periods of isolation from society than would otherwise occur are sometimes brought to light. A case tried recently before Judge Murphy illustrates this point. Z, about fifty years old, was found guilty of statutory rape on his seven-year-old stepdaughter, the case having been brought to the attention of the prosecutor by the school nurse. When the completed chart was examined several significant findings indicated a progressive sexual disturbance that would become more and more dangerous to society if the subject were at large. The chart showed a mentality of seven years, a history of past sex offenses gradually increasing in their seriousness, psychopathic traits, progressive mental disorder. He was given an indeterminate sentence of from five to twenty years with recommendation that he be detained as long as he showed the present dangerous symptoms. This may mean permanent isolation.

Judge Murphy's charts are probably the most complete histories of criminal cases ever compiled. The statistics available in a year or so may establish some very interesting and instructive correlations between factors that have not been recognized as of particular significance. Glancing over the charts of the one hundred cases of convicted felons that have passed through Judge Murphy's court this year one is struck by the large number of those who were left orphans at an early age, whose homes were broken up, or whose homes were listed as very poor. Preventive measures will be largely guided in the future by such statistics as these. Moreover, the scientific classification of criminals, which is one of the results of such a careful procedure, must inevitably lead to different methods of handling prisoners. Psychopathic cases, sex cases, and normal but weak first offenders will not be herded indiscriminately together once these types are clearly defined and recognized. The very vagueness and lack of concise information concerning types of criminals has been mainly responsible for their common treatment and association under the same discipline and conditions. Already Judge Murphy has been approached by prison wardens who wish to apply his methods.

This brief review of a practical step toward better understanding and handling of criminal cases shows how carefully Judge Murphy steers his course between the two dangers of a coldly scientific attitude on the one hand and too great sympathy on the other. The conference of the board with the prisoner, and with his nearest of kin when desirable, cannot fail to introduce the human element. The presence of three experts with different professional points of view, each accustomed to dealing with criminals, precludes any possibility of sentimentality. It is too early to prophesy the results of the reforms introduced by Judge Murphy. But it has been so difficult to get any practical trial of the constructive, progressive theories of crime that these innovations are bound to have far-reaching influence.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter had to go to Louisiana to find out what a bayou is. He had always supposed it to be a narrow, sluggish watercourse, reaching only a few miles back from some river or bay and going nowhere in particular. He had thought that one could use rowboats and perhaps small motor craft on it, but had never supposed it to be navigable in the commercial sense. A bayou, the Drifter had imagined, was necessarily overhung with branches of trees and wreaths of drooping moss. Above all, a bayou was a dreamy, out-of-the-way stream, away from habitations and of no practical importance. It is true that a bayou is sluggish and generally narrow; also a bayou is likely to be lined with trees. But the larger bayous, though dreamy enough, are anything but unsettled and of no practical importance. Nor are they short streams going nowhere in particular. On the contrary, they are lined with settlements for which they were once the great, if not the sole, highways, and even today steamboats and barges ply them in important numbers.

* * * * *

THE ordinary map gives us no idea of these bayous. In general, modern maps are of two kinds—automobile maps and what are called "political" maps. Automobile maps show the highways and towns but not the railroads. "Political" maps show the railroads and towns but not the highways. Neither kind of map shows the waterways in an adequate way, least of all the bayous. Perhaps the Coast and Geodetic Survey does better; the Drifter has not examined its maps. He knows, though, that steamboat pilots do not use them. They learn the bayous through years of wandering through their long, tortuous courses. Bayous extend all over the State. Some connect two other bayous; some connect two rivers; some are extra outlets for rivers.

* * * * *

OWING to the inadequate delineation of the bayous on the maps one gets strange surprises upon inquiring about the possibilities of steamboat travel out of New Orleans. One learns that there are more steamboats on the bayous and small tributaries of the Mississippi River than on the Father of Waters itself. One learns that it is possible to reach the Gulf of Mexico by boat from New Orleans by going almost due south through a series of canals and bayous, the total distance amounting to about half of that by way of the Mississippi River. Stranger still, one learns that he can reach by steamboat towns 100 miles west of New Orleans, which, to look at the maps, would seem to be accessible only by a vessel propelled over dry land on stilts. New Iberia, in the midst of the "Evangeline country"—halfway across the State on an east-west line—is served by two regular steamboats from New Orleans.

Revolutionary Tactics

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A discussion of revolutionary tactics, on which Heywood Broun seeks enlightenment in your issue of April 23, is not necessary when Lenin and others have written so fully on the subject. But if at this date, after watching the MacDonald Government in Great Britain, Mr. Broun still believes we can sit comfortably by the fireside and vote in a revolutionary change his faith is so touching perhaps it should not be disturbed.

No doubt it is this same tendency to faith rather than action which leads to his belief that the Soviet Union is in no danger of being attacked. Yet the very recent noisy campaign against the Soviet's religious policies ought to be warning enough that a full crop of enemies lies in wait ready to spring if attention is diverted from them for one minute.

When he comes to comment on the Union Square unemployment demonstrations of March 6 Mr. Broun lines up with the press of the city, which says, "If the police said those unemployed workers could not parade they should not have tried to parade. It was just baiting the cops to go ahead." Yet according to the law, workers have the right not only to assemble, but to parade through the streets and to petition the government. Not even the whim of a police commissioner changes that.

Eyewitnesses of the breaking up of the Union Square meeting, as well as motion pictures and photographs, testify to the fact that the police were not "baited," but indulged in an orgy of brutality against a crowd that was moving in an orderly manner. Such lawlessness has been developed in the police force of this city not only by orders from "higher up," but by a type of spineless citizen who, when driving an auto, lets a snarling traffic cop yell in his face, insult him, threaten him if he is so bold as to venture a remark, and who accepts this passively because to assert his rights would mean trouble.

Fortunately the workers of the city are made of different stuff. And there are Communist leaders willing to risk clubbing and jail terms to let the police know they have an exaggerated idea of their functions.

D. H. Lawrence

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Aldous Huxley, who is said to have been a personal friend and admirer of D. H. Lawrence, used him under a thin disguise in a story, "Two or Three Graces," which by chance I was reading on the very day of Lawrence's death. The picture is fuller and more convincing than the one in "Point Counter Point." It shows a character temperamentally rather cold who admired above everything the expression of feeling. He was always whipping his emotions into a violent rage or infatuation and using the mood as material for fiction. His favorite word was "passional."

If this is a true picture of D. H. Lawrence it may offer the clue Mr. Krutch was calling for in his article of March 19. Suppose that Lawrence, that great connoisseur of emotional experience, had to make his material as it were synthetically. Could any deaf musician or astigmatic painter be a neater example of the law of compensation?

St. Petersburg, Fla., March 30 MARIAN TYLER

In Defense of England

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I am an Englishwoman who has had intimate experience of working-class life in England during the past sixteen years. May I be allowed to comment on the gloomy picture of my country which is drawn in The Nation of April 23? It is true that the value of our exports has gone down since the war and that there has been much unemployment, but against this should be set the astonishing progress in culture, in civilization, and in all that makes for real democracy among our people. The advance has been so persistent and steady, so natural and spontaneous, that most of the upper class and all foreigners seem to have missed it. To begin at the bottom, take the astounding decrease in crime, in spite of the war and in spite of the prevalence of unemployment. No less than twenty-four prisons have been closed in the past few years. An adult-education scheme on very liberal lines has been set up in all the prisons. Take also the spontaneous and voluntary decrease in drinking. During the past eight years I have seen no drunkenness in the town where I work.

But these are only by-products of a marked and increasing rise in standards of living, not so much material as educational and political. There has been, for instance, an immense increase of university tutorial three-year classes since the war, and the movement is continually developing new forms of service. These classes not only raise the general level of thought but train men to play a more intelligent part in trade-union locals, in town councils, and in cooperative guilds. The awakening in the villages has been revolutionary of late years. The writer has found that the proposal for a course of lectures of a radical type on China, Russia, or Africa has been greeted with enthusiasm in remote villages by shepherds and agricultural laborers. All this since the war.

The last general election was symptomatic of the new England. In the city of Lincoln (70,000) 86 per cent of the population voted, and of the working class the proportion was even higher. In Peterborough it was 90 per cent, and these cases were not exceptional. There was no noisy enthusiasm, rowdiness, or crowd behavior, but the interest and discussion were more intelligent than they have ever been. The increasing part taken by the wives of artisans and laborers, who practically manage the Labor Party organization during the daytime, was marked. Everywhere the readiness to undertake unpaid service is the secret of working-class progress. Again, there is no doubt that the standard of taste in dress, in house furnishing, and in personal habits has been steadily rising. I have not space to mention the improvements in all grades of education.

To sum up, a continual rise in civilization is now expected and taken as a matter of course by the workers—i.e., a class improvement, not a merely individual one. I believe that while in England the upper class made the civilization of the eighteenth century and the middle class that of the nineteenth, the working class will mold a civilization in the twentieth century with no less distinctive a quality. All this sounds like boasting, but when I find such an enlightened paper as The Nation, which values democracy, working-class progress, education, and the part of women in public life, actually pitying England for her "deterioration" since the war I feel that the report of our death has been very much exaggerated.

We are all too much obsessed with money standards. If I had to choose between the progress of the English workers since the war, which I have described, and a greater financial turnover, with the standards of before the war, I should choose to have things as they are.

Christian Social Ethics

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your readers may be interested in a school of Christian Social Ethics to be opened this June in connection with the Conference for Church Work at Wellesley College. Those planning the school are all seeking to learn what the acceptance of Christian ideals without compromise would mean in political, social, and industrial life.

Three lines of study are to be followed: Christian Social Theory, History, and Practice. Dr. Gavin, professor in the General Theological Seminary, New York, is to give a course under the first head; Dr. Niles Carpenter, of the University of Buffalo, under the second; while the course in practical applications is to be given by the Reverend Auguste Demant of the Christian Social Council, England. Students of any or no church are welcome. It would be particularly stimulating if some would register who agree with the Soviet government that the church is inevitably an obstacle to social advance.

Leaflets with full information may be obtained from Miss Marjorie Martin, 21 East Sixteenth Street, Brooklyn.

The Folly of Work

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The League for Industrial Democracy has chosen as the subject for its June conference this year "Racketeering High and Low—The Folly of Work," and has asked me to serve as collector of material with a view to publishing a rather ambitious book that would summarize the worst abuses of our industrial system. We are looking for important facts about racketeering in the power industry, real estate, financial organization, marketing, advertising, insurance, manufacture, and labor unionism. Our plan is to get progressives in all parts of the United States to send in information concerning instances in which persons or corporations have captured part of our economic resources and machinery and are using their position of vantage to extract personal gain without commensurate service. Readers of The Nation who have knowledge of specific rackets or who are willing to do some research in this field are asked to write me at 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York.

De Libris

By ROBERT LIDDELL LOWE

Let it suffice that I have heard
And never read of how a maiden
Lay with a bright betraying bird
Who loved and left her heavy-laden;

Or how a king, unbonneted,
Without a kingdom or a bed,
Strode through a storm, while tempests far
More furious raged within his head.

It is enough that I have heard,
Though no book told me, how at night
A tiger trod the forest's floor,
Burning terrible and bright.

There will be time for books when I
Have grown too weary pondering,
Too tired of reading once again
The pale white syllables of spring.

Fake Culture for Real

King Mob. By Frank K. Notch. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

THIS is a curious book, revealing an odd mixture of merits and defects. The author, writing under the pseudonym of Frank K. Notch, is a man with a genuine literary gift. Much that he has to say is shrewd and discerning, and all of it is set forth with an exhilarating passion. But his arguments are sometimes more distinguished for animus than for plausibility, and when he attempts metaphysics the results are deplorable. The book, moreover, is badly organized: Mr. Notch constantly loses sight of his goal, and reminds one of nothing so much as the man who leapt on his horse and rode off furiously in every direction.

The dominant thesis from which Mr. Notch so often wanders is the destructive effect of the "mob" on cultural values.

> A mob is made up of a group of persons unable to think straight because they are affected by the consciousness of their own numbers. The group may be small and contained in a meeting-hall or a public square; it may be large, extending through a city or an entire country. It may even be international; but before it can be a Mob it must be touched with the thrilling awareness of number, and unable to examine the intrinsic value of an idea because its simultaneous presence in so many minds gives it another kind of value.
> The subject matter of the idea may be almost anything: an insult to the flag; a catchword like "or what have you"; bobbed hair; a fashion in clothes, pronunciation, or philosophy; a baseball player, an actor, a book, a shade of color, a political or religious leader; Negro sculpture, Chinese drawing, the assassination of the Czar, or a flight across the Atlantic.

The mob expresses its intolerance by trying to drag larger numbers into its mood.

> The fashion Mob (in dress, books, culture, science, etc.) uses derision, a bitter, cutting derision which makes the outsider wince. The patriotic Mob uses rage, which makes the outsider tremble. . . . Persons are drawn into the Mob, and remain in it, because of panic, the terror of being left outside.

The author then takes up in successive chapters various manifestations of the mob spirit in contemporary life—in literature, advertising, politics, science, nationalism. In the field of letters he finds the mob spirit becoming more rampant month by month. Its symptoms are the book clubs, the army of popularizers, and the new methods of advertising, which no longer emphasize the merits of a volume, but its sales. "The public must be 'panicked' (as good vaudevillians are said to 'panic' the audience) into the buying of a book."

And what kind of volume is it being "panicked" into buying? For one thing, the works of the popularizers. The word "popularizer," the author reminds us, comes from the old Latin popa, a butcher. "It does not seem to be understood that certain subjects cannot be simplified beyond a given point without losing their substance and character." The Will Durants, van Loons, Lewis Brownes, and Brisbanes cheapen and degrade their subjects. Their popularizations are not merely harmless. They constitute "an assault upon the world's cultural values," for by his misrepresentations the average popularizer seeks to hide the disciplinary character of intellectual effort; he encourages intellectual laziness in the few who might ultimately have been initiated. "The truth is that the millions who read Durant, van Loon, and their kind do not want philosophy or history. They want the painless removal of a vague inferiority complex." The mob, in brief, "destroys spiritual values by accepting them."

> When the low cannot reach the high it pulls down the high to its own level. There is a Gresham's law in spiritual values too: a debased currency thrusts a good currency out of circulation. The rewards offered by the Mob in money and adulation in exchange for fake culture values are enormous; young talents are tempted and corrupted.

The march of invention, again, particularly of all invention that increases the rapidity of communication, has reached the point where it is becoming more and more anti-cultural in effect by increasing the dominance of the mob, particularly through the growth of newspapers and movies. "The restless run of ideas and pictures, disconnected information, turns life into a jumble of items, fragmented newspaper paragraphs." Mankind becomes a Coney Island mob, which can be kept going only by not being too interested in anything.

> With the invention of movable type and the advent of cheaper printing the Mob took a forward move. The National Mobs began to form, enfolding millions at a time. With the coming of the railroad and the telegraph the National Mobs began to coalesce; and now, with radio and television, the World Mob is at hand, an organized, international, self-perpetuating Mob, the first phenomenon of its kind in human history.

There is a great deal of irrelevant matter in the book, chiefly on the alleged antagonism between nature and the spirit, and on the latest conclusions of science. These sections consist for the most part of ill-digested Eddington, and their argument is hopelessly garbled. Mr. Notch is more plausible when he sticks to his main contention—that the world is becoming increasingly mob-minded, and that the mob is always and everywhere the enemy of culture. But even here one is compelled to eye many of his specific arguments dubiously. A "mob" brought into being by cheaper printing, for example, hardly seems an unrelieved menace. And are the book clubs, to come to our own day, really enemies of culture? Mr. Notch's arguments against them, at least, are not very convincing. When he declares, for example, that "month by month the Mob of 100,000 [book-club subscribers] switches its hysteria from book to book," one wonders whether the mob or Mr. Notch is the more hysterical. For a problem that has long puzzled me is this: Why do Mr. Notch and people like him become so angry or alarmed because a fairly good book (I am not talking in terms of eternity, but in terms of contemporary life) is taken by 100,000 subscribers a month, and yet remain comparatively calm when a magazine like the Saturday Evening Post—with much lower average standards than the leading book clubs—circulates to twenty times as many persons a week? Or when a paper of the level of the Daily News is bought by ten times as many persons a day? What is the vital difference in principle between subscribing to a book club and subscribing to a magazine? I do not wish to be understood as offering any blanket defense of the book clubs. It is true that the very fact that a book club has 100,000 subscribers limits its range of choice. But it still seems extremely probable to me (and the actual record of the book clubs strengthens this opinion) that the choices of even the least intelligent book club are much less foolish on the average than those the subscribers would have made for themselves. Meanwhile there is nothing to prevent Mr. Notch or any other independent spirit from making his own wise selections from the 800 books published each month.

In brief, it seems to me that in spite of the truth and importance of much that Mr. Notch has to say, he has often allowed his indignation and his eloquence to run away with his common sense. The outlook for culture today is surely not a brilliant one, but I do not see that it is appreciably worse than it has ever been. The problem is immemorial, and perhaps irresolvable. For culture, as Santayana has pointed out, "is on the horns of this dilemma: if profound and noble it must remain rare, if common it must become mean."

HENRY HAZLITT

Souls in Business

The Company. By Edwin Seaver. The Macmillan Company. $2.

THIS book is one of the most significant volumes of fiction by an American writer to appear in recent years. Other writers will perhaps work out some of the implications of "The Company" more fully than Seaver has done; but whether they do or not the book will stand as an original contribution to recent writing.

Seaver has attempted, and I believe altogether successfully, a new realistic interpretation of our industrial era. He is concerned not with machines, but with human values; he conceives the "mechanization" and "standardization" of our lives as due not so much to domination by our tools as to broken faith with the high purposes and responsibilities that we conceive for ourselves and for human life in general. Always in his stories there is the instant's weakness and the eventual failure, leading to frustration of the individual. But this frustration is not conceived as inherent, and the weakness leading to it is always pointed out. Seaver's treatment of his material is objective; he writes of the boss, of stenographers and clerks and vice-presidents, in stories by turns humorous, satiric, straightforwardly realistic, and occasionally farcical. He treats his characters first of all as individuals, but one is not long in recognizing that they are also types and are, within their limitations, universal. The Company itself, far from being the personalized force it sometimes becomes, is here no more than an abstraction.

I am impressed with the forms of these stories and with the lasting freshness and vitality of the writing. Seaver uses common words—almost a monosyllabic style—yet with them obtains a lyrical expression that is remarkably varied and effective. The suggestion of his work is musical both in its rhythmic flow and in the presence of certain constant sensuous and emotional values. The forms are also musical—All Talking, an overture; Idyll, a scherzo; The Kiss, a theme and development; and Smoke, a full sonata.

CLINTON SIMPSON

Whitewash for Pope

Alexander Pope. By Edith Sitwell. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. $4.

CRITICS have generally felt strongly—one way or another—about Alexander Pope, but no one, I think, ever felt about him before with the almost maudlin tenderness exhibited by Miss Sitwell. She has taken him under her protection, gone forth to fight his battles, and, apparently, conceived for him that sort of romantic attachment which is generally reserved for poets of a softer kind. Indeed, one can explain her excitement only on the assumption that she has made some sort of identification between herself and him, and the result is a study with all the interest and all the defects inevitable under the circumstances. It says in favor of Pope many of the things which have never been said before, but it is also almost ludicrously intemperate, biased, and blind to all the things it would not see.

Pope is, she says, "in his two finest poems perhaps the most flawless artist our race has produced." Much could be said in defense of that statement, but Miss Sitwell almost forgets to say any of it in her passionate determination to demonstrate more dubious and less important theses. She denounces those who assume that poetry has anything to do with goodness, and then, with an inconsistency all too characteristic of her method, she devotes the greater part of her book to an attempt to demonstrate that Pope was "a good and exceedingly lovable man." She finds the key to his character in the shame which he felt when reminded of his physical deformity, and she maintains that friendship was the thing he longed for most, but her method is to retell with most evident bias all the stories of his intrigues while judging him by one standard and his enemies by another. When Pope succeeds in getting his ironical review of Ambrose Philips accepted at its face value by Steele, it is only a clever device, and when he slyly administers an emetic to the publisher Curll, it is no more than a publisher deserves; but when Pope himself becomes the victim of a hoax, then no condemnation is too strong for those who would stoop to such an underhanded revenge.

Pope was, of course, the subject of vile slanders, but so was every other person of prominence who happened to live in the days of Queen Anne, and it would be hard indeed to demonstrate that he was less ready than his fellows to use the weapons of the time. He fought fiercely with his lesser contemporaries, and it matters little how the fights started. The fact remains that he was mercilessly cruel to those much weaker than himself, and that he delighted in breaking gnats and fleas (if not butterflies) upon the mighty wheel of his satire. Perhaps we need not pity them, but surely we need not, like Miss Sitwell, tremble with rage at the thought of the "thousand venomous little scribblers who attack him" if we but pause to remember how much more than a match he was for them all.

When Dennis mocked his deformity he was not above retorting, in lines whose brilliancy made them immortal, that

Dennis was poor. If Lady Mary laughed at his declaration of love and if his retort was the couplet:

> "From furious Sappho scarce a kinder fate, > Poxed by her love or libeled by her hate,"

then at least they were quits, and there is hardly occasion to moon pityingly over the man who could defend himself thus. If any favor is to be shown in judging between him and his enemies, then surely it must be said that his strength obligated him to a certain consideration which he did not show. In his battles with Grub Street he had genius, fame, social position, and financial security on his side. He did not spare the weaknesses of others and there is no reason why posterity should spare his.

The attitude of protective tenderness which Miss Sitwell takes toward him seems, indeed, singularly inappropriate. He chose not to ask for the world's pity, and he consented to use certain weapons—intrigue and boundless prevarication—which may possibly be justified by success but which certainly deprive him of the right to sentimental commiseration in his failures. Though it is difficult to praise his art too highly, it is easy to be absurd in the effort to make a knight sans reproche out of a man too great to need a spotless reputation. To treat him as one would treat the merely innocent, to pity him as one would pity one of "God's fools" is, indeed, to be more than absurd, for it is to wrong Pope himself by failing to recognize the kind of character which he so triumphantly represents. A Pope who can be yearned over is merely so much the less Pope.

Those critics who think they are praising his poetry when they grant it as much of romantic feeling as could well be expected in so benighted an age have but little sense of the qualities which make that poetry great, but the effort to make him a "forerunner of romanticism" is hardly less ill advised than the effort to prove him a kindly and sentimental man. A certain hard competence, a certain willingness to depend upon wit alone, a certain preference for the world of ferocious give-and-take—all these are parts of the idea of the man no less essential to that idea than a confidence in the sufficiency of point, and skill, and clarity is essential to the idea of his poetry. I would not willingly trade Pope the complete Augustan for any version which represented him as a Keats manqué, and I am hardly less willing to trade Pope the malicious wit for Miss Sitwell's sentimental hunchback. The most interesting thing about a wasp is that he stings uncommonly well.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Misgovernment by Injunction

The Labor Injunction. By Felix Frankfurter and Nathan Greene. The Macmillan Company. $5.

THE lack of an authoritative book on the labor injunction has often been deplored by public-spirited Americans interested in civil liberty. But the origin of the present book seems curiously remote. Apparently the first impulse toward it came from an English law-journal editor who wished to inform his readers of the strange practices of their American cousins. Like many another legal invention the injunction had originated in England but had fallen into desuetude there with the rise of British labor to political power.

In this country the labor injunction has now been an issue in national and State politics for several decades. "Government by injunction" has been a familiar catchword, and considering the provocation it is a wonder that the talk has not been of "misgovernment by injunction." Naturally, during all this time a great deal has been written by labor leaders, lawyers, and editors upon the injunction. There was, for instance, the little book on the subject published several years ago by Mr. John P. Frey, presenting labor's point of view. It was apparent to all who thought on the subject that the labor injunction had become an abuse of an otherwise beneficent legal process. Originally a preventive writ to protect tangible private property from threatened irreparable injury, it had been transformed into an instrument of police in labor struggles. A large area of dispute has, however, remained as to the extent of its abuse through the issue of blanket injunctions, temporary ex parte orders, summary punishment for contempt without jury trial, and the like.

What do Professor Frankfurter and Mr. Nathan Greene now contribute toward a better comprehension and solution of the vexing problem? The labor injunction has usually been discussed with a great deal of passion. The great merit of the present work is that the subject is discussed with objectivity and restraint. If there is little in the material that is unfamiliar, it is at least presented with great order and clarity. The book is of the type called by scholars a systematization. It deals with the law of the injunction in the federal courts, and in New York and Massachusetts, selected as the two most important industrial States. It is particularly excellent as a legal case book. But in view of the highly controversial nature and the wide social and economic bearings of the problem of the injunction, it is very much to be doubted if that is enough. Of the two authors, Professor Frankfurter in particular would have led us to expect more. He is generally accounted a sociological jurist, but it would be more correct to regard him rather as one of the notable masters of the case method. It is his great public spirit and social interest that have made it difficult to detect the difference.

The weakness of the present work lies in its neglect of the sociology of the injunction. It has not a sufficiently wide orientation with the whole problem of law and labor. Considering that the injunction is usually discussed in a highly charged atmosphere, more exact analysis of many problems than the authors pursue would have been highly desirable. I say this although I am more than inclined to agree that their intuitions are in most respects not wide of the mark. But, after all, they do not have to convince those who have had no use for the injunction. Upon their own premises, they cannot expect much progress to be made against the injunction until more exact facts than are now available are substituted for conjectures, no matter how well founded. For instance, a very interesting question is the extent to which injunctions really are effective in curbing strike activities. It is often asserted that labor exaggerates the harshness of the injunction's effects. Are injunctive decrees obeyed when a labor union is powerful? The only light supplied is that which may be derived from the inconclusive statistics on the number of contempt proceedings in the federal courts and a scant few pages of opinion from variously qualified persons contained in two of the appendixes. Many similar questions press for better answers than they receive. What has been the history of industrial relations following the granting of injunctions? What is the correlation between the use of the injunction and yellow-dog contracts? Are injunctions used by employers as part of a planned and consistent program to disrupt union organizations by securing a series of interpretations of the laws unfavorable to labor? To what extent have the abuses of the injunction been due to the lack of skill of labor lawyers?

The data relating to injunctions in the federal courts have been examined with some degree of thoroughness and exactness. But similar data for New York and Massachusetts are not supplied, although it would have made possible a very important comparison between the incidence of the injunction in the State and federal courts. That the task was not an impossible one is proved, for instance, by the appearance of a study for New York in the Political Science Quarterly while the present work presumably was going through the press. It is called The Use of the Injunction in the New York Needle Trades and is by P. F. Brissenden and P. O. Swayzee. It appears therefrom that no less than 250 applications for injunctions have been made in the State courts in New York City alone since 1894 and that almost one-third of these were in the needle trades. Contrary to expectation, the figures for the number of temporary and permanent, ex parte and non-ex parte injunctions show that the State courts were no more moderate than the federal courts in their grants of injunctions, although presumably more subject to local labor influence. But whereas there were 104 motions for contempt in the 118 federal cases in the Frankfurter-Greene study, there were only 3 motions for contempt in 48 of the needle-trade cases. Was there greater obedience to the State injunctions, or did the local labor influence first make itself felt in preventing proceedings for contempt?

When it comes to proposing a remedial program the State courts are even more completely neglected. Professor Frankfurter and Mr. Greene occupy themselves exclusively in arguing in support of the pending Shipstead bill, which seeks to limit the jurisdiction of the federal courts in labor disputes. The bill has only now been reported out of a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee after lingering there for over two years. This sudden action is to be understood as an added protest against the confirmation of Judge Parker. One of the leading objects of the Shipstead bill is to declare yellow-dog contracts unenforcible in the federal courts although not illegal and void in themselves. This strange piece of casuistry is due to the fact that federal and State courts have declared legislation directly invalidating yellow-dog contracts unconstitutional. But it is fairly certain that the same fate awaits the measure now pending in Congress.

Such other provisions of the Shipstead bill as have a better chance of surviving the perils of unconstitutionality have too many loopholes. They constitute simply pious exhortations to the federal courts to grant injunctions upon less liberal terms than at present. The provisions aimed at curing the procedural abuses of the injunction are worth as little enthusiasm. There has grown up at Harvard in recent years what almost amounts to a school of proceduralists who have come to put more emphasis upon procedure than upon substantive law. It is true that it is idle to grant rights for which no adequate procedure of enforcement is provided. But where the situation fundamentally is one of no rights, procedural devices are not a great help. They only tend to perpetuate vicious substantive law by making it seemingly easier to bear. I have always, for instance, thought that the value of jury trials in injunctive contempt cases was greatly exaggerated. Juries, particularly in times of excitement, are no less ready to convict than judges whose economic bias they share.

In any event, the record of the courts is unfortunately not such as to lead to the expectation that they would not treat the procedural safeguards of the Shipstead bill in the same way as those of the Clayton Act. Certainly this is true if we are to have more judges like Hughes and Parker. In fact, my guess is that neither Professor Frankfurter nor Mr. Greene privately entertains any great illusions on this score but for reasons of policy is publicly hoping against hope. Otherwise, their faith in the Shipstead bill, considering their knowledge of the history of the Clayton Act, would be quite amazing. Moreover, even if the law were obeyed the pressure for injunctions would simply be transferred to the State courts, and the Brissenden-Swayzee study indicates certainly the ease with which they have been granted in one set of them. If the courts were ready to change their attitude they could even now remedy the procedural abuses of the injunction of their own motion, through their rule-making powers, without any necessity for legislation. The advantage of such internal reform would be that it could not be upset like legislation.

If our plutocracy ever weakens sufficiently in this country and labor achieves some real degree of political and economic power, the courts will begin to take heed, although even then our strait-jacket constitutionalism will prove a great obstacle. At present it is as hard to get rid of the injunction as it is to do away with prohibition. I am afraid that perhaps, after all, a fable for our English cousins is all that present realities make profitable. The injunction is America's great contribution to police history, having no counterpart in more realistic European countries, which are reduced to treating their workers with a direct and unpleasant brutality. Ours is the great country of mass production. It is natural that it should have given to the world an instrument of mass policing.

Beethoven as Fiction Hero

Eroica: A Novel Based on the Life of Ludwig Van Beethoven. By Samuel Chotzinoff. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

Mr. Chotzinoff has contributed nothing to our understanding of Beethoven, which in view of the enormous literature on the man is not surprising. Yet the style alone of this spiritless novel would dampen any enthusiasm one might otherwise bring to it. Few indeed are the cliches, the stilted adjectives, and the periphrastic expressions that Mr. Chotzinoff has overlooked. Even the theory that he tried to adapt his manner to the period of the story does not account for the stiff and graceless prose. Beethoven lived in the radiant morning of romanticism, and this, we are told, is the way his musings ran:

> Though he was fully aware of the artificial gap between himself and the great ladies who circled so tantalizingly around him, he could not conceal from himself that their proximity afforded him a superior pleasure. In spite of his reason, which told him that he was in every way their equal, and in spite of his pride, which commanded him to spurn them as the pusillanimous creatures of a senseless tradition, he could not gainsay a secret longing for those whose nurtured beauty and perfumed refinement so violently contrasted with his own ungainly person.

There are many pages of this indirect discourse, tedious and insipid transcriptions of what Mr. Chotzinoff imagines Beethoven thought. Everyone knows that Beethoven was inarticulate in words—no man of his mentality ever wrote such disappointing letters—but he was surely not so fatuous a figure as this. When it comes to descriptions of music, wherein Mr. Chotzinoff should feel at home, one encounters some odd examples of unintended humor—the only kind in the book. The long passage in which the composer ruminates as he labors at the Eroica symphony has to be read to be believed.

Of the novelist's license to alter data Mr. Chotzinoff avails himself sparingly. For the most part, he keeps close to authenticated facts. Occasionally he ventures into fiction, as when he positively identifies the "immortal Beloved" as Giulietta Guicciardi, and when he insinuates that Beethoven's deafness had a luetic origin; both are hypotheses as yet unproved and probably unprovable. By omitting a mass of significant details with which the records supply him and relying instead upon a feeble fancy, he has failed to paint a lifelike character. He has not conveyed any perception of the elemental energy, the titanic quality of the man.

Simple Truth About the Tariff

This last and highest Protective Tariff Bill may soon be law, imposing higher costs of living on all of us. Protection is necessary and good for us. That's the theory. But what are the facts—the God's truth, about it? Between certain manufacturers who say Protection is needed to make and keep the country prosperous, and those who say a Protective Tariff is just a robbery and a fraud upon the masses for the benefit of privileged interests—which are right? Somewhere there must be an honest and searching examination of the matter and a conclusive answer:—

THERE IS. You will find a surprisingly lucid exposition of the whole subject in the great book

The Inward Vision

Midstream. By Helen Keller. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

TO her two autobiographical works, "The Story of My Life" and "The World I Live In," Helen Keller has now added "Midstream." It was, of course, impossible to expect that this volume would have the extraordinarily moving quality of the first revelation of this remarkable spirit. It was not possible to add much to the thrilling story of her conquest of the apparently insurmountable obstacles placed in her way by an unkind nature. But through this volume, too, there shines the unconquerable spirit, and the unquenchable determination to enjoy life and to utilize it as much as any normal person. Indeed, she has achieved far more than probably would have been her fate had she not been handicapped.

Perhaps the best thing about it all is that Miss Keller has come through to middle age a liberal in spirit. With the beauty of the outward world denied to her, she is not only free from bitterness and melancholy, but is most eager that the lot of all other human beings, advantaged or disadvantaged, should be more and more freed from the restraints of narrow conventionality and the heavy chains of our industrial civilization. The injustices of our society weigh heavily upon her. Where others in her situation might well feel free to think only of themselves, Miss Keller is ready by word and purse to serve at all times, to bear witness to the breadth and the wisdom of that inward vision of a better world than the one she has faced with such superb courage. In this volume she is generous to the many who have consciously and unconsciously been able to help her. But the best part is the renewed revelation of the completeness with which she has risen above self when every aspect of her situation might so easily have led her to center all her thinking upon herself and her own immediate interests. Among the books that tell of the victory of the human spirit over incredible odds this volume will have its place.

Books in Brief

Machine Made Man. By Silas Bent. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

Nowhere outside "The World Almanac" has a more numerous aggregation of facts on a wider variety of subjects directly and indirectly connected with the machine been brought together under one tent than Mr. Bent has assembled in this book. A good many of these facts, the reader will note, are so, though his confidence in the dependability of that vast number about which he knows nothing is likely to be a trifle shaken on discovering within seven pages of each other the fact that Walter R. Ingalls is "now recognized as the best authority" on wealth and income in the United States (a superlative distinction that Mr. Ingalls would certainly be too modest to claim) and the fact that Nicaragua is an island (the latter statement being doubtless a pure inadvertence). When he finds "Senator" Frear of Wisconsin hobnobbing with "President Hoover's National Bureau of Economic Research," however, and discovers on the same page that the reason we can't compute national income accurately from income-tax returns is because huge sums are invested in tax-exempt securities (rather than because only one-tenth of our income receivers are required under the law to report) he is too likely to begin wondering whether even omniscience itself may not sometimes be liable to error. What the facts, whatever they may be, mean, he will get not the slightest idea, though he will perhaps gather from the conclusion that Mr. Bent is inclined to guess that maybe the machine may be all right, after all. Those who do not like the book may perhaps like Glintenkamp's woodcut illustrations.

Claude Monet: The Water Lilies. By Georges Clemenceau. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

Clemenceau was undoubtedly prompted by a genuine feeling of friendship and admiration for Claude Monet when in his "last heavily burdened hours" he conceived the idea of writing a book about him. Unfortunately there is a wide gap between good intentions and ability to carry them out. The present volume is neither a biography nor an aesthetic treatise on impressionism. It is not even a collection of amusing anecdotes like Brousson's "Anatole France en pantoufles." Its few chapters, thrown together without order, teem with platitudinous opinions on genius, art, time, retinal sensitivity—opinions pronounced with the authority of a general or a commander-in-chief. Amid an annoying profusion of martial metaphors, Monet is treated incidentally, episodically. Barring irrelevancies, this is all we learn about him: he had a garden with a lily pond; he was a sedentary; he was scrupulously conscientious; he loved the fields, the flowers, the woods; and the idea of the Water Lilies obsessed him for years.

Infidels and Heretics. An Agnostic's_ Anthology. Edited by Clarence Darrow and Wallace Rice. The Stratford Company. $3.

Considering its avowedly unconventional purpose, this anthology turns out to be surprisingly like most other anthologies. It has a large proportion of pieces of prose and verse not to be found in other collections, but it also has a goodly number of old stand-bys. It contains some excellent things, and it also contains some extremely shoddy writing. Many agnostics will be pained by some of the selections, and good Christians will be horrified at finding some of their favorite writers represented. M. C. Otto is consistently referred to as M. C. Ott.

Eisenstein's Latest

IF I tried to list the scenes that impressed me most in "Old and New" (Cameo), Eisenstein's remarkable sermon on the advantages of collective farming, I should be inclined to select these: the pathetic figures of a man and a woman pulling a harrow for lack of a horse; the enormous mass of smooth and glistening human flesh displayed by the kulak couple; the "juicy" portraits of priests praying for rain, interspersed for sardonic contrast with close-ups of a bleating sheep; the wheat fields swept by wind; the gorgeous stud bulls with their quivering bulk. All these may be described as portrait studies, here and there reminiscent of such Russian painters as Ryepin, Kustodiyev, and Perov, but conceived dynamically and not as "still" pictures, and brimful of characteristic detail. Perhaps it will be even no exaggeration to say that "Old and New" resolves itself largely into a series of marvelously executed cinematic portraits of men, beasts, and machines, portraits observed with a revealing penetration and the precision of a master, but strung together on a thread of narrative that carries with it no particular appeal either to the mind or to the heart. The picture was of course made primarily for the Russian peasant, as part of the campaign to carry the "general line" of the Communist

The Comte De Gramont was the Casanova of King Charles II's court—an eminent distinction in a circle of rakes like Buckingham and Rochester. policy into the village. It is therefore not to be expected that the demonstration, however ingeniously conceived, of a cream separator or a tractor would be found equally impressive by an American audience. But with all due allowance for this difference, it is still doubtful whether "Old and New" is capable of converting anybody to its message; and the fault, I think, does not lie with the message. Regarded merely as an argument for collective farming, the picture quite obviously takes too many things for granted. On the other hand, as a story of a successful struggle for such a collective farm, it is too tame and schematic in its dramatic development to make one thrill in sympathetic response.

This is not to say that the picture does not contain a number of highly effective and original scenes. The episode of the "wedding" between a stud bull and a common cow as the village bride is extremely amusing, not to say exciting; so, too, is the race between the tractor and the village carts, with the delightful interlude when the driver of the tractor, to mend his engine, helps himself to the proffered skirt of a woman enthusiast. But it does seem to me that Eisenstein's preoccupation with conveying ideas by means of a specially developed "cinematic language" is inevitably leading him into a blind alley, for it excludes the purely sensual and emotional appeal of the structural foundation of the motion picture—its rhythmic and dramatic progression. His "Potemkin" undoubtedly gained its success because of the stress laid on its dramatic and dynamic structure, elementary as this still was in its case. But "Ten Days That Shook the World" was a step away from synthesis to analysis, from a unified dynamic pattern to a series of loosely related descriptive episodes. And "Old and New" is a still further and even more disintegrating step in the same direction.

Commendable intelligence, inventiveness, and taste mark "Paramount on Parade" (Rialto), unquestionably the best screen revue that has been seen on Broadway. And having taken two years to overcome sheer ignorance and cretinism, it is to be hoped that in another two years Hollywood will show us a real cinematic revue which will use to the full extent the powers of expression inherent in the camera, the microphone, the film record, and the screen—in other words, to cite a contrary example, a screen musical play totally unlike "Hold Everything" (Hollywood), which has amusing gags but very little else.

Drama

Miss Le Gallienne's Juliet

SEVERAL months ago I expressed the wish that Miss Le Gallienne would add to her repertory some play written in a major key. She had given us much pathos and not a little sentiment, but the more familiar one became with her enterprise the more conspicuous was the absence of both genuine tragedy and genuine comedy. Her most striking successes as well as her relative failures had been all too much of a kind. A certain languishing, elegiac mood seemed to brood over the auditorium, and served to make one realize that her theater must succeed in breaking that spell if it were to become what it obviously aspired to be—a place where one might have an opportunity to see representative examples of all the kinds of excellence which dramatic literature affords.

Apparently Miss Le Gallienne herself recognized the danger, for she has just added to her repertory a production of "Romeo and Juliet," and that production turns out to be a triumphantly successful gesture in exactly the right direction.

Social Forces in Social Work

The trained social worker regards the individual, family and community he serves as centers of convergence of racial, religious, economic and other social forces which hark back to the past and must be utilized to fashion the future. This view is especially important if the worker's field lies in such a highly distinctive group as the Jews.

College graduates should examine carefully the advantages, both tangible and intangible, of

LABOR'S NEWS

He is a college instructor. He wrote Federated Press, labor's news service, and we take the liberty of quoting from his letter:

"I want a news magazine about the labor movement. A paper that surveys, condenses and makes readable the news about the trade unions, the A. F. of L., the Communists, Socialists, progressives, farmers, that I can't get in the other magazines or newspapers. You can't afford in these days not to know of the social ferment among America's 30,000,000 workers.

"I take several labor papers but each one is devoted to grinding its own ax. I don't object to that; but I find it impossible to get a clear, authoritative, unbiased picture of what labor is doing and planning. Federated Press, as labor's news service, is in a position to publish such a news magazine. Why don't you?"

That was a year ago. LABOR'S NEWS was the answer to this intelligent American, as it has been to thousands of others. Written by 60 correspondents in every industrial center of the land, LABOR'S NEWS brings you each week in eight concise pages the news of America's 30,000,000, otherwise unreported. No long articles, no windy dissertations, no airing of theories and dogmas! Just news—the news of all groups in the labor movement—authoritative, comprehensive, yet condensed to the marrow and vividly written.

Much thought has evidently gone into it and, in all probability, not a little trepidation as well; but the question which must have troubled her other admirers as much as it troubled me is answered. Miss Le Gallienne's talents as actor and director are not limited by the circle within which she has hitherto chosen to move. Her "Romeo and Juliet" is conspicuously fine and satisfying. It is, indeed, one of the best things achieved at her theater, as well as one of the best performances of that particular tragedy seen in New York for many years.

In the first place, the pace of the play is swift and right. It begins with the briskly staged scene of the street brawl between Capulets and Montagues, and it takes its spirit from the spirit of that scene—conceiving the whole story to be one which grows out of the quick tempers and the hot blood of these citizens of Verona. Over all too many versions of the tragedy hangs the cloud of a sentimental misconception of Shakespeare. Juliet is made languishing, merely romantic, and not a little syrupy. But Miss Le Gallienne has had the good sense to realize that this heroine is not "cute" and that the love between her and Romeo, however lyrical it may be, is no Schwärmerei. The blood that runs in Tybalt's veins runs in Juliet's too. She is quick, resolute, and, in her own way, fierce as well. Being a woman she is not supposed to revel and stab, but she is ready in an instant to throw caution and propriety to the winds, defying her father and meeting Romeo in the moonlight. Obviously she is no model maiden, and obviously the story of her love for Romeo is no story to put alongside the more edifying tales of ladies who, for love, pined meekly away. She is even more conspicuously great than she is good; she dies defiant and protesting, as a really tragic heroine should. Perhaps there is little reason in the passion which springs up between her and Romeo, but there is a good deal more than sentiment. Their story is the story of a flame kindled amidst tinder, burning fiercely for a brief time and then extinguished. And it is in the spirit of such a story that Miss Le Gallienne and her company play it. Her Juliet is young in experience but mature in feeling. She is, to be sure, no Cleopatra; but she is no less far from being a Miranda, a Perdita, or an Ophelia. The whole production is, moreover, almost as satisfactory in detail as it is sound in fundamental conception. The first scene particularly, with its blank blue wall penetrated by a single flight of stairs, is admirable in its suggestion of a painting by one of the primitives; and if Donald Cameron's Romeo is not so good as Miss Le Gallienne's Juliet, it is at least extremely creditable, while J. Edward Bromberg is not less than superb in the death of Mercutio.

"Romeo and Juliet" belongs, no doubt, in a different category from that in which the other great tragedies of Shakespeare are placed. It broods over no philosophical problem and it has, properly speaking, no villain. Calamity comes to its chief characters largely as the result of unfortunate chance, and their catastrophe does not, like the catastrophe which overtakes Lear or Othello, imply any great malignant or evil principle in the universe at large. In part because of that fact, and in part because its heroes are allowed to achieve their destiny—to love as fully as they would ever be able to love—the play might almost be called a happy, as it is certainly a joyous, thing. It has only one purpose: to exhibit love as love seems to lovers, and it is odd that the only other play of Shakespeare's which is believed to have been written in the same year should be that "Midsummer-Night's Dream" in which the same passion is viewed with the mockery of a philosopher. Is it possible that he had both works in mind when he put into the mouth of Friar Laurence a strange but profound observation: "For Nature's tears are Reason's merriment"? Was the one play intended to move "Nature's tears" and the other to evoke "Reason's merriment"?

THE WORLD TOURISTS, Inc., announces the 2nd Cultural Tour to Soviet Russia under the leadership of Dr. Joshua M. Kunitz, Lecturer on Russian Literature and Culture in the College of the City of New York, and author of a number of widely read studies on Soviet Russia.

Professor Kunitz' record in this field of activity marks him eminently qualified to conduct a tour through the U.S.S.R.

In 1929 Dr. Kunitz conducted the cultural tour for the World Tourists, Inc., to the complete satisfaction of every member of the Group.

In 1928 he was a member of the now historic Professor John Dewey Delegation of American Educators. Every member of that delegation will subscribe to the statement that his exceptional appreciation of what was taking place in the New Russia, plus his understanding of the historic background, and the temperament of the people, was an important factor for the success of the delegation.

The tour can be taken for 12, 24, or 35 days. Special attractive booklet containing rates, itineraries, etc., will be gladly mailed. An early reservation is earnestly suggested as the group will of necessity be limited.

Health Insurance in Austria

By Dr. ERNST KULKA

Vienna, April 24

IN the years following the war a series of laws were passed under the influence of the rising power of the Socialists requiring that every salaried worker be insured for medical treatment by what was known here as a Krankenkasse. Employer and employee were to share the expense; there were no exceptions: every servant girl, bellhop, government official, or bank director who received a salary was to be provided for. Up to that time there had been movements in that direction, especially among the laboring classes, and white-collar workers had made some provision for themselves in the form of benefit associations organized by private initiative. There had also been a workmen's compensation law, and in 1920 an unemployment insurance act. These various insurances were now incorporated into a special body of laws, and comprised the first experiment in health insurance on a grand scale. The original purpose was to protect the working classes from disease, but modifications subsequently ensued, so that lately every manufacturer and storekeeper is insured as well. At present in Vienna 78 per cent of the population is insured. No provision has yet been made for independent peasant farmers. In all Austria somewhat more than 60 per cent of the poulation belongs to a Krankenkasse.

All forms of insurance are paid for together in one premium amounting to 15 per cent of the total salary (though a maximum is fixed). Of this, employer and employee each pays 7½ per cent. The sum is divided among the different benefits as follows: pension and accident insurance, 6 per cent; unemployment, 4½ per cent; and health insurance, 4½ per cent. The average worker's salary in Vienna at present runs from four to ten dollars a week. A visit to a doctor would cost about seventy-five cents, a day at a hospital about a dollar and a half. The average worker pays then about fifteen dollars a year, or enough for twenty consultations with a physician or ten days at a hospital.

The insurance companies are private but under governmental control. Before the war there were more insurance companies than there are now. The collapse of the monarchy brought almost all of them to ruin and they were consolidated into a few large organizations. The latest law with regard to these companies (1926) distinguishes only two types: those with a purely geographical distribution, comprising a single system of forty-five units divided over as many sections; and those with an industrial distribution in the separate trade organizations. The geographical group is the original Krankenkasse as pictured by the originators of the system, and is socialistic in its political affiliations. The industrial companies are politically conservative and represent the conservative answer to the Socialists. The few surviving small benefit associations are doomed to disappear, and no new ones may be created. There are thus two large companies or systems, both private in the eyes of the law, but actually in interlocking contact with the two main parties.

Aside from accident, invalid, and old-age insurance, the Krankenkasse in Austria has a more peculiar function: the provision of all the medical needs of its members. It may do this in two ways. The less frequent way, practiced by a few benefit associations, is to allow each member a fixed sum depending on the disease he has and the attention he needs. With this sum he can do as he likes, paying the difference if he has expensive tastes. Only about 5 per cent of the insurance comes in this class. The other and more general procedure is to provide directly for the patient's needs, paying the doctor and druggist from the treasury of the Krankenkasse, but at the same time to limit the patient's freedom of choice. The companies with geographic distribution have their own physicians distributed over separate districts and each patient must be treated by the physician in his neighborhood. The physician, for his part, may prescribe drugs only from the official Krankenkasse formulary and the druggist is compensated at fixed rates arranged by contract in advance. Under this system each district physician receives a fixed salary (at present about fifteen dollars a week) and has the right to private practice in addition. The physicians are, however, much overworked and sometimes meet fifty or more patients a day in addition to their private practice. The patients often feel neglected, and balk at being compelled to visit this one doctor. As a result, there is often neither sympathy nor trust in the relation.

The trade-union insurance companies permit their members to choose their own physician from a long list of doctors under contract. These physicians are given no fixed salary but are paid by the visit; any physician who agrees to the stipulations may register. The remuneration is small, but economic stress has obliged the majority of physicians to enrol. The patient has the right to treatment by a specialist if necessary and to operation or hospital treatment, all bills being paid by the Kasse. This last system is an improvement on the other in so far as it permits the patient to be treated by a physician he trusts, while the doctor for his part does all he can for his patient if only for his own material ends. But it is precisely this that endangers the entire system. Under the district-physician system the doctor had every incentive to cure his case as soon as possible. He was furthermore totally objective in his advice and recommended drugs, pensions, and vacations only when they were necessary. From the point of view of the Krankenkasse this was ideal, and the same conscientious deportment was expected from physicians under the other system. And in fact most doctors were trustworthy. The result was that certain patients went from doctor to doctor until they finally found one who would give them what they wanted. What resulted was a sort of conspiracy between a certain doctor and a certain patient that cost the Kasse a fortune but gave the doctor a fat income and the patient a pension or a vacation. The honest doctor consequently lost clients, the Kasse grew poorer, and honest patients suffered indirectly from lack of funds.

If one examines the question impartially one cannot help feeling that under this system, because of the elaborate machinery of operation, too small a proportion of the money goes for health. A new plan of health saving is therefore being proposed. Under this plan a part of the salary would be put aside. It would remain the property of the original owner, but only in case of sickness could the money be withdrawn. When a certain fixed sum had been reached and when a person had attained a certain age (to be statistically adjusted) the money would be returned as a pension. In case of death the residue would go in part to the legal heirs and in part to a general sinking fund. This sinking fund would be employed for use as loans without interest for cases of lengthy disability and operations. In case of permanent disability a regular pension would be awarded; in all other cases the loan would be slowly repaid.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

SECRETARY STIMSON dealt a deadly blow to President Hoover's fictitious reputation for sagacity or statesmanship in handling our foreign affairs when, testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, he said:

> We went over to London without any specific instructions from the President, either written or verbal. Of course, we knew his general views. We had had the privilege of several talks with him; but he abstained from giving us any instructions of a specific character whatever, preferring to trust the delegation to use its own discretion in the methods of negotiations. He continued that course throughout. There was no time when he intervened with any instructions to us as to what we should or should not do.

This seems to Mr. Stimson altogether admirable and pleasantly "in contrast to the attitude of very many of our fellow-countrymen throughout the country who felt quite free to tell us by cable and otherwise what we should or should not do." There you have, first, the bureaucrat's resentment that his employers, the people, should dare to tell him in what manner he should serve them; and, second, a total failure to understand that what he praises in Mr. Hoover must appear to any intelligent American as a complete indictment of his chief. It is entirely characteristic of the President and of his philosophy that he calmly turned over his own responsibility to his appointees and refused to advise them in any way despite the fact that this was one of the momentous conferences of our history. The American people hire a President to lead, and they certainly did not expect that he would send his delegates to London without any plan or prearranged program, to drift as best they could. Mr. Stimson has indicted damnably all connected with the venture.

THE NOMINATION of Owen J. Roberts of Philadelphia as an associate justice of the Supreme Court is entirely commendable as far as the qualifications and personal character of the nominee are concerned. Mr. Roberts is an able lawyer who has devoted a large part of his time for the past six years to the prosecution, on behalf of the United States, of the suits against Harry F. Sinclair and Edward L. Doheny for the recovery of naval oil lands illegally leased to them under the Harding Administration. During the World War he was a Special Deputy Attorney General for the prosecution of espionage cases in Pennsylvania. He is accounted a moderate liberal in his general views notwithstanding his professional connection with large corporations, and in regard to prohibition is thought to be more wet than dry. There is no reason why Mr. Hoover should be praised for nominating Mr. Roberts, however. Mr. Hoover did his best to put upon the Supreme Bench the ill-qualified Judge Parker, for no other reason than to curry political favor with the South. In that attempt he was beaten by the Senate after a fight which had left Mr. Hoover and Judge Parker a sorry-looking pair. Now, having been trounced for one piece of misconduct, Mr. Hoover does perforce a decent thing in nominating Mr. Roberts.

THE BRITISH RAJ steadily sends forth optimistic messages that it has India well in hand; that thanks to its vigorous attitude Moslem Day and the anniversary of the Sepoy Rebellion passed off without serious disturbance. Unfortunately there are certain events to be recorded. Thus the Sikh League, composed of the best fighting men in all India, has voted to go along with Mahatma Gandhi, and the Government has brutally bombed by airplanes the forces of the Haji of Turangzai, the Afghan leader who has been threatening an invasion of the northwest frontier province. Meanwhile fourteen responsible commercial organizations of Bombay on May 7 presented a resolution to the Government protesting against the "extraordinary arrest" of Gandhi, which they said "had begun to undermine such confidence as the Indian commercial community had in the Government's sense of justice." As a whole, the cotton industry is paralyzed. A more conservative native leader, Ratanso Moraji, member of the Bombay Council of State, has resigned, as a protest against "the arbitrary internment of Mahatma Gandhi"; and the threats of V. J. Patel, lately speaker of the legislature, to intensify the boycott on foreign, especially British, goods has caused among the foreign importers "fears that the threat will be made good with disastrous effects on business in India and England." The native press is disappearing, the censorship tightens, in consequence of which the wildest and most baseless rumors fill the country. Never was censorship so foolish, for nowhere else, save in our Southern States among the Negroes, is there such a "grapevine telegraph," which carries news like wildfire all through India.

HOW MUCH should a candidate for the Senate be allowed to spend on his nomination and election? A succession of inquiries has fixed no definite standard, and until this problem is tackled there is a vagueness in all arguments over the propriety of this or that expense account. In 1922, after a heated debate, the Senate allowed Truman H. Newberry of Michigan to take his seat, but censured his expenditure of $195,000 in the primary campaign as "much larger than ought to have been expended." In the 1926 campaigns Frank L. Smith of Illinois was credited with a primary expenditure of $450,000, and William S. Vare with one of $800,000. The sequel is familiar. And now comes Ruth Hanna McCormick who has laid before the present Senate Elections Committee an expense account of $252,572 for the campaign just closed in Illinois, though Illinois rumor has it that an additional $750,000 was spent in her behalf. However, the important task before the committee is not simply to determine how much Mrs. McCormick and others have spent or will spend in this year's campaigns, but to formulate some workable limitation for the future. To those who doubt the possibility of ever achieving this object we recommend a study of the strict limitation of expenditure which characterizes present-day electioneering in England.

WE STILL WAIT for action on Senator Wheeler's bill (S. 2767) repealing the act of May 19, 1926, which authorizes the President "to detail officers and enlisted men of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps to assist the governments of the Latin-American republics in military matters." The President has been appealed to by a group of peace organizations to support the measure, but without result so far as we can learn. The mischievous practice of sending our professional war-makers to help our southern neighbors put their forces on a better fighting basis gives us a stronger grip on them and helps sell American war materials; incidentally it gives jobs to a few supernumerary military and naval officers. No wonder that the War and Navy Departments favor it. According to the former, the practice "tends to promote a correct understanding among our neighbor republics of our peaceful policies and of the good-will the officers of our army bear toward them." The War Department has truly extraordinary perspicacity. We, in our simplicity, had supposed that Senator Wheeler's bill was dictated by friendliness to our neighbors.

MEN OF GOD IN POLITICS are rather more likely than not to raise the devil, and the Right Reverend James Cannon, Jr., of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and his dear friend and Presbyterian brother the Reverend Dr. F. Scott McBride, general superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, are certainly doing their bit to make the godless jeer. The good Bishop, it appears, extracted $65,300 in cash and checks from one E. C. Jameson of New York, ostensibly for the purpose of defeating Governor Smith in the recent Presidential campaign in Virginia. Unfortunately, he failed to report some $48,000 of this amount as required by the Corrupt Practices Act, and also induced Mr. Jameson to alter his own record of the payments so as to conform to the Bishop's telegraphic indications of what the record ought to be. For this and other political activities the Shepherd of the Flock is in the way of being called to account by his ecclesiastical associates, and possibly by the courts. Dr. McBride, who appears to have been a little vague about the political operations of his Holy League, has assured the Senate Lobby Committee that the league "was born of God, it has been led by Him, and we will fight on while He leads." The divine character of the birth, he explained in answer to a question, was clear to him because the delivery room was a prayer-meeting. The country has long felt that there was something mysterious about the league, but now that we know it to be blessed of heaven, with McBride's prayers ascending while Cannon jingles the cash, everything is perfectly clear.

A MACHINE-GUN, accidentally fired by one of the national guardsmen set to guard the walls of the Ohio State Penitentiary, killed two convicts as they slept in the tents which are the only shelters provided for them by the Sovereign State of Ohio while the cell blocks destroyed by fire are being reconstructed. It is worth while repeating certain of these facts: a machine-gun . . . accidentally fired . . . killed two sleeping convicts! It is thus that the State of Ohio, population nearly seven millions, wealth eighteen and a half billions, houses and protects its prison population. Or to be more explicit, first the State of Ohio crowds 4,300 prisoners into a prison built for 1,500; the prison is a fire-trap; when it catches fire guards refuse to open the cell doors and free the prisoners; 320 of them are burned or suffocated to death; the warden whose ineptitude is largely responsible (after the Sovereign State of Ohio) for the mismanagement and lack of discipline at the prison is not removed, and as a latest, but perhaps not final, bitter stroke, a machine-gun . . . accidentally fired . . . kills two sleeping convicts. Colonel Robert S. Haubrich, ranking guard officer at the prison, detailed an officer to investigate the shooting, who reported that the "guard concerned regretted the shooting very much, but that such accidents 'cannot be helped.'" More pertinent was the comment on the prison furnished by Will Rogers in noting that the mother of twelve children the other day, in poverty and desperation, shot and killed seven of them and then tried to kill herself. We celebrate, Mr. Rogers said, and even send to Europe at the government's expense, Gold Star mothers whose sons died in France. "This poor soul had done her bit for Ohio," he added tersely. "She had contributed a husband to its wonderful jail."

WITH THE UNENVIABLE RECORD of three lynchings in 1929, Texas now steps to the fore with the most outrageous exhibition of mob fury unchecked by the forces of the law that has been seen for a long time. A mob of some two thousand persons in Sherman, Texas, on May 9 stormed the courthouse (regretfully referred to in the news dispatches as the "new $60,000 courthouse") and burned it, incinerating in one of its vaults a Negro accused of an attack on a white woman, who had been put there for safe-keeping. In spite of the efforts of about seventy of the National Guard the mob ran amok through the town, destroying by fire much of the Negro section and literally tearing to pieces everything that was distasteful to it. Martial law was declared on Sunday, May 11, after the damage was thoroughly done. Governor Moody explained that he had not given orders, as alleged, to the guardsmen to "protect the Negro if possible but not to shoot anybody," but did not explain why only one attempt was made to stop the mob with bullets, that by firing at the legs of one of the leaders. He announced that every effort would be made to apprehend and punish to the full extent of the law the guilty persons. So far sixteen men have been arrested and five of them are in the county jail. If any attempt was made by the sheriff or other local officials to check the first of the mob's advances there is to date no record of it. Instead of dying if necessary in the performance of his duty to protect his prisoner the sheriff pondered the wisdom of resigning. There is little else to record as we go to press except that Sherman is called the "Athens of Texas."

CIVIL WAR IN CHINA has broken out again, this time between the Nanking Government and a coalition in the north headed by General Yen Hsi-shan and Marshal Feng, and supported, it is said, by the shifty General Sun Liang-chang, at one time a follower of Marshal Feng and later a supporter of the Nanking regime. Hostilities, the exact outcome of which is still uncertain, but which have resulted, according to reports, in as many as 10,000 killed, appear to have spread over a front variously reported at from 100 to 170 miles, with the Lunghai Railway, extending from Suchowfu on the east to Chengchow, in Honan Province, on the west, as in general the line of demarcation between the rival armies. On the other hand, to the south of Nanking, and even in Kiangsu Province in which Nanking s situated, the authority of the Nationalist Government has for some time been challenged by widespread and serious outbreaks of banditry. The Nationalist Government thus inds itself beset behind and before. Moreover, while the Nationalist forces are admittedly superior in training and quipment they are greatly inferior in numbers. Another mbarrassment has arisen from the proposed seizure by Genral Yen Hsi-shan of the salt and customs receipts throughut the northern provinces, thereby jeopardizing the credit f the Nanking Government which has pledged these reveues as security for foreign loans.

THE ERGOT CONTROVERSY, which has been going on for two years, has reached a new stage. Ergot generally used for the control of post-partum hemorrhage, nd in September last the American Association of Obstetrians, Gynecologists, and Abdominal Surgeons appointed a istinguished committee to examine into the alleged deterioraon of the drug. The committee has just reported. Studiusly abstaining from taking sides in the acrimonious peronal controversy between the Food, Drug, and Insecticide dministration and its critics, the committee flatly declares hat "there has been a notable deterioration in the quality the fluidextract of ergot on the American market in cent years," due, in its judgment, to defects in the characr of the ergot imported. These defects, it believes, to be ue to practices "in violation of the requirements of the pharmacopoeia and of common prudence." As regards ergot quality and methods of preparation the report essentially confirms the position of Dr. H. H. Rusby, dean of the College of Pharmacy of Columbia University, the leading scientific critic of the Food and Drug Administration. In the matter of protecting the life of mothers it would appear from this report that either the existing law or its administration is sadly defective. The administration has already expressed its willingness to have its methods of carrying out the law looked into, and we believe that Senator McNary should now promptly proceed with the further hearings that he promised last February to conduct if they were requested by the physicians of the country.

HULL HOUSE, with Jane Addams still its devoted and noble head, has been celebrating the fortieth anniversary of its founding with many of its former workers and students returning to lay their homage at the feet of the woman, who, with Ellen Gates Starr, in 1889-90 took over the old-fashioned residence of Charles Hull, a wealthy business man of Chicago, for a social settlement. A direct offshoot of Toynbee Hall, Hull House has stood like a rock as wave after wave of immigration has dashed up against it and rippled on. The character of each wave has been different, the nationalities changing; but the human problems have remained the same though the needs have varied. Always the newcomers have found leadership, warm and genuine friendship, helpful cooperation, a hearty welcome at the hands of Miss Addams and her cohorts of workers, less well known but equally devoted—some of them, like Grace Abbott, Julia Lathrop, Alice Hamilton, Sophronisba Breckinridge, rising high in their special fields, to say nothing of the men who have graced the Hull House commons. Deeply imbued with that true Americanism which is the very reverse of what our patrioteers profess, Hull House is a great American institution.

JOHN MASEFIELD, the newly chosen Poet Laureate of England, departs from the cloistered elegance which has clung around incumbents of that office, at least during the last century or so. Mr. Masefield knows the docks, the farms, the country store, the life of ships and the sea, the smells of tenements, even the public house. He is the first Laureate who ever came to New York, certainly the first who ever lived in Yonkers and once polished the bar in a Christopher Street saloon. But he is a most excellent poet for all that, and wears with no unseemliness the mantle of Southey and Wordsworth and Tennyson. He is now fifty-five years of age and eleven years ago published "Reynard the Fox," often regarded as his finest poem. Since then he has been as prolific as ever, issuing novels, poems, and plays, together with a collected edition of his works. But if his poetry culminated in a magnificent stroke with "Reynard" it has since attained to nothing like that high point. Wordsworth had written his finest poems years before the honor of the Laureateship came to him; the same was true of Tennyson. It may be that a poet in the full flower of his genius is thought, even by a Labor Prime Minister, too dynamic, too dangerous a candidate for so worthy and dignified an office. At any rate, the new Laureate has done enough to be well deserving of the honor, and it is not impossible that years of high achievement still lie ahead.

The Terrible Meek

WHAT Gandhi has started in India profoundly concerns the whole world. The technique of non-resistance, to which he has already resorted nine times, challenges the entire social order based on force. Only a few years ago an American diplomat leaving for his post in China declared that his was a hopeless mission; the cause of the Allies and the United States as to extraterritoriality and other matters was lost because the Chinese were using in this case the "most dangerous weapon in the world, non-resistance." Nothing makes your modern diplomat so wild as to tell him that if he attacks you, you will not shoot back; he knows that that strikes his weapons to the ground. He has built up a preposterous world of armaments and ships and colonies, extraterritorial rights and spheres of influence, all based upon his ability to impose his will by his own troops or natives in his pay. He seeks to subdue the blacks in South Africa, the Moroccans, the Algerians. He has been getting away with it for centuries—always in the name of Christ Jesus and the Holy Word.

Now the whole miserable business of governing "inferior" races and exploiting them for "their own good" is rudely defied by an unhandsome, undersized man, naked but for a loin-cloth, who seeks nothing for himself, no material power, no office, no wealth; who dares to defy the greatest of colonial empires and is actually stirring it upon its foundations. They have ventured to arrest him at last. But they tremble lest anything happen to the Terrible Meek who sits within their jail. Here is the dispatch which tells of the treatment of this state criminal:

> A fully furnished wing in the Yeravda prison, where he can meditate, spin, take exercise, and read without disturbance, has been allotted to him. A special cook has been provided for him and he will receive ten dollars a week from the government for his personal expenses.

In addition a special board of three English physicians has been appointed to watch his health daily. His jailers know full well that if anything happens to him while he is in their custody all India will rise. They do not even dare to charge him with a crime, but are holding him under a statute 103 years old which permits them to intern in prison anybody whose activities seem to threaten the state.

A nice business for an Anglo-Saxon democracy which is only an intruder in India to engage in? An especially nice business for a Labor Government whose head was himself an execrated pacifist during the World War, with the conduct of which he refused to ally himself in any way? Yes, from this aspect the plight of Ramsay MacDonald is nothing less than tragic. This, like the failure of the naval conference, was the risk he ran when he took office and made himself responsible for the conduct of Indian affairs and the management of England's army and navy. We agree with the criticism that it would have been far better if Mr. MacDonald had worked out a solution for India's problems before plunging into the disarmament conference; at the very time he was most needed in the India Office, Wedgewood Benn, its Cabinet head, was drawn off for the endless bickerings of the naval discussions. We are sincerely sorry for Mr. MacDonald. His is now an almost hopeless position. He has had to yield in the arrest of Gandhi; how long will it be before he is sanctioning the dispatch of more British troops to India, he who brought about the return of some of the British troops sent to China? If he yields dominion status now, his political foes at home will accuse him of weakening before conditions which "call for a stern hand." If he does not grant dominion status, he faces years of unrest, of bloodshed and rebellion. For this issue will not down until, like American slavery, it is settled aright, with the peoples of India in control of their own land—for better or worse. There is only one thing Mr. MacDonald should do: move at once for dominion status, accept Parliamentary defeat, and rely upon the justice of the British people and the progress of events to bring him back to office as the pro-Boers came back triumphantly in 1906. Instead we have the postponement until October 20 of the proposed conference on dominion status.

What in this hour shall be the attitude of American liberals? With all sympathy for MacDonald and his Government they must continue to urge that the natives of India be given back their country, to rise or fall as they decide. Let it be known whether the Simon Commission has found for dominion status or not. The report appears to have been finished for a month; it is still being printed. Dominion status for India is but another test of our faith in democracy; whether we believe in autocratic good government—though we deny that the British government in India has always been good—or bad self-government. We cannot see how anybody who believes in American institutions and the principles underlying them can hesitate. India has just as much right to take over its own government today as the Americans had in 1776. It is not for us, nor for the British either, to sit in judgment upon the fitness of these people to rule themselves, or to prophesy what the future may hold in store for them.

Meanwhile, blood flows freely, and there are those who are saying that this is the inevitable outcome of non-resistance. Nothing of the kind. But the masses will strike back when sufficiently provoked, as at Sholapur—we take these facts from a press cable of May 8 (italics ours):

> A district magistrate was summoned. He warned them to disperse. Instead, the crowd, increasing in numbers every minute, refused and the police were ordered to open fire.

There was here no native act of violence before there were 27 natives killed and 100 wounded.

As for the Terrible Meek whose personal power has set all these forces in motion, he is beyond the reach of his jailers because his spirit soars above theirs; because he is serenely happy to be again behind the bars; because his conscience is clear, his course of life and action open and frank; because his soul is buttressed by a noble, an unconquerable and an imperishable truth. He well knows that if he dies now it will not matter. Liberty is under way. Its progress is irresistible. And whether he is alive or dead, Gandhi's soul will go marching on.

Billions to "Reduce"

NOTHING in the imagination of a Dean Swift could be more cynically ironic than the outburst of big-navy propaganda that has followed immediately upon the heels of the London conference. Before the treaty is ratified we have a few striking coincidences. The fleet steams into New York. One hundred and thirty-one airplanes fly over the city in battle formation. The New York Times reports:

> "What couldn't they do to us if they dumped some bombs and gas?" a policeman wearing World War service stripes said as he gazed upward from Times Square.
> "Such a fleet could wipe out the city in minutes," Lieutenant Commander A. E. Montgomery, who led the parade in a big Hornet-powered Martin bomber, said in answer to the same question later in the day.

The next day front-page reports tell how the 131 planes "destroyed" all of New England, "bombing" Providence, New London, Lowell, and Boston. Nothing is added to these reports. The sky-gazers and newspaper readers, however, are no doubt expected to use their imaginations. Their minds may then be rich soil in which to plant the conclusion: 'We must have a very large fleet in order to make it impossible for any other fleet to launch airplanes against our cities." Granting, however, that such a fleet of planes really could wipe out our great cities in minutes, and that no adequate defense could be made, the only logical conclusion is that another war would be too horrible to conemplate, and that if it occurred the size of our navy would make little difference.

These naval airplane demonstrations occurred on the ame day that Chairman Britten of the House Naval Committee introduced his bill to authorize, prior to July 1, 936, the construction of 240,200 tons of new naval vesels. The purpose, of course, is "to give the United States parity with Great Britain." Mr. Britten estimates that the new construction will call for an outlay of $498,000,000 by 1940, which, added to requirements for authorizations already made, will make a total of $937,000,000 to be expended within the next decade. Even so, Mr. Britten is not quite sure that "the expenditure of a billion dollars in the next eight years will properly provide for the national defense in an emergency." Senator Reed of Pennsylania, returning from the naval conference, is also quoted in an interview as favoring a seven-year building program ntailing an average annual naval expenditure of $100,00,000 a year. Senator Robinson takes a similar stand. Chairman Britten is very sad. He wants to build because it his opinion that the American delegates were "out-traded" t London. But Senator Reed wants to build ships for xactly the opposite reason. "In substance," he is quoted as aying, "we have a chance to build up our fleet, while Great ritain and Japan more or less stand still."

If there is any possibility of heading off this orgy of pending and building, which must result in more interational distrust and hence more spending and building, it an be realized only by vigorous outspokenness on the part f those who still believe that the naval limitation treaty, nsatisfactory as it is, is at least not a naval enlargement treaty. We recommend to all our readers the course of Mr. Herbert Fordham, who writes to Representative Robert L. Bacon:

> Thank you for your letter inclosing a copy of an address on boy scouts. While it is gratifying to learn that you favor boys and boy scouts, it might be more helpful to learn that you favor certain ends which some of us intend to achieve:

There follows a list of six of these, of which numbers five and six are:

> 5. We intend not to "reduce" our navy by spending from half a billion to a billion dollars in building ships that we do not need and do not desire.
> 6. We intend not to be maneuvered into a war with Great Britain by attempting "parity." To build up our navy to the size of the British navy can have no meaning except preparation for war with Great Britain. Without war against Great Britain we have no need for "parity." With war against Great Britain we need not parity but superiority.
> Are you with us?

Sowing the Wind

WE commented briefly last week upon the new Canadian tariff, whose drastically revised duties will affect some $225,000,000 of imports from the United States. On May 6, four days after the new rates went into effect, Premier Mackenzie King announced a general election, to be held this year "at the earliest possible moment." Back of that announcement lies a widespread irritation over the weak course of the Liberal Government in the face of the threat to Canadian industry and trade embodied in the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill. Canada has had more than one raw deal at the hands of lordly protectionists and political jingoes at Washington. Now, apparently, it is nearing the end of its willingness to take rough treatment lying down. It is going to the polls, with the American tariff as a big issue in the campaign.

The resentment which is felt in Canada is being shown all about the globe. From nearly thirty countries have come protests of manufacturing or trade groups against the egregious duties proposed by the Smoot-Hawley bill. A vigorous protest against the new duties on watches, clocks, and lace has just been lodged by the Swiss government with the American Minister. Producers or exporters in France, Italy, Spain, the Netherlands, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Finland, Germany, Austria, Rumania, Greece, Turkey, Egypt, Persia, and Ireland have protested against the blows that are being aimed at them; those of Australia, India, and the British West Indies have joined with others from Argentina, Uruguay, Guatemala, and Honduras in warning the United States of the menace of the Smoot-Hawley bill. There have been unprecedented demonstrations of wage-earners in England and France, and pledges of a boycott of American goods in Switzerland.

All this, of course, points straight toward retaliation if the tariff bill becomes law. What are the tariff-mongers at the Capitol and the Great Engineer at the White House doing to avert the storm? As far as can be seen, nothing whatever. The broadside attack of 1,028 American economists seems not to have shaken in the least the seats of the mighty. The Senate wants the farm-debenture scheme and does not want the flexible-tariff provision. The House opposes debentures but stands by the flexible provision. Mr. Hoover sides with the House on flexibility and opposes the Senate on debentures. So the wrangle goes merrily on in a conference committee, but with no trace of disposition anywhere to do anything that might help to fend off a world-wide retaliation which will hit American industry and trade all along the line.

If the tariff bill gets into the statute book and the gathering storm breaks, the country will have reason to blame Mr. Hoover at least as much as it blames Congress. Mr. Hoover championed high protection when he was campaigning for the Presidency, and demanded a revision of the tariff as the great means of helping the farmers. He has insisted upon the retention of the flexible-tariff authority, although everybody knows that it will be used only to jack up the duties still farther as occasion offers, no matter to what point Congress raises them. He has made no effort to stop the rate-raising debauch in Congress, albeit the evidences of world hostility are matters of common knowledge. As a promoter of international peace, and of the consideration which a powerful nation would seem to be in decency bound to show toward its friendly neighbors and good customers, he is a sorry figure. He contemplates with apparent serenity the prospect of an economic war. The country will have something to say about Congress in the elections next November, but it may also be counted upon not to forget the sage of Rapidan and the lazy play of twiddling thumbs.

For a Greater Library

A MILLION and a half dollars is the comparatively trifling sum asked of Congress for the purchase, for the Library of Congress, of the Vollbehr collection of incunabula. Nor could this sum, about a tenth of the cost of a new cruiser, be spent in any more worth-while or satisfactory manner. Three thousand books comprise the collection, 40 per cent of the titles not being represented at all in the United States today. There are works on religion, astronomy, medicine, natural science, law, geography, cosmography, chess, cookery, history, matrimony, philosophy, customs, travel, bibliomania, temperance, military and naval science, and many other subjects. In a sense this is a compendium of culture before the sixteenth century, in English, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Italian, French, Chinese, Slavonic, German, and Spanish. And the gem of the collection is one of the three perfect copies in existence of the Gutenberg Bible printed on vellum, and the only copy in three volumes. The other two copies, in two volumes, are owned by the British Museum and the Bibliothèque Nationale respectively. The Vollbehr Bible has been valued at $1,000,000, and beyond all consideration of price its acquisition by our great national library seems eminently just. Incidentally, it is interesting to note that this unique book has been held, until modern times, by only three owners. It belonged first to Johann Fust, Gutenberg's partner; by him or his heirs it was sold or given to the monastery of St. Blasius in the Black Forest; and during the Napoleonic wars it was transferred by the Benedictines there to the monastery of St. Paul in the valley of Lavant in Carinthia, where Dr. Vollbehr of Berlin bought it in 1926. Only the exigencies of post-war famine could have compelled these German monks to part with perhaps their greatest treasure.

There is every reason to believe that Congress will be willing to appropriate money for the purchase of these books. Its policy toward the Library of Congress has been, on the whole, farsighted, generous, and intelligent. The library, started in 1800 with an appropriation of $5,000, received its first important acquisition by the purchase, for the small sum of $23,950, of Jefferson's admirable library of 6,000 volumes. But this great addition was not received with universal rejoicing. For months Congress haggled over Jefferson's books. The library was characterized as "immoral, indecent, irreligious, and generally revolutionary"; one of the opponents of the purchase said:

> It might be inferred from the character of the man who collected it, and France, where the collection was made, that the library contained irreligious and immoral books, works of the French philosophers, who caused and influenced the volcano of the French Revolution, which had desolated Europe and extended to this country. He was opposed to a general dissemination of that infidel philosophy and of the principles of a man (Jefferson) who had inflicted greater injury on our country than any other except Madison.

In spite of this derogation of two of the Founding Fathers, the books were bought. The library grew, until at present it has attained to the impressive wealth of some 4,000,000 books and pamphlets, more than 1,000,000 maps, 1,000,000 pieces of music, nearly 500,000 prints, and 70,000 bound volumes of newspapers. In number of books and pamphlets it is surpassed only by the Bibliothèque Nationale. Its collections in American history and politics, in music, in United States documents are almost unique in importance. Credit for this masterly assembling is due in handsome measure to the eight librarians who have presided over the fortunes of the library since its inception, but chiefly to the distinguished present incumbent, Dr. Herbert Putnam, Librarian of Congress for thirty-one years and one of America's great public servants.

In determining appropriations for the library Congress has made several bad slips, which have been regretted ever since by persons aware of their significance. Money was refused to buy Washington's library, now housed in the Boston Athenaeum; the original manuscript of Washington's Farewell Address was bought by the Lenox Library of New York for $2,300 after Congress had refused to become interested in it. The most serious loss to the national library, however, was the Bancroft library, the most valuable collection of Americana, among other things, ever assembled. It consisted of 14,606 books, 486 volumes of manuscripts, and 4,648 pamphlets, the tools used by the historian George Bancroft in his volumes on the United States. It was offered for $75,000 and Congress would not spend the money. Now it may make up for this unfortunate mistake by appropriating without delay funds for the purchase of the unique and invaluable Vollbehr collection. When we consider the vast sums that are discussed for the "limitation of armaments," a mere million and a half seems little indeed.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

WHEN the final ten had been counted over the prostrate form of Judge Parker there still remained much doubt as to just what it was that hit him. The World, for instance, gave its editorial opinion that the organized Negro opposition had nothing to do with it. Mark Sullivan, in the Herald Tribune, allowed the colored faction the balance of power and assigned it ten Senatorial votes. Indeed, it seems to be the consensus that it was the disaffection of conservative Middle Western Republicans which accounted for the defeat of the gentleman from North Carolina. And this has within it a very satisfactory ironic quality. Until near the end Judge Parker remained exceedingly scornful of Negro opposition. He refused the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People the courtesy of a reply when it asked him to pass upon the validity of certain statements attributed to him by the press of his own State.

The mills of the gods in grinding hit upon an extremely pretty conceit. Judge Parker had declared himself against Negro participation in politics and as a result the American Negro became politically effective for the first time and barred the way to Mr. Hoover's appointee. And there was drama in the manner of the conflict. The President, as has been pointed out on many occasions, is a great organizer. With prestige and patronage at his command he could exert terrific pressure for the confirmation of Judge Parker. In justice to the President it may be said that many promises were made in his name which he had by no means authorized. But even though he was personally guiltless much in the way of seemingly executive temptation was dangled before the eyes of weak-kneed Senators. And so it is exciting to know that the man in the White House was checkmated largely through the efforts of a short and slight mulatto in a five-room Harlem flat.

Walter White did the field work for the National Association and on the strength of his recent triumph he may become one of the most powerful forces in American politics. It is a little ridiculous to refer to Mr. White as a mulatto, since his skin is just as fair as the paper on which these words are printed. His eyes are of a Nordic blue and his hair is decidedly sandy. In other parts of the world Walter White would be ranked as a Caucasian with a slight admixture of Negro blood. Here he is officially Negro because of some minute strain which has been biologically discounted. Of course, even here in America, Mr. White is a Negro largely from choice. The community has only his word for the fact that he is Negroid. Had he chosen to call himself white no power on earth could have singled him out from his fellows.

And yet this small blond Negro is among the most passionate of propagandists. His waking hours and perhaps his dreams are given over to the question of race relations. Unlike some other Negro intellectuals he is not much infused with a contempt and hatred for all things white. At least one does not get that impression from his courteous and friendly bearing. And he is pleasantly humorous for all the fire which burns inside. But he is no compromiser. The school of "Know your place" finds no support from him.

Often I have envied him his chance to lead a dual existence if he so desires. As agent for the National Association he can go into the deepest portions of the Southern Bible belt and inquire about some act of violence or discrimination without ever allowing the local citizenry to know that he is a black man investigating happenings for a Negro organization. The phrase "black man" is ridiculous enough in this case but I am for the moment humoring the "one-drop" school of American thought and expression. To be sure, this school is founded upon a fallacy. It is the proud boast of the more militant Nordics that they can't be fooled. "If I pressed your fingernail like this," said a Southern gentleman on a Pullman crossing the State of Mississippi, "I could tell right away if you had so much as one-thousandth of a drop of Negro blood." And having said this the Mississippian did lean forward and press against the fingernail of Walter White. He never knew why the little blond man laughed at the end of the experiment.

There is no getting away from the fact that the Negro in America labors under many handicaps. It would seem that any individual possessing the right of choice would inevitably choose to be white instead of colored. I wondered why Walter White chose to identify himself with a race which labors under such hardships when with a word he could cross over, as very many light-colored men and women do each year. In order to settle that point in my mind I finally asked him. "Why didn't you ever decide to become a white man?" I asked. "It must be hard to remain a Negro when you don't have to." He told me this story:

> I was born in Atlanta and my father, who is darker than I am, was a letter carrier. We had a house right on the edge of the Negro quarter. It was a nice house. One week-end there were rumors of race trouble. We tried to get my mother and sisters to leave town and go to a farm outside the city. They wouldn't go. Early in the evening the trouble broke. I was twelve years old and my father gave me a shotgun and stood me at one of the two front windows on the second floor. He stood at the other window. "You're not to fire," he said, "until they cross the edge of the lawn. When they get that close shoot and go on shooting as long as you can."
> Two or three hours later the white mob came down our street. The leader stopped in front of our house and said, "Let's get that damn nigger letter carrier." Before they reached the edge of the lawn, some Negroes down the street fired and killed two men in the mob. The crowd swept past our house and went after the men down the block who had fired the shots. Several Negroes were killed. In the morning the soldiers came and martial law was declared.
> But [said Walter White] I'd stood at that window for two hours with a shotgun waiting for them to cross the edge of the lawn. I was twelve years old. After that night I never wanted to be a white man. I knew which side I was on.

And a good many years later John J. Parker was not confirmed for the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Nation's Tariff Poll

TO find New England newspaper editors opposing a higher tariff by a vote of two to one on the ground of its economic consequences, and well-nigh unanimously on the basis of its probable effect on international relations, and to find a majority of them going so far in opposition as to think that the President ought to veto the bill is a surprising thing. Yet that is the result of a telegraphic poll just conducted among them, and the detailed replies are even more unfavorable than the above statement would indicate. The Connecticut editors who answer are almost solid against the bill, and only two out of thirteen papers in Massachusetts favor it without qualification.

In an effort to obtain some gauge of public opinion on the pending tariff bill, The Nation has addressed a series of questions to newspapers throughout the country. The first results, covering returns received from New England up to the time of going to press, are presented herewith. The returns from other sections of the country will be published in our next two issues. Four questions were asked of the editors of ninety-two of the leading newspapers of New England. Replies were received from twenty-five, of which seven are listed as Republican in politics, five independent Republican, one Democratic, one independent Democratic, and eleven independent. Here are the results.

1. Will the pending tariff bill, if enacted, raise the cost of living?

Sixteen editors, including all but one answering in the States of Maine, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, say yes. The New Bedford (Massachusetts) Times, on the other hand, answers no. The Burlington (Vermont) Free Press believes that the tariff will not raise the cost "appreciably"; the Rutland (Vermont) Herald thinks that it "should stabilize prices"; and the Keene (New Hampshire) Sentinel "does not believe that it will raise cost to the extent that its opponents claim." On the most favorable showing, then, the score against the tariff on this count is sixteen to four.

2. Will it ultimately benefit or injure us economically?

Five editors think that it will benefit, thirteen that it will injure us. Two others give qualified economic approval, the New London (Connecticut) Day, for example, holding that it "may be of ultimate benefit if toned down to minimum increases, abandoning inexcusable items like sugar and olive oil"; and two others are inclined to look for some economic injury from it. On economic grounds the total is thus seven for and fifteen against the bill.

3. Will it improve or injure our international relations?

Here there is striking agreement. Seventeen writers, including even those who favor the measure on economic grounds, believe it likely to make our relations with other countries more difficult; but the Hyde Park (Massachusetts) Gazette-Times says, "What of it? Why should we not consider our own manufacturers first?" The New Bedford Times alone thinks our relations will be bettered. Three papers look for little effect. The Lawrence (Massachusetts) Telegram thinks that any threatened disturbance will be "a flash in the pan." The Springfield Union regards the idea as a historic bogy, yet does not consider "the present bill as better than the existing act, even with the debenture and other fantastic notions left out." Seventeen editors, then, must be recorded against the international political effects of the measure; four, and three of those only negatively, for it.

4. Should the President sign or veto the bill?

Six editors flatly favor signing; seven flatly oppose. Four others favor Presidential approval under certain conditions; four others apparently favor a veto. Ten in all are for approval; eleven against it. The Portland Evening News, holding that the bill will raise the cost of living, injure us economically both immediately and ultimately, and injure our international relations, yet holds it "a grave question whether the President should veto and thus cause great confusion and delay." The Boston Transcript, which has regarded revision as unnecessary, yet believes that if the debenture is excluded and Presidential flexibility included the President should sign the bill in order to prevent the tariff from coming up in the next Congress. The Worcester Telegram, favoring protection, holds the provision for Presidential flexibility "imperatively necessary." The Brockton Enterprise favors the bill because "only a tariff on shoes can check a flood of importations that will close many American plants." The Hartford Courant, while speaking in guarded terms of any possible benefits, believes that "if the bill goes to the President minus the debenture provision he should sign it and give it a chance to prove the wisdom or unwisdom of its makers." The Hartford Times is doubtful if the bill "offers sufficient improvement over present conditions to warrant enactment," but hardly expects a veto.

On the other hand, the Lewiston (Maine) Evening Journal, declaring that Congress should never again be permitted to make a general revision, asserts that "the wool schedules are the worst ever offered to the country and are alone sufficient cause for a Presidential veto." The Quincy (Massachusetts) Patriot-Leader, strongly critical, feels that the bill "may well be allowed to go into the discard." The Mercury and the Standard of New Bedford both condemn the measure on the ground that the cotton duties are unworkable, and the former specifically favors a veto. The Worcester Evening Post and the New Haven Journal Courier both favor a veto if the bill is passed in its present form, while the Stamford (Connecticut) Advocate prefers a veto if it "means definite retention of present rates, but if veto means more uncertainty and continued bickerings we would favor signing the bill even though unsatisfactory." The Waterbury (Connecticut) Republican and American say pointedly: "Pending tariff bill will raise living cost. It menaces economic welfare. It menaces economic relations. Its veto should be considered." The Springfield Republican believes that the bill will injure us economically and politically, and should be vetoed. The Springfield News believes that "Hoover should veto it, but such judgment may hardly be expected of him in view of Parker fiasco and other monumental blunders." The Bridgeport (Connecticut) Herald says: "We have had tariff for protection only and tariff for revenue only. The Grundy bill will give us tariff for extortion only. President Hoover should veto this pernicious bill."

II. Saving and Wasting Lives[*]

By LOUIS RESNICK

I
Our Continuing Slaughter

FOR several years after the World War much was made of the fact that during our participation the number of Americans killed or injured by accidents at home was greater than the number of American soldiers killed or wounded at the front. This record was attributed to the extraordinary industrial activity of the war period, to the high pressure under which everybody worked, and to the replacement of skilled men in industry by green hands, who are more susceptible to accidents than old employees. It is now twelve years since the armistice, but the casualty list in peaceful America each year still is longer than the casualty list of the A. E. F.

Each year since 1918 we have killed or injured accidentally almost twice as many human beings as were killed or injured among the American military forces during nineteen months of war. In the last twelve years we have killed 1,000,000 men, women, and children and seriously injured 25,000,000 by preventable accidents in the United States. In so doing, we have caused an economic loss of at least $40,000,000,000. These are conservative estimates based on studies and reports of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, the Hoover Conference on Traffic Accidents, the National Fire Protection Association, and the National Safety Council.

Year after year, it is shown in the proceedings of the annual safety congresses, the lives of 80,000 to 90,000 persons have been cut short by accidents in the United States. The trend has been steadily upward, and last year 95,000 persons were killed by accidents in this country. Those who know most about the accident situation predict that during the present year 100,000 Americans will be killed.

Is such slaughter an inevitable by-product of modern civilization? Is it unavoidable? Hardly. H. W. Heinrich, assistant superintendent of the Engineering and Inspection Division of the Travelers Insurance Company, told the Seventeenth Safety Congress in New York City (October, 1928) that 98 per cent of all industrial accidents are preventable. This was no offhand estimate, but the conclusion of a recognized authority after careful analysis of 70,000 detailed accident reports. Eighty-eight per cent of all industrial accidents, Mr. Heinrich said, are due to faulty supervision; 10 per cent are due to the material equipment with which employees have to deal; only 2 per cent are unavoidable.

C. W. Price, formerly general manager of the National Safety Council, author of the first State safety code (Wisconsin), and now director of the course in accident prevention at New York University, is convinced that 75 to 90 per cent of the accidents in any industry can be prevented and that 50 to 75 per cent of all accidents outside of industry are preventable in the light of our present knowledge. Persistent, intensive, and properly organized effort in any community, Mr. Price says, would avert an even larger percentage of the so-called public accidents.

Frances Perkins, Industrial Commissioner for the State of New York, on February 26, 1930, told the Greater New York Safety Conference: "Enough has been done to show that no accident need happen." A few minutes before she had said: "Last year [1929] was the worst year we have ever had. There were more industrial accidents than ever before, 20,000 more [in New York State] than in the previous year." And she was referring only to industrial accidents serious enough to warrant compensation for injuries to the employee.

Walter King, in the president's address at the 1927 congress of the National Safety Council, said:

> Approximately 7,000 children were killed in automobile accidents last year and fully 140,000 boys and girls were injured by motor vehicles. Practically all of these youngsters were between five and fifteen years of age. The deplorable fact is that practically all of these accidents might have been prevented. We feel almost horrified at the ignorance or indifference which permits it.

The National Fire Protection Association is authority for the statement that an average of forty-one persons are burned to death each day—15,000 a year—and that practically all of these are needless sacrifices. Every year thousands of children are drowned. Thousands fall to their death from windows, roofs, porches, and fire escapes. Hundreds of children die in the Roman holiday that we make of the Fourth of July.

During the past thirty years more American lives have been lost in celebrating our independence than were lost in acquiring it. The score follows:

Cost of ACQUIRING American Independence
Americans killed in Revolutionary War	4,044
Americans injured in Revolutionary War	6,004

Cost of CELEBRATING American Independence
Americans killed in fireworks accidents (last 30 years)	4,290
Americans injured in fireworks accidents (last 30 years)	96,000

These figures are based on nation-wide studies by the American Medical Association and the American Museum of Safety. They do not include the many deaths which occur long after the Fourth of July as a direct result of fireworks accidents on the Fourth. Nor do they include the drownings and automobile fatalities which regularly occur on the Fourth of July over and above the daily average.

The Museum of Safety and the National Society for the Prevention of Blindness jointly undertook a study of Fourth of July casualties, and this is what they found in 1927:

[*] The second of three articles on the safety movement. The third will appear in our issue of May 28.—EDITOR THE NATION.

161 persons were killed in fireworks accidents between June 19 and July 17;
52 of these were children less than 5 years old;
54 burned to death when their clothing was ignited by fireworks or bonfires;
20 children were burned to death by "harmless sparklers";
21 children died as the result of eating fireworks;
32 persons were shot by "unloaded guns" or stray bullets;
30 persons lost one or both eyes;
300 others suffered eye injuries;
1,900 persons were otherwise injured.

All this with ten States not heard from. Approximately 900 cities and towns reported fireworks casualties; only 9 reported prosecutions growing out of these accidents. Pennsylvania led the States with 23 deaths and 425 injuries as the result of its Fourth of July celebration. Detroit headed the list of cities with 90 accidents and 8 deaths. New York State reported 16 dead and 234 injured.

"Why isn't something done to stop this annual slaughter? How about the safety movement we hear so much of?" The answer is simple. Professional safety men and safety organizations have been too busy trying to reduce the kinds of accidents that cost the most money—industrial accidents, which cost industry at least a billion dollars a year in workmen's compensation and lowered production, and motor-vehicle accidents, which cost another billion in insurance protection and traffic delays—they have been too busy doing this job, the job for which they are hired, to make any strenuous effort to save the lives of 100 or 150 children every Fourth of July. No one has to pay for fireworks accidents to children and so no one makes any serious effort to stop them.

THE SAFETY MOVEMENT

What is the safety movement, anyway, and how did it start? The problem of accident prevention is as old as man. Safety men have found references to their doctrine in the speeches of Abraham Lincoln, in Shakespeare, and in the Bible. But the organized effort to prevent accidents began on a certain day in May, 1908, when the late Judge Elbert H. Gary, chairman of the United States Steel Corporation, addressing a meeting of the casualty managers of the corporation's subsidiaries, said:

> We expect our legal department and the gentlemen under their control, direction, and advice [the casualty managers were under control of the legal department at that time] to take such steps as are practicable to ascertain anything that can be done at every locality and in every department to add to the safety of our equipment and to prevent accidents.

Returning to his office, Judge Gary wrote to the presidents of the subsidiary companies:

> The United States Steel Corporation expects its subsidiary companies to make every effort practicable to prevent injury to employees. Much can be done by designing new construction and machinery with all practicable safeguards. Expenditures necessary for such improvements will be authorized. Nothing which will add to the protection of the workmen should be neglected. The safety and welfare of the workmen is the greatest concern. [Italics mine.]

That was an historic statement, and the most vital part of it is the italicized sentence. It started the safety movement not only within the properties of the Steel Corporation but in American industry generally. And what little is being done for accident prevention outside of industry in this country today must be credited to the industrial safety movement. In the next year steelplant executives learned that accidents could be prevented. Incidentally, they learned that money could be saved—lots of it—through safety work. The records of the Steel Corporation's Bureau of Safety, Sanitation, and Welfare show that in twenty years more than 59,000 employees have been saved from death or serious injury and that more than $20,000,000 has been saved for the stockholders through accident prevention.

In the next few years State legislatures began to pass workmen's-compensation laws requiring employers to pay to injured workmen a portion of the wages they would have earned during the period of their disability and to the dependents of those killed in industry some compensation—usually about $3,500—for the loss of their breadwinner. Whether Judge Gary and the other pioneers in safety were impelled primarily by humanitarian motives or by purely economic motives, no one can know. We do know that the economic necessity created by the workmen's-compensation laws drove most other employers to some organized effort at accident prevention and that these laws today provide the principal stimulus for accident prevention.

Up to the time of the Steel Corporation's demonstration, accidents in industry were generally regarded as inherent and unavoidable "hazards of the trade." Their frequent occurrence in a plant cast no reflection on the management, nor were they recognized as any serious liability. The situation is described by Arthur Williams, president of the American Museum of Safety, thus:

> In those days human life was the cheapest thing in this country. Men were treated with less concern than animals in industry, and when we first began to take an interest in accident prevention we were charged with being socialistic.

Workmen's-compensation laws, the publicity given to the fine showings of the Steel Corporation, and the zeal of some of the early safety men changed all that. Safety associations began to spring up: first, the Safety Institute of America, in New York, then the National Safety Council, in Chicago, the American Society of Safety Engineers, with branches in various cities, and numerous local safety councils. A new profession was created, a profession which today numbers some five to ten thousand men in all its various ranks.

The handicap under which most of these men are working was tersely told way back in 1921 by C. P. Tolman, consulting engineer of New York City, who was at that time chief engineer and chairman of the Manufacturing Committee of the National Lead Company and president of the National Safety Council. Speaking before a joint meeting of the Cleveland Engineering Society and the Engineering Section of the National Safety Council, he said:

> Usually the engineer is required to make the plant as safe as possible, with the following stipulations:
> he must not interrupt operations;
> he must do nothing which would decrease output;
> he must do nothing which would increase cost;

- he must not make changes of a character or in a manner to cause labor troubles;
- he must not make changes which would affect the character of the product.

Otherwise he has free rein. This seems to leave little chance for accomplishment, but hundreds of safety men are doing effective safety work under just such restrictions.

Nine years later—just a few days ago—I reminded Mr. Tolman of this statement and asked to what extent it described conditions in industry today. His answer was: "It is just as true today as it was in 1921—despite the fact that there is nothing in the safety movement which, if properly done, need interfere with production. In fact the contrary is true."

IV. The Chain Daily*

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

TO whom the credit belongs for starting the first chain of dailies is a moot question. The pioneer was probably Edward W. Scripps, who in 1875 was associated with his brother in the founding of the Detroit News. Three years later he established the Cleveland Press, which was in turn followed by the Cincinnati Post. These were the leaders in a chain which is now the largest in the country, numbering twenty-five dailies including the New York Telegram, with the Ira C. Copley holdings and the Hearst chain following with twenty-two dailies each. Altogether fifty-five chains are listed by the Editor and Publisher, but as seventeen of these comprise only two dailies each, they ought really to be deducted. No one, for example, considers Mr. Ochs the owner of a chain because he possesses the New York Times and the Chattanooga Times; nor can the Pulitzer group, the New York morning and evening World and the St. Louis Post-Dispatch be rightly included.

All told there are sixteen major groups comprising five or more dailies each. Besides the Hearst, Copley, and Scripps-Howard chains, the more important are the Macfadden, Paul Block, Booth, Brush-Moore, Cox, Fentress-Marsh, Gannett, Howe, Lee Syndicate, Macy-Forbes, Lindsay-Nunn, Palmer, Stauffer, Thompson, Ridder Brothers, and Scripps-Canfield. Even here, however, it is to be noticed that some of these are entirely within one State and comprise small-town papers only; thus, all but two of the Macy-Forbes newspapers are in Westchester County, New York. The list naturally takes no account of the weekly newspapers which may also belong to the owner of a chain. As this article is written comes the news of the purchase of a group of thirty-five weeklies, semi-weeklies, and small dailies in Ohio by the "Ohio News, Inc.," whose real ownership is not yet revealed. In most cases the desire to own a large string is evident. No one can say just how rapidly a chain may grow. Colonel Copley, for instance, is reported to have bought his eighteen California dailies in a day after having withdrawn nearly all his millions from certain public-utility companies through which he had amassed his fortune. His remaining four dailies are in Illinois and of a distinctly different kind from his small-town California properties.

Here we have a characteristic of a number of chains—a lack of balance. The Scripps-Howard dailies seem better coordinated and more wisely distributed than any other; unlike Mr. Hearst the owners of this chain do not own more than one daily in a town. They are thus represented in twenty-five cities, whereas Mr. Hearst's dark journalistic shadow has happily as yet fallen upon but eighteen. Curiously enough, the Fentress-Marsh chain seems not to go into a city until it acquires all the dailies or the only daily in that town. Other chains are curiously put together. For example, the Ridder brothers, the sons of the late Hermann Ridder of the Staats-Zeitung, have added to that daily such diverse journals as the New York Herold (also German language), the New York Journal of Commerce, a business daily, the Jamaica, New York, Long Island Press, the historic St. Paul, Minnesota, Pioneer-Press, the St. Paul Dispatch, the Aberdeen, South Dakota, American and News, and the Paterson, New Jersey, Press-Guardian, besides holding a minority interest in the Seattle Times.

The most striking rise of a chain is undoubtedly that of the Frank E. Gannett group, now sixteen in number, of which all but two are published in New York State. It includes such important dailies as the Brooklyn Eagle, the Hartford, Connecticut, Times, one of the two or three most influential newspapers in New England, and the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle and Times-Union. Mr. Gannett's experiment is the more interesting because he has made use of the new technique of selling bonds and preferred stocks to the public and keeping control through the possession of the common stocks, doubtless with the expectation of making such savings in costs by large-scale purchases, by using one Washington office for the entire group, and other economies, as to be able speedily to buy out the public. That, aside from the question of personal power, is the chief lure of the chain.

It is still too early to assert that the newspaper chain has finally demonstrated its financial stability. Several of them are suffering a good deal in the present depression, which has severely affected the advertising of practically all Eastern dailies. It is easy to carry a combination of dailies when conditions are good throughout the country; it may become a dangerous burden when times are bad. The Hearst chain has a number of very weak links. There is nothing, for instance, about his morning dailies in Washington or New York to indicate prosperity, and there is a general belief that if he could find some means of giving away the New York American without too great loss of prestige it would be done. Baltimore is still a weak spot for him, and so are one or two of the up-State New York cities, this despite the fact that his business management has been much improved during the past several years. Mr. Gannett has had difficulty with the Brooklyn Eagle, for which he probably paid too much—the prices of dailies have been as much inflated since 1920 as were farm lands in the boom war years. It was to finance the purchase of the Eagle that Mr. Gannett procured a loan of $2,000,000 from the International Paper and Power Company and its "public-spirited" president. When the fact was brought out and the transaction was severely criticized, Mr. Gannett felt it to be his duty to obtain the money elsewhere in order to repay the paper trust. Other reasons also have combined to make the situation of the Eagle a difficult one.

* The fourth of a series of articles on the American press. The fifth, on the standardization of the daily, will appear in our issue of June 4.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Except in the case of Mr. Hearst, who increased his holdings rapidly in the days when he sought to be Governor of New York and President of the United States, I do not feel that political motives have played any great part in this newspaper development, certainly not at all in Mr. Gannett's case. Mr. Gannett was once asked if he had in mind any definite purpose in creating his chain, such as the endeavor to influence public opinion in increasing measure. His reply was in the negative; he merely enjoyed enlarging his personal field of activity. He had no more conscious motive than that which leads a man to buy six more drug-stores if he has made a success of one or two. Undoubtedly the newspaper chain is as much a response to an economic urge or tide as the recent grouping of railroads and the development of the chain cigar or food stores. It is in the air; it is part of the transformation of almost every business which is going on under our eyes, and if it had not been Scripps, Gannett, or Copley, it would have been someone else. The economic drift is what counts—the nation-wide combinations to decrease competition, to restrain trade, and to deal in larger and larger units. There was at bottom no reason to expect that the newspaper business would be spared by the economic forces which are remodeling our industrial life and making the relationship of government to the staggering combinations of capital the paramount issue of the day.

If there is as yet no deliberate planning of newspaper chains to control opinion there is no reason why this could not be undertaken. It is already quite in the power of rich men to buy all the dailies in the smaller States—there are only three in Delaware, six in Wyoming, five in Idaho, twenty-two in Alabama, and thirty-six in Washington. Henry Ford could long ago have purchased the sixty dailies in Michigan with the exception of the very rich Detroit News, with but a portion of one year's income. Since there are forty-eight towns and cities in Michigan which possess only one daily journal apiece, despite the theory that this is a government by two political parties, the opportunity must be pretty obvious to those with political ambitions. The purchase of the California chain of Colonel Copley was attributed by some to a desire to control public opinion in southern California in favor of the power interests, but this was denied by his employees. The relative worth of the chain, and whether it is a gain or a menace, will depend upon the personal equation, the character and the aims of the owners.

So far it is impossible to say that any one chain has been used for specific anti-social or reactionary propaganda, if we omit the Hearst dailies. The Scripps-Howard newspapers are usually liberal, and most friendly to reform movements. It is a pity that their reporting is sometimes poor, their make-up and typography wretched. They sorely lack high standards in these respects, but their answer is the old one—"We must stoop to get circulations in order to put our ideas over." Even the New York Telegram lacks typographical distinction and is messy; yet the New York Times has made its great success while adhering to typographical dignity and taste, with the Herald Tribune following its example. None of the chains, again excepting Hearst, strive for typographical uniformity. It would be welcome if a format of beauty and distinction were to be adopted by one of them; but those two qualities have largely disappeared from the American press.

By using the new technique of getting the public to advance some of the money while the promoter himself holds control there is no reason whatever why we may not see a chain of one hundred dailies controlled by one man. Theoretically at least; whether this would work out well practically is doubted by many. Yet the steady progress of the Scripps-Howard syndicate, despite certain weak members, would seem to prove that it is no more impossible than the creation by one owner of a group of five hundred grocery or five-and-ten-cent stores. I can see no valid reasons why we should not have much larger chains and, I believe, we shall see them when those having great stakes in the present economic system are sufficiently enriched or sufficiently frightened by the specter of radicalism to seek more directly to control public opinion. Here is where the danger lies. In this connection the action of the International Paper and Power Company in buying its way into a number of dailies in 1928 and 1929, and lending much money to newspaper owners, including Mr. Gannett, is highly suggestive. The purpose of this new policy, the president of the company said in his own defense, was simply to assure to the company steady customers for its paper. But the outcry within the press and the disapproval of the public were so great that he was speedily compelled to change his mind about the advisability of this policy and to get out of the newspaper business. Similarly persistent and at times successful efforts by the power lobbyists to get their hooks into daily newspapers are a warning of a tendency that must be guarded against if the press is not to become merely a creature of the great capitalists. It is, heaven knows, today sufficiently in the clutch of the forces which make for reaction and the support of the status quo.

Again, the question of absentee ownership sometimes plays a considerable part in the development of the chain. Some of the smaller communities resent the control of their dailies by men living elsewhere. This is not, however, a universal feeling. There might, however, well be dissatisfaction in Pittsburgh, where all three of the dailies remaining in a city which had seven morning and evening newspapers only a few years ago are now owned by capitalists residing elsewhere—the Scripps-Howard Syndicate, Hearst, and Paul Block. At bottom the owners of the Hearst and Block Pittsburgh newspapers have no more direct interest in the city than have the owners of chain cigar stores. It is true that there are always editorial writers to deal with local problems; that the staffs are still largely made up of local men. The owners of the Scripps-Howard papers make every effort to tie up their editors with the local interests of the cities in which their papers are situated. Local autonomy is the watchword and it is generally lived up to, except in national affairs. The local Scripps-Howard editor is given help to buy an interest in the paper and is expected to spend the rest of his life in its service. He is constantly urged to "know your town" and "feel its pulse." Scripps-Howard editors are, however, freely transferred from one city to another. It still seems impossible that there should be quite the same relationship of the daily to its community that exists when the paper is owned by a local man known to all his fellow-citizens, to be seen at local gatherings, and to be held directly accountable to local opinions and desires. It would seem as though no community of the size of Pittsburgh could rest happy under such conditions. They seem to me intolerable.

On the other hand, defenders of the chain allege that there is a certain advantage in this freedom of a chain editor from local entanglements—social, business, and financial. While it was always Mr. Scripps's idea that his editors might purchase stock in the papers they were serving he rigidly ruled that they should not invest their savings in other enterprises which would interfere with their complete freedom of opinion and action. He wished them to be exclusively and only newspapermen. Another view is expressed by Eugene A. Howe of the Howe Newspapers (chiefly located in Texas, where the chain idea is being developed most rapidly and successfully). "I think," he states, "that it doesn't matter who owns a newspaper as long as it is operated vigorously and honestly. The average reader doesn't bother about the paper's masthead. Give him a judicious selection of news and features, give him a good newspaper, and he is satisfied. And the paper usually will be a profitable investment. . . . We are still experimenting in Texas, but we feel we are going a long way in establishing group dailies."

There remains, however, the question of the editorial opinions of a chain of newspapers. Here we have three distinct policies. The Scripps-Howard dailies, while free to deal with local issues, all conform to the national editorial opinions formulated by chief editorial writers, or, as in the case of their support of Herbert Hoover for the Presidency (which they are presumed to be repenting in sackcloth and ashes), as a result of an editorial convention and a free vote of all the editors. Mr. Hearst's editors reflect his own contradictory and changing views and personal whims. Frank Gannett, however, does not alter the political policies of the papers he purchases. Thus the Hartford, Connecticut, Times remains Democratic, and the Brooklyn Eagle independent Democratic, while most of the others are Republican. Mr. Gannett is a convinced and sincere dry; it will be interesting to see if it will be possible for him to allow some of his papers to take the opposite viewpoint if the question of prohibition becomes still more acute. His policy seems to me entirely ethical and quite defensible. It is certainly unusual for an owner to grant to his editors the complete freedom of opinion and expression which Mr. Gannett permits.

In another situation, that in which the same company controls all the dailies in one city, the question is a bit more difficult. Thus, in Springfield, Massachusetts, all four papers are owned by one company. Two are Republican in politics, one Democratic, and one independent. Where the facts are known and where, as in Springfield, there is an honest and aboveboard endeavor to advocate the policies of the two political parties and no effort is made to hide the real ownership, it would seem that no criticism could lie against this procedure. Different is the case, cited by Senator B. K. Wheeler of Montana, of a town in that State in which both the dailies, one Republican and one Democratic, were none the less owned by the same mining company, their respective opposing editorials being written by the same hireling!

As for the standardization of the dailies which results from ownership of groups, I shall touch upon that in another article. It is necessary to point out here only that this is the inevitable result—and a specially desired one—of the amalgamations. Herein lies part of the great opportunity to make savings by supplying the same cartoons, illustrations, rotogravure sections, and articles. These savings are not always realized, as for example in the case of white paper, for which a standard price has now supposedly been fixed for all purchasers, large or small, who do not have their own mills and must buy of the large companies. But in the main it would seem as if enormous economies could be made.

It cannot be maintained that the chain development is a healthy one from the point of view of the general public. Any tendency which makes toward restriction, standardization, or the concentrating of editorial power in one hand is to be watched with concern. For the ideal journalistic state of a republic, especially where the two-party system prevails, is one in which papers may easily be created by single individuals, as Horace Greeley established the Tribune and Alexander Hamilton's friends the New York Evening Post, to rise and disappear if need be. If the coordination of the press with the current urge for larger and larger combinations is inevitable, it is regrettable if only because this makes it additionally harder for the man of small fortune to start a daily and compete successfully for public support. That this chain development is an international phenomenon does not alter the situation.

It has gone farthest in Great Britain, where three groups, those of Rothermere, Beaverbrook, and the Berry Brothers, now dominate the press, and inform or misinform perhaps 80 per cent of the reading public. It is not impossible that within twenty years or less we shall see these three groups owned by a single company or individual. When that comes to pass the government will have to take cognizance of the existence of a power to control and inform opinion that may prove superior to its own—an impossible situation. No independent daily comes up for sale in England today without the existing three groups bidding for it. The Hugenberg chain in Germany is so large and powerful as to have worried many persons lest it menace the existence of the new republican institutions. Even in South Africa the chain tendency is apparent. Thus, the three leading evening journals, the Star of Johannesburg, the Cape Argus of Capetown, and the Natal Advertiser of Durban, belong to the same company, which also owns the Diamond Fields Advertiser of Kimberley and The Friend of Bloemfontein, besides controlling the two leading dailies of Rhodesia.

The formation of a British company in 1928 for the purpose of owning British dailies and buying into newspaper properties in other countries foreshadows the international chain. Its mere organization aroused a storm of protest in France, and led to the immediate threat in Paris of a law to prevent the holding of any shares of a French daily by foreigners. The heated and, I believe, totally false charges in this country, during and after the war, that a portion of our press is, or was, under British control is proof of the deep feeling which would be aroused if it should appear that foreigners were seeking to control our American sources of information.

The Supreme Court Victory

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

WHETHER the country has "turned the corner" and is now on its way back to that brummagem prosperity which obviously constitutes Herbert Hoover's sole ideal of the national destiny is open to serious doubt. What does it matter, when profound hopes are springing from other ground? The Senate's act in rejecting the nomination of John J. Parker for the Supreme Court may easily be regarded as the most encouraging event in domestic politics since before the war. It is true that a single victory does not always decide a campaign, and the margin in this case was uncomfortably narrow. Nevertheless, Parker's defeat definitely suggests that the impenetrable apathy which has characterized the public's attitude toward the public's business during the past ten years is vanishing at last before a revival of the intelligent and progressive interest which the war effectually crushed. The unsuccessful fight on Charles Evans Hughes and the successful fight on Parker were inseparable phases of the same event, one leading inevitably to the other. The event itself was nothing less than a general uprising against the national plunderbund which has been operating under the protection of decisions handed down by the reactionary majority of the Supreme Court. All the fatuous revilings of stall-fed editors and all the labored explanations of journalistic boy scouts cannot obscure the fact. Senators found that the attack on Hughes, contrary to what many had dreaded, was immensely popular with the folks at home. They found that public reverence for the former corporation attorneys comprising the court majority was a myth. Once that discovery was made the lid was off. The opposition to Hughes rested largely on resentment against the conditions which enable public-utility corporations to earn enormous profits on fictitious property values. Opposition to Parker was inspired largely by knowledge of the atrocious abuse to which the power of injunction has been subjected by class-conscious or corrupt judges in labor disputes. In each instance the evil existed by the authority and with the consent of the Supreme Court majority. In short, this was the same fight that Abraham Lincoln waged after the Dred Scott decision—a fight to reverse the policies of the court, either by impressing its members with the necessity of adopting more enlightened views or by replacing them with more enlightened men. And, in my humble judgment, it has just begun.

* * * * *

THE next step will be a determined effort on the part of Senators Norris, Borah, and Walsh (of Montana) to obtain action on the Shipstead anti-injunction bill, a measure comprehensively designed to end just such abuses as formed the subject of debate in the Parker fight, and many others in addition. Thus the bill—applying, of course, only to federal courts—would prohibit the issuance of injunctions based on the existence of "yellow-dog" contracts, such as Judge Parker upheld in the Red Jacket case; it would prohibit injunctions restraining workers from quitting their jobs, or joining unions, or receiving strike benefits; it would forbid the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes until the complainants had made every reasonable effort to settle; it would forbid the issuance of injunctions to preserve order unless local peace officers testified that order could not be maintained by ordinary means; it would forbid the issuance of injunctions in any case unless it were shown that the injury resulting from failure to enjoin would exceed that resulting from issuance of an injunction; it would insure jury trials in cases of criminal contempt arising from labor disputes, and it would prohibit any judge from hearing a case of contempt alleged to have been committed against his own court unless it were committed in his presence, thus abolishing the disgraceful procedure, so often employed against newspapers, in which the judge acts as complainant, prosecutor, jury, and judge. For ten days Senatorial defenders of Judge Parker have been declaiming on the Senate floor that the proper way to end the injunction evil is by legislation. Soon—perhaps before this appears—they will be confronted with precisely such proposed legislation. Remember their names—Fess of Ohio, Gillett of Massachusetts, Overman and Simmons of North Carolina, Hebert of Rhode Island, Hastings of Delaware, Waterman of Colorado—and watch how they vote on the Shipstead bill!

* * * * *

MEANTIME, consider the pathetic plight of Mr. Hoover. The fact that he suffered a disastrous licking the very first time he elected to stand up and fight has confirmed the opinion so widely held among practical men of his own party that he simply doesn't know the first elements of the game. The fact that he chose to stake his personal prestige on an attempt to elevate a mediocre lawyer-politician to the Supreme Bench, in an effort to strengthen himself politically in North Carolina, vindicates the judgment long held by other persons that the Great Engineer is more deeply concerned with political considerations than any man who has been in the White House during the present century—not excluding the cunning little Calvin. In selecting Parker he completely ignored the warning conveyed by the Hughes fight. In refusing subsequently to withdraw him he rejected the advice of the shrewdest leaders of his party, preferring to rely on his own judgment, fortified with the sycophantic assurances of the political "yes men" who surround him. Never did that ardent letter-writer, Assistant Secretary of the Interior Joe Dixon, utter more prophetic words than when he declared that the nomination of Parker would be "a major political stroke." His only failure was to foresee who would be struck. He never dreamed it would be the "Chief" himself, although the probability was obvious enough to such ordinary politicians as Jim Watson and Charlie McNary. The White House reaction to the result was such as to leave few dry eyes outside the Senate. Rage gave away to self-pity, and self-pity to despair. By turns the "boy scouts" declared that the Senate had been actuated by envy of a Superior Intellect; that political cowardice had produced treachery on the part of such regulars as Vandenberg, Deneen, Glenn, Robinson, and Robsion; that subversive elements were bent on undermining the government by destroying public confidence in the President and the courts, but more particularly in the President; that the whole thing was a Democratic plot; that the whole thing was a Norris-Borah plot, and so on, and so on. Woe unto Israel! It never seemed to occur to any of them that Parker might have been rejected because of his patent and almost universally recognized unfitness.

* * * * *

APPARENTLY the idea eventually occurred to Mr. Hoover, however. At any rate, he definitely abandoned the attempt to play politics with the appointment when he gave it to Owen J. Roberts. As one who associated rather intimately with Mr. Roberts throughout six years of litigation over the Teapot Dome and Elk Hills oil leases, I do not hesitate to say that he will be the most valuable addition to the court since Justice Brandeis joined it. If not a liberal in the constructive sense in which Holmes and Brandeis are liberals, he is at least an intelligent conservative, thoroughly honest and utterly independent. His point of view has never been identified with that of the railroads, the power companies, or any other predatory interest. He has taken an active and unselfish interest in the reform of judicial procedure, and he has been fastidious about accepting retainers—as, for example, when he refused a very handsome offer from the power trust to appear before a Senate committee during the time when he was acting as special government counsel in the oil case. His judgments will never be mere echoes of the devious sophistries of Mr. Chief Justice Hughes. For making such a nomination—undoubtedly the best of his entire administration—President Hoover is entitled to whatever credit may properly accrue to an executive who chooses a good man after learning to his sorrow that no other kind will be accepted.

* * * * *

IN THESE stirring times in the capital there is much to report, but space in a high-class publication of The Nation's type is necessarily limited, and when the inexorable blue pencil descends my choicest phrases are always the ones to suffer. Hence, to condense: The Department of Justice, fidgeting uneasily before the stern glance of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, mumbles that it expects to do something pretty soon about the Radio Trust. The Lobby Committee discloses that the righteous revolt against Rum and Romanism which Bishop Cannon led in Virginia in 1928 was planned by foxy Bascom Slemp and financed by a New York millionaire who admits that his record of his contributions does not quite tally with the Bishop's reports, notwithstanding that holy man's careful instructions to him on how to make them conform. Dr. Scott McBride, head of the Anti-Saloon League, denies that he lobbies in Washington, although I recall one occasion not many years since when the reverend doctor made the round of dry Congressmen's offices, beseeching them, in the league's name, to vote against the impeachment of Federal Judge George W. English, who nevertheless was later impeached on charges of corruption and misconduct. The Couzens resolution prohibiting further railroad consolidations until Congress shall legislate on the subject appears in a fair way to pass the Senate at this session. But let us pause for breath and reflection. It nearly all boils down to the fact that the government is still in the hands of the same combination of political adventurers, party hacks, and agents of big business that has been running the show in Washington for the last ten years. What is really new in the situation is that the public apparently is beginning to understand it, and resent it.

In the Driftway

ANNOUNCEMENT is made from London that on May 19 Paul Robeson will open in "Othello," with Sybil Thorndike as Emilia. The Drifter is strongly tempted to drop everything and rush across the Atlantic for this momentous event. Othello is one of the finest acting parts in the theater; and Paul Robeson is one of the most moving, dramatic, and powerful of modern actors, with a magnificent voice and physique. Moreover, he is black-skinned. The Moor of Venice was probably lighter in color; but to have the part played by a Negro is eminently right and just.

* * * * *

THERE will be fewer persons in London than there would be in America to gasp at sight of a pale white Desdemona being smothered by a black Moor. Indeed, we have probably attained to sufficient sanity on the Negro question even in the United States to be able to witness such a performance without wincing—except in certain sections of the intransigeant South. Robeson will not be the first Negro to play Othello with a white company. About 1835 Ira Aldridge, born in Maryland, played the role with great acclaim in London and throughout Europe. If Aldridge played in this country the Drifter has not heard of it. Indeed, it is inconceivable that, except with a Negro company, a performance of "Othello" would have been permitted while slavery was in its heyday; and if Negroes had performed it probably only Negroes would have witnessed it. In the latter respect we have come a long way on the road of race toleration. Even in Atlanta, even in the fastnesses of Richmond, Roland Hayes sings to an applauding white audience. It is true that he has the greatest difficulty in securing decent hotel accommodations, not only in the South but in Northern cities as well. But that, of course, is another matter.

* * * * *

THIS difference was made only too plain to another Negro performer while he was in the very act of being honored for his art. Charles Gilpin, who died on May 6, became famous over night for his performance of the Emperor Jones in Eugene O'Neill's play of that name. He was celebrated as the greatest Negro actor of his time, and in 1921 was selected by the New York Drama League as one of the ten who had contributed most to the art of the theater. A dinner was to be given for the chosen ten. And rumors got about that Gilpin was to be asked not to attend. A heartening protest from other guests was the result. But this, and many things as preposterous, have happened in the battle between black and white. If Paul Robeson plays Othello in New York, as it is announced he has contracted to do; if Lillian Gish, who has been suggested for the part, plays Desdemona, we shall count it a step forward. It will be a great dramatic spectacle. And it will be, in addition, a milestone in the struggle of a race.

"The Green Pastures"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: When I read Mr. Joseph Wood Krutch's ecstatic review of "The Green Pastures," in which he commends Mr. Marc Connelly for having achieved "this Negro version of Christian mythology," I felt constrained as one of Negro birth to make this statement concerning the true worth of Mr. Connelly's play, not as a play, but as a representation of the Negro's religious belief.

"The Green Pastures" no more represents the untutored Negro's conception of God and heaven than it represents a Chinese's idea of Confucianism. Those of us who are bound by ties of blood, who have lived in the South, and who therefore truly know the Negro, realize that when the Negro whom Mr. Connelly represents visualizes God, he visualizes Him not as a kindly preacher of his own race but as an anemic-looking white gentleman with golden beard and flowing hair, garbed in a long nightshirt with bishop sleeves! In other words, the unlettered Negro pictures his Heavenly Father in terms of the cheap chromo representations of God that are hawked by gimlet-eyed white peddlers through the Negro quarters of the South. To such Negroes not only God but the cherubs also are white. I know of a Negro preacher who almost disrupted his congregation by ordering for his remodeled church stained-glass windows picturing black cherubs!

The reason for such a conception on the part of the Negro is simple enough. Has he not spent his life in a country where to be black is to be despised? Is it therefore likely that he will want to take such a handicap with him to heaven? Oh, no! The untutored Negro looks upon death as a great emancipator who will usher him into a heaven where he will blossom out in all that this world holds dear—fair faces, golden hair; where the toil of this life will be forgotten in endless hours of ease; where there will be not a "fish fry" but a celestial banquet of milk and honey. To him, heaven will be no prosperous Negro lawyer's office with battered roll-top desk, as Mr. Connelly would have you believe. It will be to him a place with shining golden streets and crystal seas, walled in with jasper and sapphire and chalcedony and emerald. A holy place that will need no scrubbing. Work will be no more.

As one of Negro birth who therefore knows the Negro far better than either Mr. Connelly or Mr. Bradford, I can assure you that the Negro does not interpret the life beyond in terms of his present-day existence. Let the dramatic critics appraise "The Green Pastures" as a white man's conception of the Negro's conception of religion and heaven.

"An Admirable Guide"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have read with keen interest Mr. Villard's second article on the Associated Press. May I take this opportunity, as a journalist, of saying how much I enjoy reading your paper for its good taste and its scholarship no less than for its fearless independence, so refreshing in these degenerate days. We find it extremely useful, too, in conducting the Reuter service from this country, as an admirable guide to American liberal opinion on all matters of public interest.

Invocation to the Phoenix

By STANLEY J. KUNITZ

Soul of my soul, in the Egyptian wood
Where all the trees were loosened of their leaves
I strayed, uncovering my winter form;

Webbed in a dream, stagnating like a worm,
Offensive to myself, to the gray bird-drifts
Melting from the boughs with rhyming calls;

Ancient and hoarse, beslimed, glued to a rock
Five hundred years, fainting, struggling with mist
Self-woven, issue of death, ghost of my name—

Heard then the pods clack hollow blistered skins
Where blowzy nest, where musty honeycomb
Tipped in the blowing summer of your fame.

Now is sweet thunder-clearing; wet leaves gush
From buried roots; gleam of your eyes, by day
Harsh solar gold, and night's bleached lunar stone.

Fleet iridescent particle, red brain
Blue-ruffed with blaze, make me your sanctuary,
Your destruction, pyre of your mutable design;

For I have known attrition in the rains,
Endured the conjugations of the stars,
Yet, Circler, one incendiary vein

I have defended, purified, to slake
You in the burning, whose demonic beak
The clasp of bone about my heart O break!

Style and Thought

Between the Lines. By H. M. Tomlinson. Harvard University Press. $1.25.

WHEN English authors come to our shores to lecture and to make money, there is surely nothing reprehensible about it, particularly if they happen to have such qualities of mind and heart as Mr. Tomlinson. Nor is there anything but commendable candor in the prefatory announcement to the present little volume: "The address printed in the following pages was delivered at Princeton University, Yale University, D'Youville College, Cornell University, and Columbia University; and, in its present form, to members of the Harvard Union." That is efficiency and sound economy. The address, moreover, was worth using more than once. It must have charmed the bodies to which it was delivered, for it is dulcetly written, and it adheres to no single set dogmatic theme, but winds gracefully over some of the major problems of literature and life.

Yet a man who speaks before a sea of upturned faces is inevitably tempted to be eloquent, and eloquence is sometimes the enemy of precision. Mr. Tomlinson, I fear, has yielded to this temptation in his discussion of literary style. The result is a series of questionable generalizations. "It is certain," he remarks, "that a great writer never worries about his style." Now I cannot imagine any question about which there could be less certainty. How can we know how much any given writer worried about his style? It is one of those questions on which only positive evidence is possible. We can know, from diaries, corrections of proof or original manuscript, letters or verbal confessions to friends, or printed confessions to the public, whether a writer did worry about his style; we are never in a position to say with complete confidence that he did not.

"The importance of what [the great writer] has to say," continues Mr. Tomlinson, "controls him, and his chief anxiety is that we should clearly understand it. If that does not give him style, then nothing can; and if style is there, then it will be in accord with the importance of his message." Now it may be true that clarity is the primary virtue of prose; yet one cannot help noting that it is a virtue within the grasp of quite commonplace writers. Moreover, it does not seem to be the virtue that most frequently attracts our attention to great styles. It is surely not the most salient characteristic of the prose of Sir Thomas Browne, or of Carlyle, or Pater, or Henry James, or Doughty, or Santayana, or James Joyce. None of these styles convince one that merely making himself understood is the chief anxiety of the great writer.

"It is certain that a great writer never worries about his style." But Stevenson, as we know, spent most of his youth worrying about it, and if we deny that Stevenson was a great writer, or even a good writer, we cannot so easily dismiss the Paters and Flauberts. "Only a bad style," concludes Mr. Tomlinson, "can come of artful deliberation, as Oscar Wilde and others have shown." And this seems to me the most dubious of all Mr. Tomlinson's generalizations. For nearly all the prose writers I have just mentioned—Sir Thomas Browne, Pater, Henry James, Doughty, Santayana, Joyce—seem to me to write with "artful deliberation," as do also Jeremy Taylor, Addison, Sterne, Burke, Gibbon, Johnson, Lamb, De Quincey, Newman, Borrow, Emerson, Jowett, Thoreau, Hudson, Beerbohm, Strachey. And all poetry, even the most "natural," is the product of "artful deliberation." Not even Keats thought spontaneously in sonnets, i. e., in fourteen five-foot, iambic lines rhyming. Pope, whom it is once more becoming respectable to admire, would surely not have spoken so disrespectfully of artful deliberation, nor was his chief concern always the importance of what he had to say, but rather the manner in which he said it:

> True wit is nature to advantage dressed,
> What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed.

Or again:

> True ease in writing comes from art, not chance,
> As those move easiest who have learned to dance.

And was even Oscar Wilde's a bad style? Mr. Tomlinson may not like it, but he should not forget that unless it had had some qualities to make it eminent in its generation he would never have heard of it. Without artful deliberation Wilde would scarcely have been Wilde. In any event, the distinction is not so much between artful deliberation and the lack of it as between bad and good artful deliberation.

There is a sense in which Mr. Tomlinson is profoundly right when he falls back upon the ancient conclusion that style is not a writer's "dress, but the essential man, the man even his friends may not know." A distinguished style can be written only by a distinguished mind; a great style can come only from a great mind. I can no more imagine a writer with a genuinely admirable style and a commonplace mind than I can imagine a triangular circle. The greater part of the beauty of fine writing is the beauty of the thought itself. But the reverse is not necessarily true. A distinguished mind does not necessarily write a distinguished prose; we hardly need the Deweys and Dreisers to remind us that a man who has something important to say does not necessarily say it well. Those who make a complete separation of "style" and "matter" are, it is true, as ill-acquainted with the true nature of the art they deal with as the farmer who builds himself a house and then sends to the city for a man to put on the architecture. Style is not a pretty coat of paint that a writer lays on his thought; it is the very form of the thought. But it is not, as Mr. Tomlinson appears to assume, identical with the thought. It is one thing to decry the false separation of style and matter, it is another to announce that they are synonyms. This is simply the fallacy of declaring that whatever is not white must be black; it is the fallacy into which not only Mr. Tomlinson, but writers as different as Arnold Bennett and Croce have recently fallen. When we talk of a writer's style we are talking of that writer from a different aspect than when we talk of his ideas. To destroy this distinction is merely to invite hopeless confusion.

"O Bright Young People!"

Vile Bodies. By Evelyn Waugh. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

THIS is the kind of book that assures you, in a desperate sort of way, that it is funny. It is modeled, pretty consciously, upon the early Aldous Huxley—the Huxley, that is to say, of "Crome Yellow" and, more noticeably, "Antic Hay"; not the sad Huxley of the moment, whose touch has become so oppressive since he borrowed Mr. Wells's ouija board and achieved intimacy with God. Mr. Waugh, too, has heard the thunder on the usual Sinai: "Vile Bodies" has predicatory implications, the same hangover tone that spoiled "Point Counter Point," but Mr. Waugh has little of Huxley's wit and none of his substance. While it was possible to forgive the latter's taking himself so seriously by reflecting that after all he had created something to be serious about, it is difficult to excuse Mr. Waugh for wrenching good slapstick into tragicomedy.

As satire the book is no less a failure. First of all, Mr. Waugh displays none of the élan that distinguishes the true satirist from the caricaturist. For all its brilliance the writing lacks vitality. The invention is tired, and effects are too often got by recourse to the devices of slapstick exaggeration. Again, the satire is self-conscious satire, which destroys itself. What made "Crome Yellow" so effective, for example, was its utter lack of apparent purpose. One never felt that Huxley was deliberately meaning anything; least of all was one conscious of him as the imminent critic of his characters. One is constantly aware, however, of the presence of Mr. Waugh: usually he is felt only in casual turns of expression, the occasional laying on of effect upon conscious effect; but sometimes he descends to the whimsical footnote, and at least once to the bombastic apostrophe: "O Bright Young People!" Successful satire must be impersonal (the "I" of "Gulliver" is dissociate from Swift) and either entirely improbable ("Gulliver" again, and "Alice"), qua history, or entirely probable ("Crome Yellow," "Antic Hay"). "Vile Bodies" is none of these.

If Mr. Waugh had not tried to do so much, if he had been content to amuse, without attempting to devastate, if he had been content to laugh, without essaying a prophetic sneer at the same time, his book would be diverting in a cockeyed sort of way. It is acceptable comic knowledge that men and women drink to be drunk and sometimes sleep together; that female evangelists are often hypocrites and society editors occasionally unreliable; that movie directors are not invariably sincere artists; that many clergymen are smug, many wives adulteresses, many statesmen lechers, and many dowagers boors. And it is always pleasing to know that what used to be called the "lost generation," before it went humanist, is still energetically losing itself. It is a pity that Mr. Waugh felt that more than these ingredients was needed. Because of its weight of satiric and tragic exaggeration, "Vile Bodies" neither amuses nor instructs. It is not of the type of true stories, but of True Stories.

The Federal Reserve System

The Federal Reserve System: Its Origin and Growth. Reflections and Recollections. By Paul M. Warburg. The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $12.

PAUL M. WARBURG'S two imposing volumes on the Federal Reserve System are at once a historical document of the very first importance, a theoretical treatise of extraordinary interest, and a valuable manual of detailed advice for financiers and statesmen. The essential facts of the origin and early development of the Federal Reserve System are established beyond the possibility of successful question. The theoretical foundations of that system are set forth with extraordinary clarity of thought and elegance of exposition. The dangers threatening the system and the practical methods of avoiding them are pointed out with a directness and simplicity that make unnecessary any parade of the profound knowledge of fact and theory underlying the suggestions.

Mr. Warburg, of course, is the spiritual and intellectual father of the Federal Reserve System. When he came to the United States in 1902 we had a so-called banking system that was nothing more than a mob of banks, and we regarded this disorderly rout as the very palladium of our liberties and as distinguishing us from the effete monarchies of Europe. Conditions were ripe for a change, however, and Mr. Warburg, thoroughly trained in the sound banking theory and practice of the Continent, set himself with astonishing boldness, vision, and wisdom to the task of educating the bankers and politicians of his adopted country to overcome their century-old prejudices and utilize the experience of the Old World for the benefit of the New. To most men the undertaking would have appeared hopeless; yet in eleven years the Federal Reserve Act was a law. It is no depreciation of the other workers in the great task, but only a deserved tribute to a too modest man, to say that first credit for that achievement belongs to Paul M. Warburg. His book, now reluctantly given to the public, sets forth with a wealth of documentary evidence the principal steps in the campaign that led up to the Act of December 23, 1913, and certain important events of the years following, during which he served on the Federal Reserve Board. A highly valuable feature of the book consists in its assembling of practically all the author's important writings on banking reform.

In view of Senator Glass's apparent determination to assert exclusive Democratic, not to say Vitreous, property in the Federal Reserve Act, Mr. Warburg's just and generous observation is worth quoting:

> When the Democrats took up the fight for currency reform, the idea had already triumphed; but their own party had to be conquered. In this struggle and in the honor of having secured a great piece of financial legislation against the ignorance, prejudice, vagaries, and conceit at work within his own party ranks, Congressman Glass stood side by side and shared honors with the President.

The deadly parallel columns in which Mr. Warburg sets down the texts of the National Reserve Association Bill (the Aldrich bill) and the Federal Reserve Act show clearly enough the debt that the Democrats in 1913 owed and the country today owes Senator Aldrich. As is repeatedly pointed out in this book, the question of personal credit is unimportant; the important thing is that the fundamental principles of sound banking embodied in the law be clearly recognized and tenaciously held.

It is Mr. Warburg's peculiar distinction that he was the first clearly to enunciate those principles, and he has displayed extraordinary skill and adaptability in helping to secure their acceptance in face of almost insuperable political difficulties. Today our better bankers and politicians, largely as a result of his preaching, have learned that the centralization of reserves and the mobilization of commercial paper are the essential characteristics of an effective central banking system.

The Federal Reserve System, as modified during the first five years of its existence, vindicated itself magnificently during the war. It has by no means wholly lived up to its opportunities during the peace, and the disastrous speculative smash of 1929 will forever remain as a monument to the weakness of the Federal Reserve Board, which could have stopped and ought to have stopped the runaway stock market, certainly not later than last spring. Mr. Warburg, in the discussion of this incident, as elsewhere in his book, sedulously refrains from individual criticism; but the attentive reader will have no difficulty in discovering the Harding Administration weakly yielding to political pressure in making appointments to the board, and the Coolidge Administration in general aiding in the effort, sometimes against the protests of some of the reserve banks, to boost the stock market and help the party of prosperity.

The great present peril of the system Mr. Warburg sees in the ever-present possibility of political, as opposed to disinterested banking, control. In order to avoid it he suggests certain changes which he has been urging in exactly their present form ever since 1922. The Secretary of the Treasury, it will be recalled, is ex officio chairman of the board. Mr. Warburg would remove him from the board entirely, substituting the Undersecretary, who would have more time for the board and less political prestige. The office of the Comptroller of the Currency he would have administered under control of the board, and the comptroller himself perhaps removed from membership on the board. The board itself should appoint its own governor and vice-governor, who should be chairman and vice-chairman respectively; and a member of the board, once confirmed by the Senate, ought to be capable of reappointment by the President without renewed confirmation. These and other moderate and sensible suggestions all look in the direction of insuring non-political action on the part of the board and attracting to its service the best banking talent of the country. For a quarter of a century Mr. Warburg has been wholly consistent in urging the necessity of a unified banking system under proper government control, but administered non-politically with an eye single to the economic welfare of the whole country.

In his introduction to a volume of banking essays published in 1914 Professor Seligman compared Mr. Warburg's place in our banking history with that of Lord Overstone in England's. Readers of the present work, which will inevitably serve as a guide to those who direct the future destinies of the Federal Reserve System, cannot fail to be struck with Mr. Warburg's resemblance to another well-known Briton; for there is in his writings the same combination of firm grasp on theory, broad and yet detailed knowledge of banking history and practice the world over, and power of clear and lucid exposition that have made of Walter Bagehot's "Lombard Street" and other works classics of economic literature. Mr. Warburg's writings are likely to occupy a similar place in American economics. Many of our best Americans were born abroad.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Imagist Poetry

Imagist Anthology, 1930. Covici-Friede. $3.50.

THE imagists as a school have long since ceased to exist. That this movement did much, in its time, to clear away the moldy brush of Victorianism and to make poetry exact, condensed, rather too photographic is well known. That poets very soon discovered the limitations of the imagist creed and came to realize that no conceptual mind could dwell long on mere picture-painting is likewise literary history. Imagism played a brief but beneficial part in the development of modern poetry, and now we hear little of it.

But here (with two apologetic prefaces) is a new "Imagist Anthology," no longer definitive of any school, but a collection of poems from those poets once connected with the creed of imagism. These are D. H. Lawrence, Richard Aldington, John Gould Fletcher, F. S. Flint, and H. D. The volume includes other names not so closely related to the original movement: William Carlos Williams and John Cournos and James Joyce. Each poet claims to have developed after his own fashion, nor are the poems included said to be after any school. But old themes and old manners persist: here are D. H. Lawrence and his problems of sex struggle, Richard Aldington in a long disjointed poem on the relationship of the sex instinct to romantic love, John Gould Fletcher attempting irony about the ideals of the modern world, and even H. D., always head and shoulders above these others as a true poet, become in these last poems a bit too inclined to rely for effect on the mere repetition of emotional words. As for James Joyce and his contribution from the Work in Progress—here we have what appears to be a very amusing, punning poem composed of coined words to get at the exact meaning of which the reader will have to be a much better linguist than the present reviewer.

This is, I suppose, the pièce de résistance in the volume and quite worth looking up. The most beautiful single poem is William Carlos Williams's The Flower, a poem on the American city.

EDA LOU WALTON

One Side of a Debate

The History of Music. By Cecil Gray. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.25.

MR. GRAY, because he is writing "for the average intelligent music-lover rather than for the student, and for the general cultured reading public rather than for the professional musician," dispenses with musical illustrations. My own understanding of the matter, on the contrary, is that a person who does not know a piece of music will learn nothing from a statement about it; therefore that a book for the lay reader which deals, as Mr. Gray's does, with unfamiliar types of music and disputes accepted notions should be adequately illustrated, as a book about painting is usually illustrated. Without illustrations it is not suitable for lay readers and merely provides them with phrases they cannot understand about music they do not know. Mr. Gray aims at "striking a mean between the abstruse and the elementary, the scientific and the educational," but this affects only the text; it does not alter the need for illustrating the text.

Where I do not know the music he writes of, Mr. Gray's comments upon it have no real meaning for me; and I cannot understand the two sides of the quarrel when he is quarreling with someone, much less decide which is right. On the other hand, where my knowledge permits I find his revaluations of music often extraordinarily penetrating, but at times merely unsympathetic or perverse; and his reasoning often brilliant, but at times that of a tooth-and-nail debater. Thus, he gives differences between Graeco-Roman music and early church music to demonstrate that the two have nothing in common, and that one was not, therefore, an adaptation of the other. Since he never cites an authority and almost never names an opponent, one must discover for oneself that these differences are the ones given in the standard works on that period, but that he has simply omitted the similarities which (with the differences) cause the authors to conclude that early church music, as might be expected, was an adaptation of existing Graeco-Roman means to new ends. Against W. J. Turner's belief that the Greeks must have had a music commensurate with their other arts, he offers the general truth that "a race whose outlook is primarily intellectual and logical, and whose peculiar strength lies in the direction of clarity and definition, must inevitably find its most complete and congenial artistic expression in the formative arts, and more particularly in sculpture"—which means that the Germans picked the wrong art. Again, after he has attacked the belief that Greek music had no harmony, because it is not based on conclusive evidence, he argues the contrary, in the absence of evidence, with "Is it not on the face of it unlikely that . . .?"

Nor are Mr. Gray's ends themselves above question. The more naive evolutionist view of musical history that he objects to is wrong—and, one might add, pretty generally discredited by now; but his own attitude is no better. If the evolutionist was "afflicted by a morbid mania for detecting resemblances and influences where none exist," he is afflicted with a mania for denying them even where they do exist, not to speak of detecting some that are as far-fetched. And if the evolutionist had the bad habit of "regarding a whole school or period as leading up to one or two outstanding figures, in whom all the virtues and qualities of their predecessors are presumed to be contained," one often suspects that he, in his desire to discredit the evolutionists, does more than justice to some of the composers who have been neglected.

Lincoln in Cartoons

Abraham Lincoln: His Path to the Presidency. By Albert Shaw. Review of Reviews Corporation. Two volumes. $8.

THE veteran editor of the Review of Reviews has given much time to the compilation of this cartoon history of Lincoln and has included in his two volumes many hitherto unpublished cartoons culled both at home and abroad. He has not been content to reprint the familiar English ones, but has found others quite as much worth while, and he has gone to the European cartoonists for examples as well. Nor has he confined his selections to those relating only to the Emancipator. He has included contemporary portraits and cartoons of all the notables of Lincoln's time, both Southern and Northern, those in public life and out, so that we have a loose, running pictorial history of the whole period of Lincoln's activities. Dr. Shaw has even added some modern ones, such as H. T. Webster's priceless cartoon: "A New Baby Down at Tom Lincoln's." Unfortunately the value of this remarkable collection is considerably marred by two things—first, the lack of chronological consequences, and, second, the frequent failure to mark the sources of the cartoon, the date and place of publication, and the method of its appearance. Both these things militate much against the value of the work as a historical document, which is all the more regrettable because of the excellent taste displayed in the choice of the pictorial material that has been used.

Some of Dr. Shaw's characterizations of the personalities portrayed are inaccurate. Thus, Wendell Phillips was not brought into the Abolition fight by the mobbing of Garrison in Boston in 1835, but by the murder of Lovejoy two years later. Nor is it fair to say of Henry Ward Beecher that he considered John Brown only "an irresponsible fanatic." He decried him after the Harper's Ferry raid as a bungler, but he approved of the spirit of the raid, apparently thought highly of him while Brown was in Kansas, and egged him and those like-minded on at all times to use "Beecher's Bibles," i.e., Sharp's rifles. None the less the books have their genuine value and will beyond question stimulate the appetite for more information about Lincoln and his period, in which it is now so difficult to interest the younger generation.

To accompany the cartoon history Dr. Shaw has written a running narrative in his usual easy and readable style, interpreting events from the point of view of his philosophy. He would, of course, be the last to wish that these volumes should be deemed a final and definitive history. But as an outline of the major problems, difficulties, and campaigns, they will have their place among the ever-growing Lincolniana.

Novels in Brief

The Party Dress. By Joseph Hergesheimer. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Joseph Hergesheimer's first novel in four years harks back to his most popular one—"Cytherea." It is a story of today and is laid in the same complacent little suburb of wealthy commuters, Eastlake, and among the same country-club, cocktail-drinking smart set from which Lee Randon of "Cytherea" ran away to Cuba with Savina Grove. Oddly enough, Cuba plays a part in this new volume as well, for Chalke Ewing has come from there on a visit to his sister. Chalke is to Nina Henry what Savina was to Lee Randon. This sounds like a mathematical formula, but so do Mr. Hergesheimer's plots when stripped of their embroidery. Chalke, with his mysterious past, his exotic appearance, and his rum swizzles, is the dream figure, the embodiment of the escape theme, the romantic comedian—a well-known ingredient of the Hergesheimer formula. It is usually female, but in this respect "The Party Dress" harks back to "Linda Condon." Nina Henry is the earthly figure, very earthly indeed this time, who is seeking, seeking—something. And it must be admitted that she is exceedingly well portrayed. The party dress serves as a symbol as well as an emotional cocktail for Nina. All those who are familiar with Mr. Hergesheimer's novels have now sufficient material to write the book themselves. But not, of course, with his deftness and skill, for Mr. Hergesheimer is a good craftsman. The new novel, however, will do little to revive a waning reputation.

Uncle Sam: In the Eyes of His Family. By John Erskine. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

Mr. Erskine says in the brief foreword to his latest comedy of history: "I have long believed that . . . our national temperament . . . might have a biography. Since no one else has attempted it, I here try my hand . . . I should like to show Uncle Sam as he is today." The result of his attempt is, first, an allegory that seems bald and oversimplified, and, second, a novel that seems highly fantastic. The allegory, which is not intended to be completely sustained, lends neither profundity nor wit, satire nor charm, to the story, but it does succeed in destroying any hope there might have been for that to stand on its own feet. One cannot escape the impression that Professor Erskine is writing down to his great army of readers in the same way that he gently patronizes all his emasculated characters. Certainly he has made no attempt to go beyond the A B C of national and racial characteristics.

The Age for Love. By Ernest Pascal. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

The heroine of this novel had the courage of her romantic convictions. Believing that there was no justification in the marriage relation except a deep foundation of romantic love, she left her husband for a lover in spite of the fact that she had a child, and when her lover, unsatisfied by the lack of stability in their relationship, dropped himself from a monoplane into the Atlantic Ocean she refused to resume her life with her husband in spite of his urging, not because she despised him or found him distasteful, but because she "believed in love" and preferred loneliness to a joint life without it. Mr. Pascal has refused to compromise with the current notion of marriage as a contract entered into for social reasons, with love coming to be more or less irrelevant. His heroine, therefore, will not be popular with women's clubs. But she is honest and frank and, in spite of her creator's oversimplification of her difficulties, admirable in many ways. And Mr. Pascal has written an honest and thought-provoking book.

The Trader's Wife. By Jean Mackenzie. Coward-McCann. $2.

This is a scrupulously written novelette about a New England poetess married to an African trader and taken by him to the slave coast, where the sights and sounds and smells of slavery first jerk her out of her placid acceptance of the world and then drive her to her death. Miss Mackenzie has not spared her heroine the compelling dampness of the forest, the monotony, the strangeness, the wailing desolation of black mothers whose children are dying of starvation, all the horrors of the barracoon, all the final irresistible despair. And enough of this despair is communicated to the reader to make of "The Trader's Wife" a memorable novel. In form it is, moreover, a little masterpiece, concise, exact, tempered, elegant. The same style with as dramatic a mise en scène in a novel that was considerably longer and that dealt more completely with its characters would make Miss Mackenzie one of the more important writers of her time.

Huntsman in the Sky. By Granville Toogood. Brewer and Warren. $2.50.

There are some very good things in this first novel. Grandfather Lloyd, gentleman of the old school, Philadelphia Brahman, with his great house and stables and his reverence for the good things of life, is an excellent portrait of the thoroughly American aristocrat. The writing is harmonious and polished. But there is something definitely wrong with the book in spite of its fine moments. The story does not advance. Bartram Garrison, the grandson, is Orion, the Huntsman in the Sky. He is presented to us as a thoroughbred gentleman and a musician and composer of great talent, just beginning to find himself through sorrow and self-torture after a failure in Paris. Somehow the gentleman fills the picture, leaving little of the genius or of the man. Bart is too perfect, too tolerant. One would not be surprised to hear that he carried an edition of Marcus Aurelius in his vest pocket. He rules himself by will, not only in his relationship with the beautiful heiress who arouses in him (so we are repeatedly told) all the blind forces of desire and against whom he steels himself for the sake of his art, but also in every other aspect of his life. There is no blossoming of the soul; only a rousing of the will against—not with—his emotions. The bohemian scenes and the gatherings of the "Peripatetic Philosophers," Bart's old drinking cronies, are amateurishly done, as though the mere account of a few rather conventionally stupid young bloods getting tight together were an entertainment in itself. The novel, like its hero, seems to have little of the strength and fire of a great talent.

Music

The Composer's League Presents

"Die Glückliche Hand." Opera for orchestra, chorus, solo barytone, pantomime, and color-light, by Arnold Schönberg. Written in 1913. First performance in America. Directed by Rouben Mamoulian. Setting and costumes by Robert Edmond Jones.

"Le Sacre du Printemps." Ballet for orchestra, dance chorus, and soloist. Libretto and décor by Nicholas Roerich; music by Igor Stravinsky. Written in 1913. Present setting and costume by Roerich; choreography by Leonide Massine.

Presented by the League of Composers and the Philadelphia Symphony under Leopold Stokowski.

THIS bald announcement ushered into the Metropolitan Opera House on April 22 such a convocation of talent as has rarely been assembled in this city for one enterprise. It produced, for a brief hour and a quarter, a brilliant and curious performance of very uneven merit.

Schönberg's opera presented, it seems, in a brief abstract form the vicissitudes of the human soul, horror-ridden by its own inadequacy, lifted for a time by hope, betrayed by the emptiness of material ambition to which it led, and finally sunk again under its original despair. These entities of the soul were dramatized as a winged monster, a man, a woman, and a stranger, the dramatis personae of a buried inner self—doubtless Schönberg's own—tortured almost to insanity by life.

One may object that a neurosis is not material for art, and refuse the opera on this ground. But one cannot deny that Schönberg has contrived with appalling success to lead us below the threshold of normal consciousness into the subterranean chambers of the under-mind, whose emotional entities fill the score with mutterings of horror, lyric wails of hope, staccato laughter of despair. Although the materials of his sound structure are strange, as for his purpose they must be, its form is clear, economic, and well defined. Pantomime and stage lighting further symbolized the struggle, so that a triple battery of sound, movement, and color carried his intent to the audience. The result, thanks to the work of Jones, Mamoulian, and the pantomimists, frequently approached and at times achieved an absolute unity.

Unfortunately this cannot be said for the more important work of the evening—"Le Sacre du Printemps." Hear the composer's avowed purpose: "I have meant to express the sublime upward thrust of nature renewing itself. . . . In the prelude I have intrusted to the orchestra the expression of that awful fear which every sensitive creature feels in the presence of forces at their moment of greatest potency . . . a holy terror in the presence of the midday sun, a Pan-like cry." This was Stravinsky's intent, and the now famous score leaves no doubt as to its overwhelming fulfilment. As no other music it evokes the primitive fecundity of nature, the ancient time when man had not so far diverged upon his own path as to be consciously separated from the other growths about him. The great seasonal rhythm of fertility, the wave of life that opened buds and thrust up grass, included him in its sweep, and the rituals which handed down to his successors the rites of Dionysus and Osiris were gradually evolving round the procreative force of his own body into the first of all religions—the impersonal and ecstatic worship of sex.

With this ancient, primitive, and powerful evocation proceeding from the orchestra, it was a shock to receive through the eye, from the stage décor, a poster of spring in the Dolomites, all posies and prettiness, with maidens in bright smocks, daisy-garlanded, and sunburnt youths in bearskins out for a vernal holiday. To be sure the choreography did much toward visualizing the external rhythms of the music (although a leisured waltz is not this writer's idea of the slow, awkward, terrifying thrust of the Vernal Dance episode). But, on the whole, sight and sound were utterly at odds. If one closed one's ears and merely looked one inevitably fancied the music of Mendelssohn's "Spring Song." If one closed one's eyes the music created a stark plain, rude monoliths in a circle, and humans moving through a rite hardly beginning to be conscious of its form—at least something very far from the winsome setting and costumes of Mr. Roerich.

During the second part of the ballet, however, The Sacrifice, the impressions of eye and ear drew together. The darkness and quiet of the Pagan Night episode which opened it allowed the eye to forget the setting. The choreography greatly improved in originality and power. Above all the long solo dance of Martha Graham as the virgin offered for sacrifice, together with the supporting choreography, followed the mounting intensity of the score, and visualized it so well that the mind received music and movement as one entity. Even to give accurate shape to the complex sequence of the music is a remarkable achievement for Miss Graham and Mr. Stokowski, to say nothing of the beauty and terror manifest in her dancing. In plan and projection it was an astonishing and intensely moving creation.

It concluded the most ambitious evening of music and ballet which has been seen for many a year, sustained throughout—one is tempted to say, "of course"—by the presiding genius of Mr. Stokowski. In his brilliant readings, his mastery of the vastly complicated organism of scores, dancers, soloists, and chorus, he again proved himself a pioneer in a field into which, we hope, he will lead us far. The modern ballet, with its synthesis of color, form, movement, and music, is the logical vehicle for the expression of this complex age of swift fluidity and omnipresent sound. One is grateful to the Composer's League.

Drama

Lewdness and Laughter

MY confreres of the daily press seem to have been shocked both aesthetically and morally by the goings on which constitute "Lost Sheep" (Selwyn Theater). The farce details the confusion which arises when the family of a dissenting clergyman rents a house formerly occupied by some popular prostitutes, and it is, as the critics point out, of necessity neither particularly subtle nor particularly delicate. One may, indeed, go still farther. One may add, for example, that the complications are something less than probable, and that in real life explanations would have been in order somewhat sooner than they occur in the play. But I should consider myself derelict in duty if I did not confess both that I was not offended and that I joined the audience in a good deal of its laughter. Moreover, though the proceedings are certainly enlivened by the work of an excellent cast, which includes Ferdinand Gottschalk, Cecilia Loftus, and a very pretty newcomer appearing under the inappropriately masculine name of Sidney Fox, I shall not attempt to excuse myself by any pompous reference to "acting which made one forget the disgusting nature of the subject," for "Lost Sheep" was constructed by someone with a sound knowledge of conventional farce technique, and many of the malentendus which arise are genuinely funny.

Indeed, I feel myself impelled to go still farther—I do not understand why the thing should be considered morally objectionable. From experience I have learned that I am not to be trusted in judging of such matters, but so far as I am able to comprehend what those of more sensitive feelings are talking about it seems to me that their protests are generally based upon one or both of two convictions: (a) that certain words must not under any circumstances be mentioned because, as a seventeenth-century moralist proclaimed, "the sin sticks to the syllables"; (b) that certain treatments of certain situations are likely to arouse what are commonly called "impure thoughts" and to inspire the spectator to go and do likewise. But even if these convictions be admitted to be sound, I fail to see how they can lead to the conclusion that a farce like "Lost Sheep" is damnable. In the first place, not one of the mysterious syllables is uttered, and in the second place I fail to perceive how a fable like the present could possibly induce its auditors to rush off to a bawdy house. Indeed, it has always seemed to me that laughter and libidinousness are sworn enemies. A modern poet has something to say about "the imbecile earnestness of lust" and this modern poet is right. "Evil thoughts" are always solemn thoughts, and one cannot be genuinely lascivious while thinking of sex as funny. Aristophanes understood the fact well, for moralist though he was he had no hesitation in representing everything up to the embrace itself in "Lysistrata," because he knew well enough that there was something quite the reverse of inflammatory in the spectacle of an eagerness which the audience did not share. The smirk may be compatible with desire, but the smile and the guffaw are not, and it is a pity that the moralists do not realize the fact. Indeed, it is just because they do not that they predict the downfall of society as often as they read the funny papers. But then, moralists cannot, I suppose, be expected to understand a principle like this. They laugh so seldom.

"Courtesan" (President Theater) was supposed to impress the audience because only one character appears on the stage. There are, however, so many off-stage voices and so many conversations over the telephone that not even the dubious novelty seems very novel. Nothing is left except a dull story about a kept woman who jumped out of the window because a new lover doubted her purity.

Gandhi the Non-Resistant

By HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

MAHATMA GANDHI has joined battle with the British Empire for the soul of India. Against this contemporary Goliath, mightiest empire of our day, armed with the resources of science, organization, wealth, and all the enginery of war, there stands forth the slight figure of one single man clad in a loin-cloth, without arms, without wealth, without any of the accouterments of power. On what does this mystical madman rely as he goes forth to the unequal combat? With what strange weapon does the Mahatma fight?

> The term "passive resistance" [said Gandhi fifteen years ago, at the end of his long and astonishingly successful campaigns in South Africa] does not fit into the activity of the Indian community during the past eight years. Its equivalent in the vernacular, rendered into English, means truth-force. I think Tolstoy also called it soul-force, or love-force, and so it is. Carried out to its utmost limit this force is independent of pecuniary or other material assistance. Violence is the negation of this great spiritual force, which can only be cultivated or wielded by those who will entirely eschew violence. . . .
> It is impossible for those who consider themselves to be weak to apply this force. Only those who realize that there is something in man which is superior to the brute nature in him, and that the latter always yields to it, can effectively be passive resisters. This force is to violence what light is to darkness.
> In politics its use is based upon the immutable maxim that government of the people is possible only so long as they consent either consciously or unconsciously to be governed.

As he puts it in another passage:

> The pathway of Ahimsa [non-violence]—that is, of love—has often to be trodden all alone. . . .
> The current (and in my opinion mistaken) view of Ahimsa has drugged our conscience and rendered us insensible to a host of other and more insidious forms of violence, like harsh words, harsh judgments, ill-will, anger, spite, and lust of cruelty; it has made us forget that there may be far more violence in the slow torture of men and animals, the starvation and exploitation to which they are subjected out of selfish greed, the wanton humiliation and oppression of the weak, and the killing of their self-respect that we witness all around us today than in the benevolent taking of life.

Strange words these in our Western ears, and stranger deeds. "Soul-force," the weapon of the humbly strong. Facing the whole British power, Gandhi declares:

> My confidence is unshaken that if a single Satyagrahi holds out to the end victory is absolutely certain. That is the beauty of Satyagraha [truth-force, soul-force]. It comes up to us. We have not to go out in search for it. There is a virtue inherent in the principle itself.

Clearly enough, we put it negatively, imperfectly, when we call it non-violence, passive resistance, for it has the positive power of truth, of love, impregnable to all attacks because it fears nothing, not even death.

We view the operation of this force with wonder, for our progress has been in the control of material things, and our reliance has been on such control. Yet we have not lacked our own prophets and seers. One who is not without honor among us has said: "Resist not evil." "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you." Even in our own land Emerson proclaimed the power of non-violence again and again. Most arresting of all to Americans today, because of their strange connection with present events in India, are the words of the Liberator, William Lloyd Garrison, who, aflame with passion for breaking the chains of the slave, put non-violence at the very basis of his practical activity.

> Another motto we have chosen [says he] is "Universal Emancipation." . . . Henceforth we shall use it in its widest latitude—the emancipation of our whole race from the dominion of man, from the thraldom of self, from the government of brute force, from the bondage of sin, and the bringing it under the dominion of God, the control of an inward spirit, the government of the law of love.

Tolstoy testifies to Garrison's powerful influence on him, coming, as he says, in the spring of his awakening to true life. He says of this great American:

> The principle of non-resistance to evil by violence, which consists in the substitution of persuasion for brute force, can only be accepted voluntarily, and in whatever measure it is freely accepted by men and applied to life—i.e., according to the measure in which people renounce violence and establish their relations upon rational persuasion—only in that measure is true progress in the life of men accomplished. . . . Garrison was the first to proclaim this principle as a rule for the organization of the life of men. . . . Therefore Garrison will forever remain one of the greatest reformers and promoters of true human progress.

Thus the great Russian non-resistant, who passed on the torch Garrison had lighted.

Gandhi in turn confesses his debt to Tolstoy. "The Kingdom of God Is Within You," he says, gave permanent form to his own ideal. Of his resulting South African campaigns, C. F. Andrews says:

> He was the first to organize corporate moral resistance and to obtain at last in South Africa, through rigid discipline, a firmly united community ready to go to any lengths of suffering as a body for the sake of conscience. Perhaps it would be true to say that since the days of the early Christian church no such effective acts of passive resistance have been organized as those which Mahatma Gandhi inspired.

That victory won, Gandhi returned to his own country and continued the struggle against oppression and injustice, at first working as a loyal subject of the British Empire, then, after the black horror of Amritsar had convinced him that the Empire in India was an evil thing, throwing his whole life and thought to direct the invincible power of non-violence against that Empire by the dangerous method of non-cooperation. Few Americans there are, perhaps, who realize that the present conflict, which is likely to be the greatest of all, is the ninth that Gandhi has waged in these fifteen years, and always with the single weapon of non-violence, truth-force. "My non-cooperation has its root," he says, "not in hatred but in love. . . . It will be a non-violent fight, it will be clean, it will be truthful."

Mistakes he has made a plenty, and none more ready to admit them than he. He tells of the great struggle against the Rowlatt Act: "Therein our inherent shortcomings came to the surface. . . . I had to confess my Himalayan blunder"—he had been ignorant that the masses were certain to become violent if left to themselves! The non-cooperation campaign in 1921 was wrecked in its non-resistant aspect by the terrible outbreak of violence among his followers at Bombay and their butchery of the police at Chauri Chaura. Immediately he made a vow to fast till the violence in Bombay should cease, and called off the non-cooperation movement at the height of its power.

> The drastic reversal of practically the whole of the aggressive program [he said] may be politically unsound and unwise, but there is no doubt that it is religiously sound, and I venture to assure the doubters that the country will have gained by my humiliation and confession of error.

What an act of faith to undertake to teach the three hundred millions of a veritable continent by personal example the meaning of non-violence, the power of love!

Then came that strange, magnificent scene at his trial:

> I wish to indorse all the blame that the learned Advocate General has thrown on my shoulders in connection with the Bombay, Madras, and Chauri Chaura occurrences. . . . It is impossible for me to dissociate myself from the diabolical crime of Chauri Chaura or the mad outrages of Bombay. . . . I knew that I was playing with fire. I ran the risk, and if I were set free, I should still do the same. . . . Non-violence is the first article of my faith. . . . But I had to make my choice. I had either to submit to a system which I considered had done an irreparable harm to my country or incur the risk of the mad fury of my people breaking forth when they understood the truth from my lips. I know that my people have sometimes gone mad. I am deeply sorry for it. . . . But I hold it to be a virtue to be disaffected toward a government which in its totality has done more harm to India than any previous system. . . .
> I believe that I have rendered a service to India and England by showing in non-cooperation the way out of the unnatural state in which both are living. . . . But in the past non-cooperation has been deliberately expressed in violence to the evil-doer. I am endeavoring to show my countrymen that violent non-cooperation only multiplies evil, and that as evil can only be sustained by violence, withdrawal of support of evil requires complete abstention from violence.
> Non-violence implies voluntary submission to the penalty for non-cooperation with evil. I am here, therefore, to invite and submit cheerfully to the highest penalty that can be inflicted on me for what in law is a deliberate crime, and what appears to me to be the highest duty of a citizen.

Such is Gandhi, the non-resistant. Today, after further years of self-discipline, experience, and training of his followers, he has once more matched forces with the British Empire. Where will the victory rest?

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

ONLY by the aid of the Vice-President was it possible to break the deadlock between House and Senate over the debenture and flexible-tariff provisions of the tariff bill. By 43 to 41 the Senate released its conferees from adherence to the debenture plan—and thereby assured the passage of the measure. It will now go to the President without the provision to which he especially objected and he is confronted with the severest test of his courage and statesmanship. If he approves the bill, and the business world is certain that he will in order to end the much-talked-of uncertainty, he will put his name to the most scandalous tariff measure ever passed, will strike a grave blow at our export trade just when it is shrinking alarmingly—it fell off 291 millions or 20.4 per cent in the first quarter of this year—and will add to the cost of living of every American. If he vetoes the measure the tariff barons will rage, but as the figures of our poll indicate in this week's Nation, a majority of the newspapers of the country will sustain him and, we believe, the bulk of the people. Meanwhile, the deadly injury the proposed tariff is doing to our international standing is clear. With amazing and unprecedented frankness the Swiss Minister and the Spanish Ambassador in Washington have spoken out publicly against it with a resultant demand in the Senate that the former be sent home. A reliable cablegram to the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom from Switzerland speaks of the "unprecedented reaction, widespread indignation meetings" and declares the proposed tariff "will cause great suffering." So it will in many other countries.

THOROUGHLY TEMPERATE and highly courageous was the speech made by Dwight W. Morrow in opening his campaign for nomination by the Republican Party as United States Senator from New Jersey. Avoiding the extreme of either wet or dry, Mr. Morrow nevertheless recognized boldly and clearly that the question of prohibition is a vital question before the American people today. Nor did he base his argument on an appeal to the "rights" of personal liberties. In any democracy such rights are always thoroughly relative. There must and should be, said Mr. Morrow, some government control of liquor. The question is whether or not the present system of control by the federal government is practical or desirable. "Is it well," he asks, "that large portions of our people should conceive of the federal government as an alien and even a hostile power? Is it well to have as a result a lawless, unregulated liquor traffic, attended by a shocking corruption?" This is not overstatement. The remedy advocated by Mr. Morrow is repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution and substitution of a new amendment permitting the several States to impose within the State such control of the liquor traffic—always refusing the return of the saloon—as their voters desire. We do not call this an ideal solution; but it is one solution. And to suggest it is one of the most impressive bits of honest politics that we have seen in a long time.

THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION will be completely reorganized if the House of Representatives takes favorable action on the Couzens bill. The commission has highly important duties; for it makes the leases of all power sites controlled by the federal government, and its valuation work controls the conditions of recapture of such sites by the government fifty years hence. Testimony before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce disclosed that the three Cabinet officers (the Secretaries of War, Agriculture, and the Interior) who ex officio constitute the commission have given to its work an average of five hours a year, so that its actual business has been done largely by the executive secretary. Secretary Hyde testified before the House committee that "there has been a grand and glorious fuss on the commission ever since I've known anything about it," and declared it "highly necessary" to set up an independent commission. The Couzens bill was reported by unanimous recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Committee, according to its chairman, and was passed by the Senate without a roll call. It ought to be promptly passed by the House.

MR. W. G. CAMPBELL, chief of the federal Food and Drug Administration, responding to public criticism and notably to an article by Senator Wheeler in the current issue of Plain Talk, under date of May 13 addressed to Senator McNary a request for an investigation by the Senate Committee on Agriculture of charges of lax administration of the Food and Drugs Act. Mr. Campbell truly says: "If the responsible administration officials are lax or incompetent they should at least be removed. If they are discharging their duty in a conscientious, efficient manner they should be vindicated." He might well have added that if the law is defective it should be strengthened. We trust that Senator McNary's committee will go thoroughly into all the important questions raised in this inquiry, in order that the public may have actual knowledge of the situation concerning not only ergot but also digitalis, ether, and any other drugs about whose purity and potency any serious question is responsibly raised.

TO SENATOR ROBERT F. WAGNER of New York we offer our congratulations upon the record he has been making in the United States Senate. Mr. Wagner's contribution to the debate on the Parker nomination was one of the genuine high lights in that discussion. It was scholarly, well informed, and liberal and it carried the more weight because Mr. Wagner had been for years a jurist in excellent standing whose opposition to Judge Parker could neither be whistled down nor laid to an irresponsible desire to injure the Supreme Court. More valuable still has been the Senator's fight for the unemployed. Others, especially the President, who made such great promises at one time, were content to sit still. Senator Wagner single-handed accomplished his aim of getting three bills through the Senate. They do not get us very far; they could not, of course, have been radical. But at least they recognize that the evil does exist, and if they are passed by the House they should give us adequate employment statistics and a national employment-bureau system with an annual appropriation of $4,000,000. The Senator's third bill calls for a long-range federal building-construction program. We look to Senator Wagner for greater liberalism in the years to come—even, we hope, in the matter of the tariff, where his record has by no means commended itself to those who would praise him.

EVIDENCE to show that Mr. Whalen's famous red documents were manufactured in a small printshop on East Tenth Street, New York City, was offered to the House of Representatives on May 12 by Representative La Guardia. Mr. Whalen, testifying a few days previously before the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, had refused to divulge the source of his documents on the ground that to do so might interfere with an investigation into Communist activities now being conducted in New York City. It is difficult to be patient with this sort of official sidestepping. But if we are to have investigations of Communist activities, as perhaps we should have in order to permit Mr. Whalen to sleep at night, then let the investigation be public, thorough, unbiased, and receptive of testimony from all sides. And let us not forget that an investigation does not offer an excuse for indiscriminate red hunts or a fresh series of Lusk laws. We have had enough of that sort of hysteria. Let us not forget, also, that as a specific case of what the Communists would rightly call class justice, Robert Minor, William Z. Foster, Israel Amter, and Harry Raymond are in jail in New York, convicted of a misdemeanor, that they were sentenced to from six months to three years in prison, and that they have been denied bail pending appeal of their case. These men clearly suffer not for their offense, which was slight, but for their opinions. Whatever their opinions, they are entitled to their rights and privileges under the law.

SALT DEPOTS NEAR BOMBAY were raided on May 18. By the end of the day several hundred Indians had been arrested, but according to reports not one blow had been struck. The incident is an indication not only of the strength in India of the doctrine of non-violence, but also of what non-violence coupled with the vast numbers of the Indian population could accomplish. Meanwhile, along the strategic northwest border the British are quelling unrest with bombs. At Allahabad the working committe of the All India National Congress called upon all Indian papers to cease publication and another resolution called for non-payment of certain taxes in certain provinces. The Viceroy has announced that the proposed round-table conference will be held on October 20, and V. J. Patel, lately speaker of the Legislative Assembly, states that Gandhi would probably be willing to participate even now if he were assured that no other question except a grant of complete dominion status would be discussed. In view of the importance of accurate and impartial news from India, interviews such as the one given out by L. F. Rushbrook Williams on his arrival in this country recently should be carefully scrutinized. When it is remembered that Professor Williams is envoy at London of the Chamber of Indian Princes, probably the most reactionary body in India, it is easy to understand why he calls Gandhi a "fanatical reactionary." Even so, it seems hardly necessary to produce "from among his private state papers" as new and conclusive evidence against Gandhi and his movement the "confession" (consisting of Gandhi's strictures on the machine age and modern science generally) which was openly printed in 1909 and which, according to C. F. Andrews, one of Gandhi's closest friends, Gandhi would probably modify if he recast it at this time. Why Professor Williams should be going immediately to Washington to report on the Indian situation to the British Embassy of a Labor Government is hard to understand.

EVERY FRIEND OF HAITI will rejoice in the peaceful transfer of the Presidency on May 15 from Louis Borno, the puppet of the American Occupation, to Eugene Roy, the non-partisan candidate agreed on by all factions in March during the visit of the Forbes Commission. One important step toward American withdrawal is thus taken. That withdrawal should be hastened, for the Haitians know too well the meaning of American occupation. We pass over the threatened renewal of the Rodenberg concession in the Artibonite Valley—a dangerous exception to the Haitian law against alien landownership—to remind our readers of an incident here. A month ago the Navy Department awarded the Navy Cross to Lieutenant John B. Blanchard for "commendable courage and forbearance" in shooting down the group of Haitians at Aux Cayes whose slaughter led to the appointment of the Forbes Commission. Chief Marine Gunner Calvin A. Lloyd received a special letter of commendation "for courage and good judgment in assisting in the dispersal of the mob"—perhaps for shooting straight. In face of such a revelation of the temper and judgment of our naval authorities, it is small wonder that the Haitians would like to hasten the departure of General Russell.

EGYPT WILL REMAIN EGYPT, for the present at least, with the same political status as before, now that the London negotiations for a new treaty have broken down. The rock on which the negotiations split, it seems, was the question of the Sudan. The British Government appears to have taken the position that the Sudan issue was not to be discussed at the London parley; the Egyptian delegation, on the other hand, insisted upon taking up the question at London and settling it then and there. The Egyptian demands included a majority representation in the administrative council of the Sudan, an Egyptian vice-governor, the opening of other important offices to Egyptians, and the return to the Sudan of Egyptian troops. The British Government offered very substantial concessions in the matter of the withdrawal of British troops from other parts of the country and their concentration along the Suez Canal, but it refused to give up the joint control over the Sudan (joint only in name because in fact British) on the ground that the arrangement had not yet been sufficiently tested and that Egyptian capacity for complete self-government had not yet been proved. The outcome was welcomed by the Conservatives, but the Labor Government gains no credit from the failure.

FIFTY-FIVE DAYS before the end of his prison term, John Santanella made an attempt at escape from Sing Sing, was caught, and is now in solitary confinement, facing the seven-to-fourteen-year term imposed by the Baumes law for breaking jail. We recommend this story to those persons who object to making our prisons into "country clubs," and who do not approve of pampering of prisoners. For here was a young man, twenty-nine years of age by the way, who in less than two months would have been free! No country club, no baseball team, no moving-picture show can equal that in the eyes of the prisoner behind bars. On July 11 John Santanella would have been at liberty, and because he found himself totally unable to endure waiting for that imminent day he made a mad try at his freedom, one that he must have known was one chance in a thousand, because prison is abominable, unendurable, lacerating to the spirit no matter how much entertainment is provided behind the bars. We can offer our prisoners better food, better beds, more decent living conditions, more recreation—and they will still be in prison. We need not fear that we shall be pampering them while that fact persists.

THE PULITZER PRIZE awards will probably precipitate the usual controversy and dissent. While there is likely to be general gratification over the choice of Marc Connelly's "The Green Pastures" as the outstanding play of the year, there will be a great deal of speculation as to why Oliver La Farge's "Laughing Boy" was chosen in preference either to Hemingway's "A Farewell to Arms" or Thomas Wolfe's "Look Homeward, Angel." The history award, moreover, again raises a larger issue. According to the New York World's report, the Pulitzer jury favored Claude Bowers's "The Tragic Era" by a vote of two to one, but its decision was reversed by the Columbia School of Journalism Advisory Board, which voted for Claude H. Van Tyne's "The War of Independence." Thus the juries of recommendation continue to be treated with scant respect. In 1920 the committee, after having voted for "Main Street," was overruled and the prize given to "The Age of Innocence." In 1924 the committee recommended to the Advisory Board that the dramatic prize be awarded to "The Show-Off." The recommendation was disregarded and the prize went to Hatcher Hughes's "Hell-Bent fer Heaven"—with the jurors left to discover that fact through the newspapers. Last year it was rumored that a recommendation of Upton Sinclair's "Boston" was rejected and Julia Peterkin's "Scarlet Sister Mary" chosen instead. With so little value attached to their opinion, how long can first-rate men be expected to serve on the juries of recommendation?

THE DEATH OF DEADWOOD DICK will come as a surprise to thousands who never knew that he existed outside the pages of the thrillers of which he was the hero. He was, however, substantial enough to ride the pony express, fight Indians, and, finally, a year or so ago, to come via airplane for a visit to President Coolidge. We shall not undertake even to hazard a guess concerning the amount of fact to be found in the numberless tales written around him by "Ned Buntline" (Edward L. Wheeler), who was also responsible for the Buffalo Bill yarns, but he seems at least to have talked and acted the part. At the time of his death at the age of eighty-four he was still keeping his curls and still explaining the notchless butt of his pistol by declaring that he had never shot a white man or kept track of Indians slain. This has the authentic ring; but "Deadwood," we fear, has just missed the immortality probably assured to Buffalo Bill. An extensive series of novels dealing with the latter is kept continually in print, but "Deadwood" is unknown to a generation which follows the snaky youths now reigning in Hollywood.

HERBERT CROLY conducted the New Republic bravely and outspokenly for sixteen years, always with scholarly learning and sincerity. Freed by the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. Willard Straight from any anxiety as to the stability of the organ that he conducted, he quickly made it an important influence upon public opinion, notably in the war years. Then it was almost the fashion; indeed, it was, for a time, supposed to be the mouthpiece of the White House. To one of its editors was attributed the drafting of the Fourteen Points. Under Mr. Croly's leadership the New Republic made the grave mistake of yielding to the belief that if only the United States entered the war it could dictate the peace and thereby assure a much better world. Events speedily showed the faultiness of this philosophy, as they revealed anew that liberalism and war cannot come together without damage to all liberal causes, and the editor of the New Republic later proved that he was not unaware of it. Not originally trained for journalism or naturally well-equipped for it—he wrote at too great length and without adequate clarity—he yet published an extremely valuable periodical. As for his books, one, "The Promise of American Life," had a great deal of effect upon liberal thinking in the time of Roosevelt and the muck-raking period, though it would hardly bear reexamination today. In Mr. Croly's death American journalism loses one of its foremost exponents, and the editors of The Nation an able and most valued colleague in the field of weekly journalism.

Business and the Law

HARD cases make bad law, the jurists say. Some very bad law is likely to come out of the merger movement, then; for it certainly is putting some extremely hard cases up to the legal officers of the government. The Standard-Vacuum Oil merger and the radio trust development are only the two latest conspicuous examples of a widespread and inevitable movement that goes squarely athwart the original theory of the Anti-Trust Act. The Department of Justice is entitled to sympathy in its attempt to enforce that law. So are the great business men who are trying to find some legal way of doing what they find themselves economically bound to do. So are the smaller business men who look anxiously to the strict enforcement of the law as the necessary condition of their being able to continue in business.

The Sherman anti-trust law, passed in 1890, contented itself with putting into statutory form the common-law doctrine that contracts and combinations in restraint of trade and commerce are unlawful. It left to the courts the task of giving concrete meaning and content to that doctrine as the cases arose. The law was based on the nineteenth-century theory that there is something peculiarly "natural" about a condition in which there are many competitors in an industry; only the natural depravity of certain human beings leads them to interfere with this beatific state of nature. Of course, even in that dim and misty past students recognized that railroads and street-car companies did not fit into this idyllic competitive picture. Still, they were "exceptions," so we just tried to prevent the evil of combination by prohibiting it. For twenty years, accordingly, the courts struggled along, interpreting the law as prohibiting all combinations in restraint of trade. It was the theory of a community industrially undeveloped. Yet even so the judges tried not to strangle the developing business forces of the country. Their task, no easy one, grew harder as the years passed.

For the business men, prohibited by law from combining, yet found themselves driven by well-nigh irresistible economic forces to unite with other business men. It was not alone the lure of monopoly profits, powerful though that incentive was. It was also the economies and the efficiency of combination that brought them into more and more effective union, law or no law. It is easy to blame the business men who sought to get around the law and the great lawyers who devised ways of getting around it. The plain truth is that our economic growth was making it necessary to change the law.

The Supreme Court in the Standard Oil case in 1911 accordingly changed it by the simple device of invoking the so-called "rule of reason." The language of the law remained unchanged, but during the past twenty years that language has meant that only combinations in "unreasonable" restraint of trade are prohibited. What constitutes unreasonable restraint is a matter for the courts and Congress to determine. In that attempt we have clung with one hand to the benefits of competition and chaos; with the other we have grasped for the gains of combination and order. The result has been a hodgepodge of legislation, administrative regulations, and court decisions in which it is hard to trace any consistent theory. By the Clayton Act and the Trade Commission Act we undertake to prohibit simply certain forms of "unfair" competition. Monopoly, we thus in effect assume, is unobjectionable if not established and maintained by such methods. By the Transportation Act, on the other hand, we try, just as we have always done under the Interstate Commerce Act, to keep competition alive among the railroads, while at the same time we attempt to bring about a stability of return that implies somewhere a monopolistic power to fix rates. The Department of Commerce, particularly under the administration of Mr. Hoover and his successor as secretaries, has been active in fostering trade-practice conferences, open-price associations, and other agencies for bringing order, unity, and organization into industries that are still actively competitive. The Department of Justice meanwhile has been by turns quiescent and uneasily active in suggesting that such organization violates the law.

Where business men themselves took the initiative in organization, as in the oil and radio cases now before the courts, the government's legal department has sometimes been active in prosecution under the Anti-Trust Act; sometimes it has displayed a notable lack of zeal in that direction. In the radio case, for example, Mr. Young states that the government has been advised of every step in the development; yet suit has only now been started, and the Attorney General is careful to state that the department is not initiating any trust-busting campaign. With every desire to see the small business protected against the great one, we venture to suggest that the somewhat hesitant course of the courts and the Department of Justice in some of these great cases may be due at least in part to a recognition of economic realities. The anti-trust law of 1890 has become more and more hopelessly divorced from the industrial and commercial necessities of our developing industrial life.

We need to do some clear thinking. If the Radio Corporation or the oil companies have been guilty of concrete violations of law, as charged, by all means let them be prosecuted. But let us not imagine that the mere fact of bigness or even the growth of monopoly not based on unfair competitive practices is ground for hostile legal action or public disapproval. We live in the day of huge industrial and commercial enterprises; law, it has been said, is the crystallization of economic imperatives. The law, then, must adjust itself to the needs of a society that lives by the activities of trusts and combinations of every kind. That society cannot go back to the days of the itinerant shoemaker, the local grist mill, and the jerkwater railroad; if it tried to it would starve to death. No less certainly, if it tries to put present-day business into the strait-jacket of the law that fitted the old conditions, business will be hampered for a time but will ultimately burst the strait-jacket after a sufficient amount of injury has been done to the community. The real task of a modern democracy is not to fight large-scale organization, but to learn to use it for the common welfare. We shall not accomplish that without making large inroads on the present organization of private enterprise.

The Briand Plan

M. BRIAND'S plan of a United States of Europe turns out to be something quite different in two important particulars from what was expected. In the general remarks about the scheme which M. Briand made at Geneva in September, he took pains to insist that the proposed union was to be of an economic and not a political character, and that it was not, of course, to duplicate any existing organization. In the so-called questionnaire which he has now made public, politics stand in the forefront of the proposed union. "All possibility of progress toward economic union," M. Briand declares, "being strictly determined by the question of security," which again is "closely bound up with the question of possible progress in the realm of political union," it is in the political field that the organizers of the projected union are admonished to begin their work. The mention of security is, of course, characteristically French, but the importance which M. Briand assigns to it shows that his United States of Europe, whatever else it may be, will unmistakably be political.

The proposed union is also, it now appears, to be tied closely to the League of Nations. It is to be a league within the League. The difference is that while the League of Nations is intended to be universal, the Briand union will embrace only European states. It will apply to Europe the principle of regional security and mutual assurance which the Locarno treaties embody. With the League of Nations, however, the working relations would be very close. The permanent secretariat, it is suggested, should be established at Geneva, and the possibility of using, at least partially or temporarily, the special facilities of the League is to be kept in mind. The proposal that the committee of organization should address itself to "a study of political, economic, social, and other questions interesting the European community and not yet dealt with by the League of Nations" suggests that the proposed union is expected in practice to be subordinate to the League, and that when the League chooses to broaden its activities those of the union will shrink.

In the non-political field, on the other hand, M. Briand holds out some very interesting opportunities. The simplification of tariff policies naturally has first place, but the tentative program includes also such important matters as industrial unions and cartels, coordination of public works, communication by land, water, and air, telegraphs, telephones, and radio, facilitation of credit for states in need of it, a long list of labor issues, public hygiene, and intellectual cooperation in universities, schools, and the press. The main question, of course, is whether any such scheme can actually be made to work. The plan is French, and the danger is that the union will be dominated by France. As long as France sees everything through the red glass of security, the political character of the union would color all its proceedings. A few more speeches such as Mussolini has lately been making, with their glorification of force and their thinly veiled defiance of France, may well lead Europe to conclude that the time for political or economic union has not yet come and that Italy, at least, prefers war to peace. M. Briand, however, has made a most interesting and valuable gesture which may prove epoch-making.

The Hucksters' Treaty

TWO things at least the country has learned from the Senate committee hearings on the London naval treaty. The first is that the American delegation had no instructions from the President when it set out for London and received no instructions from him while it was there—incredible as the latter fact appears. Secretary Stimson, in his first day's testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee, stated categorically that "we went over to London without any specific instructions from the President, either written or verbal. Of course, we knew his general views. We had had the privilege of several talks with him, but he abstained from giving us any instructions of a specific character whatever, preferring to trust the delegation to use its own discretion in the methods of negotiations." For this mark of confidence, he added, the delegation feels "profoundly grateful," while as for himself he expressed the belief that that was "the only way in which such a negotiation could be carried out successfully 3,000 miles away from home."

No instructions, of course, mean no special preparations. We have Mr. Stimson's word for it that the American delegation was sent overseas with no plan to offer, no particular indications of the course it was expected to follow, no clear idea even, it would seem, of the problems to be dealt with. The delegates had had the "privilege" of talking with Mr. Hoover and knew his "general views"; beyond that they were left in the dark. It would be interesting to know if Mr. Hoover, in the talks which he so graciously accorded, let drop a hint that he and Ramsay MacDonald had actually reached no agreement at all and that the whole matter of parity was up in the air; or if the Great Engineer intimated that there might be difficulty in translating parity into concrete terms of tonnage and gun caliber, or in creating a "yardstick"; or if, having nothing else to do, anybody thought it worth while to study the French program that was made public some weeks before the delegation sailed. Mr. Stimson did not say. He merely voiced profound gratitude that the delegation was sent off with a glad but empty hand.

As far as can be judged from the testimony given at Washington, the negotiations went on in the blundering fashion that was to be expected when the party with the biggest retinue did not know exactly what was to be done and had not a single previously prepared proposal to offer. The American delegation backed and filled, advanced and sidestepped, put on a bold front and knuckled down under pressure, just like any bunch of political hucksters. The amazing suggestion of building another American battleship, we now learn, was only a shady trick to frighten the British into making a concession. When, at last, it appeared that the conference was at the point of going to pieces, the delegation hurriedly took what it could get, labeled it parity, emitted another hosanna, and scuttled for home to lay the fruits of a glorious victory at the feet of the Chief.

The other thing is that nobody seems to know exactly what the parity provisions of the treaty mean, or whether, assuming that they mean this or that or something else, the bargain is in either case a good one for the United States.

Secretary Stimson is confident that if anyone will read the treaty as he reads it, parity will be found sticking out all over it; and Secretary Adams, when driven into a corner and compelled to say something definite, appears to agree with his colleague. Admiral Pratt and Rear-Admiral Jones, on the other hand, one of whom is as good a technical authority as the other, are not agreed at all either about parity or about the comparative merits of cruisers with eight-inch guns and cruisers with six-inch guns, though, as a letter from Rear-Admiral Jones shows, he held precisely the opposite opinion last year; Rear-Admiral Bristol, chairman of the General Board of the Navy, comes to the support of Rear-Admiral Jones, while the General Board, which was not consulted during the negotiations, appears to have different ideas today from those it had a couple of years ago and, it now appears, did violence to its own views a year ago to cheat the British. Putting together the reports from Washington, London, and Tokio, it appears that the United States, Great Britain, and Japan have each got too much or too little, according to the way you look at it.

One thing alone is certain. Whatever parity is, it will cost the United States about a billion dollars if it undertakes to attain it. Perhaps Mr. Hoover, who did not think it worth while to instruct the American delegation about anything, overlooked this trifling matter, and the national enthusiasm would certainly have been dampened had he mentioned it. Now, however, it stares the country in the face, not, indeed, as a certainty, but as an imminent possibility, unless defeated by a popular protest. We hope the Senate committees will go right ahead exposing the scheme.

Fridtjof Nansen

TO Caesar it was thrice given to refuse the kingly crown. To Fridtjof Nansen once. When he who had worked so hard for the separation of Norway and Sweden shared in the joy of that peaceful achievement his fellow-countrymen looked to him to be their royal leader. In vain. This simple and great zoologist, oceanographer, explorer, and statesman decided without delay. It was not for his own advantage that he had labored for separation. Indeed, there was no time in his life that his noble spirit ever labored for itself. Of him, too, it could truthfully be said that his countrymen were all mankind. The knowledge that he sought at the risk of his life was meant for all the world. And when, in the aftermath of the dreadful carnage of the World War, victors and vanquished alike turned to him for aid and leadership, it was because they recognized his unselfishness, his greatness, his worthiness to wear any crown. The Nobel Prize was rightly his in 1922 for his services to the repatriated prisoners, to the starving Germans and Russians. If there are four men in the world today to be ranked with him in ability, in character, in breadth, in steadfastness, and in statesmanship we know them not.

Nature cast Nansen in heroic mold, both physically and mentally. It fitted him out with a daring spirit, but one controlled by a clear reasoning and profound mentality that rejected humbug, despised cant, and gave to his extraordinary adventuring not the objective of mere reckless excitement but a direct and scientific aim. Others might vanish into the once awesome silences of the Arctic for personal reasons—to win notoriety or to be able to say that they had stood first at the North Pole. With Nansen, achieving the farthest north of his time was purely incidental to the scientific task of plotting currents and assaying drifts across the top of the globe. He went with complete modesty; and years of isolation in a tiny ship with a handful of comrades merely intensified the innate simplicity and kindliness of this Norseman.

Never was there a record of failure here; never quarrels, nor bickerings, nor jealousies. Amundsen, his rival, was one of his dearest friends, whose magnificent flinging away of his life in the endeavor to aid some unworthy adventurers was worthy of them both. The world of science and of ice seemed to Nansen big enough for all. Nothing of Peary and Cook here—only the desire to serve knowledge. Yet Nansen's spirit was enslaved to the lure of the Arctic. At sixty-eight he was ready to fly across the Pole in the Graf Zeppelin, again for scientific purposes, and mourned the postponement of the venture for another year—as it has turned out, forever. It was impossible to hear him tell of his plans when he was last in America and feel that there was any other motive than to add a substantial amount to our knowledge of Arctic currents, depths, water temperatures, and drifts, in order to equip further the science of meteorology. At a period of life when other men would think of rest and retirement, there was about him no suggestion of age or slackening vitality, only the same quiet dauntlessness, the same gentle spirit and iron will.

But never to the point of being cold or unmoved in the presence of wrongdoing. Within was a soul that could burn to a white heat; that could speak out in unmeasured terms, for example, as to the follies and blunders of the Treaty of Versailles; that could find no words too strong to censure those who sought to exploit and to degrade a beaten enemy. Here was vision, here humanitarianism in its finest form. Here was a statesman who could really see ahead; who realized that it was of no avail to destroy given evils if thereby others were created to take their places. When better-known statesmen at Paris—better known because of the blood they caused to be spilled—could only talk of revenge and punishment here was one to keep his head and his judgment clear. So they turned to him, the neutral Norwegian. It was he who was made High Commissioner to repatriate the prisoners of the World War, especially those in Russia and the Balkans; he who labored for the starving German children; who threw himself into the struggle for life of multitudes of starving Russians as if they were of his own flag; who became the chief of the committee of the League of Nations for the relief of the Armenians and the Greeks. It appeared at once that this man was a great executive, capable of extraordinary achievements in the same modest manner in which he achieved the Polar Seas—that modesty which is always the accompaniment of the truly great. His was the international mind at its best, free to be itself without compromise because he kept himself apart from mere partisanship or party office-holding, though he served well in the post of minister to Great Britain in the diplomatic service of his country as a special negotiator of treaties. And wherever he went men knew him for what he was—a great man whose soul was never else than free.

As a recent recruit to vaudeville and the radio I have learned something which I should have known before. The passion for novelty concerning which much commotion arises from time to time is exceedingly ill-founded. Such managers and magazine editors as keep crying to their young men and women "Give them something new" are victims of a superficial fad. Few want anything new. The phrase "old stuff" is sometimes hurled as though it constituted a reproach. Instead it can be, and usually is, as warming as burning logs to the heart of the average man. And to better people than that as well.

Balboa on that peak saw for the first time the Pacific, and the poet would have us believe that the stout warrior's thrill was mighty. Maybe so, but it was of lesser caliber than others which he had known. I speak not from an intimate acquaintance with the Spaniard, but wholly on the theory that generals and O'Gradys are in some way similar. To me no sight or smell or sound or taste is so moving as the one which is somehow touched with familiarity. There is a lack in all first experiences. In this category I would include love at first sight. And it is also true of olives.

No emotion in man reaches so deep as recognition. Things remembered, even dimly, are friendly lights assuring the voyager that he still steers his true course. And there remains in the mind from old times the fear of the edges of the world where existence drops off sheerly on to the polished backs of turtles. Beyond that slippery surface there lies nothing. It is better to have under your feet the friendly gritty gravel of some well-remembered path.

It is not good that anyone should voyage forever after things which are new. Such journeyings must bring him into lonely places. However, man cannot truly flatten life into straight lines. Fretful courage may swing the circle wide, but it is still a circle. The wheel turns even in the firmest hands. At the end the voyager comes home. There will rise out of the sea a green island or a white cliff which he has seen before. He has sped through strange Sargassos, but all the time the ship was moving back to a remembered port.

Some may be irked to feel the tug of tether, but I would not. No, even though the orbit cuts this side of the rainbow's pot of gold, I would willingly turn back. A circle is better. It is more adventurous. It has no end.

If I have not made myself clear, I might perhaps be more explicit by turning my philosophy to the question of taste. Is there a man alive who enjoyed his first glass of beer? I refer, of course, to the days when no hint of devilish disobedience lay in this simple act. Before Volstead there was, I can testify, little enjoyment in the original experiment with beer. I can remember my surprise and chagrin to find it such bitter stuff. And was this the amber nectar I had read of in poems? How could the peasants and soldiers in the shows swill down this brew with such smacking of the lips? Not for a moment was the concoction in any way comparable to a frosted chocolate soda or even a bottle of pop.

Had I been a person of weak character the first glass of beer would also have been my last. But out of the determination to make good and fit myself to stand shoulder to shoulder with my fellows I persisted. The copybook maxim that there is no such word as "fail" inspired me to go on. And the maxim justified itself. In course of time I could drink beer even in reasonable quantities without making faces. And so I would celebrate not the first glass, but the nine-hundredth, which was the point where aptitude and liking began to develop. First there had to be familiarity. Fondness came later.

It is certainly so with tobacco. The comic papers which serve to establish and perpetuate many fallacies are correct in the assumption that the first experience with nicotine is generally wretched. Not one of the cigarette addicts of my acquaintance but had to fight his way through noxious fumes before he was able to set the habit upon a solid basis. And to the list of things which are more fun in later rather than earlier meetings I would include skylines, music, paintings, mountains, lakes, and, I believe, loved ones.

Surely this is demonstrably true of music. The new opera has a hard time getting a responsive audience because its melodies are strange. The old ones hang on persistently, for in them are passages which set heart and feet to tapping. The case of critics may be quite different, but the ordinary, run-of-the-mill music-lover is not after novel sensations. For him the spell of Verdi and Puccini and Wagner does not stale.

I rather think the same thing holds true in the theater. Playwrights do a deal of puzzling and pondering over what Broadway calls "a new twist." And then there comes along some naive dramatist who writes about a young man, a young woman, and a moonlit garden, quite oblivious of the fact that it has been done before. To him, as like as not, the laurels are accorded. Much has been said about the novelty of "The Green Pastures." And it is not inaccurate to say that nothing like it has been seen in the theater of our day. Yet Mr. Connelly himself knows quite well that for his pattern he went back to something as ancient as the old miracle plays. Surely the factor of recognition is not absent in a dramatic piece which wins the laughter and the tears of spectators by telling to them once again the story of Noah, and his ark, and the flood. For many this reaches down to the time when they were smallish and in Sunday school back home.

Even in strange circumstances there comes to the adventurer the vague misgiving that some time or other he has been by this selfsame door before. Both poets and psychologists have commented on this lurking memory of an ancient swing around the circle. It is an emotion not unknown to columnists. Again and again I get as far as the third paragraph in the treatment of a brand-new, current theme, only to be impeded by the thought "Just when was it that I wrote this column before?" I've learned to put such thoughts away. If it seems to me a good piece that's enough. I almost welcome the suspicion that it may be a twice-told tale. "Perhaps," I say to myself, "they'll like it better on this second lap."

HEYWOOD BROUN

Veto the Tariff!

WHO wants this new tariff? Certainly not the newspaper editors of the industrial States. As indicated by The Nation's poll they demand its veto by a majority of more than 3 to 2. By 4 to 1 they believe that it will raise the cost of living. By 2 to 1 they hold that the situation of manufactures does not warrant its enactment. By 7 to 4 they express their belief that it will injure us economically. By 12 to 1 they declare that it will make our relations with other countries more difficult. The bill has been savagely criticized because Congress, it is charged, actually wrote it for the benefit of the manufacturers instead of the farmers. Yet, as we reported last week, a majority of the New England editors answering our questionnaire ask for a veto. This week adds the striking fact that of eight great industrial States stretching from the Hudson to the Mississippi six show a majority for a veto. Even Pennsylvania, where protection is more sacred than religion, yields 10 editors who favor vetoing against 11 who favor signing the bill. Illinois shows 6 for signing against 4 for vetoing.

The Nation's questionnaire was addressed to 590 editors in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan—a solid block of industrial States. Up to the time of going to press replies had been received from 117, divided in the proportion of a little more than 2 Republican and a little less than 2 independent papers to 1 Democratic, 1 independent Republican, and 1 independent Democratic (in addition to the Socialist Milwaukee Leader). There seems to be little connection between the politics of the editors and their opinions on the tariff. The specific questions and answers follow.

1. Will the pending bill, if enacted, raise the cost of living?

Yes, 84; no, 22. Three others think the increase will not be appreciable; and 5 just "don't know."

2. If so, does our manufacturing situation warrant the enactment of the pending bill?

Yes, 33; no, 68. Fifteen of those who expect the new tariff to raise the cost of living believe that the manufacturing situation none the less warrants its enactment, some of them basing their opinion on individual industries and special local conditions.

3. Will the new tariff ultimately benefit or injure us economically?

Benefit, 38; injure, 69. Five papers are in doubt.

4. Will it improve or injure our international relations?

Improve, 6; injure, 75. Nineteen papers expect little or no result. A striking feature of the returns from this section of the country, as from New England, is the widespread conviction that the Smoot-Hawley tariff is going to make our international relations more difficult. It may be doubted whether an equal uneasiness has attended the enactment of any previous tariff law.

5. Should the President sign or veto the bill?

Sign, 40; veto, 66. Five editors are frankly uncertain, or else willing to leave it to the omniscience of the President.

Certain interesting results appear in the returns by States. It is astonishing to find 12 Pennsylvania editors who think that the bill is going to injure us economically, as against only 11 who look for benefit; 18 of them think that it will embarrass us in international relations, as against only 2 on the other side; only 10 think that the condition of manufactures warrants enactment, as against 11 opposed; and 10 out of 21 actually favor vetoing the bill. In Ohio, out of 20 papers, no less than 18, thinking that the bill will do us both economic and political damage, come out flatly for a veto. The New York editors, except for 5 who expect little result, are solid on the political disadvantages of the proposed measure; 12 editors are for vetoing, 10 for signing the bill.

No one acquainted with the limitations of an inquiry of this kind will lay too much stress on the results, striking and surprising as they are. The actual number of answers is small, even though it does include, in the States covered, 20 per cent of the dailies with more than 2,500 circulation. The returns are by no means proportioned to the population or the industrial importance of the States covered. They reflect rather the interest of the editors canvassed in the tariff question. Further, it is probable that those opposed to the bill would be more likely to answer than those in favor of it. Yet when all allowances are made, the results of this poll in the greatest industrial section of the country are distinctly arresting. They gain added interest from the fact that the returns give disproportionate weight, so far as can be judged from a rapid inspection of the replies, to the papers in the smaller towns. These papers, with a few thousand circulation each, may not unfairly be considered to reflect local sentiment even more closely than the press of the great cities. If they are as hostile to this proposed measure as our returns indicate, what is the state of opinion in the large cities, which on the whole are more inclined to trade liberalism?

This summary may well close with a few individual comments, largely from the editors of the smaller papers. The Punxsutawney (Pennsylvania) Spirit expresses a view almost unique in our returns: The bill is warranted, "only it is not sufficiently protective. The bill should have been passed as originally drawn by Senator Smoot." The Canton (Ohio) News, on the other hand, fears the consequences of enactment: "Production, when above normal, more than supplies United States demand. Our outlet is foreign trade. Wages must go up to meet living increases, and we cannot compete with other countries." The Muncie (Indiana) Evening Press expects no effect on international relations "after a first few squawks from Europe," but the Lafayette (Indiana) Journal of Commerce declares: "Reprisals do not constitute our idea of neighborliness." The Ottawa (Illinois) Republican Times, despairing of knowing anything about the matter, would have the tariff "a cut-and-try proposition . . . taken out of the hands of Congress and given to a bureau to handle with power to change where and when changes are needed." The Passaic News-Herald declares, however, that "one schedule will mean the reemployment in this city of 5,000 persons, now idle, due to cheap Tyrolean and Chinese orphanage labor. They are handkerchief operators." If there is anywhere in these States a trace of enthusiasm for the pending bill, our returns do not disclose it.

"My Dear Senator"*

IV

MY DEAR SENATOR: You ask me if I really still believe in free trade in view of the fact that the whole trend of the world is toward a protective tariff and the movement in England is becoming stronger and stronger. I do not accept your statement of fact, but that I waive in order to answer your question directly. I can see no reason whatsoever for modifying my belief that free trade is not only the sound and rational policy for any country to adopt, but that it is eminently practicable and workable.

As I have written to you before, I do not mean to suggest, nor does any other free-trader, that the present system could be changed over night into complete free trade. There would have to be a gradual approach—first, in the direction of tariffs for revenue only with the protective principle eliminated. There could be no such transition without working some hardship upon government-pap-fed industries, and those which are kept alive in defiance of economic law and in spite of the absence of any economic necessity for them. But, as has been pointed out so often, this fact that there might be very considerable readjustments need deter no one from accepting the sound principle of complete freedom of trade, for the fact is that radical and far-reaching readjustments are the order of the day in many lines of industry. You yourself have seen miles and miles of abandoned trolley lines in New England, the values in which have been destroyed by the coming of the motor bus. You have seen in your home town the displacement of the harness-maker, blacksmith, livery-stable keeper, and carriage-maker, all driven into other lines of industry by the arrival of the automobile. Rayon strikes a deadly blow at the silk mills; short skirts cripple woolen and cotton mills; the radio changes the whole situation as to the phonograph. Yet in none of these cases has there been an especial appeal to public sympathies, or a demand that Congress reimburse those who have lost their invested capital.

The worst thing about the protective tariff, aside from the corruption of our public life, is that it keeps in business numerous incompetents. As I have already pointed out to you, it is impossible for any tariff-making machinery, whether a Congress or a commission, to investigate an entire industry in order to ascertain whether the bulk of its members are conducting their enterprises efficiently or inefficiently, honestly or dishonestly, whether the stockholders are being mulcted for the benefit of insiders, and whether its methods are not too antiquated to deserve perpetuation by government protection. From the point of view of economic waste alone it is immoral of the government to keep alive inefficient businesses. Again, you are of the school that believes that competition is the life of trade. Then why destroy international competition?

But the truth is that the history of the United States, Great Britain, and Germany affords the clearest proof that freedom of trade over great stretches of the earth's surface is practicable and just and the surest means of building up great nations. Russia under the Bolsheviks is now about to prove the same thing again. There are one hundred and sixty-nine ethnographic groups, and heaven knows how many small and large republics, divisions, and subdivisions, in that great country. Would you suggest that they be encouraged to place tariff walls around their respective areas? If you look at Europe as a whole and can forget the flags of the several nationalities is it not perfectly plain that what they need is the striking down of all the tariff barriers to admit freedom of trade between themselves? The leading bankers of the world in their manifesto of 1927 suggested this, and the possibilities of such an arrangement are just beginning to dawn upon M. Briand. Is this a time to doubt the workability of the system? Is it correct to say that the whole trend of the world is in the other direction?

I must refuse, however, to be drawn into a discussion of individual cases of hardship which might take place. The principle is sound and that is sufficient, precisely as it is a sound principle that men should be free and not enslaved, that people should determine their own fate and not foreigners who happen to be able to impose their will upon them by force. If one flag flew over the whole world, as some day it will, you would not question the advisability of free trade for everybody. During the World War when the Allies took charge of the greater part of the world, they did their best to expedite freedom of trade between neutrals and the Allied nations. It is true that they did not seek to break down the tariff walls, but the aim of their great communistic experiment was to keep trade moving freely and steadily across the five seas, so that each country might have its share of the raw materials of the world, with the least possible waste and oversupplying.

Morally speaking, the case for free trade is unanswerable. Ethically we have certainly no justification for ruining the lace-makers of Switzerland or France, or the diamond-cutters of Belgium. We have no right whatever to carry on a fiscal policy which is the excuse jumped at by employers of labor in other countries to depress the wages of their workers so that they may overcome our new tariff rates. The way to meet foreign competition, by the way, is not to run away from it, but to improve our methods of production. I heard of a very interesting case the other day. Our electric-bulb manufacturers were seriously threatened by the Japanese production. Instead of doing the cry-baby act and rushing to Washington, they developed their machinery and their labor to such an extent that Japanese competition is now the least of their worries. The excuse that the other fellow is paying lower wages covers a multitude of economic sins and human inefficiencies!

But my main point is that protection connotes corruption. You cannot put a political party in a position of dispensing tremendous tariff favors, of regulating the size of the profits of any business or industry, without inviting corruption. It is inevitable and inescapable. So the whole system wreaks a terrible punishment upon our country, besides mulcting the great mass of the American people that the few favored may profit. That protection was the handmaiden of socialism was stated long ago in the days of Horace White, David A. Wells, and Professor William Graham Sumner, of Yale. Nowadays we think differently about socialism—we are all socialists in larger or lesser degree—but the fact is that this is an interference by government which has no economic warrant whatever but is specious and misleading. There can be no compromising with this evil. Give the tariff barons an inch and they will take an ell. Thirty-three of the nations of the world they have now got by the ears with their latest tariff, and Joe Grundy says he is going to put Herbert Hoover out of office and elect a Republican Congress which will give us a real tariff—one that will keep out every single manufactured article which can also be produced in the United States. That is the logical position for a protectionist to take. The only way that it can be staved off is for those of us who are not economically crazy to take the other extreme—that we shall refuse to compromise at all, that we shall wage unyielding war upon the proposal that the government shall guarantee profits to private businesses for the regulation of which it assumes no responsibility.

Lift Up Thine Eyes

By SHERWOOD ANDERSON

IT is a big assembling plant in a city of the Northwest. They assemble there the Bogel car. It is a car that sells in large numbers and at a low price. The parts are made in one great central plant and shipped to the places where they are to be assembled. There is little or no manufacturing done in the assembling plant itself. The parts come in. These great companies have learned to use the railroad cars for storage.

At the central plant everything is done on schedule. As soon as the parts are made they go into railroad cars. They are on their way to the assembling plants scattered all over the United States and they arrive on schedule.

The assembling plant assembles cars for a certain territory. A careful survey has been made. This territory can afford to buy so and so many cars per day.

"But suppose the people do not want the cars?"

"What has that to do with it?"

People, American people, no longer buy cars. They do not buy newspapers, books, foods, pictures, clothes. Things are sold to people now. If a territory can take so and so many Bogel cars, find men who can make them take the cars. That is the way things are done now.

In the assembling plant everyone works "on the belt." This is a big steel conveyor, a kind of moving sidewalk, waist-high. It is a great river running down through the plant. Various tributary streams come into the main stream, the main belt. They bring tires, they bring headlights, horns, bumpers for cars. They flow into the main stream. The main stream has its source at the freight cars, where the parts are unloaded, and it flows out to the other end of the factory and into other freight cars.

The finished automobiles go into the freight cars at the delivery end of the belt. The assembly plant is a place of peculiar tension. You feel it when you go in. It never lets up. Men here work always on tension. There is no let-up to the tension. If you can't stand it get out.

It is the belt. The belt is boss. It moves always forward. Now the chassis goes on the belt. A hoist lifts it up and places it just so. There is a man at each corner. The chassis is deposited on the belt and it begins to move. Not too rapidly. There are things to be done.

How nicely everything is calculated. Scientific men have done this. They have watched men work. They have stood looking, watch in hand. There is care taken about everything. Look up. Lift up thine eyes. Hoists are bringing engines, bodies, wheels, fenders. These come out of side streams flowing into the main stream. They move at a pace very nicely calculated. They will arrive at the main stream at just a certain place at just a certain time.

In this shop there is no question of wages to be wrangled about. The men work but eight hours a day and are well paid. They are, almost without exception, young, strong men. It is, however, possible that eight hours a day in this place may be much longer than twelve or even sixteen hours in the old carelessly run plants.

They can get better pay here than at any other shop in town. Although I am a man wanting a good many minor comforts in life, I could live well enough on the wages made by the workers in this place. Sixty cents an hour to begin and then, after a probation period of sixty days, if I can stand the pace, seventy cents or more.

To stand the pace is the real test. Special skill is not required. It is all perfectly timed, perfectly calculated. If you are a body upholsterer, so many tacks driven per second. Not too many. If a man hurries too much too many tacks drop on the floor. If a man gets too hurried he is not efficient. Let an expert take a month, two months, to find out just how many tacks the average good man can drive per second.

There must be a certain standard maintained in the finished product. Remember that. It must pass inspection after inspection.

Do not crowd too hard.

Crowd all you can.

Keep crowding.

There are fifteen, twenty, thirty, perhaps fifty such assembling plants, all over the country, each serving its own section. Wires pass back and forth daily. The central office—from which all the parts come—at Jointville is the nerve center. Wires come in and go out of Jointville. In so and so many hours Williamsburg, with so and so many men, produced so and so many cars.

Now Burkesville is ahead. It stays ahead. What is up at Burkesville? An expert flies there.

The man at Burkesville was a major in the army. He is the manager there. He is a cold, rather severe, rather formal man. He has found out something. He is a real Bogel man, an ideal Bogel man. There is no foolishness about him. He watches the belt. He does not say foolishly to himself, "I am the boss here." He knows the belt is boss.

He says there is a lot of foolishness talked about the belt. The experts are too expert, he says. He has found out that the belt can be made to move just a little faster than the experts say. He has tried it. He knows. Go and look for yourself. There are the men out there on the belt, swarming along the belt, each in his place. They are all right, aren't they?

Can you see anything wrong?

Just a trifle more speed in every man. Shove the pace up just a little, not much. With the same number of men, in the same number of hours, six more cars a day.

That's the way a major gets to be a colonel, a colonel a general. Watch that fellow at Burkesville, the man with the military stride, the cold steady voice. He'll go far.

Everything is nicely, perfectly calculated in all the Bogel assembling plants. There are white marks on the floor everywhere. Everything is immaculately clean. No one smokes, no one chews tobacco, no one spits. There are white bands on the cement floor along which the men walk. As they work, sweepers follow them. Tacks dropped on the floor are at once swept up. You can tell by the sweepings in a plant where there is too much waste, too much carelessness. Sweep everything carefully and frequently. Weigh the sweepings. Have an expert examine the sweepings. Report to Jointville.

Jointville says: "Too many upholsterers' tacks wasted in the plant at Port Smith. Belleville produced one hundred and eleven cars a day, with seven hundred and forty-nine men, wasting only nine hundred and six tacks."

It is a good thing to go through the plant now and then, select one man from all the others, give him a new and bigger job, just like that, offhand. If he doesn't make good, fire him.

It is a good thing to go through the plant occasionally, pick out some man, working apparently just as the others are, fire him.

If he asks why, just say to him, "You know."

He'll know why all right. He'll imagine why.

The thing is to build up Jointville. This country needs a religion. You have got to build up the sense of a mysterious central thing, a thing working outside your knowledge.

Let the notion grow and grow that there is something superhuman at the core of all this.

Lift up thine eyes, lift up thine eyes.

The central office reaches down into your secret thoughts. It knows, it knows.

Jointville knows.

Do not ask questions of Jointville. Keep up the pace.

Get the cars out.

Get the cars out.

Get the cars out.

The pace can be accelerated a little this year. The men have all got tuned into the old pace now.

Step it up a little, just a little.

They have got a special policeman in all the Bogel assembling plants. They have got a special doctor there. A man hurts his finger a little. It bleeds a little, a mere scratch. The doctor reaches down for him. The finger is fixed. Jointville wants no blood poisonings, no infections.

The doctor puts men who want jobs through a physical examination, as in the army. Try his nerve reactions. We want only the best men here, the youngest, the fastest.

Why not?

We pay the best wages, don't we?

The policeman in the plant has a special job. That's queer. It is like this. Now and then the big boss passes through. He selects a man off the belt.

"You're fired."

"Why?"

"You know."

Now and then a man goes off his nut. He goes fantoed. He howls and shouts. He grabs up a hammer.

A stream of crazy profanity comes from his lips.

There is Jointville. That is the central thing. That controls the belt.

The belt controls me.

It moves.

It moves.

It moves.

I've tried to keep up.

I tell you I have been keeping up.

Jointville is God.

Jointville controls the belt.

The belt is God.

God has rejected me.

You're fired.

Sometimes a man, fired like that, goes nutty. He gets dangerous. A strong policeman on hand knocks him down, takes him out.

You walk within certain definite white lines.

It is calculated that a man, rubbing automobile bodies with pumice, makes thirty thousand and twenty-one arm strokes per day. The difference between thirty thousand and twenty-one and twenty-eight thousand and four will tell a vital story of profits or loss at Jointville.

Do you think things are settled at Jointville, or at the assembling plants of the Bogel car scattered all over America? Do you think men know how fast the belt can be made to move, what the ultimate, the final pace will be, can be?

Certainly not.

There are experts studying the nerves of men, the movements of men. They are watching, watching. Calculations are always going on. The thing is to produce goods and more goods at less cost. Keep the standard up. Increase the pace a little.

Stop waste.

Calculate everything.

A man walking to and from his work between white lines saves steps. There is a tremendous science of lost motion not perfectly calculated yet.

More goods at less cost.

Increase the pace.

Keep up standards.

It is so you advance civilization.

In the Bogel assembling plants, as at Jointville itself, there isn't any laughter. No one stops work to play. No one fools around or throws things, as they used to do in the old factories. That is why Bogel is able to put the old-fashioned factories, one by one, out of business.

It is all a matter of calculation. You feel it when you go in. You feel rigid lines. You feel movement. You feel a strange tension in the air. There is a quiet terrible intensity.

The belt moves. It keeps moving. The day I was there a number of young boys had come in. They had been sent by a Bogel car dealer, away back somewhere in the country. They had driven in during the night and were to drive Bogel cars back over country roads to some dealer. A good many Bogel cars go out to dealers from the assembling plants, driven out by boys like that.

Such boys, driving all night, fooling along the road, getting no sleep.

They have a place for them to wait for the cars in the Bogel assembling plants. You have been at dog shows and have seen how prize dogs are exhibited, each in his nice clean cage. They have nice clean cages like that for country boys who drive in to Bogel assembling plants to get cars.

The boys come in. There is a place to lie down in there. It is clean. After the boy goes into his cage a gate is closed. He is fastened in.

If a country boy, sleepy like that, waiting for his car, wandered about in a plant he might get hurt.

There might be damage suits, all sorts of things.

Better to calculate everything. Be careful. Be exact.

Jointville thought of that. Jointville thinks of everything. It is the center of power, the new mystery.

Every year in America Jointville comes nearer and nearer being the new center. Men nowadays do not look to Washington. They look to Jointville.

Lift up thine eyes, lift up thine eyes.

Safety Last

III. Why the Safety Movement Fails*

By LOUIS RESNICK

THE first ten years of the safety movement show fine records in the reduction of accidents. But what do the last ten years show? Briefly this: while the death-rate from diphtheria has been reduced about 80 per cent, while the mortality from tuberculosis has been cut 60 per cent, while infant mortality has been cut more than 30 per cent, while the general death-rate (from all causes combined) has declined, the death-rate from accidents in the United States has gone steadily up.

In industry, the American Association for Labor Legislation, studying the records of twenty-two States, found an average increase for 1923 of 30 per cent over the previous year. Half the States showed increases of 25 per cent or more. Nearly a quarter of them showed increases of more than 40 per cent. Several showed increases of 50 per cent. Not one State showed a decrease in accidents.

Later, Ethelbert Stewart, director of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics at Washington, said:

> The accidents of 1925 have apparently exceeded those of 1924, as certainly the accidents of 1923 greatly exceeded those of 1922. The trend in the iron and steel industry has been gradually and practically continuously downward. But I do not believe that the present trend in the iron and steel industry is applicable to industry as a whole. My own judgment is that accidents are on the increase.

Bureau of Mines records show that between 1916 and 1924 there was a 10 per cent increase in the number of miners killed per million tons of coal mined and an increase of 21 per cent in the number of miners killed per million hours of work. This despite the improvement in production methods and the introduction of coal-mining machinery.

The United States Department of Labor, analyzing the 1925-26 accident experience of 2,200 concerns in twenty-six States, employing approximately 1,000,000 men and women, found that six industries had declining accident-severity rates, while eighteen industries had rising severity rates. (Accident-severity rates are arrived at by computing the amount of time lost per million man-hours of work.)

> Since the cost of accidents is influenced by the severity rate of accidents rather than by their number [says the department's report], it is evident that the present tendency in general industry is toward greater cost.
> One factor in this rising cost may be the fact that all American industry has been much influenced by the effort for increased production. This speeding up has not been accompanied by an equally intense effort toward accident prevention except in the case of certain large organizations in which the safety movement first took root and which have been assiduous and successful in maintaining steadily improved conditions.

Finally, Dr. Louis I. Dublin, statistician of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, chairman of the Statistics Committee of the National Safety Council, and perhaps the best-informed person on vital statistics in America, told the 1927 Safety Congress that his committee found no decrease in the accident death-rate "in spite of the fact that 1927 promises to show the lowest general death-rate in our history." The year 1928, the year 1929, and the first quarter of 1930 show still further increases in accident rates. While progress is being made in almost every other field of life conservation, the much-advertised safety movement is running on a treadmill and is slipping back a bit each year.

What are the reasons for this state of affairs? Why is it that although "safety pays in dollars and cents," although methods of preventing most accidents have been devised and their efficiency thoroughly demonstrated, although there are safety councils by the score and it is always "Safety Week" somewhere in America—why, despite all this, are more people killed by accidents in the United States today than ever before? Why has the campaign against accidents been so much less successful than the campaign against tuberculosis, or the campaign against children's diseases, or the whole public-health movement?

* This is the last of three articles on the safety movement. The first two appeared in the issues of May 14 and 21.—Editor The Nation.

Why is it that at no time in the history of the safety movement have more than 10 per cent of the industrial concerns of America been members of any safety organization? Why is so little being done to check the rising tide of automobile fatalities, and why has so little been done in this direction throughout the past decade—especially since professional safety men knew ten years ago that for every million additional automobiles put into use, a thousand more persons would be killed every year?

Five thousand safety men know the answers to these questions; the officers of the several safety associations know them; most government officials who have anything to do with accident prevention know them; and, above all, every insurance executive knows them. The answers are not pleasant and so they are seldom mentioned, even in private, and never in public. It is high time these men and the country at large looked the facts in the face and tried to do something about it. So here they are—the reasons why the safety movement has failed to make greater progress. There are other reasons, but these are the most fundamental.

First, the safety movement lacks real leadership. There are probably 10,000 men engaged solely in the work of saving life and limb through accident prevention. They, more than any other group in industry or public life, know the tragedy of accidents. They see every mangled hand, every broken back. They, most frequently, must carry the news of death to mother, wife, or child. It is they who must then go back into the plant to investigate the cause of the accident and discover how easily it might have been prevented. Finally, it is they who must battle with management on the one hand and with the workmen themselves on the other hand to do what obviously will prevent a recurrence of that kind of accident. They are, for the most part, as fine a lot of men as can be found in medicine, law, or engineering. But the pay of most of them is less than that of plumbers, carpenters, or machinists.

Let the reader stop here and name a single great leader of the safety movement. Let him recall the names of all the safety men he has ever heard of. Let him even consult the files of the safety organization and see if he will find a single name comparable to that of Flexner or Mayo in medicine, Goethals and Hoover in engineering, Pupin or Edison in invention, Hughes, Root, or Brandeis in law. Find in the safety movement a single name comparable to Chrysler or Sloan in the automotive industries, Sarnoff or Aylesworth in radio, Warner or Fox in the movies—all fields of endeavor as new as safety. There are not now and there never have been any really great leaders in the movement.

Second, the safety movement lacks facilities for the training of its personnel. There is not now and there never has been in America a single school for the training of industrial-safety engineers or public-safety directors. New York University is just now giving one course in this subject, and that in the evening in the extension division. For twenty years safety men have talked about the need of a training school for safety engineers, but they have not in all that time succeeded in persuading a single engineering school or technical college to offer a degree in safety engineering or even to give a few courses in the fundamentals of accident prevention.

The plant manager who would not think of having anyone but a graduate chemist analyze his raw materials, anyone but a certified public accountant audit his books, anyone but a mechanical engineer calculate the strength of his steel will without hesitation call in an insurance clerk, a shop mechanic, or the chief watchman and say: "John, from now on you're the safety engineer in this plant; now get busy and stop accidents." What the safety movement needs is a high-grade school, or a number of them, for the training of men and women in the science or art of accident prevention.

Third, the proponents of the safety movement have thus far tried to sell the idea of accident prevention almost wholly on a "dollar-and-cents" basis, and they have largely failed because most people prefer to buy financial protection against the consequences of accidents, rather than try to prevent the accidents. The average employer spends a definite amount—a hundred dollars a year, a thousand dollars, ten thousand dollars, or more, depending on the amount of his pay roll—for workmen's-compensation insurance and then proceeds to "stop worrying about accidents," in the language of the insurance salesman. The average employer would rather do this than hire a safety engineer and undertake a thoroughgoing accident-prevention campaign, because he then knows at the beginning of the year exactly what accidents will cost him; he simply incorporates this amount in the total cost of manufacture and thereby passes the cost of accidents on to the ultimate consumer in the price of his commodity or service.

The employer is greatly encouraged to arrive at this decision by the argument of the insurance agent that a policy will give him not only financial protection against accidents, but actual accident-prevention service. A few of the larger insurance companies do attempt such a service, but in most instances it is only a gesture.

Much the same thing is true with respect to motor-vehicle accidents. For $50 to $100 a year one buys financial protection against the accidental killing of two persons. The insured motorist does not then set out to kill, but he drives with just a little more abandon than he would if he did not know that "the insurance company will take care of me in case of accident."

That it is a mistake to advocate accident prevention primarily on the strength of its economic values was recognized as early as 1919 by R. C. Richards, then president of the National Safety Council, who told the members of this organization:

> We should all remember that Safety First is not a question of dollars and cents; it is a question of saving human life, the most valuable thing in the world, which once gone can never be brought back; it is trying to save men from losing their arms and legs which never can be put back; it is trying to avert the making of widows and orphans, destitution and misery.

Every year two or three of the several hundred speakers at the National Safety Congress say the same thing, but the dollars-and-cents argument continues to dominate the technique of securing new members for safety associations or of inducing individual employers and whole communities to start some organized, intensive effort to prevent accidents.

Little wonder then that when the employer adds up the cost of a safety man, the cost of machine guards, and all the other incidentals of a safety campaign, and discovers that the total is greater than any possible saving which might result from a reduction in his insurance rates (reductions being granted to plants with low accident records) he is so often ready to wipe out his safety department and be content with insurance protection against accidents. Little wonder that scores of cities, after a few months of a "permanent safety campaign," let their safety organizations die when they find that the only immediate financial gain is a slight reduction in automobile accident-insurance rates, and that problematical. Even Westchester County (in which many of the suburbs of New York City are located), one of the richest residential areas in America, which has spent more than $100,000,000 for parkways in the last ten years, could not—or would not—support a safety campaign costing less than $25,000 a year for the thirty or forty towns and villages in the county. This, despite the fact that the first year of the campaign brought about a marked reduction in the number of persons killed or injured.

There can be no doubt that safety work, properly conducted, is not only economically sound, but highly profitable; that accident prevention in industry and in public places pays big dividends in dollars and cents; that it is cheaper to prevent accidents than to pay for them. All this is true; it has been shown over and over again. But it is high time that safety men and safety organizations added some new strings to their fiddles. It is time the safety movement took account of the moral responsibility for accident prevention, not only in speeches, but in actions. It is time safety men and safety organizations took some interest in legislation as a means of accident prevention. It is time they gave more attention to fundamental research (in which they have done almost nothing) and less attention to the production of safety calendars, safety posters, and safety slogans.

When the title Safety Engineer ceases to be something any employer feels free to bestow with a wave of the hand and becomes the symbol of four years of training in the fundamentals of engineering, education, psychology, advertising, and industrial management; when employers' legal responsibility for accident prevention extends beyond the installation of a few mechanical guards and the carrying of workmen's-compensation insurance; when the reckless motor-vehicle driver has more to fear than a few days in jail or a hundred dollars' fine for running down that gradually disappearing species of game known as the "pedestrian"; when the fight on accidents captures the imagination and the cooperation of the public as has the war on tuberculosis —when all this happens the safety movement will be well on the way to real success.

Meanwhile we shall go on killing and injuring men, women, and children by accidents in America twice as fast as our soldiers were killed or wounded in France during the World War. And if you want to know just how fast that is take a look at the clock. In the next hour 11 persons will be killed by accidents and 275 will be seriously injured; 3 will be killed in industry, 3 by motor vehicles, and 5 in or near their homes. Of those hurt some will be blinded; some will lose an arm, a leg, an eye, or a hand. And this goes on every hour, day and night, 365 days a year.

Who are these people who are going to be hurt or killed while you read this—and while the leading safety organization is busily engaged selling calendars? Carelessness, recklessness, thoughtlessness, and greediness are no respecters of persons. So you may find when you get home that one of the 11 or one of the 275 lived next door, or in your own house.

In the Driftway

THE decline of American bread can no longer be ignored. The Drifter would enlist the aid of all who love their country against that abomination known as the "sandwich loaf." A country cannot escape responsibility for its bread; in most cases, in fact, the bread of a country seems to partake significantly of the national character. The Italian loaf is squat and wide like the mother of ten Italian children. Because it is made of the whole flour it is fibrous and resistant to the teeth like a kernel of wheat fresh from the field. French bread, though a bit more refined, tastes as if it were made from flour. Spanish bread, the Drifter freely admits, he does not understand. Certainly he cannot join in the praises of Havelock Ellis and Ernest Hemingway, though there is no doubt that Spanish bread, with its almost impenetrable white crust and disappointing stale interior, has character. On the whole the Drifter has the feeling that it was originally good to eat but that most of it came out of the oven when Isabella's jewels spilled out of their casket into the adventurous hands of Columbus. It may be, however, that the mystery lies in some subtle Moorish influence that still haunts the ovens of Spain as it haunts the towers of Alhambra Hill. German bread is inclined toward weight and sourness but it is certainly worth while. As for Austria, the Drifter is hopelessly prejudiced in its favor because his only memory of Austrian bread is in conjunction with wild honey among the upper valleys of the Tyrol.

* * * * *

BUT what of America? America's loaf is four inches square and fifteen inches long, and beyond it are ranged a million other loaves exactly like the first in size, in weight, in utter tastelessness. The "whole-wheat" variety differs from the white in that it has been soaked apparently in dark brown medicine. It was not always so. The Drifter can remember when a loaf of fresh bread even in America was a thing to rouse cupidity. A faint smell of potato water foaming, not to say fermenting, with "east cake" hovers about even yet whenever the Drifter thinks of his mother's kitchen. Baking day was really Mother's Day then, and if the batch of bread turned out badly distress and shame pervaded the house until they were wiped out by a successful baking. Those were the good old days, too, of bread and milk. Today it is crackers and milk because the "sandwich loaf," put to the ordeal of milk, disintegrates into a spineless pulp fit only for the blue milk it is broken into.

* * * * *

THE Drifter has been told that the inferior quality of baker's bread is due to the fact that healthy flour will not keep. Flour from which all life has been "processed" stays dead, naturally, and keeps forever. It is not difficult to guess which flour the bakers use. Why the American public accepts the lifeless bread they get is much more mystifying. The Drifter says "accepts" because he is of the opinion that very little of it is eaten, since it is only faintly edible at best, namely, as toast—which explains the great and growing popularity of toast.

* * * * *

PERHAPS a little less prosperity—which we seem to be in for—will cause the nation to think more about its bread and less about its automobile, and the bread will become as good as the automobile. But the Drifter doubts it. Meanwhile he would clinch his case against American flour by one final bit of testimony. An acquaintance of his went away for a time leaving behind him two bins of flour, one containing whole-wheat flour, the other white. He returned to find that the enterprising whole-wheat flour had populated its bin with whatever it is that whole-wheat flour propagates. The white flour, on the other hand, had preserved its pristine purity and splendid isolation almost intact. Almost, not quite. Unfortunately a few bumptious whole-wheat offspring had crowded through a crack and fallen into the white flour. It was their corpses that marred the pure Antarctic expanse of the white-flour bin. They had died of starvation.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Special Correspondent

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I enjoyed very much the articles on the Associated Press. I have one observation to make based on the experience I had during the Havana conference. My impression there was that the Associated Press covered the conference more completely and fairly than did any special correspondent. The Associated Press had reporters with a thorough knowledge of the Spanish language who were not interested in exploiting any personal point of view.

On the other hand, I feel that the newspapers that had special correspondents at Havana gave a much more misleading picture of the conference than did papers using only the A. P. dispatches. These so-called "trained seals" were obliged to write something different from the A. P. dispatches. They did not have any more thorough knowledge of the problems of the conference. Many of them knew no Spanish. As a result they went off into blind leads and into a sensationalism of which the Associated Press and the United Press were not guilty.

Bayard on Protection

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: To those so-called Democrats who have deserted the high principles and traditions of their party to vote for this worst of tariff bills at Washington, might we not commend the sentiments of an address made at Edinburgh thirty-five years ago by the American Ambassador to Great Britain, Thomas Francis Bayard, once a distinguished ornament of the United States Senate?

In that address Mr. Bayard referred to "the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled protection," to which—if I may summarize his language—he attributed these social and political evils: Protection fosters class legislation and creates inequality of fortune. It corrupts public life. It banishes men of independent mind and character from the public councils. It lowers the tone of national representation and blunts the public conscience. It creates false standards in the popular mind by familiarizing the people with state aid and guardianship in public affairs. It divorces ethics from politics and places politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble.

The experience of the years that have passed since this great American Democrat gave utterance to these sentiments has served amply to demonstrate the truth of his indictment of a system that has prostituted the law-making power of our government for selfish and dishonest ends.

"Ridin' and Talkin'"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The article on bank failures in your issue of February 26 contains unfair criticism of country banks. Banking standards in country banks are as high as they are anywhere. Loans on good land have always been sound finance—until now.

The cause of agricultural depression is wholly outside of agriculture. The problem cannot be solved by tariff, or cooperation, or commissions. The cause is inflated values and inflated salaries. It cannot be true that a bricklayer can earn fourteen dollars a day when wheat is worth only ninety-five cents a bushel. It is simply not true.

A colored friend of mine has analyzed present conditions for me as well as any economist I know. He said: "All the money is spent for ridin' and talkin'." My colored friend is as wise as I am and fully as wise as you. Since the cause of economic distress is ridin' and talkin' then the solution would be less of it. Walk awhile.

Economic laws are as sound as they ever were. We simply have an economic problem now which has never confronted us before. And it will be solved when a bricklayer will work for what he can earn—and also the rest of you, or us.

A Name for the New Planet

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Not long ago I noticed a news item to the effect that Italian astronomers have urged that the name Pluto be given to the new planet, which is about the size, in appearance, of a star of the fifteenth magnitude, and is a great deal farther from the sun than is Neptune. It occurred to me that it might be worth while to call attention to a number of reasons why the name Pluto would be very appropriate.

Jupiter, of course, being so very prominent an object in the heavens (it looks larger than any star of the first magnitude) and only half as far away as Saturn, which is not so large as Jupiter, was undoubtedly known to the ancients even before they knew Saturn. When they named Saturn, therefore, they seem to have given it that name because Saturn was the father of Jupiter, i.e., more remote.

When Uranus, which appears to be the size of a fifth-magnitude star, was accidentally discovered by Sir William Herschel in 1781, it was named by him Georgium Sidus, i.e., George's Star, in honor of his patron, George III of England. Others for a while called it Herschel, but later it came to be called by everyone Uranus, evidently because among the gods of the ancients Uranus was the father of Saturn.

Among the gods of the ancients the name of the father of Uranus did not exist, either among the Latins or among the Greeks. Thus when Neptune, a star of the eighth magnitude (the sixth magnitude being the smallest-sized star that can be seen with the naked eye), was discovered, apparently the astronomers did the next best thing and gave to the new planet its name because Neptune, among the gods of the Romans, was the brother of Jupiter. Since Pluto, as well as Neptune, was a brother of Jupiter, it certainly would seem quite in order to adopt the Italian suggestion in naming the new planet.

There is another point to be made. If the name Pluto were adopted, it would doubtless be abbreviated to PL; and PL might also be taken to stand for Percival Lowell, the name of the man whose studies over many years resulted in the discovery of the new planet.

New York Public Utilities

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your cavalier treatment in your issue of May 7 of the utility measures passed by the New York State Legislature prompts this comment. Analysis of the hearings before the commission appointed to investigate the Public Service Commission laws shows that the administration or the authority of the Public Service Commission should be modified in three major directions, involving (1) the attitude and policies of the commission itself, (2) the control over holding companies, and (3) the handling of valuations and the rate of return.

1. Of these the first overtops all others in importance. If the New York commissioners had looked upon themselves as public defenders endowed with powers of initiation—as they were originally intended to be—rather than as judges on the bench, and if they had used the full measure of their legal authority, it is practically certain that there would have been no such criticism as broke forth in 1929. For instance, they have long had authority over certain relations between the most important holding companies and their affiliates but have practically never used it. They also have a very wide discretion in determining valuations for rate-making purposes, even under Supreme Court decisions, but they have not only failed to develop any policy on this matter but even fought shy of rate cases, depending rather on necessarily one-sided negotiations. Other evidence might be cited to prove that it is not so much the law as its administration that has been ineffective. The remedy for this state of affairs lies in the hands not of the legislature but of the executive who is vested with the appointing power. The legislature can bolster up administration by making appropriations for an increased staff. This was done to the amount of $215,000, thereby augmenting the staff by nearly sixty-four positions.

2. One of the outstanding reasons for the appointment of the investigating body was the power and rapid expansion of the holding companies, which, with the exception noted above, have been beyond the commission's control. The holding-company bill is by far the most drastic that has been passed in any State. The opposition of certain utility officials would indicate that it is far from innocuous. It may, indeed, prove to be too far-reaching to be workable. This is no "tinkering" legislation. In itself it justifies the special attention given to utility matters in the past session.

3. With regard to valuations for rate-making purposes anyone conversant with utility regulation will admit that present methods, as determined by the Supreme Court, are costly and cumbersome from every point of view and must sooner or later be thoroughly revamped. The Republican members of both the investigating commission and the legislature virtually subscribed to this by passing a bill on this subject. But they have been roundly condemned in certain quarters for not adopting the prudent-investment theory, as urged by a limited group of advocates. The evidence, as recorded in the hearings before the investigating commission, goes to show that there is no unanimity on this theory among liberal-minded commissioners, engineers, economists, and constitutional lawyers. Although every effort was made to discover competent witnesses favoring prudent investment there was almost no support for it in these hearings. To expect the commissioners to advocate a measure upon which experts cannot agree, for which there is no public demand, and against which the Supreme Court has frequently ruled is, to say the least, naive. To condemn and belittle any other constructive action that they may have taken because of their failure on this count is ungenerous and unfair.

A new method of valuation is of paramount importance, but let it not be thought that it will come about in any other way than through an educational campaign and a public demand that will make itself felt even within the precincts of the Supreme Court. If Governor Roosevelt puts his shoulder to this wheel he will be performing a signal public service.

Wellsiana

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am writing an account of the life and activities, literary and other, of Mr. H. G. Wells. It will appear this year in America and Europe. In the effort to make it biographically accurate and detailed, I am basing it very largely upon original sources, and I want to appeal to those who can lend me for quotation or other use relevant reminiscences, impressions, or letters (or transcripts of letters), especially any referring to Mr. Wells's earlier years or to specific activities. Original letters (or transcripts to be returned) will be treated most carefully, handled only by myself, and returned without delay by registered post. Matter may be sent direct to me at Acacia, Dane Bridge Lane, Much Hadham, Hertfordshire, England, or in care of my publishers, W. W. Norton and Company, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Mr. Wells of course knows of and has approved this appeal.

The Kneeling Nun

By EDA LOU WALTON

Upon the highest mountain when pale dawn
From its dove breast unfolds its luminous wings,
Her figure carved in granite kneels alone
Beseeching the vast heavens. Turned to stone
Before whatever Deity the gray
Waters of sunlight hide, here she must pray
Stone hands on stony breasts, in iron folds
Clad as a nun. She once betrayed
These vestments, once emboldened by desire
She tore the linen band from off her brow,
And bathed her brow in fire.
Now without rest and under whirling skies
She kneels forever praying in the snow
Until the rock which is her breast shall flow
Down the bright stream into the valley's dust
And her long penance done
She sinks to rest under the valley sun.

Love was her sin; she ran away
From bells that broke interminable hours
Over a walled-in garden. Till that day
She was obedient, but that day had broken
Too desperately on her heart; she fled
Hearing the bells still ring, hearing vows spoken.
She was a child who like a lily planted
Had like a lily grown; she had been taken
And laid upon an altar, heard iron gates
Clang in her heart, nor had she yet been shaken
From such wild vows as never touched the hem
Of the long garment she was fashioned in.
Year after year was ended before fear
Beaded her rosary, and she was hungry fed
Upon celestial bread. What scarlet cloak
Had wrapped her round, what strong untempered hands
Bared her bright bosom to the heated air,
She would remember down the centuries;
While those who judged her flowered in the dust,
She would remember. And was she so to blame
Who now is but a legend and a name
Of warning to frail maidens veiled in white?

There she will kneel till neither you nor I
Can fix her with a dimmed eye, and she will pray
Past the last prayer we utter in dismay;
And every sunset, she will rise and burn
Like a bright phoenix on the brow of night,
With arms spread wide like wings and stony eyes
Turned searchingly down
Toward the twinkling little town,
And lovers in the town will see her shine
A dark defiant figure, a strange sign
Against the heavens until the fire is out,
And night creeps down the valley, while the moon
Haloes a nun at prayer; and lovers soon
Turning toward their homes, will gather there
Around the supper tables; there struck blind
By the wide-branching candles, they will see
Their dim companions dimly, but their hands
Reached hungrily for bread, these clearly they will see,
And try to fill, and see them emptily
Reached out again, until like thirsty flowers
They fade within the light.

Artists in Exile

Portrait of the Artist as American. By Matthew Josephson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

FOLLOWING in the footsteps of Van Wyck Brooks and Lewis Mumford, Matthew Josephson has produced a study of the fate of the artist in America. The first two names occur inescapably, for without Mr. Brooks's pioneering volumes, particularly the biographies of Mark Twain and Henry James, and without Mr. Mumford's "Golden Day," Mr. Josephson's book, if it had been written at all, would surely have been less penetrating and satisfactory than it is. This debt, I think, Mr. Josephson would freely acknowledge, and its existence in no way reduces the high value of his work.

Though he surveys the whole history of the artist in America, Mr. Josephson's attention is focused particularly upon the writers of the second half of the nineteenth century, for it was then that blighted careers were most frequent and appalling. The early morning of New England letters had passed, thrust aside by the triumphant march of industrialism, land speculation, and expansion, but undone, also, according to Mr. Josephson, by its own limitations, its failure to provide a philosophy and a relevant program for the new age. The artists in the generations which followed the Civil War found no place to fit in; they felt themselves exiled: as Howells said, they were tolerated at best, rather than accepted. Hence their baffled lives—the obscure tragedy of Melville, passing half his existence in silence as a clerk in the customs office of New York; the wholesale flight of others to Europe and the far corners of the world. James Whistler dies in London, Lafcadio Hearn in Japan, Stephen Crane in Germany, early in life; Henry James seeks to obliterate his origin in his long London life; Henry Adams, in despair of all else, haunts the Gothic cathedrals of France; Emily Dickinson conceals her strange poems, and makes a nunnery of her paternal home and garden. Even the minor figures are driven out: the young American, Henry Harland, goes to London in the nineties to found The Yellow Book; Stuart Merrill discards his own language for the French, and becomes a symbolist poet; middling novelists like Harold Frederic and Marion Crawford vow never, never to return to their native land, from Italy or Chelsea or wherever.

More than to any other writer, almost as much as to all the others together, Mr. Josephson devotes his attention to Henry James, who best articulates the problem of the American artist and the expatriate, "who sleeps with it, walks with it over a long period of years, and answers it." And unlike Van Wyck Brooks, who concluded sternly from the career of James that the artist should not quit his native soil, Mr. Josephson holds that James's expatriation, from the standpoint of his literary development, was a "very successful adventure, despite whatever sum of personal suffering imposed." For if the destiny of the exile was not an easy one, the lot of the faithful, Mr. Josephson believes, was "infinitely harder," and he seeks to prove this as he reviews the careers of those who stayed at home. Walt Whitman himself was finally betrayed into hailing with joy even the business materialism of his age. Mark Twain, "the most nearly perfect original and model of the local spirit," despised all genuine art and culture, made a "buffoon's tour" of Europe, and learned to write almost solely for commercial rewards. Howells, with all his talent, became constantly more timid, finally rationalizing his genteel novels with the conclusion that "the more smiling aspects of life are the more American." Ambrose Bierce, stimulated by his five years in London, returned only to enter a tormented struggle for equilibrium; he soon deserted all serious literary effort, scattered his energies and talents in eternal petty polemics, and died in bitterness. As for the pallid Thomas Aldriches, Bayard Taylors, and Margaret Delands, they are "mercifully forgotten."

What is the lesson of all these careers for our own day? Here I find Mr. Josephson vague, and I am not at all sure that I understand his position. For the implicit moral of his melancholy biographies, as well as of some of his explicit commentary, would seem to be that salvation for the American artist has been in a retreat to foreign climes. And this retreat has been necessary, it appears, chiefly because of two things—industrialism, the universal pursuit of material prosperity, and democracy. ("The whole question whether the arts, in their historical character, can survive in democratic societies," says Mr. Josephson, "must be thrown open.") Now as democracy is still as rampant as ever, and as, nationally, we still pursue material prosperity with the same relentlessness, while industrialism becomes even more dominant, the logical conclusion for Mr. Josephson would seem to be that the only hope for the American artist is still in flight. But Mr. Josephson does not draw this conclusion. Europe, he believes, is so rapidly becoming "Americanized" that the retreat is blocked; meanwhile the T. S. Eliots and Ezra Pounds, with their "hermetical obscurity," their "unsocial, personal patterns of flight," are practicing an art that bears the seeds of extinction within itself. What is left? Well, somehow Mr. Josephson hopes that out of our time will come "a kind of moral revolution," and "a growth of humanism, with its system of discipline, proportions, intellectual perfection."

I do not find myself in agreement with all Mr. Josephson's portraits and judgments. His personal taste, I suspect, inclines him to the precious rather than to the robust writer, and his estimates are not unaffected by his thesis. He uses William James as a mere foil for Henry James, and his portrait of Mark Twain is one-sided. But he has given us an arresting history of the American artist, admirably written, full of penetrating criticism; a series of brilliant and absorbing biographical sketches.

HENRY HAZLITT

The Gandhist Creed

Mahatma Gandhi's Ideas. By C. F. Andrews. The Macmillan Company. $3.

C. F. ANDREWS is widely known as Gandhi's closest European friend. Indeed, it would be true to say that he is the only native of the West who has been admitted to complete intimacy with the Mahatma. In writing, or rather compiling, this book he has performed a necessary task, for it is obvious that someone had to bring together in small compass the religious and ethical beliefs of the most extraordinary Indian of his age. There prevails throughout North America—as the present reviewer should know perhaps as well as anyone—a great eagerness to learn about the Mahatma's personality and the faith that has inspired him during the campaign of the past ten years. Americans in the main, as I judge, want to know, first, what it is in the way of essential belief that Gandhi stands for, and secondly, whether that belief has any importance for the modern man and woman in the West. Mr. Andrews, in this simple and candid volume, provides them with all that is needed for an estimate of Gandhi as prophet and devotee; and more than that, he tells, in episodes, the story of the two great movements—passive resistance in South Africa and non-cooperation in India.

The reader will not complain that the English interpreter has sought to temper the Mahatma's doctrinal extremism. Let us take two or three examples. That which distinguishes Hinduism from all other religions, says Gandhi, is the adoration of the cow: "Cow protection is the gift of Hinduism to the world, and Hinduism will live so long as there are Hindus to protect the cow." But he is obliged to add that cow protection "has degenerated into a perpetual feud with the Mussulmans" and to make this damaging confession, "I do not know that the condition of the cattle in any other part of the world is so bad as in unhappy India." "A religion that establishes the worship of the cow," he says further, "cannot possibly countenance or warrant a cruel and inhuman boycott of human beings"; and yet the Mahatma has to recognize that in denouncing, as he does, the oppression of the outcastes by the caste Hindus, the "indelible stain" of Untouchability, he has against him the great majority of his orthodox coreligionists. He accepts the main lines of the Hindu caste system, and will not admit that there is any validity in the reformer's wish to abolish the ban upon eating in common: "If mankind had not, much to its hurt, made of eating a fetish and indulgence we should have performed the operation of eating in private, even as one performs the other necessary functions of life in private." Not for him, that is to say, any of the beauty and fellowship which, in every age and every land, humanity has honored in the meal eaten together in affection and good humor. As for the economic doctrine upon which Gandhi has striven to base a self-sufficing India: Swadeshi means "the use and service of our immediate surroundings to the exclusion of the more remote." Not only, therefore, he contends, is foreign commerce to be avoided; you are doing wrong when you trade even with your own folk if they happen to live at a distance, except under the drive of utter necessity. The Mahatma, in other words, is a pure anarchist, an immitigable enemy of society. As such he is impelled to touch the limit of nihilism when it comes to the sex relation. The root evil, he insists, is that men and women "continue to enjoy one another." But without that, human life would cease? It would, the Mahatma concedes, yet only on this earthly plane!

Now the grave fact of the present terrible situation in India is not that the Indian people, so far as they are socially conscious, have not accepted the Mahatma's domestic and economic theories. That, manifestly, they could never do. It is that, under the lead of politicians and modernist intellectuals, they have rejected the central doctrine of their Mahatma—Ahimsa, non-violence. In his letter to the Viceroy of last January—historic because announcing his decision to enter upon a decisive form of civil disobedience—Gandhi stated that he had been forced into action because, if he refrained, Young India would plunge into violence. He was, of course, right. The march to the sea, followed by the ritual act of defiance, was a final desperate move, designed to test the possibility of non-violent revolution in a country torn with religious and racial enmities. It was foredoomed. The control of the nationalist movement had passed out of the hands of the one Indian leader who might conceivably have built a tentative bridge of peace. The vast convulsion with which British authority is grappling in this summer of 1930 has nothing whatever to do with Mahatma Gandhi's ideas. That is why Mr. Andrews's exposition bears the look of a visionary gospel, already far away.

S. K. RATCLIFFE

Non-Euclidean Criticism

Poetry and Mathematics. By Scott Buchanan. The John Day Company. $2.50.

ANY intelligent layman who, delving into the lives of such typical mathematicians as Poincaré or Karl Pearson, tries to understand not the results of their researches but the paths along which their minds naturally move, will discover that high mathematical ability is aesthetic in its nature. A new mathematical structure is only in an inferior sense the outcome of "logic"; it is really what happens when a mathematician perceives a new form, a new style possible in the manipulations of his symbols. The least important part of his activity is that devoted to "proof." The high-school student is led astray by the ordinary teacher's sentimental insistence on the "ironclad logic" of algebra and geometry. He assumes that mathematics is an uninspired system of rigid demonstrations summed up in a set of stony-eyed formulae. Actually, in its less elementary realms, as in projective geometry and the theory of functions, rigidity disappears and the structures become a flexible network of shifting relationships. These relationships are not inexorable; they are susceptible (within certain limits) to selection and manipulation under the hand of the individual mathematician. In this sense mathematics is more an art than a science.

What Mr. Buchanan in his completely brilliant essay does is to take this truism and make it yield something in the way of illuminating the nature of the poetic faculty. As I understand it, he bases his argument upon what might be termed two axioms: (a) "Illustration of mathematics by concrete event, fact, or object is never as effective as illustration by equally abstract analogous ideas" (in this case ideas about imaginative literature); and (b) "Poetry and mathematics are two very successful attempts to deal with ideas. Both employ sets of symbols and systems of notation." Neither literature nor mathematics is "true"; they are both symbolic; and their symbols can be made to render up useful comparisons and correspondences. It is impossible here to summarize the ingenious trains of thought by which Mr. Buchanan's analogies are established. Perhaps the most interesting parallels are to be found in his comparison of the development of the action of a novel or play with the process of transformation underlying projective geometry; of ordinal and cardinal numbers with mediate characterization ("Tom Jones") and immediate characterization ("The Idiot"); of Cartesian geometry with allegory; and, most fundamental of all, of words with functions, a comparison that yields a series of beautiful insights into the nature of style.

More interesting, however, than what this book establishes is what it indicates as to the temper of its creator. Both "Poetry and Mathematics" and Mr. Buchanan's earlier, more purely dialectical work "Possibility" are the productions of a mind whose like is very infrequently found among American writers. I express myself inadequately in saying that it is a mind which can play without being frivolous. The great exemplar of this type of mentality is, of course, Plato; and there are in this book many paragraphs which, in their deep irony, may justly be called Platonic. At times Mr. Buchanan's intellectual flexibility leads him into whimsy, into analogies which are far-fetched even though delightful; but his very flights of fancy have an undertone of quiet amusement with himself which is wholly captivating. But more often behind them lie witty truths, as when he tells us that "in the 'Republic' Plato is exposing the Pythagorean secrets of the Delphic Oracle, which is the Greek analogue of our modern research foundations."

This little book is one of the tentative first fruits of a distinguished mind; it already bears the mark of a distinguished prose stylist. From its investigations both poets and mathematicians have much to learn, but it will be most interesting, perhaps, to the literary critic. It is no overstatement to say that it will open up to him, in Mr. Buchanan's phrase, a new dimension in literature.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Trotzky's Side of It

My Life. By Leon Trotzky. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

THERE are few more dramatic records in history than that of Leon Trotzky. His story is far more fascinating than a detective-mystery plot and it has the added merit of being true. He began life in a peasant's mud hut; he leads us through prisons, exiles, escapes—all the drama of revolutionary struggle. The fight for power is brilliantly described. Then follow the peace negotiations, the fight against world military forces, with the climax of Lenin's death, growing opposition within the Communist Party, exile and deportation.

Naturally, Trotzky weaves into the picture a defense of his own position. In it all one can clearly see Lenin's estimate of his one outstanding defect—"an excess of self-confidence." For Trotzky is an able man who does not minimize his own merits in the slightest. He says about his fellow-revolutionists within Russia in 1905: "There was not one from whom I could learn anything. On the contrary, I had to assume the position of teacher myself."

It is easy to see other reasons why Trotzky made enemies. As he says, he was so intent on achievement amid counter-revolution and civil war that he could not take time for tact, nor could he avoid stepping on others' toes. At first his name was always ranked next to Lenin's. It was inevitable that older Bolshevik war horses with a cleaner party record should be jealous of his world prestige. Then too he claims to have shared the dictatorship with Lenin, for whenever these two agreed no one dared differ.

In spite of the bitter hostility against Stalin which breathes through the book the picture is not entirely unfavorable to the present dictator. Trotzky says that in 1917 Stalin flashed before him "as a barely perceptible shadow." In the heat of the fight he easily forgot his existence. At one time he even obtained Stalin's recall from Tsaritsyn, where the latter was commander. One clearly sees the difficulty Lenin had in keeping these two leaders from pulling in opposite directions. For a time he succeeded, but after his death a split was inevitable. When one considers the struggle between Roosevelt and Taft, lifelong friends, it is hardly to be wondered at that two such powerful leaders as Stalin and Trotzky, with totally opposite dispositions, should fight. Trotzky maintains that Stalin was constantly intriguing against him. This may be true, but the fact remains that at the time of Lenin's death Trotzky had very few close friends among the inner Communist group. This surely could not be solely owing to Stalin.

Trotzky can hardly be said to be dispassionate in all he writes. For instance, he describes America as "not only the strongest but also the most terrified country. Hoover recently explained his passion for fishing by pointing out the democratic nature of this pastime. If this be so, although I doubt it, it is the only evidence of one of the few survivals of democracy existing in the United States." Possibly his comments on Russian affairs also are colored. At any rate he nowhere adequately explains why he should have been so completely isolated after Lenin's death. To be sure, he says that it was not due to Stalin alone but that he was seriously ill during the campaign of 1923. This was the result of an accident. Indeed, Trotzky maintains that the historical process is usually a refraction of historic law through the accidental. The accident here occurred because Trotzky used to go out hunting while Lenin was lying ill and while Stalin was pulling political wires. On one of these trips he contracted influenza and recurrent fever. His excuse for hunting is that it afforded relaxation, but one suspects that it also provided excitement after the civil war had ended.

Had Trotzky been able to work with men as effectively as Lenin, had he not gone off on wild tangents antagonizing others, perhaps had he not spent so much time hunting, he might have remained in power. He was easily the most brilliant orator of the Russian Revolution. He was an able administrator but an extremely bad politician. Trotzky was the type of general who is desperately needed in a period of revolution but who ought to be superseded in a more stable period. In the light of his own story it would have been difficult for the Communists to have made Trotzky the outstanding leader of the Communist Party following Lenin's death. Stalin, just because he did not have such outstanding individuality and originality, made the better leader. There is surprisingly little evidence against Stalin. He may have been disloyal to Trotzky, he may have been grossly unfair in his campaign attacks, but there is no evidence presented of treason to the fundamental ideals of communism. Indeed, some of the actions which Trotzky complains of in Stalin have much to commend themselves. In opposition to Trotzky, he tried to work with the committee of the British Labor Party. Stalin believes it is possible to make a demonstration of socialism in Russia alone. Trotzky denies this.

Trotzky's life shows once again the many personal factors which play a part in revolution. To some degree it disproves the case for economic materialism. Psychology, individual differences, even psychopathic attitudes play a vital part in success or failure. Communists have an economic theory, but at heart they are men and women molded by social forces as well as economic. They all desire power and love prestige. These forces are powerful in affecting the course of history.

It is perhaps fortunate for history that Trotzky was deported. Otherwise no such honest record of revolutionary attitude could ever have been written. Trotzky would not have had the time, nor would the party have permitted it. The flashes describing various Bolshevik leaders and inner party history will be invaluable in piecing together the mosaic of the actualities of the Russian Revolution. No student of contemporary history will want to miss the fascinating and true romance that this life of Trotzky relates.

JEROME DAVIS

Stendhal

Stendhal: The Life of an Egoist. By Rudolph Kayser. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

KAYSER'S book has all the defects of its genre. It is that pernicious thing, a fictionized biography. But it triumphs in a sense because it portrays vividly a man of immense importance, a man to whom one can turn today and learn a great deal. Henri Beyle was what Hugh Fausset would call a complete romantic. He suffered from few of the defects of the type, and it would be difficult for Professor Babbitt to put him out of court. Though he reverenced Rousseau he was not a complete Rousseauist. Indeed, he was the antithesis of Rousseau on fundamental questions. Above all he differed from Rousseau in emphasizing the intellect.

Stendhal was one of the great intellectual novelists, a man of ideas who functioned best in the novel. His great creations, "The Red and the Black" and "The Charterhouse of Parma," are of small interest to those who demand of fiction lush emotionalism. But to those of us who take pleasure in a spare and thrilling story grounded in ideas, they are precious. We do not reproach Stendhal for rejecting "spurious methods" of gaining the approval of the reader.

He was the novelist of "spiritual energy," says Kayser truly, a man to whom the idea was but a prelude to action. He thought in terms of the individual and he thought psychologically. Singularity and intelligence seemed to him the hallmarks of the complete man. But his perception, while true, was not one that the immediate future was to indorse.

For between Stendhal and ourselves there lies the age of the triumphant bourgeois to whom money was the supreme value. His acute intelligence foresaw this society, but condemned it and placed his popularity on the farther side of it. Now that we are emerging from the bourgeois period—into what?—we turn to Stendhal once more for illumination. It is there for all who wish to find it. What we need, however, is not books like Kayser's but critical studies which shall clearly indicate the nature of Stendhal and of his ideas.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

The Death of Harding

The Strange Death of President Harding. From the Diaries of Gaston B. Means as told to May Dixon Thacher. New York: Guild Publishing Corporation. $3.50.

THIS is the third book to deal with the bad side of President Harding's Administration and his personal weaknesses. It is so highly sensational that, if the press is correct, it has already been submitted to a grand jury in the District of Columbia. Were there libel laws to protect the dead in this country as abroad, Mr. Means would have risked more than he did in publishing it. His book has had, and is having, we hear, a tremendous sale despite the fact that there are three prima facie reasons for discrediting it: first, that Mr. Means served a term in Atlanta penitentiary for violations of the prohibition laws; second, that he lays this conviction to the Harding "Ohio gang" for whom he worked; and third, that in this very volume he admits his complicity in all sorts of wrongdoing, boasting, for instance, that no less than $7,000,000 of prohibition graft passed through his hands—and more, as a result of the blackmailing of corporations or the sale of government favors—and that he lived far beyond his government salary at other people's expense.

Naturally these facts call for an attitude of extreme caution toward this book. If it is to be believed, then President Harding was helped to his death much as was Socrates, and so were Jess Smith, General Sawyer, and still others—it is a fact that no less than eight of the Harding crowd died suddenly or committed suicide. General Sawyer was one of these, and as Means shows by a citation from the New York Times, his death was entirely unexpected and "almost identical with the manner of death of the late Warren G. Harding." All these deaths, and Mrs. Harding's, make it difficult to get at the truth; the dead are not here to refute Means. And the extreme cleverness with which the book is put together, its skill in insinuation rather than in open charges, makes the task of refutation the more difficult.

What then should be one's attitude toward this book which, if it is true, paints a picture to make every American hang his head with shame? The disposition of most people would be to ignore it. What, they ask, is the use of stirring up anew these nasty scandals? What good will it do to prove that they are true? They will only besmirch the country still more. To my mind there should be an inquiry. There are a number of points in Mr. Means's book whose accuracy can be easily tested. There are still Harry Daugherty and his brother to throw light upon the situation. After all, there is such a thing as establishing the historical truth; if we do not do it now the scandal will spread day by day, and it will be the cause of speculation and misrepresentation in the years to come.

Finally, there is the question of Harding himself. If there is anything that can be done to improve the reputation of this President of the United States is it not owing to him? I confess to surprise that men like Charles E. Hughes and Herbert Hoover, who sat in his Cabinet and have never yet criticized anything that happened in the Harding Administration, have not undertaken something themselves. Is there too much dynamite in the situation? They were of those who contributed, we presume, to the $800,000 memorial to Harding to be erected over his body in Marion. If this enterprise is to be put through as originally planned it would seem as if the least that could be done would be an investigation of the charges that have been made. Until something like this happens Mr. Means and his book will hold the field; he will profit by its phenomenal and unchecked sale; and the volume will spread throughout the country the belief that his allegations are in the main correct.

The Nation's Trees

Forestry. By Arthur Bernard Recknagel and Samuel Newton Spring. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

At the last national meeting of the Society of American Foresters the senior author of this book declared that he had "complete confidence in the ability of the American business man to solve any problem whatsoever." For people who indorse this somewhat sweeping panegyric, "Forestry" will prove excellent reading: "The forest industry of America is becoming conscious of its obligations. . . . It is fitting that American business, in accord with its recognized genius, should take the lead in matters of public welfare. . . . The genius of the American business man is addressing itself to the great problem of timber growing and there is visible the dawning of a new era." It seems a shame to carp about mere facts in the face of such poetry, but unfortunately there are a few profane skeptics who will inquire whether there is any reasonable proof that the new era will better promote the public welfare than has the present era under the guidance of the same American business men. They will observe what has happened in the private exploitation of coal, oil, and water power. Especially they will cite the authors' own figures, which are quite questionably high, that on only 10 per cent of the private timberland is even a faint trace of forestry visible today. They may, for such reasons, find it difficult to share the authors' faith that the omnipotent genius of the American business men will solve the nation's forest problem.

Nevertheless, there are parts of the book which can be adjudged excellent even in the face of a critical analysis. For example, the chapter which tells of the development of forestry in the United States is the best brief account of this history which I have yet seen. The sections covering forestry research, the application of forestry, and the role of forestry as an essential of social welfare should prove decidedly instructive. There seems no reason why any person who reads this book should ever again fall into those prevalent misconceptions of the layman that forestry and planting are synonymous, and that forestry means locking up of timber resources. With the qualifications mentioned the book as a popular treatise is to be commended.

American Natives and Nature

After innumerable travel pictures in which the less familiar parts of the world are presented in the manner of a snapshot album, with the tourist or the big-game hunter conspicuously in the fore, one turns with pleasure to a picture like "The Silent Enemy" (Criterion) from which one does learn something about the life of a primitive tribe with the joys and sorrows—particularly sorrows—that are attendant on it. Of course, the genre derives from Flaherty's "Moana"—still unsurpassed for subtle observation and photographic beauty—and his also very interesting "Nanook." The next important contribution, a few years later, was made by Cooper and Schoedsack with their "Grass" and "Chang." It is from "Grass" that "The Silent Enemy," like the recently shown British picture "Stampede," derives more directly, all three pictures illustrating the same idea and differing from one another no more than is required by the differing peculiarities of the tribes they describe and the territories in which the episodes take place. In "Grass" we were given a vivid picture of a Persian tribe crossing a formidable mountain ridge in search of new pasture lands; "Stampede" described a search for new hunting grounds by a Sudanese tribe; and now "The Silent Enemy," with still greater vividness, tells us of the search for fresh hunting grounds by the Ojibway Indians in the Great Lakes district of Canada. After suffering the great hardships of a long trek through snow-covered wilds, the Indian tribe arrives in time to intercept the migrating herds of caribou. We are shown the overwhelming spectacle of the stampede of the animals—a photographic feat that seems to surpass everything of the kind the writer has seen on the screen, even if one assumes that much of the action was "staged." H. P. Carver, who directed the picture, and his assistants deserve every credit for the skill shown in the shooting of this scene as well as of many other marvelously observed incidents in the life of wild animals. Great praise is also due the natives for their "acting," which is extraordinarily expressive while remaining perfectly unforced and natural. On the debit side, however, one must note the conventional treatment of the plot, with heroism, villainy, "love interest" injected in approved fairy-tale fashion.

The German silent picture "Asphalt" (Fifty-fifth Street Cinema) is an example of smooth and intelligent competence in acting and direction. It probes no great depths in its story and betrays but occasional touches of originality in its treatment.

In the field of the talking picture, and of the screen revue in particular, "King of Jazz" (Roxy), directed by John Murray Anderson, marks another step of progress. Following "Paramount on Parade," which rose above the customary ineptitudes of Hollywood in the matter of sketches, "King of Jazz" rises above other revues in discarding the stage setting and making a fuller use of the methods of the silent picture, with a stress on the spectacular that is somewhat reminiscent of "Intolerance." We must now wait for the next step—a revue making cinematic use of speech and music as well as of visual images.

The principal thing to be said of "Song of the Flame" (Warner's) is that for sheer idiocy of story it doubtless carries off the palm. The travesty of the Russian Revolution, though heavily weighted with slander, is too mirth-provoking in its operatic absurdities to be taken seriously. The composers must be congratulated, however, on the idea of making Russian mujiks and a prince express their rejoicing in the "Oi, oi, oi" melodies of "Dybbuk."

Alexander Bakshy

Drama

Ibsen's Prentice Hand

"THE Vikings," now rather elaborately produced at the New Yorker Theater, is Ibsen's familiar romantic tragedy "The Warriors of Helgeland." It had to wait four years after it was written before it was seen on any stage, and it has never before been given by a professional company in New York, but it reveals itself now as a drama of considerable intrinsic merit and of very great psychological interest in connection with the development of Ibsen's genius. One needs to know that it was completed some twenty years before the first of the plays in its author's mature manner, but when one bears that fact in mind it becomes a fascinating document for the study of the efforts of a genius to find himself.

If the immature works of a great man generally miss the success achieved by the prentice hands of lesser talents, the fact is neither hard to understand nor entirely attributable to the stupidity of the public, for groping genius can neither find a form appropriate to itself nor rest content with an imitation of one which others have brought to perfection. It must begin with the style and the materials of its predecessors, but it can do nothing except mar them. The thoughts, the moods, and the motifs which are to become characteristically its own seem merely inappropriate in the company of others which belong to a different tradition, and one is aware chiefly of a kind of disharmony. Mixture of styles, that worst of all artistic sins, is almost inevitable in the work of the young genius, and it is only after he has detached himself from all that is not part of him that we can perceive why he seemed at first so much less promising than others who had no intentions of their own capable of spoiling the successful self-consistency of an imitation.

"The Vikings" is said to have displeased Ibsen's contemporaries because it went back to the sagas for its material instead of imitating the conventions of romantic tragedy, and that may very well be, but the thing which strikes a modern auditor is the fact that these Norsemen are also forerunners of the troubled heroes of the problem play, and that they seem at times almost ludicrously like Tesmans and Lövborgs masquerading in fancy dress. It was not until some thirty-three years later that Ibsen was to write "Hedda Gabler," but the heroine of this early play is merely Hedda in blond braids and a winged hat, for she is not only a woman who loves destruction, but one whose evil nature is explainable in the terms of Hedda's psychology—the psychology of a creature hating all potency because she herself is impotent. Ibsen could not yet see that no mere modification of tradition was sufficient to furnish a vehicle for the profoundly original things he had to say, and Ibsen's contemporaries could hardly be expected to perceive that this odd sort of romance was the forerunner of something entirely new.

"The Vikings" is produced with the aid of some interesting lighting effects supplied by the clavilux, and acted by a conscientious company not entirely at home in the poetic language of the piece. It has one very powerful act—the second —but it trails off to a conventional and rather meaningless conclusion. Doubtless it would never have been revived were it not for the fame of its author's later works, and interesting as it is in certain respects it can hardly hope to achieve any considerable popular success. Rightly or wrongly the public, when it goes to the theater, likes nothing less than a museum piece.

The Joker in the Naval Treaty

By DAVID W. WAINHOUSE

IF the main object of the London conference was to do away with competition and bring about limitation in naval armaments, the conference must be recorded as a marked failure. It is true that the three signatories to the treaty have agreed to limit their fleets to specified tonnages, but the joker, or what is euphemistically termed the "saving clause" in the treaty, carries with it the not unlikely possibility that competition, Anglo-French this time, will soon be with us again, and that limitation of navies will soon become Dead Sea apples. The crux of the London treaty lies in Article XXI, which is worth giving in extenso:

> If during the term of the present treaty the requirements of the national security of any high contracting party in respect to vessels of war limited by Part 3 of the present treaty are, in the opinion of that party, materially affected by new construction of any Power other than those who have joined Part 3 of this treaty, that high contracting party will notify the other parties to Part 3 as to the increase required to be made in its tonnages within one or more of the categories of such vessels of war, specifying particularly the proposed increase and the reasons therefor, and shall be entitled to make such increase. Thereupon the other parties to Part 3 of this treaty shall be entitled to make a proportionate increase in the category or categories specified; and the said other parties shall promptly advise with each other through diplomatic channels as to the situation thus presented.

Stripped of its technical language this article means that if England's two-Power standard in Europe is threatened by French and Italian naval building, England will give due notice to the United States and Japan "as to the increase required to be made in its own tonnage," and, like falling dominoes, the United States and Japan shall be entitled to make proportionate increases in order to maintain the ratios of their respective naval strengths.

Great Britain must have her two-Power-standard dogma in Europe; the United States must have her parity with Great Britain; and Japan is determined on 70 per cent cruiser strength. The article is so worded that if Great Britain adds to her naval armaments "the others (i.e., the United States and Japan) may then make proportionate increases," to use Senator Robinson's words. Thus American parity vis-a-vis Great Britain is to be of the escalator variety, on which Japan is given a place.

Set against these dogmas there is the Italian demand for parity with France, and the insistence of France that her navy must be at least 240,000 tons stronger than the Italian. A Fascist Italy could not afford to bring back from London in 1930 less than what the pre-Fascist Government brought back from Washington in 1922. In 1922 Italy was given equality in capital ships with France; at London Italy held out for paper equality with France in the lighter categories. France remained intransigent. After the American and British delegations had exhausted themselves for many weeks preaching to the French and Italians, it dawned on them that no progress could be made until Great Britain had settled with France and Italy the basic political problems which were threatening to ruin the conference. Fearing that complete failure would make them the laughing-stock of the world, the three greatest naval Powers signed a three-Power treaty, and this notwithstanding the declaration from Washington of the Acting Secretary of State that there would be a five-Power treaty or none at all.

A three-Power treaty with a categorical limitation on the British fleet would have been unbearable to the British Admiralty because it demands a fleet equal to the combined fleets of France and Italy. To allay British fears Mr. Stimson suggested that a provision similar to that of Article XXI of the Washington treaty be inserted:

> If during the term of the present treaty the requirements of national security of any contracting Power in respect of naval defense are, in the opinion of that Power, materially affected by any change of circumstances, the contracting Powers will, at the request of such Power, meet in conference with a view to the reconsideration of the provisions of the treaty and its amendment by mutual agreements [italics mine].

Great Britain refused to subscribe to an article which would merely give her a right to call a conference with no assurance that the conference would conclude in her favor. What Great Britain wanted was the expressed right to build without consultation beforehand should such a course appear advisable to her. And this is what she got by incorporating her own Article XXI in the London treaty. To have denied Great Britain the desired safeguard would have been tantamount to a request that she forget the French navy altogether.

If there ever was a time when the British could ill afford to forget the French navy, that time is now. Prior to the World War France's naval strategy demanded a concentration of her entire fleet in the Mediterranean. "The French fleet," said Sir Edward Grey on August 3, 1914, when he was putting before the House of Commons the arguments for and against the declaration of war on Germany, "is now in the Mediterranean, and the northern and western coasts of France are absolutely undefended." Twelve years after the destruction of the German fleet we find France planning for the defense of her northern and western coasts. The fact that France is clamoring for a security she never sought when the German navy was less than two days' steaming from her Channel ports is a matter of great anxiety to the British Admiralty. French strategy shows a singular, and to the British Admiralty a sinful, forgetfulness of history.

What chance is there that Great Britain will invoke Article XXI? The answer to this question obviously lies in the building programs of France and Italy and Great Britain's success or failure in solving the outstanding political differences which have prevented the two Latin Powers from coming into a five-Power treaty.

Italy's demand for parity is wholly une affaire de prestige, asserted at London for home consumption. If by parity we mean reasonable equality of power it is clear that France will not grant it, for that would drag France down once and for all to the naval rank of Italy. Parity has become a national thesis with the Italians, and surrender of it would be a humiliation which the Duce can ill afford at the present time. The Italian position is that she doesn't need and doesn't want and can ill afford any big naval expenditure. But she doesn't want to be bound by a treaty to accept and maintain in the future naval inferiority. The oft-repeated demand for parity makes it politically impossible for the Italians to agree to anything less. French unwillingness to concede parity is not unlikely to lash Italy into the building of a fleet which she never intended to build. Therefore the hope of solving the Franco-Italian problem of parity in a "prestige-Power" world is not bright.

So far as France is concerned her thesis for security, so clearly outlined in the memorandum of December 20, 1929, and stoutly maintained at London, remains a possible ground on which she and Great Britain can agree. A Mediterranean Locarno or a tightening of Article XVI of the Covenant has been suggested by France as a quid pro quo for reduction. For some ten weeks the discussions at London revolved about the French thesis of security. Mr. MacDonald's hands were tied with the pledges he had given Parliament that Great Britain would not enter into any commitments beyond those contained in Article XVI of the Covenant. The Foreign Office, on the other hand, was willing to go so far as to agree that the recommendations of the Council for the use of military and naval sanctions under Article XVI would be carried out by the British. In return for the extension of British commitments the Foreign Office expected a considerable reduction in the French fleet. Just how much of a reduction the French would be willing to make was not discussed because Mr. MacDonald's continued public utterances that he could not entangle Great Britain frustrated the political discussions which Mr. Henderson was carrying on with the French. The difference of opinion between the Foreign Office and Mr. MacDonald on the matter of sanctions must be borne in mind when the Anglo-French-Italian conversations get under way. If Mr. MacDonald isn't won over to the Foreign Office point of view, and it's not likely that he will be, the whole problem of naval disarmament, so far as France and Italy are concerned, will remain where the London conference left it. France will continue with her program set out in the Naval Statute of 1924; Italy will attempt to turn paper parity into steel parity.

At the present time France has a navy of 681,808 tons. The Naval Statute calls for a navy of some 804,000 tons by 1942. Building at the rate of 40,000 tons a year, France will have about 724,000 tons by 1936. "Out of these 240,000 tons 43,200 would represent complementary building and 196,800 tons of replacement," states the French memorandum of February 13, 1930. This will give France practically a new and an entirely post-war fleet. Vis-a-vis England, France will have an 85 per cent fleet, with an enormously superior submarine force.

The present Italian navy is about 370,000 tons, built and building. The New York Times correspondent reported on April 30 that the Italian government has decided to lay down in 1930 warships totaling 42,900 tons. This about equals the French construction program for the same year.

A week before this decision, the same correspondent reported the launching of five new units totaling more than 30,000 tons. These activities are bound to have repercussions in London and Paris, particularly in Paris.

The threat to the British two-Power standard is thus well begun. A cool-headed British Admiralty will not wait until 1936 before answering the challenge of the two Latin Powers. Should France and Italy continue this pace for two years, their total tonnages will outweigh the British. Then we shall see Article XXI come into play. Mr. MacDonald Mr. Henderson, and Mr. Alexander have all given notice that the figures arrived at in London are subject to revision upward if the two-Power standard is threatened by the "European Powers represented at the London conference," meaning, of course, France and Italy.

Ceteris paribus, the signatories to the three-Power treaty will jump on the escalator at the same time in an effort to maintain the relation of the fleets. Article XXI entitles them to the ride, and the "billion-dollar" American parity with Great Britain may yet prove to be too low a figure. Naval opinion has it that the United States must face an eventual increase over and above what the London treaty allows it of not less than 40,000 tons of cruisers and 60,000 tons of destroyers before the treaty expires in 1936, in order to match a similar British increase provoked by French and Italian building.

BLACK GENESIS

By SAMUEL G. STONEY and GERTRUDE M. SHELBY

William Lyon Phelps says: "I have read it with great enthusiasm... An exceedingly interesting and diverting book."

The curious psychology of the attackers, which permitted them to plunge forward and yet, when they were obstructed and in some cases attacked, to offer no defense, has created a vexing problem for the police.

EXACTLY! This naive quotation from the New York Times explains just why it is that the Nationalist ovement is steadily making headway with even the Mohamedans beginning to go in. Never in the history of the orld has there been such amazing self-control by great asses of people. Two hundred thousand persons in Bom-ay forced the police to yield and let them into the "fort ea" of the city they were forbidden to enter, merely by eir refusal to attack the police before whom for four ours they sat down singing their Nationalist songs. On May 21 the brilliant correspondent of the United Press, Webb Miller, reported:

> I personally saw more than 200 Nationalists in a temporary hospital where they were carried by volunteers. . . . Most of the injuries were head wounds, fractured arms and wrists. The Surat native police lost their tempers. I saw them kick volunteers already lying on the ground. My clothes were splashed with mud when the police flung volunteers into the ditches. The spectacle of their beating the unresisting volunteers was so painful I was frequently forced to turn away from the crowd.

On that day at Dharasara no less than 630 were injured by blows from the police sticks, yet not one native lost his self-control and not one policeman was injured. On May 25 at Wadala more than 30,000 Nationalists ran over the police and successfully raided the salt works there. No wonder the Associated Press reports that news "from all parts of India shows that the unrest is gradually growing," and the London Express hears that "the country faces the gravest situation since the campaign began."

MUSSOLINI AS FIRE-EATER plays no new role, but he has been playing it of late in a manner that occasions some concern. In speeches at Florence, Leghorn, Milan, and elsewhere, delivered before vast crowds who responded with frenzied applause, he has been descanting upon the great achievements of fascism, pointing to the splendid future which he sees awaiting Italy, and glorifying force and arms in a fashion to suggest that if he does not himself exactly intend to provoke a war, he would not be at all averse to see a war actually break out. France in particular is disturbed at the references, thinly veiled but contemptuous, which Mussolini has several times made to Italy's relations with its western neighbor, and wonders what the Duce meant when he exclaimed at Milan: "We came back from Versailles with a mutilated victory, but victory is still within our grasp." Does he think of ripping open the peace treaties in the hope of getting by force some undescribed satisfaction that Italy failed to get eleven years ago? Probably not. Mussolini is a demagogue, and demagogues must talk. Like the horse of Scripture, their strength is in their mouth. The trouble is that such incendiary harangues are dangerous; they rouse suspicion and fear abroad and nourish an ugly temper at home.

WHAT CAN ONE SAY about the case of Senator Clarence C. Dill? We have already called attention to his extraordinary conduct in connection with the tariff bill. This he capped by casting the vote which made it possible to retain the provision giving the President the power to continue to raise or lower tariffs. He had opposed this principle and voted against it steadily until the last moment. His change of position not only retained the President's tariff-making power, but actually saved the whole tariff bill, although he had voted against it when it passed the Senate. It is an extremely unfortunate coincidence for the Senator that the very next day after he switched Chairman Hawley of the Ways and Means Committee of the House raised the tariff on lumber to one dollar per thousand feet—Senator Dill had been voting steadily in favor of a higher tariff on lumber. When we commented several weeks ago on the Senators who swapped their votes and included Senator Dill in the list he and his friends were indignant. What is one to think now? Since we have Senator Dill's assurance that his motives are of the best we must conclude that there is something radically wrong with his intellectual processes.

TO THE LAST HEARING the admirals in Washington continued to make a holy show of themselves in their testimony as to the naval treaty. Senator Reed effectively put Rear-Admiral Jones out of action by producing a letter which showed that eleven months ago he was advocating precisely the opposite of the position which he is now taking, namely, that by the substitution of six-inch guns for eight-inch the American people have been abandoned and left naked to their enemy, Great Britain. Rear-Admiral Jones explained that the similar twistings of the General Board of the Navy were "camouflage" to deceive the British into yielding what we wished—a nice, honorable, and kindly attitude toward our recent ally on the fields of Flanders! Rear-Admiral Bristol cuts hardly any better figure. The truth is that admirals the world over are the real enemies of peace and of disarmament. What do we see today? A majority of our American admirals testifying that we were betrayed at London, that the treaty degrades us and does not give us parity. In Japan at the same time an admiral commits suicide in protest against the betrayal of Japan and its naval degradation by the British and Americans. In London the British admirals and the Tories rave because England was taken into camp and tricked by the Americans. We repeat—it is the admirals who are the enemies of peace.

OUR DEEPEST SYMPATHY goes out to the Quakers the world over. It is bad enough to have a Quaker President of the United States who goes on peace missions on a battleship and reviews the fleet at the same time that he is contributing money for a new Quaker meeting-house in Washington. But now comes along this same President's brother, who sat on the same Quaker meeting-house benches with him as a boy, to announce the most extraordinary doctrine ever voiced by an adherent of the faith of William Penn, of George Fox and Elias Hicks. Here are the sentiments which Professor Theodore Hoover has been giving to his students in engineering at Leland Stanford:

> The human race develops by war and succeeds in war in proportion to its use of metals. Races perish in peace. Culture is increased by the invention of new weapons. The pacifist errs in assuming that peace is desirable. Emerson says, "Everything we have must be paid for." We Americans are living in unpaid luxury and must pay in the future by blood and hard work.

Professor Hoover protested against the publication of this matter on the ground that it was a breach of the "inviolability of the classroom," and he made the following sapient remark: "I believe in all efforts directed toward the achievement of perpetual peace, but at the same time I have a fear that they will all prove ineffectual." He thereby does his best to make them ineffectual by teaching the doctrines of Bernhardi and all the bloody-handed militarists in the history of the world. Professor Hoover ought to apologize to the Kaiser and all his generals and admirals, while admitting that they were entirely right in their teachings.

THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION, according to an announcement of May 19, has granted the license at site Number 1 on the Flathead Indian reservation to the Rocky Mountain Power Company, a subsidiary of the Montana Power Company, one of the Electric Bond and Share group. The rental has been fixed on a flat annual basis under which the Indians will receive an average of $140,000 a year during the first twenty years. After that date the rent is subject to readjustment. In the opinion of Assistant Commissioner Scattergood, who has been largely in charge of negotiations, the contract represents the most advanced form of agreement, from the standpoint of the protection of the public interest, of any yet entered into by the commission. He believes that the separate accounting required of the Montana Power Company's subsidiary, together with the provision for a return based essentially on prudent investment, lays the basis for active rate control by the State commission, the federal commission having no control over rates. We have already expressed our conviction that in view of the present unsatisfactory condition in the Federal Power Commission it is highly undesirable for that body at this time to take final action in a matter of this importance. That question aside, while we realize the arguments that are urged in behalf of getting the dam started at once, we regret to see this commanding source of power passing into the hands of the great concern that dominates so largely the economic and political life of Montana; for we see little hope under these circumstances for effective State control of rates. Walter H. Wheeler, the rival bidder for the license, on May 20 stated that he would appeal to the Federal Power Commission against the decision, and if beaten there would appeal to the courts.

COMMISSIONER WHALEN, with a graceful bow, steps out of the spotlight in New York City, and plain Mr. Whalen—except for a gardenia and a top hat—resumes his position at Wanamaker's department store and his post as Chief Official Welcomer and Offerer of the Freedom of the City to distinguished visitors. We shall, of course, hear more of Mr. Whalen; no man with a gift for publicity like his can fail to make the news now and then. We shall remember that it was Mr. Whalen who improved New York's traffic problem and did not locate Mr. Rothstein's murderer; who tried to make jaywalking a crime and could not put uniforms on taxi drivers. We shall even recall, perhaps, that Mr. Whalen, with his red documents, was largely instrumental in bringing about the inquiry into Communist activities in the country, passed in the House of Representatives by a vote of 210 to 18 Commissioner Mulrooney, Mr. Whalen's successor as head of the New York police force, is a modest, unassuming man who made his way up from the ranks. He is said to be thoroughly honest, well-intentioned, and anxious to avoid public notice. The last quality will recommend him to the city's vaudeville mayor, and the former may see him through to the accomplishment of a good job. Meanwhile certain words of Representative Snell, chairman of the House Rules Committee, in the debate on the proposed Communist-inquiry resolution are worth recording. Mr Huddleston of Alabama asked: "Is this resolution broad enough to include fascism?"

> Mr. Snell. Include what?
> Mr. Huddleston. Fascism, fascism.
> Mr. Snell. I don't know what that is, but I guess it is.

TO GIFFORD PINCHOT go our congratulations upon his winning of the Republican nomination for Governor of Pennsylvania, even carrying the city of Pittsburgh although running as a dry. It is perfectly obvious, however, that if it had not been a three-cornered race the Vare candidate would have won. The drys will nevertheless make considerable capital out of the result, for Pinchot ran best n the rural districts where prohibition is strongest. As for the Senatorship, President Hoover is heartily to be felicitated upon his now having the chance to appoint a new Secretary of Labor in place of the dull and reactionary James J. Davis, who has defeated the great Grundy himself. From another point of view Mr. Hoover is not so fortunate; Joe Grundy is now free to indulge to the full his hatred of the President and to work day and night against his renomination. The campaign, be it noted, resulted in much loss of prestige for the greatest Secretary of he Treasury since Alexander Hamilton, for his own city went back on him and Vare successfully challenged his eadership. Senator Reed's days in the Senate now seem numbered. It must not, however, be believed that the defeat of Grundy means a protest against the Grundy tariff. Far from it; there are multitudes in Pennsylvania who feel hat it is not nearly high enough. In its essence this has been but another fight between bosses while the public is diverted from the main arena by the prohibition and tariff ideshows.

PALESTINE ADDS ITS BIT to the British government's troubles in India, where it is highly necessary o conciliate Mohammedan sympathies. An Arab delegaion from Palestine, including the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, conferred with the British Colonial Office on the ubjects, among others, of land, immigration, and a contitution; and on May 13 Lord Passfield was obliged to reply "that the sweeping constitutional changes demanded by them were wholly unacceptable, since they would have rendered it impossible for His Majesty's Government to carry out its obligations under the terms of the mandate." n consequence the Arabs are reported to be leaving London n a bitter frame of mind—a bad thing for India. Six days after Lord Passfield's statement the High Commisioner for Palestine, according to an Associated Press dispatch, announced that, effective May 15, all immigration o Palestine was suspended pending the report of Sir John Simpson, who has been sent out from London to report on and and immigration. This report led to a well-justified nd world-wide Jewish protest, backed by a peaceful half-day general strike of all Jews in Palestine. Two days after the original announcement Dr. Drummond Shiels, undersecretary of the Colonial Office, hastily announced in he House of Commons that there had been no general toppage of immigration and no final decision as to a chedule covering the period ending September 30. Under he mandate the Jews have the right of immigration and and settlement in accordance with the economic possibilities f the country, and they will have the hearty support of air-minded persons in insisting that their rights be respected o the letter by the mandatory Power, no matter what the xigencies of imperial politics. We believe that it is the urpose of the British government to respect those rights. The economic and cultural achievements of Zionism have been a cheering feature of the post-war decade. The further development of this admirable program will undoubtedly be one of the best ways of settling political differences between Arab and Jew.

Dollar Books

THE announcement, coming simultaneously from four reputable publishers, that they plan to publish books at half or less than half of the prices now current will probably be welcomed with hosannas by the book-buying public. Doubleday, Doran, Simon and Schuster, and Farrar and Rinehart promise new, full-length, and well-printed novels for $1 each. Coward-McCann will sell first novels for $1.50, thus relieving the alleged prejudice of booksellers against the work of an unknown author. Albert Boni will issue the Boni paper books at fifty cents each.

It is, of course, plain that the book publishers, like everyone else engaged in business, have suffered from the trade depression that followed last year's market collapse. They have suffered simultaneously from the widely successful sale, mainly in chain drug-stores, of new, popular, and readable books at a dollar. Some publishers, shaking their heads, have called it the worst spring in history. Best sellers have languished; moderate sellers have gathered dust on the shelves. The public, so the sad story goes, is not buying books. But the public, according to an official of the Doubleday, Doran firm, bought 60,000 copies of Star Dollar Books in one month at one drug-store in New York City. This would seem to indicate very plainly that if people will not, and perhaps cannot, buy books as luxuries at from $2 to $5, they can and will buy them in large quantities as necessaries for $1.

Undoubtedly the book clubs, offering new books at bargain prices, have whetted the appetite of book buyers for more of the same. Is there any reason why a current novel should not be issued in paper covers at a dollar—or less? Is there any reason why persons of moderate means should pay $2.50 for a novel that they do not want to keep on their book shelves, but merely read for an evening's entertainment? In Europe paper books, attractive in format, have been published right along for a small sum. In England there is at least one flourishing sixpenny library.

A very pretty price war is evidently to result from the new plan. Ten other publishers, among them Harpers, the Macmillan Company, G. P. Putnam's Sons, and E. P. Dutton and Company, have come out with a vigorous protest against the price cut as economically unsound. Books have not been costing too much, they say, and the procedure of issuing cheap reprints after a book's first popularity has waned is better business for publisher, bookseller, and author. The public, in this case, must be the final arbiter. If it buys dollar books in large quantities, unquestionably all publishers will be driven to the necessity of selling books at that price. As for the poor author, whose royalties are cut in half under the new plan, he cannot complain if his sales are doubled. For it is a sad fact that most authors are obliged to write, as Jane Austen said so neatly, "for fame and not for pecuniary emolument."

Government by Abstention

WE are still unable to recover from our astonishment at Secretary Stimson's revelation that President Hoover gave no "specific instructions . . . either written or verbal" to those he sent to London to represent the United States at the Naval Disarmament Conference. From another source, equally reliable, we learn that after the delegation sailed for England Mr. Hoover never communicated with Mr. Stimson and his associates by letter, telephone, or cablegram. He had selected what he considered a highly competent delegation and to them he intrusted the negotiations, so vital to President Hoover's own reputation and, what is vastly more important, so vital to the peace, prosperity, and happiness of the United States. Never did he seek to direct their negotiations, to voice his own views, to offer counsel or advice, approval or disapproval. Having appointed the commission he washed his hands of the whole matter, made it plain that he would accept whatever they brought back, and apparently even felt that if the delegates returned with empty hands, as appeared for weeks altogether likely, his policy of non-intervention would be entirely justified.

This is what we call government by avoidance, or better, abstention. What Secretary Stimson regards as a virtue we, as we have previously set forth, consider as an amazing and an alarming shirking of a most solemn official duty. If this constitutes living up to the responsibilities of the Presidency then we do not know what those responsibilities can be. If this constitutes leadership then we have been for decades utterly mistaken in our definition of what constitutes leadership. This may be government after the manner of mining engineers, but by no stretch of imagination can it be called statesmanship. It is well, indeed, to give confidence and freedom of action to one's representatives, whether in business or in diplomacy. But to send delegates forth without specific program or policy or proposal is as bad business as it is bad diplomacy. We cannot believe that any captain of industry would thus send his representatives to a negotiation for a merger or combination. We cannot see how the President of the United States is morally justified in turning over to others that duty to devote himself to the welfare of this Union to which he is pledged by the most solemn of oaths. Is it surprising that his delegates came back with nothing but a miserable compromise which may yet cost this country a billion dollars in new warship construction?

This attitude of President Hoover is the more extraordinary and the less understandable because of the record of this country at the Washington conference of 1921. Mr. Hoover knows that at its very opening Mr. Hughes electrified the gathering and insured a highly substantial achievement by offering in his opening address a definite specific proposal, to the naming of the very ships involved. There was nothing left to chance here; there was no trusting to luck that at the eleventh hour something worth while might emerge—if anything came out at all. With this example before him—Mr. Hoover was in the audience when Secretary Hughes made his memorable address—how could he fail to profit by it and pattern after it? Not to do so was to shirk. Not to do so was to forget the statement signed by President Hoover and Prime Minister MacDonald on October 9 last in which they stated that the agreement then reached represented "a substantial contribution to the efforts universally made by all nations to gain securities of peace," and that it gave the unqualified promise that there would be unceasing effort to remove "as many differences as possible before the official and formal negotiations opened." How is this to be reconciled with the dispatching of delegates without a single suggestion of how to carry through the high hopes held out to the American and British people of an epoch-making reduction in the fleets?

Against this interpretation of the American Presidency and what occupancy of the White House connotes, we emphatically protest. That way lies not leadership but extremely dangerous weakness. If in so vital a matter the President can give over his responsibilities to some delegation of minor officials, what would not Mr. Hoover do in a still graver situation involving even more directly the issues of peace and war? But this policy of government by abstention seems to be inherent in Mr. Hoover's attitude toward his office. His passion for appointing commissions and groups to deal with any given problem was manifest it is true, when he was Secretary of Commerce. It was not dreamed that he would act similarly when invested with the highest office in the land. Yet this is precisely what he has done. Whenever an emergency has arisen he has appointed a commission and let it go at that. Is there a crash in Wall Street? Then call together the business men, form them into various groups, and leave to them the formulating of measures to be taken and safeguards to be devised to protect the country from a recurrence of these dire happenings. Only in the case of the heavy unemployment has the President failed to utilize his favorite device There government by abstention from responsibility has been complete. Not a finger has the President lifted to deal with this grave problem. No wonder that the Omaha World Herald declares that "confronted, unfortunately, by a succession of crises, he has seemed to meet them sitting down He has provided no inspiration, sounded no bugle note Apathy has spread to his natural followers and with it something of discouragement and apprehension." Or that the Chicago Daily News declares it would be especially pleasing to the American people and a cause for rejoicing "should they discover that they had a fighting Quaker in the White House. That discovery, if made, would be of material assistance to the President in rallying public opinion. . . ." Or that the Sioux City Journal hopes that "President Hoover will now emerge from his shell and commence fighting." Or that that staunch Hooverite, the Kansas City Star, hopes that the President will "swing around the circle" and explain "to the folks back home" what he has in mind and what he is trying to do. These are the plaintive appeals of warm friends. The truth is that government by abstention and avoidance leads only to defeat and may lead to disaster.

Who Wants the Tariff?

WHO wants the new tariff? Not the consumer, who is going to pay higher prices. Not the farmer, who has been buncoed again. Not the wage-earner, who will find in it no remedy for unemployment. Not the statesman, who finds it imperiling our relations with other countries. Who, then, does want it?

The business man, we are told, for he stands selfishly to gain by it. But most of our business men will not gain by it, and plenty of them are saying so in no uncertain terms. Henry Ford calls on his friend Herbert Hoover to veto it in the interest of manufacturers as well as other classes. James D. Mooney, vice-president of the General Motors Corporation, demands its defeat because it imperils our foreign trade. General Motors sells 15 per cent of its entire volume abroad, and Mr. Mooney declares that it aces a drop of 60 per cent in foreign sales this year as compared with last. The result of the New York World's poll s only another indication that Mr. Mooney speaks for all he export manufacturers in attacking the bill.

Their present concern is only too well founded. With exports during the first three months of 1930 down by $286,000,000, or more than 20 per cent, from 1929, we already face a new Canadian tariff, put into effect on May 2, hat affects unfavorably $300,000,000 worth of our exports. The retaliatory French automobile tariff is a sorrowful present fact. No fewer than thirty-three countries have forvarded protests against our new duties, and two representaives of foreign countries have recently taken the unusual ourse of calling attention in public addresses to the danger o trade relations involved in the present bill. Spain sells us $30,000,000 worth of goods a year and buys twice that value rom us. Ambassador de Padilla puts the case in a nutshell: A small number of people here in the United States might e against the importation of cork, olive oil, and these other roducts, but a much larger number of people are looking orward to an increasing exportation of motor cars, films, otton, machinery, agricultural implements, and novelties." witzerland sells one-sixth of all her watches in our market. The new duties mean a practical embargo on watches and locks, to say nothing of the effect on cheese, embroideries, nd other Swiss products. How will Switzerland buy if he cannot sell? Small wonder that the Manchester Guar-ian reports from Geneva "a violent reaction against Ameri-an goods," or that Minister Peter takes an unusual means f calling attention to the possible dangers. Isaac F. Mar-osson scarcely exaggerates in calling our present tariff pro-ram "a pact of economic suicide." The business men in ur export industries do not want the new tariff.

The demand for it, as far as there is any, comes from articular industries, sometimes particular establishments, which for one reason or another want to be freed from oreign competition. There is no evidence of any general nterest to be served by the bill; there is overwhelming evi-ence of general injury. It is only the political power of a ombination of special interests, skilfully managed by log-olling, that has carried the bill through to its passage. Even Pennsylvania has already vetoed its principal author, Mr. Grundy. Let Mr. Hoover veto the Grundy tariff.

How Long, Labor?

THE resignation of Sir Oswald Mosley from the MacDonald Government is a stiff blow at Mr. MacDonald's prestige—the hardest, on the whole, that the Labor Party has had to take. To be sure, the office of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster which Sir Oswald gave up is of minor political importance, and the refusal of the Labor members of the House of Commons by an overwhelming majority to approve a motion censuring the unemployment policy of the Government leaves Mr. MacDonald still in command. It is also true that the country, with the last general election only a year behind it, is not anxious to have another, and that the Conservatives, the only party that might successfully contest the hold of Labor, are not at all eager to take over the responsibilities of government just at this time. The fact remains, however, that there has been a breach in the Cabinet, and that one of Mr. MacDonald's most intimate associates has retired because of a sharp difference with his chief over the question which dominates all other domestic issues.

The stone of stumbling is unemployment. The particular proposals whose rejection by the Cabinet led to Sir Oswald's resignation do not seem, on the surface, to be very much more radical than some of the things to which the Labor Government is already committed. They contemplate, for the relief of unemployment, a large loan in aid of industrial reconstruction, pensions for workers at the age of sixty, a higher age limit for compulsory school attendance, national plans for road-building, and government control of the importation and price of wheat. With the exception of the latter item, the proposals appear to be in principle pretty much in accord with the program of public works, reorganization or "rationalization" of industry, and unemployment benefits which the Commons have been debating for several months, and parts of which have already been put into operation. The obvious inference to be drawn from the rejection of the proposals is that the Government, which has promised much, is a good deal less sure than it once was of the soundness of its procedure, that what it has done has been disappointing, and that it is reluctant to go much farther until it can see more light.

The Government may well feel baffled, for the difficulties are appalling. The number of unemployed in Great Britain has reached the alarming total of about 1,700,000, with the likelihood that it will reach 2,000,000 by the end of the year. Some 7,500,000 persons, or about one-sixth of the population, it is reported, are receiving direct government aid, in the form of pensions of various kinds, at an annual cost of about $815,000,000. What makes matters worse is that, notwithstanding this colossal expenditure, there is no relief in sight. Financially, the Government is pouring money into what seems like a bottomless pit.

Unemployment, however, is not the only embarrassment. The Liberals, without whose support Mr. MacDonald would have only a narrow plurality in the House of Commons, have virtually given notice that they must not be counted upon further unless they can be assured of reform in the electoral system, at the same time that the Independent Labor following, whose votes are necessary to give the Government a majority over the Conservatives, are arrayed aggressively in opposition. The Snowden budget, the main debate on which is just beginning, has already drawn a violent attack from the Conservatives, and the Senate committee hearings at Washington have furnished some formidable ammunition for the opponents of the London naval treaty. There are ominous rumblings and explosions in various parts of the Empire that are bound to have their repercussions in the Commons: a general election in Canada with tariff retaliation against the United States as a leading issue; resentment in Egypt at the flat refusal of the MacDonald Government to release British hold on the Sudan; a violent controversy in Malta involving British relations with the Vatican; a startling vote in the South African Assembly declaring that approval of the recommendations of the Imperial Conference "must not be taken as derogating from the right of any member of the British Commonwealth to withdraw therefrom"; and the distressing problem of India.

Mr. MacDonald has promised, now that the naval conference is out of the way, to give more personal attention to unemployment. If he can show himself able to cope with that problem his success will count heavily in his favor with every other. If he fails there the days of his continuance in office are numbered.

Obscenity in Court

JOHN S. SUMNER and his redoubtable society no longer have things all their way—as was demonstrated a short time ago when the case which they had brought against Nathan Asch's novel "Pay Day" was dismissed in a magistrate's court. We were not especially concerned over the fate of that particular novel, but we are very much interested in the general principle involved, and we consider the brief which Morris L. Ernst submitted for the defendants to be the most significant summing up which we have ever seen of the law as it now stands. Mr. Ernst makes it clear that several of the recent victories won for freedom of expression have established precedents of great importance, and that the courts are gradually building up a liberal interpretation of the law which promises in time to assure a reasonable attitude on the part of judges toward contemporary literature.

Mr. Ernst is, of course, concerned only with New York State, but he begins by saying:

> In recent years there has not been a single instance where a book generally accepted by the public, the press, literary critics, the reading public, and the community at large, and openly dealt with by the publishers and the book trade, was ultimately condemned by the courts. . . .
> This statement is fully borne out by such books as Gautier's "Mademoiselle de Maupin," the anonymous "Madeleine," the "Satyricon" of Petronius, Cabell's "Jurgen," "A Young Girl's Diary," Schnitzler's "Casanova's Homecoming," Bodenheim's "Replenishing Jessica," Radclyffe Hall's "The Well of Loneliness," and the Dennett pamphlet. All of these publications were claimed to be obscene by Mr. Sumner. None of them was finally condemned by the courts.

Moreover, the opinions which accompanied several of the decisions rendered in favor of these books defined the issue in a way which cannot but be very gratifying to those who hope to see the law aligned with enlightened opinion rather than with fanatics of Mr. Sumner's kind. In the first place, several opinions have established the fact that any work prosecuted in the courts must be considered as a whole. Thus, while Massachusetts permitted the citation of single words or sentences, one of the higher New York courts, in reversing the opinion of a lower tribunal, remarked:

> No work may be judged from a selection of such paragraphs alone. Printed by themselves they might, as a matter of law, come within the prohibition of the statute. So might a similar selection from Aristophanes, or Chaucer, or Boccaccio, or even from the Bible. The book, however, must be considered broadly as a whole.

Nor is this opinion, important as it is, the only one of liberal character which has been established. The decision in favor of the defendants in the case of "Mademoiselle de Maupin" effectively disposes of the argument that a subject matter, even that of sexual perversity, can be considered obscene per se, and still more significant is the tendency exhibited in several opinions to recognize the fact that the standard of decency is variable and determined rather by prevalent custom than by dogma.

Mr. Ernst cites opinions which indicate an acceptance of this attitude. Thus in the case of the People v. Seltzer the court said: "Moral standards of thought are not of static . . . nature." In that of the United States v. Kennerly Judge Learned Hand remarked:

> If there be no abstract definition, such as I have suggested, should not the word "obscene" be allowed to indicate the present critical point in the compromise between candor and shame at which the community may have arrived here and now? . . . Such words as these do not embalm the precise morals of an age or place; while they presuppose that some things will always be shocking to the public taste, the vague subject matter is left to the gradual development of general notions about what is decent.

And in the same opinion Judge Hand, in commenting upon a previous decision given by another court in a different case, remarked further:

> I hope it is not improper for me to say that the rule laid down (i. e., in Regina v. Hicklin), however consonant it may be with mid-Victorian morals, does not seem to me to answer to the understanding and morality of the present time, as conveyed by the words "obscene, lewd, or lascivious." I question whether or not in the end men . . . will not believe that truth and beauty are too precious to society at large to be mutilated in the interests of those most likely to pervert them to base uses. Indeed, it seems hardly likely that we are even today so lukewarm in our interest in letters or serious discussion as to be content to reduce our treatment of sex to the standard of a child's library in the supposed interests of a salacious few.

Laws against obscene literature will probably always remain on the statute books. Those interested in the free development of adult literature will consider themselves fortunate if such laws are interpreted to mean merely that the law may take action against those books which outrage the sensibilities of the enlightened opinion of the time.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

THIS would be a rather late hour in which to express surprise at the intense bitterness which bigots manifest toward heretics. But I am somewhat surprised to find in many cases the same sort of all-embracing and dogmatic hate upon the part of the heretics. It is much more logical for a bigot to be bigoted than for a so-called freethinker. But even the atheists seem to have creeds, by-laws, and a leaning toward at least an intellectual inquisition. It is not unknown for them, too, to cry out, "Crucify him."

And to be much more specific, I believe that there is a certain unscientific thoughtlessness in such rationalists as hop up and down and utter fierce cries whenever the supernatural is mentioned. In Russia, for instance, the leaders of the Communist faith, which is the state religion, are intent upon stamping out all belief, or even interest, in the supernatural. And if press reports are to be believed (and very often they are not) the Russian leaders of education would take away all fairy stories from the rising generation.

The association of religious myths with secular legends seems to me sound enough. Both arise from the same instinct n man. Both belong inevitably in the life of man. To extirpate them is to destroy some of the deepest roots of the mind, the very roots which go down far below the surface and make contact with the living water. For what is a myth or a miracle? I say that a miracle is something which has not happened yet, but which will almost assuredly come to pass within the existence of human kind. What man can conceive, that man can achieve.

Russia, which prides itself upon the manner in which it s bringing the latest and soundest scientific thought to all he masses, has studied rather ineptly the work of Dr. Freud. To be sure, Dr. Freud himself has written anti-religious reatises, but the great physician suffers under one vital handicap. It has never been his privilege to be psychoanalyzed by Dr. Freud. Possibly he too has missed the ssential importance of myth content in human thought. Man annot live by bread alone nor can he survive up to the limit f his best potentialities upon the precise information of aboratory science.

That is not the whole of science. The requirements f the scientific method must admit a great deal more. The cientific process means no more than the close and careful xamination of data before the drawing of deductions. He would be a timid research man indeed who would abandon all speculation on some phase of life simply because he did not possess apparatus intricate enough and sufficiently ensitive to make his experiments thoroughgoing. "This I ave reason to believe" is just as much a scientific statement s "This I can demonstrate."

I think there is abundant proof that in man there does eside the gift of prophecy. Always the dream comes first and after that the actuality. And so, although I would not hink of maintaining that the whale swallowed Jonah, I eel quite certain that some day he will. I am not in the east impressed by those higher critics of the Bible who assemble excellent evidence to prove that no such person as esus Christ ever lived. To me this seems irrelevant in the scheme of universal salvation. My faith is more deeply rooted than that of the fundamentalists. I feel that the mankind which can fashion the concept of an individual without flaw or blemish can, in its own good time, past or future, produce that very person.

Never, to the best of my knowledge and belief, has the entire body of living human beings ever ardently desired a happening without that thing coming eventually to pass. "Hold on," you say, "how about heaven? How about that golden city with the pearly gates where joy is everlasting?" That I will admit is one of man's favorite concepts. It is an age-old myth. I have every confidence that it will come to pass. My rule will not break down on this. For, after all, what is the dream and the vision of heaven but the symbolic expression of the longing for Utopia? The slums will not be always with us, nor the pain of poverty and sickness. Even the wildest words of Revelation constitute no more than a blueprint of the kingdom, the state, to which man will eventually crawl after deep cogitation and much tribulation.

Belief in the supernatural, myths, legends—these are the bootstraps by which man can and will pull himself up. To a surprising extent he has done so already. A realistic Arab in the days of Harun-al-Rashid might have said, "I will not have the mind of my little son distracted by fairy-tale rubbish about magic carpets upon which some prince might fly." That rational Arab would have overreached himself in barring this particular tale, for the first minstrel to tell it had already set his feet upon that road which finally ended in a bicycle shop in a Middle Western town. The myth-maker was the spiritual ancestor of the Wrights. We know now that the carpet can be made to fly if only it is attached to a gasoline motor.

Legends and myths are not flimsy things to be blown away by the first puff of rationality, because behind each one there lies an idea. Nobody has ever found a stronger weapon. If I had my way I would remove the inscription which stands at Concord Bridge. If my memory serves me it says, "Here once the embattled farmers stood and fired the shot heard round the world." That isn't quite fair to the farmers. It wasn't the shot which was heard round the world. It was the notion. We are told that in the next conflict poison gases can be dropped capable of destroying great cities, but it is always possible to get above the range of a gas or to seek shelter below its scope in underground vaults. You cannot fly above an idea or burrow down beneath it. An idea will pierce through the walls of the thickest vault. And through the thickest skull.

And so I say that it is unscientific to toss aside the aspirations of mankind which find their most eloquent expression in the myths and legends of any people. Possibly William Tell never did shoot an apple from his son's head, but if enough people have heard the tale and been moved by it the thing takes on all the potency of a United Press news dispatch hot off the wires. In fact, with no offense to the United Press, rather more. Belief, like wine, is best when it has been mellowed into vintage standing by the processes of time.

Zionism Finds Itself*

By WILLIAM ZUKERMAN

London, May 12

BY some mysterious operation of the public mind British sympathy with the Jewish experiment in Palestine has increased since officialdom pronounced adverse judgment upon it. There is now, after the appearance of the report of the Palestine Commission, a decidedly more favorable tone in the press, together with a profounder understanding of the Jewish cause, than there was immediately after the tragic events of last August. At that time the entire British press was either openly antagonistic or at best very lukewarm to the Jewish side of the question in Palestine. Britain was admittedly put out by what had happened, and was inclined on the whole to blame the Jews for the difficult position in which it found itself. Not only the Daily Mail, but also the Manchester Guardian and the better-class weeklies were unsympathetic. There was a note of sincerity expressive of the mood of the entire nation in the Rothermere propaganda cry "Get out of Palestine."

There is a definite change now. The report of the Palestine Commission was received with an expression of pro-Jewish sympathy greater than anything ever heard before in this country. The reception of the report was, in fact, the exact antithesis to the report itself. In most of the more serious weekly journals it caused an outburst of enthusiasm for Zionism which was nothing short of amazing in view of the previous coldness. Not only the Liberal press, but also the impartial Conservative journals are showing an increased appreciation of the Jewish achievements in Palestine and a better understanding of the Jewish point of view.

A similar tone of friendliness is heard often now also in the House of Commons at the question period, which of late has come to be the favorite time for tilting between the pro-Jewish and the pro-Arab forces in Parliament. The latter have now organized a parliamentary committee for "justice in Palestine," and with the arrival in London of the delegation of the Palestine Arab Executive, including the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, they have considerably increased their activity both in Parliament and outside. For the Arab delegation has committed the unpardonable error of affiliating itself altogether with the most reactionary and imperialistic group in British politics. Its meetings are sponsored by the "National League," broadcast by the Morning Post and the Daily Mail, presided over by Lord Brentford (Joynson-Hicks of Arcos-raid fame), and attended by those lords and ladies who see treason in Mr. MacDonald's policy in Egypt and India, socialism in Mr. Snowden's budget, and Russian communism in the work of the Jewish pioneers in Palestine. It has thus destroyed whatever belief there may have existed in liberal quarters in England that the outbreak in Palestine had something to do with real grievances on the part of the Arab people, and that the present Arab delegation represents someone besides the effendis of the country. In consequence, the forces in the House of Commons are now so arrayed that on the Jewish side are lined up the liberal and progressive elements in British politics and on the Arab side the conservative.

A factor which has largely contributed to molding this present mood toward Palestine is that through some unknown process operating upon social consciousness the country has somehow awakened now to the realization of the practical Jewish achievements in Palestine. What ten years of Jewish effort could not do, the few months which have elapsed since the August outbreak have achieved. Britain—and perhaps the rest of the world—seems suddenly to have realized that, apart from the interminable discussions about the Jewish national home and the incessant nagging about the Balfour Declaration, Zionists have in the last decade accomplished also a remarkable piece of constructive work in Palestine. A hundred thousand men have been transplanted from the arid Ghettos into fruitful soil; a people economically sterile for centuries has become productive on the land as well as in industry; colonies have been built; new industries developed; cities established; an ancient language revived; and civilization in a derelict country has been furthered in ten years more than in generations before. And all this has been achieved without government aid or any assistance from outside; merely by the will, persistence, and enthusiasm of a voluntary social movement. The world, it seems, did not expect this, or at least did not know of it. The events of last August and the Arab propaganda which followed them have succeeded in drawing the attention of the world to the fact that however much of a failure Zionism may be politically, it has justified itself constructively, economically, and culturally. Politically Zionism has failed, but practically it has been successful. From the economic point of view, the Jewish experiment in Palestine is without doubt one of the more hopeful constructive efforts of the post-war period. This fact could not but awaken interest in England as soon as it became known through the publicity which the August tragedy provided. Anglo-Saxon respect for efficiency and success and for colonial work well done has been called into play, and this is doubtless one of the reasons for the greater degree of sympathy which British public opinion is manifesting now for Zionism.

But there is yet one other reason, far more potent and of much greater significance, for it lies within Zionism itself. Close observers of the movement and of its leadership in London know that Zionism today is different from what it was last summer at the sixteenth Zionist Congress at Zurich. Internally, the movement has undergone what amounts to a revolution. There have been a break in its ideology and a decided change in its activity. The political aspects of Zionism have been obscured, and the constructive and practical sides strengthened. The intensely chauvinistic men from Poland with their wild talk of a Jewish majority and a Jewish state have been thoroughly discredited. The act that even the most friendly non-Jewish liberal opinion hroughout the world could not altogether absolve certain spects of Zionism from partial responsibility for the 'alestine outbreak has had a sobering effect on the majority f Zionists. For the first time in their history, perhaps, ews found themselves at variance to some extent with the est liberal opinion of the world. At first it caused in ionist quarters only pained surprise and deep resentment. hat Jews should be even suspected of injustice to another ace! But after the pain and the resentment came a searchng of heart which has now resulted in a complete discreditng of those views and tactics which led up to the unortunate Jewish demonstration on the eve of the August ragedy.

* This article was mailed before the British Secretary for the Colonies had returned his unfavorable reply to the Arab delegation, and before the British High Commissioner for Palestine made the announcement temporarily imposing further restrictions on Jewish immigration. The changes noted in the article gain added importance in the light of these developments.—EDITOR THE NATION.

This came out very clearly at the last session of the dministrative committee of the new Jewish Agency and ne Zionist General Council held in London recently. hese two bodies are the highest executive organs of the ionist movement, and their sessions are almost tantamount o a Zionist Congress (they are indeed called the "Little ongress"). They control all Zionist activity in Palestine nd outside it, and they are really indicative of the mood f the movement. At this "Little Congress" politics were lmost completely eschewed, although the present political tuation is undoubtedly the most critical which Zionism has ad to face in the course of its existence. The interminable olitical debates which form the basis of Zionist congresses vere conspicuously absent from the agenda. Instead, the eliberations were all concerned with practical problems of nd purchase, land settlement, industrialization, and the elations with the Arabs. The theory of a Jewish najority in Palestine was thrown overboard by a resolution enouncing any "domination of Jews by Arabs as well as f Arabs by Jews." Although officially Zionism stands out gainst a parliament in Palestine, and there are no words trong enough for Zionists to condemn Dr. Magnes's peace fforts with the Arabs, nevertheless the "Little Congress" pent a good deal of its time in drafting definite plans for nunicipal and parliamentary representation in Palestine dmittedly leading to the establishment of parliamentary overnment in Palestine and in preparing schemes for bringng about closer relations between Jews and Arabs. The notions introduced by the extremist group calling for the onvocation of a new congress and embodying their political emands to the mandatory Power for the delivery of the ıll pound of political flesh promised by the Balfour Declaation were defeated by overwhelming majorities. More nportant still, the entire spirit of the gatherings was noroughly hostile to the bombastic political talk which has een to the Arabs the most obnoxious part of Zionism.

And the most significant feature of this new mood in ionism is that it was not altogether imposed upon the novement from outside, by reason of the recent events. hese events helped to establish it, but they did not origiate it. The struggle between the so-called "constructive" ionism and "political" Zionism has been going on inside the ionist ranks for over a generation. Whenever the political utlook of Zionism darkened the "constructionists" gained ne ascendancy, and vice versa. Before the war Zionism vas definitely settling down into a practical colonization novement, and the "politicians" were reduced to insignifiance. The Balfour Declaration brought them out of their obscurity and bestowed upon them greater power than they had ever before held in Jewish social life.

The more sober Zionists did not even then, in the heyday of political Zionism, give up their plan of the practical upbuilding of the country, for they realized then, too, that a mere government paper cannot transform an Arab country into a Jewish state. This has been the view especially of Jewish labor in Palestine, which has always remained completely indifferent to the political side of the Balfour Declaration. The Jewish middle class, on the other hand, especially those hailing from Poland, based all their hopes on the political concessions of the British government. Fortunately for Zionism, it is labor that has built and is building the Jewish Palestine and that has accomplished everything that the Jews now have to show in the country. The only attempt of the Polish-Jewish middle class to participate in the upbuilding ended in disastrous failure in 1926. So the point of view of the real builders of Palestine has largely prevailed in Zionism. By another stroke of good fortune, the leader of the movement, Dr. Chaim Weizmann, very early adopted the same constructive point of view as Palestine labor, and has stubbornly stuck to his guns in spite of the most bitter and vehement opposition coming from Eastern Europe.

It was this point of view also that led to the creation of the new Jewish Agency last summer, which brought Zionism under the domination of the more practical and less politically minded American Jewry. The new body, which was the result of the combined efforts of Dr. Weizmann and the late Mr. Louis Marshall, represented the greatest victory of constructive, apolitical Zionism, as opposed to the Zionism based on the Balfour Declaration. It was an effort to save Zionism from the dangerous morass of Eastern European extremist nationalism and political futility; it was also an attempt to forestall the tragedy which anyone following the trend of events in Palestine could have seen coming. Unfortunately, it did not come in time to avert the August outbreak. The Palestine riots broke out a few days after the formation of the new agency, but the bloodshed shaped the new body and its policy just as it doomed the old.

Thus the recent tragedy in Palestine has not been in vain, at least for the Jews. It has helped them to find their balance in Palestine and to rediscover their traditional liberalism, which some of them had lost, probably for the first time in centuries. It has become clear even to the Jewish middle class of Poland that the Balfour Declaration is not an eleventh commandment, and that Jews cannot exchange their old moral law for a political one. Jews have again found their true selves in Palestine.

If Zionism were a biangular problem based on an understanding between only the Jews and the British, its knottiest question would have been solved now and its future clear. For both the Jews and the British have now a better understanding of their position and their duties in Palestine and of each other than they ever had before. But Zionism is a triangular problem. The Arabs also are involved, and not before they too have found their balance and have been purged of their extreme nationalism is the future of Zionism secure. The significance of the present moment is that an important step has now been taken in that direction.

The Press Today

V. Standardizing the Daily*

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

VARIOUS causes have contributed to that standardization of the American daily newspaper which is one of the most discouraging features of the press today. In the first place, your newspaperman is, as I have elsewhere pointed out, what the children call a "copy-cat." He watches his rivals and more distant contemporaries like a hawk. If any one of them hits upon a single new feature, be it comic strip, or picture page, or cross-word puzzle, or advice to the unhappily wed, all the rest of them follow suit. Original ideas are scarce and they are not copyrighted. Hence the rush to imitate. Especially is this true in the case of a successful daily. Immediately its success is assured everybody else similarly situated hastens to imitate type or make-up. Observe the New York dailies and see how they follow the Times in their first-page "stories."

Take the case of the Herald Tribune. It has made great gains since it took over the Herald, affording a rare case of one newspaper really holding the bulk of the circulation which it acquired. It has now become an excellent newspaper, for which the credit goes primarily, it is believed, to the present managing editor, Arthur S. Draper, and the willingness of Mr. and Mrs. Reid to abandon the old narrow partisanship of the news pages. But when you come to analyze the Herald Tribune there is not a single original feature of importance. Its "Books" is a copy of—and an improvement upon—the Times's book supplement; the magazine sections and rotogravure supplements of the two papers are alike, and so are those devoted to athletics. The powers that be on the Herald Tribune decided to go after the Times on its own lines and they have profited thereby because that meant getting out a daily with lots of news in it—even to the printing of long speeches and cabled documents of importance—but it did not involve the slightest originality save for the distinctive types and headlines used.

The fact is that few of the present generation of journalists set any store by beauty of type and appearance. That passed with the coming of mass production. Hearst hastened its demise with the screaming whole-page heads six inches deep of his flamboyant period of 1895-1900. That he would become quieter and more conservative was inevitable. But competitors and observers all over the country imitated him in order to increase sales. Today the headlines are everywhere approximately the same save for those fine old Southern dailies which have escaped the economic pressure and the competition which have gone so far to standardize the Northern and Western press. There are still exceptions in the North, like the Baltimore Suns, the Cincinnati Enquirer, and the Boston Transcript, but in the main the owners of the press have themselves decreed the drift toward standardization. Professor Henry E. Birdsong, who teaches journalism in Temple University in Philadelphia, tells me that when his beginning students stumble upon the Enquirer or Transcript they are excited by what they consider these new departures. For many years the Philadelphia Record had its special size and typography. Two years ago it was taken over by a new owner and now it is practically impossible at a distance to tell whether one is looking at a copy of the Ledger or the Record. The latter's management sees no sales value in originality of type and make-up.

I know of only one case in recent years in which a daily has deliberately chosen an original first-page make-up and attractive new typography—the New York Morning Telegraph, which, as a sports daily, is out of the ordinary competition. The most outstanding case of a newspaper which has kept its old and original format is the Cincinnati Enquirer, or En-quirer, as they call it out there. Its appearance has not been changed in forty or fifty years; it is the only paper left, as far as I know, which carries its one-column heads, sometimes ten lines deep. In its attention to local, suburban, and nearby communities it is almost unique, and it appears to have an amazing vitality and vigor.

It is hardly necessary to dwell upon the standardization of our dailies resulting from the development of our great news services. That speaks for itself. It is the most normal and defensible of all the standardizing tendencies; indeed, it is as justifiable as it was inevitable. The 1,200 members of the Associated Press naturally carry exactly the same news, but as the lesser dailies become more prosperous the drift toward differentiation by means of special cablegrams and telegrams and exclusive correspondents at once sets in. As soon, however, as these special features become costly there is the inevitable temptation to syndicate them in turn.

Today, when one travels through the country on a Sunday on a fast train and buys successively the Buffalo, Cleveland, Chicago, Indianapolis, Toledo, and St. Louis Sunday papers it is hardly possible to tell which city is represented in a given mass of printed pages without carefully scanning the page headings. One finds the same "comics," the same Sunday magazines, the same special "features" in almost all of them and, of course, in most of them precisely the same Associated Press news. I have looked through the Sunday editions of nine big Eastern and Mid-Western papers and I found "Little Orphan Annie" in seven of them, and she doubtless graces hundreds of others. "The Gumps," I am sorry to say, are not so popular, as they appear only five times. I was shocked to find "Mutt and Jeff" in only three of them, and "the Katzenjammer Kids," once the leading American comic, in only two. A cursory examination of the Philadelphia Inquirer, for example, reveals twenty features that have appeared in the other eight newspapers, and probably as many more have appeared in other Sunday issues not included in this study. The special services of the New York Times, Herald Tribune, American, and the other New York dailies are as widely syndicated as possible. The truth is that people, in or out of journalism, facing the same problems, having great economic stakes in the existing order are bound to react in the same way if they do not happen to be infected by the germ of liberalism or radicalism. The newspaper profession has turned out to be a business and as a result there was bound to be a standardization of the mentality of owners and editors which had its effect upon the editorial pages and the news pages, too.

* This is the fifth in a series of articles on the American press. The sixth, on The Philadelphia Cabbage Patch, will appear in our issue of June 11.—Editor The Nation.

So we have a steady waning of the individualism of the daily, marked first by the disappearance of the great editor whose personality shone through its pages—men such as Watterson, Medill, the Bennetts, Godkin, Dana, Greeley, Raymond, Nelson—and then by the extinction of the typographical originality. You could tell the Tribune of Horace Greeley, the Springfield Republican of the Bowleses, the old Boston Post, the Evening Post of Godkin, as far as you could see the format. They were distinctive institutions bearing the impress of owners and editors. Now they have nearly all yielded to the tremendous pressure every owner is under to increase circulation in order to get more advertising at higher rates, in order, in turn, to meet his steadily increasing costs. No wonder he turns to syndicates, to combinations, or to special services. What more natural, too, than to make up your pages just like one of the New York dailies, with your editorial pages, "opposite-editorial" pages, society and sports pages in the same relative positions? The appearance of the tabloid is, of course, a variation from the old standardized type of daily, but it is significant that the tabloids themselves imitate one another with complete fidelity.

In the sports pages above all others the opportunity for standardization is of the best. But here we have the offset that there is a tremendous thirst for the views of the distinguished commentators on sports who are paid very large salaries and are bid for by rival dailies because they carry with them, as they migrate from one daily to another, a following of "fans" whose numbers run into the thousands. Read the leading dailies in the East and see how much alike their financial pages are. As for the editorial pages, standardization is at work there with a vengeance. The same "columnist" and the same editorial cartoons may appear in a dozen or many more dailies, and the same half-column of medical advice and the same personal gossip from Washington. I have personally received as many as sixty clippings of an editorial commenting upon some words of mine from as many small dailies all over the Union—all of which had received the editorial from the same source and doubtless accepted its facts and comment, without subjecting them to any critical examination whatever. The Newspaper Enterprise Association, one of the leading syndicates of the country, sends out daily about five editorials. It is the belief of the managers that 80 to 90 per cent of the 800 to 900 newspapers they serve use one or more of these "canned" editorials a day.

As for the syndicates, they play an ever-increasing role. Thus the Newspaper Enterprise Association, which is a Scripps-Howard organization, spends $2,225,000 annually on its service. Of this, $500,000 goes for pictures only, to obtain which quickly no expense is spared. Thus, to rush to New York a few photographs of the stranded German airplane which was the first to cross the Atlantic from east to west it hired a special train as well as airplanes—the modern press photographer in his daring outranks the special correspondents of old. Sometimes it has spent $12,000 for a single picture; sometimes it hires a whole fleet of airplanes to distribute its photographs. This Association offers three kinds of service—the difference being in the quantity of matter offered. It sells, besides editorial matter, foreign correspondence of the gossipy, "feature" variety, and letters from Washington, comics, radio, aviation, and other features.

On the other hand, the North American Newspaper Alliance is most eager to let one know that its chief aim is to get away from standardization. It serves no chain of newspapers, only independent dailies, and but one in each city. It is not interested in factual, but in interpretative articles. Most of its clients belong to the Associated Press and, like that organization, the Alliance is cooperative and non-profit-making. It is especially strong in financial and business articles, is distinctly dignified, believes itself "conservatively liberal," and also supplies "women matter," news of Hollywood (daily!), and is able to purchase such costly features as articles by H. G. Wells and G. B. Shaw. It gives plenty of attention to sports, but offers no "comics."

There is, of course, another side to syndication which, in all fairness, must be set forth. Without the syndicate small-town newspapers would be much duller and much less informed than they are. They could not print any news pictures; they could not broaden their pages; they could not have much—if any—news of New York, Washington, or other centers; their foreign features would probably almost disappear, except in so far as they were brought to them by the news associations. Some of the syndicated Washington and European correspondence is of genuine educational value.

Most of the modern manufacturing inventions tend to standardize the dailies. In speaking of the new teletypesetter, which he is developing, Mr. Frank E. Gannett recently said:

> The teletypesetter automatically will make necessary greater care in the preparation of all copy. Our wire services will be compelled to edit their stuff better and will undoubtedly give newspapers a complete, carefully written story instead of bulletins, flashes, leads, subleads, kill-leads, and all the other corrections that now come to the telegraph editor in a jumbled fashion. The teletypesetter will, of course, work toward standardization. It will be necessary for newspapers that intend to go in a circuit to standardize their grammatical style, width of column, and the size of type used. It will also tend to standardize our news services. . . .

Moreover a complete newspaper page has already been transmitted by radio from San Francisco to the General Electric Company laboratory in Schenectady. When this process is perfected I cannot see why the great Eastern and Mid-Western dailies cannot reproduce their issues on the Pacific Coast or anywhere else and put them on sale at once. This development, too, will make for standardization and for the further aggrandizement in wealth and influence of our most powerful and prosperous dailies. Indeed, in the Technological Review for December, 1929, John J. Rowlands goes so far as to predict a master newspaper, to be issued in New York and transmitted by wire and air to a thousand newspaper offices for immediate reissuing—which will certainly hasten the day of the control of public opinion by a few men or one master-capitalist.

Whether this comes or not, there can be no doubt that standardization of the press will continue to increase as the years pass.

Will the President Listen?

FINAL returns from The Nation's tariff poll indicate that the editors of every section of the country overwhelmingly reject the pending measure. As earlier reported, a majority of the New Englanders replying demand its veto, and more than three-fifths of the editors in the eight other leading industrial States. More than three-fifths of our answers from the Northern agricultural States, nearly two-thirds of those coming from the West, and more than seven-eighths of the Southern replies flatly call for a veto. More than three-fifths of the Western, two-thirds of the agricultural, and nine-tenths of the Southern editors expect ultimate economic injury; while the proportions foreseeing resultant international difficulties are even larger.

Outside New England and the industrial States, we have divided the rest of the country for report purposes roughly into three great sections: (1) the Northern agricultural States, including Wisconsin and the States west of the Mississippi from Minnesota and North Dakota to Missouri and Kansas; (2) the South, covering the whole great area from Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Arkansas south, extending west to Oklahoma and Texas; (3) the West, covering the Mountain and Pacific States. The questions and the answers in these sections follow:

1. Will the pending bill, if enacted, raise the cost of living?

Agricultural States: yes, 39; no, 8. South: yes, 78; no, 7. West: yes, 22; no, 4.

2. If so, does our manufacturing situation warrant the enactment of the pending bill?

Agricultural States: yes, 11; no, 35. South: yes, 7; no, 78. West: yes, 10; no, 15.

3. Will the new tariff ultimately benefit or injure us economically?

Agricultural States: benefit, 14; injure, 28. South: benefit, 8; injure, 79. West: benefit, 9; injure 16.

4. Will it improve or injure our international relations?

Agricultural States: improve, 9; injure, 32. South: improve, 7; injure, 80. West: improve, 5; injure, 20.

5. Should the President sign or veto the bill?

Agricultural States: sign, 18; veto, 29. South: sign, 10; veto, 74. West: sign, 9; veto, 16.

The result of the poll in these States is simply to emphasize the unpopularity of the measure as disclosed in the returns from New England and the industrial States. It is interesting to note that even in the Northern agricultural and Western States, where transatlantic affairs naturally command less attention than in the East, practically four-fifths of the editors answering our questionnaire believe that our international relations are likely to be made more difficult by the new enactment.

For purposes of convenient comparison we bring together in the table below the outstanding results of the poll in all sections of the country. As the returns are arranged, the reader will find in the first column between each pair of double lines the number of replies favorable to the new bill, and in the second column the number unfavorable. It may be noted that the New England editors were not asked whether the manufacturing situation warranted enactment.

Question will naturally and properly arise as to the representative character of these returns. The reader can judge for himself whether the questions asked were fair ones. The questionnaire was sent to the editors of all daily newspapers in the country having a circulation of more than 2,500. Replies were received from about 20 per cent of them, the proportion answering not varying strikingly in various sections of the country, except that the returns from the West, partly owing, no doubt, to slowness of returns from a greater distance, are proportionately much lower than from other sections. By an interesting coincidence, the number of papers replying from the various sections is very closely proportioned to their population, New England and the Northern agricultural States being slightly overrepresented in the returns, the industrial States and the South underrepresented, the West almost exactly represented. As suggested last week, the returns probably give undue weight to the smaller papers, and in our judgment editors opposed to the new bill probably answered in larger proportion to their number than those favoring it.

Taking all these considerations into account, the results of this poll seem to us to constitute a repudiation of the Smoot-Hawley bill as surprising as it is overwhelming. The President cannot afford to ignore the warning.

The Porcelain Sophia Andreyevna*

A Letter of Leo Tolstoy

[The original of this curious document is in the Tolstoy Museum in Moscow. It is here presented in English for the first time so far as is known. The first letter, which is unfinished, is in the handwriting of Sophia Andreyevna, the wife of Tolstoy. Then follows the letter, dated two days later, in Tolstoy's handwriting. Both are addressed to the sister of Tolstoy's wife, Tatiana Andreyevna Kusminskaja. At the time the letters were written Tolstoy and Sophia Andreyevna, who was sixteen years his junior, had been married six months.]

March 21, 1863

ARE you in low spirits, Tania? I have had no letters from you for ever so long and you know how I enjoy them. Neither has Leo had an answer from you to his half-made missive. For my part, I have not understood a word of it.

(In the handwriting of Leo Tolstoy)

March 23, 1863

She wrote this much and stopped because she could not go on.

And do you know why, dear Tania? A very strange and unusual adventure has occurred to Sophia Andreyevna and me. You know yourself that she was always like the rest of us, made of flesh and blood which reacted as anybody else's. She breathed, felt warm, sometimes hot, could blow her nose (and pretty loudly, too). Especially was she able to articulate all her limbs and take different positions with her hands and feet. But to make a long story short, physically she was the same as the rest of us. Suddenly on March 21, 1863, at ten o'clock in the evening, there occurred this unusual event. Tania, I know you always loved her. (What your feeling will be now for her I cannot say.)

I know your great interest in all that concerns me, your sound judgment in the serious matters we meet in life, and how tenderly you are attached to your parents. (Take care as you tell this to them.) I am writing to you all that happened that day.

I rose early in the morning, took a long walk and a ride. That day we had both breakfast and dinner together and read together (she was still able to read). I was calm and happy. At ten o'clock I said good night to my aunt. Sonia was absolutely as she always was. She said she would follow me and I retired to my room and went to bed. Presently I heard her open the door, heard her breathe as she was undressing herself. I heard her come out from behind the screen and approach the bed. I opened my eyes and saw Sonia—not the same Sonia that both of us know, but Sonia in porcelain! Made from the same porcelain stuff that your parents used to discuss! Do you know those porcelain dolls with bare, cold shoulders and neck, with hands folded in front, with black, wavy hair, the paint worn off at the top of the head, and with prominent porcelain eyes also painted in black and rather too thick at the corners? The folds of the nightgown were likewise of stiff porcelain.

Such was Sonia. I touched her hand—it was smooth, agreeable to touch, but cold like porcelain. I thought I was dreaming. I shook myself. But she was still standing motionless before me. I said: "Are you made of porcelain?" Without opening her mouth (the mouth, rather pursed, with the lips painted in red, did not move) she answered: "Yes, I am porcelain. I felt a chill in my back." [Chill is added in Sophia Andreyevna's hand.] I looked at her feet. They were of porcelain (you can imagine how terror-stricken I was) attached to a piece of porcelain board, a sort of background painted green like grass. Near her left foot at the back, a little higher than her knee, was a small porcelain column painted brown, meant to be the trunk of a tree, I suppose. All was of one piece. I understood that without that little column she wouldn't be able to stand up. And I felt dreadfully sad, as you may imagine, you who love her so much.

And still I could not believe what with my eyes I saw. I uttered her name, called her, but she could not move away from the trunk and what was meant to be ground. She shook gently from side to side together with the piece of ground, as if seeking to lie down by my side. I heard the gentle knocking of the porcelain bottom on the floor. I touched her—she was smooth all over, agreeable, cold like a piece of porcelain. I tried to lift her hand. It was impossible. I tried to push my finger between her elbow and her ribs, but it was impossible. The obstacle was a mass of porcelain like that made at Auerbach's from which gravy-boats are made. Everything was made only for external view. I examined the nightgown; it was of one piece with the body. Looking more closely I saw that a fold of the nightgown was broken off. Inside it was brown. At the top of the head the paint was as though rubbed off, and there was a white spot. On one side of the lips the paint had worn off also, and a bit of shoulder was broken. But nevertheless all was so nice and so real that it looked like our former Sonia. The nightgown was the one I knew, trimmed with lace; so was the knot of black hair at the back of her head, but it was of porcelain, and her dear slim arms, and her big eyes, and her lips, all looked real but were made of porcelain. So were the dimple in her chin and the small bones above her shoulders.

I was in a dreadful state, not knowing what to do, what to say, what to think. She looked as if she would be glad to help me, but what could a porcelain being do? Her eyes were half-closed, her lashes and eyebrows looked lifelike from a distance. She did not look at me, but at the bed, as if she wished to lie down, and she kept shaking from side to side. I was entirely lost. I grabbed her and wanted to put her in my bed. My fingers did not press into her cold porcelain body and, what struck me more, she became as light as a little glass. And suddenly she became quite small, not bigger than the palm of my hand, yet looking exactly the same as before. I grabbed the pillow and stood it on one of its corners, crushed in with my fist the corner sticking upwards, laid her in it, and folding her nightcap in four, covered her up entirely. There she lay motionless—I put out the candle, placing it near me.

Suddenly I heard her voice from the corner of the pillow: "Leva, why have I changed to porcelain?" I did not know what to answer. She spoke again: "Is it not bad that I've become porcelain?" Not wishing to pain her, I said it did not matter. And then in the darkness I touched her. She was still a cold porcelain doll. Her little belly was the same as if she were alive, but it became narrower toward the waist, which was not quite natural for a porcelain doll. I experienced a strange feeling. I felt pleased with her present state and ceased to wonder. It all seemed natural. I took her out of the pillow, passed her from one hand to the other, put her under my head. All this seemed to satisfy her. We both fell asleep. In the morning I woke up and went away, not even glancing at her. I still felt frightened at what had happened the previous night. When I came to lunch she was as she had always been. I did not remind her of the day before, fearing it would pain both her and my aunt. I have mentioned it to no one beside yourself. I thought it had all passed away, but every day, when we are alone, the same thing happens. She suddenly becomes little and like a porcelain doll. But when anyone is present she is her old self. She is not annoyed by it, neither am I, however strange it may seem. To speak frankly, I am glad, and in spite of her being a porcelain doll both of us are perfectly happy.

I am writing all this to you, dear Tania, in order that your parents may be carefully informed about it and through your father inquiries may be made among medical men to know what this occurrence means and whether it may do harm to the baby which is expected.

At this moment we are alone and she sits close to my shoulder and I feel her sharp little nose cutting into my neck. Yesterday she was alone in the room and when I came in I saw that Dora, our pet dog, had dragged her into the corner, playing with her, and was on the point of breaking her. I gave the dog a spanking, put Sonia in my vest pocket, and carried her to my study. However, I ordered from Toula, and have received it today, a little box made of morocco leather with a clasp. It is lined inside with red velvet, just the place to put her in with her elbows, head, and back. This will prevent her from breaking. I covered her with a piece of chamois.

While I was writing this letter a terrible misfortune occurred. She was standing on the table. Natalia Petrovna, an old woman living with us, pushed her as she passed. She fell off the table, and her leg broke above the little brown trunk it rested upon. Alexey, the clerk, says it may be fixed with white paint in powder and the white of an egg. Don't they know in Moscow of some paste? Send me some, please!

Plots and Counterplots

Projects of a Great Engineer

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, May 24

THE first thing the observing visitor is likely to remark in Washington nowadays is the atmosphere of suspicion, distrust, and dread which pervades almost every department of the national government. Among officials of all ranks one encounters the same feeling of being watched and plotted against by secret enemies. The fear which emanates from the White House has spread over the capital. Under a President who sees in nearly every prominent member of his party a secret aspirant for the Presidential nomination in 1932—and in every hint of opposition to his policies a conspiracy to wreck his Administration—it is not strange that Cabinet members, Congressmen, chairmen of commissions, bureau chiefs, and secretaries are engaged in suspecting their subordinates and each other of equally dastardly designs. All sense of security has vanished. The air is oppressive with rumors of plots and counterplots. Senators' offices are entered at night, and their most intimate correspondence read by a visitor wearing cotton gloves. Important records are reported missing from government archives. Guards are increased, and doors that have been unlocked since the Civil War are barred for unexplained reasons. It is like living in a dime novel. When the Chief shivers everyone else shakes.

PERHAPS this state of mind is responsible for the unpleasant accusation of "double-crossing" which has been directed at the White House in connection with the recently announced candidacy of Representative Franklin Fort for the Republican Senatorial nomination in New Jersey. The charge originates with friends and admirers of Dwight Morrow. The gist of it is that Mr. Hoover, fearing that Morrow's fame and popularity were growing too rapidly, either prompted or permitted Fort to file against him for the purpose of eliminating Morrow as a potential rival for the Presidential nomination two years hence. Certain facts contrive to give plausibility to the suggestion. Morrow enjoys the confidence of the business interests, and, more than any individual except Calvin himself, he personifies the "Coolidge prosperity" for which millions of business men pray night and morning and for the return of which they would gladly exchange a carload of Great Engineers. Added to this is the settled conviction existing among those who have noted the intimacy of Fort and Hoover that the New Jersey Congressman simply would not consider entering the race against Hoover's wishes. Whatever the motive, the event threatens to eliminate Morrow. If he divides the wet vote with ex-Senator Frelinghuysen, and Fort polls the full strength of the New Jersey drys, Fort is almost certain to win in the primary—and to be defeated in the general election by the wet Democratic nominee, Alexander Simpson. Neither Fort nor Simpson would add anything to the Senate, whereas Morrow would add vastly to its sum total of intelligence, courage, and sincerity.

* * * * *

ANY such addition to the Republican side of the chamber would be especially welcome now that "Puddler Jim" Davis seems assured of a seat from Pennsylvania. "Puddler Jim's" contribution will consist entirely of a bright smile, a hearty handshake, and one thoroughly dependable Old Guard vote. As one who remained unconvinced by "Holy Joe's" eleventh-hour crusade for progress and reform, I prefer the Big Moose: he lacks Grundy's power for evil. Assuming that the tariff bill will become a law, the lobbyist-Senator will retire with the distinction of having been the most expensive representative of the public, considering his length of tenure, that ever entered either house of Congress. The greatest losers by his departure are Uncle Andrew Mellon and the Democratic Party. It is not that Uncle Andrew values "Holy Joe" so highly—although, of course, two more congenial souls never sailed under the black flag. The tragedy, from the Mellon standpoint, consists in the threatened loss of Senator David A. Reed, personal and Senatorial representative of the Mellon family, the Mellon fortune, and the Mellon political machine. Pennsylvania political tradition and expediency allot one Senatorship to the eastern part of the State and one to the western. Davis and Reed are both from Pittsburgh, and it is almost inevitable that Philadelphia will have a candidate in the field against Reed when the 1932 primaries arrive. That candidate probably will be supported by doughty Bill Vare. The prospect is one which no patriotic multimillionaire can contemplate without tears. The Democrats will miss Grundy as a political issue in the Congressional elections this fall, but they may take comfort in the presence of Grundyism, which is almost as good, and which promises to remain with us for some time in the form of what historians may designate as the Grundy-Hoover tariff.

* * * * *

WHATEVER doubts lingered concerning the Administration's attitude toward that measure were about all dispelled by the determined methods that were employed in eliminating the debenture and Senate flexible provisions. If Hoover had wanted the bill to die with a minimum of embarrassment to himself he could easily have managed it so that the two provisions remained, thus producing a perpetual deadlock between the Senate and House. Instead, the Administration resorted to drastic measures, reminiscent of those employed in the Parker fight, to round up sufficient votes to eliminate them. The factors which influenced the decision to jam the bill through appear to have been simple enough. It was felt that such an ignominious conclusion to eighteen months of tariff labor would be "a fatal confession of failure." In the second place, the interests that will benefit from the increased rates are still determined to have them, and these interests, while few in number, remain the heaviest contributors to Republican campaign funds. Finally, it was realized that failure of the present bill undoubtedly would result in the introduction of a new one when the next Congress convened, thus prolonging the tariff wrangle to the very eve of the next Presidential election. Republican leaders are not blind to the political consequences that will ensue from the enactment of the Grundy rates, but they much prefer to face those consequences in 1930 rather than in 1932. The program, therefore, is to rush the bill through, face the music this fall, and give the dear, absent-minded public two years in which to get accustomed to the higher cost of living.

* * * * *

OWEN J. ROBERTS was confirmed as Justice of the Supreme Court without a dissenting voice in the Senate, despite the efforts of certain Administration spokesmen to invite opposition. Day after day, through publicity avenues usually recognized as reflecting White House views, it was dinned into the Senate's ears that Roberts was a corporation lawyer, that his economic and social views were ultra-conservative, that he belonged to the Mellon school of thought, that he was infinitely more reactionary than either Hughes or Parker, and that failure of the Senate liberals to oppose his confirmation would constitute an abandonment of their principles. Every conceivable misstatement was made to goad them into a fight. This curious campaign against the President's own nominee was actuated by two motives, equally small and transparent. The first was to counteract the widespread (and correct) impression that the Senate finally had compelled the President to name a decidedly liberal man for the court. The second was to torment the Senate Progressives into starting a fight in which they were certain to be beaten and partially discredited. The charming ruse failed because most of the Senate Progressives were personally acquainted with Roberts and his views. Nevertheless, it furnishes an excellent illustration of the plane on which high affairs are being conducted here.

* * * * *

THE Senate Lobby Committee, after performing an astounding lot of good, has succeeded in appearing at its worst in its inquiry into organized activities for and against prohibition. Blaine of Wisconsin is the only wet on the committee, and he is not the most adroit cross-examiner in the world. Borah, Walsh, Robinson, and Chairman Caraway are all bone dry, although, it should be added, Borah hasn't attended a meeting in months. It was bad enough when Walsh and Robinson, after subjecting Henry Curran, of the Association Opposed to the Prohibition Amendment, to the most prolonged and savage grilling, proceeded then to exhibit their tender solicitude for Scott McBride of the Anti-Saloon League, notwithstanding his admission that he lobbied with members of the House when the impeachment of a federal judge was under consideration there. What is worse is the committee's refusal, thus far, to produce evidence which is available to them tending to disclose Bishop Cannon's disposition of the $48,000 which he received from E. C. Jameson for the Hoover campaign, and for which he never has accounted. The Senator principally responsible for this refusal, I regret to say, is the generally admirable Walsh of Montana. His excuse—that the proffered evidence would be irrelevant—is unimpressive, particularly in view of the committee's inquiry into Claudius Huston's financial adventures, in which inquiry Walsh took the leading part. Many a good Christian is hoping he will change his mind. For those who believe in punishment here as well as hereafter, the wily Bishop has been "getting away with it" much too long.

In the Driftway

AT best politeness is not a major virtue; at worst it may easily be a minor vice. A good deal of the time it is a kind of fawning ingratiation or strategic policy, and sometimes it becomes downright hypocrisy or cowardice. In general any kind of politeness which is not innate or of the heart would better not be at all. That is why the Drifter counts among the lesser annoyances of modern life the parrot politeness which is imposed upon employees by an increasing number of corporate employers. Somebody has said that there is more talk about "service" and less of the thing itself in our day than ever before. And somewhat the same thing is true of politeness. In response to your blunt complaints your telephone company aggravates you doubly by a series of Chesterfieldian notes, none of which reaches the point at issue; while your street railway accents its miserable service by a lot of blah about its devotion to your welfare. We have gone a step beyond the doctrine that "the customer is always right." Modern business insists that its employees shall efface their personality in dealing with the public and substitute a parrot politeness prescribed from headquarters.

* * * * *

THE elevator operator in the department store no longer says "Going up," "Going down," and "Fourth floor—carpets, furniture, upholstery, children's toys, groceries, and sporting goods." He says "Up, please" and "Out, please" and "Fourth floor, please." There is not the slightest reason for lugging in the word "please" in any of those connections, and for one the Drifter finds himself not pleased but mildly annoyed. He would prefer one of the saucy asides with which elevator operators once regaled their passengers. When a stout lady fifty feet down the aisle hails the elevator and then ambles leisurely toward it, stopping to glance at several counters of notions on the way, the modern department-store automaton merely repeats placidly: "Down, please; down, please." Once he would have relieved himself and his restless passengers by observing sotto voce: "I wonder if old Mother Widdle-Waddle thinks we're open until midnight. If she don't step along I'll leave her behind in linen goods, draperies, women's cloaks, and misses' underwear."

* * * * *

THE hotels, too, are exponents of the jargon of automaton politeness. The Drifter has had the experience of stopping in a good many hotels in various parts of the country lately and he has had occasion often to ask over the house telephone that he be called at a certain hour in the morning. With monotonous uniformity the response to his request has been, "Thank you." In some cases it has been "Thank you; good night." The Drifter has enjoyed that "Good night." Even if entirely perfunctory, and the result of immutable orders from the management, the wish has seemed to be kindly and relevant to the situation. But why in the name of Beelzebub should a hotel telephone operator thank a patron for a request to be called in the morning? As well thank him if he called down profanely to complain that the sheets on his bed hadn't been changed. Once the Drifter felt so strongly about it that after that pointless "Thank you" he took the receiver off the hook again and inquired: "Why do you thank me for asking to be called at six o'clock in the morning? Do you get a commission on everybody you get out of bed at that time?" But of course the girl at the switchboard didn't get the Drifter's point—if there was one. She thought the Drifter had been drinking, and merely replied soothingly that he needn't worry; he would be called at six o'clock without fail. But fortunately this parrot phrase of "Thank you" is not quite invariable. It is a pleasure to recall that at the Cotton Hotel in Houston a request to be roused at a specified time brought back the response from the girl at the telephone, in the delightful accent of the South: "I sure wi-i-ll." And at the Arizona Hotel in Yuma the Drifter's request for an early-morning call brought back from the night clerk a laconic "You bet." There was something assuring in that. The Drifter dropped off into dreamland confident that he would not be allowed to oversleep.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Freedom of the Press in Korea

[In February of this year the editor of The Nation sent to Mr. D. S. Chang, editor of the Dong Ah Ilbo, a daily newspaper in Seoul, Korea, a letter of greeting and congratulation on the occasion of the newspaper's tenth anniversary. Recently a letter was received from Mr. C. Hugh, president of the Korean Nationalist Weekly, published in New York, disclosing the subsequent fate of the Dong Ah Ilbo. We print below the letter of congratulation and the letter received from Mr. Hugh.]

DEAR MR. CHANG:

I am happy to send a word of greeting to the Dong Ah Ilbo on its tenth anniversary on the coming April 1. May I also extend to your paper on this tenth anniversary the heartiest greetings of The Nation, which since 1865 has been devoting itself to the liberties of minorities, the right of all peoples to their own way of life, and to opposition to imperialism from whatever source?

In view of this I need hardly assure you of our interest in the causes championed by the distinguished newspaper which you represent. We have never faltered in our belief that the Koreans were entitled to their own independent existence, precisely as we have violently opposed the imperialistic moves of our own country in Nicaragua, Haiti, and elsewhere. Fortunately for our peace of mind, we are entirely of the opinion that the era of imperialism by the so-called superior races is approaching its end. If India now throws off the shackles of English rule, enslaved people everywhere will be heartened to strike off their own shackles. We are even hopeful that the present American Congress will this year grant unconditional freedom to the Filipinos, something that we of The Nation have been asking for ever since our fleet sailed into Manila harbor on May 1, 1898.

We are well aware that a great responsibility rests upon a paper such as yours under the conditions which at present surround it. The very fact that it is placed in a hard position means that it must be as upright as Caesar's wife; that it must be beyond criticism in every way, unselfish, broad-minded, clean, and determined to sacrifice everything for the causes which it champions. If it holds to a policy like this it cannot fail to win lasting fame, and to serve both its people and its causes with a maximum of efficiency. May I offer you a motto? In 1832 my grandfather, William Lloyd Garrison, founded a newspaper, the Liberator, to which historians have attributed a large share of the credit for bringing about the freedom of the enslaved Africans in this country. In the very first issue of this paper he used these words which I commend to you: "I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse—I will not retreat a single inch—and I will be heard." In addition he declared: "Our country is the world—our countrymen are mankind." His struggle was harder than yours, for he was poor, little trained, and had hardly a supporter, yet he lived to see the success of his apparently hopeless undertaking within exactly thirty-two years.

I send you every good wish for yourself and your distinguished journal. May you march triumphantly forward in your next decade, championing at all times, as you have, the great cause of democracy, peace among nations, and the establishment of the true social democracy within all nations.

New York, February 1 OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

DEAR MR. VILLARD:

We want to inform you that Dong Ah Ilbo of Seoul, Korea, was suspended indefinitely on April 16, 1930, by the Japanese authorities. The cause of the suspension was the congratulatory message that you were so thoughtful as to send to the paper on its tenth anniversary. The Japanese authorities contend that the message was inciting and for that reason suspension was ordered not only for the issue in which the message had appeared but for an indefinite period.

It is exceedingly unfortunate that the Korean people were denied the privilege of reading your message. We have no doubt that your message would have given them the moral support which cannot be expected from other quarters during these times of unspeakable atrocities and inexcusable oppression by the Japanese authorities.

Mr. Carlisle on Government Ownership

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: To show that at least one of our colleges has the courage not to be hypocritical about dispensing public-utility propaganda, let me mention an address my loud speaker assures me was given this morning in the chapel of St. Lawrence University at Canton, New York, and broadcast by the university's radio station. Although the speaker, Mr. Floyd L. Carlisle, was introduced simply as an outstanding friend of the "north country," second to none in its development, and founder of a chair of forestry at the college, Mr. Carlisle himself made no secret of being in the electric-power business with a firm whose name, if given, I didn't catch.

Against the proposed government development of St. Lawrence and other water power, Mr. Carlisle lengthily cited the State's losses in building the Barge Canal, which he says it is now finding difficult even to give away. Pointing out that universities exist for the fearless dissemination of truth, he proceeded with a statistic or two exposing the unfortunately not-well-known inefficiency of the Ontario power system. If the State of New York, he said, would relieve his company of taxes it would sell power to households at one-half the Ontario price, although he mentioned that only 4½ per cent of his company's electricity went to households. He also talked about the pity of trees going to ruin in the State's Adirondack Park without benefit of business.

After the lecture a questioner asked what bearing the Barge Canal had on developing water power. Mr. Carlisle answered that since the State had thus failed in a proposition no sane business man would ever have undertaken, taxpayers ought to stop, look, and listen, and that the principle that the government should not engage in business is fundamental in Anglo-Saxon organization.

If the latitude of this come-back seems to be about forty-three degrees north of the sequitur, don't blame it on a mere

"Northern New York," April 24 REPORTER

Lord Ponsonby on Balfour

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I comment on the estimate of Arthur James Balfour, written by Lord Ponsonby for your issue of April 2. Speaking of his work in the field of philosophy, Ponsonby writes that in this "he was no more than an attractive amateur."

It is interesting to contrast this estimate with another, written by a man who, I am confident, Lord Ponsonby himself would agree was a far better judge in this field of intellectual activity. When Balfour's "Foundations of Belief" appeared William James, in a letter to his brother Henry (dated April 26, 1895), wrote:

> I have been reading Balfour's "Foundations of Belief" with immense gusto. . . . If I mistake not it will have a profound effect eventually, and it is a pleasure to see old England coming to the fore every time with some big stroke. There is more real philosophy in such a book than in fifty German ones of which the eminence consists in heaping up subtleties and technicalities about the subject. . . . B. is a great man.

This letter is quoted in "Religion in the Philosophy of William James," by Professor J. S. Bixler, page 86.

I call this fact to your readers' attention, because they will then understand that Ponsonby's conclusions in other fields must likewise not be taken too seriously. When he mentions "the Balfour policy for the settlement of Jews in Palestine" as one of those policies which in his judgment "are not achievements of sufficient magnitude long to be remembered," I am afraid that he displays the same keen sense of prophecy that he displayed in philosophic judgment.

Mooney and California

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The comments which occur in The Nation from time to time on the Mooney case make me wonder if there is not more interest in that case outside of California than within. If a poll were to be taken here I believe a large majority of opinions would fall into one of two classes: either (1) Mooney must be guilty, because he was convicted in a court of justice, and anybody who questions the result now is an undesirable citizen, if not actually in the pay of the Soviets; or (2) even if Mooney did not commit the crime for which he was convicted he was an undesirable agitator, and it is just as well to have him out of the way.

I do not believe that even labor would make any sacrifice or take any risk for Mooney. Meanwhile, it is reported that Governor Young is to be a candidate for reelection, which sounds bad for Mooney, for the Governor is certainly aware that the political career of anybody who pardons Mooney is closed.

Portent

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

Weeds by the barn grow greener every day.
Something is here. Silver field-mice run
Panting among the stalks at covering noon
Or crouch with quick sides by the purple stems
When the broad sun is lifted from the day.
At dusk there is no wind to move a leaf.
Oh, anything may happen in the world . . .
The field-mice know, who see the seedling moon,
A youngling, silver-waxen shoot
Grow in her garden towards astounding bloom.

This Petty Pace

Brief Candles. Stories by Aldous Huxley. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

AFTER half a dozen volumes Aldous Huxley has returned to the short story, but he does not bring his old irresponsibility with him. He has acquired a Message, and he insists that we shall hear it. It is the same message that raised its head in nearly every one of the essays in "Do What You Will," to wit, that if one tries to be superhuman one ends by being subhuman, that the best way of turning a child into a devil is to try to bring it up as an angel. Against the ideal of superhumanness he pleads for the ideal of perfected humanity. Mr. Huxley's, in other words, is just another brand of humanism. But it is at the farthest pole from Babbittean humanism, for instead of moderation Mr. Huxley believes in excess, provided that one excess is counterbalanced by another, and instead of believing in the will to refrain and the middle level he holds (I am here assuming that one of his characters speaks for him) that a human being should "completely and intensely live . . . on every plane of existence."

There is no need here to examine this philosophy in detail. It is enough to say that Mr. Huxley, in talking of subhuman, human, and superhuman levels, is making as dubious a division as the Babbittean humanists when they talk of man living on three "planes," the natural, human, and religious. For every "plane" on which a human being lives is necessarily a human plane, just as every action he takes is at bottom a natural action. It would not occur to our literary philosophers to divide the actions of a dog into subdoggy, doggy, and superdoggy; it is only when we come to our own race that we consider it necessary to have something fancy in the way of metaphysics. The use of the words "human" and "natural" in so many different senses, each sense carrying within itself its peculiar shade of approval or disapproval, is bound to produce murky thinking and silly conclusions. It is much wiser to ask simply whether a given action or ideal is desirable or undesirable, regardless of what "plane" one may think it on.

That three of the present four stories are written at least in part to support a thesis does not in itself make them any the less amusing. Most satire gains its effect through the very fact that it is written to support a thesis, or to ridicule someone else's thesis, e.g., "Candide." When Mr. Huxley mars his work he does so not by having a thesis, but by illustrating his thesis too often through explicit statement rather than indirectly through the story itself. In the present volume he has been content sometimes to allow the story to remain secondary.

In The Claxtons, for example, he does little more than deride a certain type of "spirituality" and the products for which it is responsible. How beautifully the Claxtons live, how spiritually! Even the cat is a vegetarian. There is Herbert, "long-legged and knickerbockered, his fair beard like a windy explosion round his face," who carries a Rücksack even in London as though he were just about to ascend Mont Blanc. When the street boys yell or the flappers whoop with laughter, Herbert ignores them, or else smiles through his beard "forgivingly and with a rather studied humorousness." His wife, Martha, is also spiritual; and she too can smile a beautifully Christian—yet superior—smile. The Claxtons is less a story than a portrait or a travesty of a type, but it is magnificently done, a merciless exposure of the self-consciously uplifted.

In The Rest Cure, which comes nearest to the orthodox story, a young English woman rents a villa near Florence and enjoys a mild flirtation with a local Italian; her husband, visiting her for a few days, warns her so brutally against the man that in defiance she gives herself to him; he extorts money from her and quickly tires of her, and the story ends ironically when she shoots herself for the wrong reason. The last and most important story, occupying half of the book, After the Fireworks, describes what begins as a charming but ends as a sordid affair between a novelist of fifty and a girl admirer of twenty-one. By once more making his hero a novelist Mr. Huxley finds free scope for that brilliant talk, those little essays and excursions into philosophy, the wit and brilliant description, as well as the cynicism, that have always distinguished his work; and he writes, too, a story of great psychological penetration. The diary of the girl, however, leans too heavily in its syntax on "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes," while the comments are a little too intelligent to make that style altogether credible.

HENRY HAZLITT

How to Become President

Rutherford B. Hayes. By H. J. Eckenrode. Assisted by Pocahontas Wilson Wight. Dodd, Mead and Company. $5.

THIS new life of Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States from 1877 to 1881, is the first of a projected series on American Political Leaders. It is a book which all statesmen will want to read. (I suspect that those who are fortunate enough to live their adult lives in Ohio, New York, or New Jersey and who therefore can aspire to be President will also look eagerly forward to the promised biographies of Garfield, Harrison, McKinley, Cleveland, and Taft.) For Hayes's life gives a satisfactory answer to that ever tantalizing query: how can a mediocre man, endowed with no natural talents, small intellect, unable or dreading to possess convictions—how can such a person become President of the United States? Reading Mr. Eckenrode's new book one sees how easy it is.

The future President will study law and will practice it. (Not too successfully, however, for the stigma of "corporation lawyer" will be too deep ever to eradicate.) He will, at an early age, become a party worker and hold a succession of small local offices. (Vide Hayes, Cleveland, Roosevelt, Taft, and Coolidge.) He will serve in a war and return with honorable wounds, if possible. (Hayes and Harrison were mustered out as brigadier generals; McKinley was a major; Roosevelt and Bryan were colonels.) He will espouse a cause that has a well-organized following. (With Hayes it was temperance; with Harrison, justice to the Civil War veterans; with Cleveland, reform.) By holding one's mouth or saying only the most obvious things, by being a bitter partisan in election contests, by voting the party program whether it be the tariff or the resumption of specie payments, or a big navy, or imperialism, by swallowing one's words if one has to (as Garfield did about the tariff or McKinley about silver), by entertaining no economic heresies, by leading an impeccable private existence, and by the possession of a proper wife, preferably one identified with a philanthropy—thus covered in and out with a hard, shiny varnish, one may attain that final goal. It is simply a matter of time and the breaks.

It should be noted that Mr. Eckenrode knows all this and says a good part of it; it is refreshing to record, too, that this initial volume does not inaugurate a new American Statesmen series of pompous stuffed shirts. Mr. Eckenrode is not impressed by his hero's intellectual capacities, his early political record, his willingness to play shabby politics. Mr. Eckenrode tells the tales that have to be told: of how Hayes became a temperance worker because political capital could be made out of the association; of how he voted, without a murmur, the shameful Reconstruction program of Stevens when he sat in the Congress of 1865-67; of how he waved the bloody shirt in the Presidential elections of 1868 and 1872; of how he catered to war veterans, protectionists, and the "sound-money" men in the face of appallingly hard times, when the farmers and the workingmen of the nation were bitterly oppressed. Yet I have used the word "hero" advisedly; for Hayes is a hero to his biographer. A single passage from this book will suffice to throw into relief Mr. Eckenrode's political philosophy:

> The life of Hayes should teach us optimism and hope for the future of the Republic . . . A plain, shrewd, capable, honest business man did much better [than Grant]—did so well that the country was put in the right path again. That should teach us not to be disheartened by the failures of brilliancy but to put our destiny in coming crises in the hands of other plain men—American business men who blend practical ability with idealism, just as Hayes did. Hayes was, in a way, an average man, but what an average it was! The future of the nation is safe if it continues to breed men like Rutherford B. Hayes.

Thus we extol our politicians for their mediocrity, their caution, their timidity. Hayes, Garfield, Harrison, Cleveland, McKinley: these are our great men. Under their rules the country's natural resources were exploited, a privileged class was built up behind mighty tariff walls, the farming class of the nation was ruined, industrialists were permitted to flood the factory towns of the land with contract labor to depress farther the already mean standards of living of the American laboring population. Never once in the whole long, bleak period in our political annals from the end of the Civil War to the turn of the century do we find enunciated one political principle of the smallest importance: not a single policy defined with regard to immigration, agriculture, conservation, the rights of the workingman, imperialism.

Timidity in our statescraft is greatness but daring in our industrial life—ah, that is greatness, too. It is astounding to contemplate this contradiction in our American life in the post-Civil War era: Hayes, Garfield, Cleveland, and McKinley moved in the same world, knew of, spoke to, were familiar with Carnegie, Frick, Armour, Rockefeller, Hill, Harriman, and Morgan. The antecedents, education, external habits of both groups were largely the same. The politicians were what they were; the industrialists were imaginative, enterprising, bold individuals who built railroads into wildernesses (as Hill did), who linked coal mines, coke ovens, iron deposits, blast furnaces, and rolling mills together to form a mighty industry (as Carnegie did), who dreamed the dreams and had the visions of empire and of greatness. Some day a future Henry Adams will tell us how two persons like Hayes and Rockefeller could both come out of Ohio in the years that followed 1865.

Mr. Eckenrode calls Hayes the "statesman of reunion." He it was who healed the wounds of war, bound North and South together, ushered in our America of today. Might one dissent? I submit that Morgan and Harriman, to take but two examples, accomplished a thousand times as much. Morgan, in the nineties, created the Southern Railway Company; Harriman, at the end of the century, joined the Central of Georgia Railway with the Illinois Central system. The South was now united by bands of steel with North, East, and West. When magazines and books published in New York and Philadelphia reached Southern tables as quickly as they did those of the Middle West, when the clothes and house furnishings of New York, Chicago, and Cleveland adorned the persons and the homes of the inhabitants of Atlanta, Shreveport, and Mobile, only then did the South become an integral part of American life. Hayes's removal of federal troops from Charleston and New Orleans in 1877 did not do it. In fact, as Mr. Eckenrode himself points out, white supremacy had been achieved in all the Southern States except Louisiana and South Carolina before Hayes's coming to office. But the penetration of Northern capital into the South and the standardization of taste and the ordinary round of daily living—these, and not political gestures, healed the wounds of war.

I would respectfully suggest to Mr. Allan Nevins, the editor of this new series, that the stories of half a dozen of the railroad, oil, steel, and financial giants of the period he is covering would help this generation to a full understanding of modern America better than any number of carefully written, completely documented biographies of unimportant and forgotten "statesmen."

LOUIS M. HACKER

A Minor Bard

Thomas Holley Chivers: Friend of Poe. By S. Foster Damon. Harper and Brothers. $5.

THE lives of unimportant persons are not infrequently investigated with an insane assiduity by the pure scholar, but it is not often that a litterateur as obscure as Chivers is rewarded with a biography like the present, in which scholarly knowledge is combined with first-rate critical writing. Most of those who remember Chivers at all remember only that he was a friend of Poe, and, perhaps, that Swinburne greeted Bayard Taylor with the ambiguous exclamation, "Oh, Chivers, Chivers! If you know Chivers give me your hand"; but Mr. Damon has made of him both a notable addition to the company of eccentrics and a symbol of an episode in the development of American culture.

Chivers was born near the town of Washington, Georgia, in the annus mirabilis 1809. He took a degree in medicine at a backwoods college, and he spent the rest of his life in wandering about the United States while composing poetry most obviously remarkable for the original character of its badness. He was copious, undisciplined, bold, and ardent. He could reach sublime depths of absurdity, as he did in an elegy addressed to his daughter, in which he wrote:

As an egg, when broken, never
Can be mended, but must ever
Be the same crushed egg forever—
So shall this dark heart of mine!

But occasionally he achieved something which was almost good, and he had a passion for pure sound in which Mr. Damon finds an anticipation of the cult of "pure poetry." Perhaps he influenced Poe (who was accused of plagiarizing from him), and he almost certainly helped Swinburne discover the Swinburnian rhythm, but the most interesting thing about him is the extent to which his culture typified that of the nascent intelligentsia of America. He had begun as a Baptist, and he retained to the end a fondness for angels, harps, and the other conventional images of naive Christianity, but he subsequently reinterpreted them in accordance with both spiritualistic and transcendental ideas, and he was so thoroughly a child of his time that he sympathized with all the extravagances which were the product of America's endeavor to find herself.

Indeed, the most interesting portions of Mr. Damon's book are those chapters in which he analyzes Chivers in connection with the tendencies and tastes of his generation and defines the school to which he as well as Poe belonged, discovering in Chivers's verse pure examples both of the rococo which flourished in the days when languid maidens drooped to the music of song birds and of the products of that passion for psychology which extended from Jonathan Edwards through Charles Brockden Brown to Poe, Hawthorne, and Henry James. The individual genius of the great writers obscures somewhat the significance which they have as illustrations of the Zeitgeist, but Chivers had just talent enough to be typical. Mr. Damon uses him chiefly as a specimen, and he succeeds by that means in illuminating the minds and fancies of a whole generation. No one interested in the history of the American temperament should miss his book.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Amy Lowell as Critic Again

Poetry and Poets. By Amy Lowell. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.25.

WHATEVER one may think of Amy Lowell as a poet, one has to grant her a keen critical mind. She was a propagandist, of course, and she had her favorites among the poets, but no desire to defend schools or persons blinded her to the exact qualities a poet might have. Her criticism is not synthetic nor has it any general theory of aesthetics behind it; it is simply a poet's intuitional grasp of what other poets are attempting, and such penetration is always worth studying. This book of posthumous essays, for the most part long reviews of books published during the months preceding her death, is very interesting. It is a clear indication that Miss Lowell's mind was alert to some of the new developments in poetry just when the tide was sweeping away from her own generation's values and on toward new values.

Amy Lowell believed in her own type of free verse, but she saw the faults of much of the free verse being written; she saw that the time had come when the younger poets must take very seriously the technique of their art—when they could no longer sing in any form whatsoever of anything and everything. She did not realize probably that such emphasis upon technique would lead to a tightening of form and an emphasis upon pattern which would destroy the free-verse school. She approved of and participated in the imagist school, but she saw how easily it could lead away from human emotion and toward the mere trick of word painting. She did not realize that the younger poets, having learned what they could from the imagists, were developing conceptual imaginations which would never be satisfied with the imagist technique.

She was a good fighter, and she upheld D. H. Lawrence against criticism both of his art and of his morality. She pointed out that the Georgian poets were a very sleepy lot and very wearisome to read. She saw Sandburg's danger in his desire to write propaganda, and she noted Robinson's love of the melodramatic, the last trait most critics of that remote poet would have thought to mention, and yet one of his most characteristic. In other words, Amy Lowell was of her generation completely, and yet anyone reading these essays cannot but believe that had she lived she would have begun analyzing and fighting for new causes, would have kept step with the times fairly well, and would have attempted to understand the younger poets and their very different ideals. What she would have made of the trend toward classicism, restraint, simplicity of subject, religious conviction of vision, it is hard to say; but most assuredly she would have had her opinions.

EDA LOU WALTON

Biology and the Humanities

Human History. By G. Elliot Smith. W. W. Norton and Company. $5.

THIS book, the author tells us, "has been written in a scientific laboratory where the principal device for the Study of Mankind is the process of dissection." The vantage-ground is significant not because Dr. Smith is a distinguished anatomist, but because of his belief that the only true history of mankind is that which combines biology with the humanities, the physical development of the race with its intellectual and social activities. His book, accordingly, is a study, popular in style but learned in substance, of the physical beginnings of the race and of the early civilizations which were attained in Egypt and Greece. We are shown the "natural man," untouched as yet by culture, chiefly preoccupied with the effort to understand himself as a living being and to penetrate the mysteries of life and death. Prominent in the picture is the mummy, prepared by a dissector who, with "a much more ambitious aim than the mere preservation of a corpse," had "persuaded himself that in making a mummy he was actually prolonging the existence of the body so that it might be reanimated as a living being." Around the mummy Dr. Smith sees created architecture, sculpture, music, dancing, and other "essential arts and crafts," together with "the deepest aspirations of the human spirit." It was only after hundreds of thousands of years that man "began to devise civilization" and thereby "became entangled in the meshes of the theory of the state," from which entanglement he was rescued by the Greeks, who "cut the Gordian knot" and restored to human reason "the freedom it had lost." Since then "human history has been a conflict between the rationalism of Hellas and the superstition of Egypt." As an attempt to unify biological and cultural history the book is certainly notable.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

King of the Armament Racket

The Mystery Man of Europe: Sir Basil Zaharoff. By Richard Lewinsohn. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

FOR half a century Sir Basil Zaharoff, to the uninformed public a figure of mysterious splendor, has been known among the war-mongers of Europe as chief bagman of Mars. He has been a master-vendor of armament applying all the tricks of salesmanship on a grand scale, by contact and intrigue and deft expenditure making ministers and governments armament-minded and war-minded. When his market has been slack his agents have stimulated trade by subtly promoting international hatreds and fears. The rewards for these eminent social services have been ample. Sir Basil, now an aged gentleman in a wheel-chair, is said to be one of the richest men in the world. He has received the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor and the Grand Cross of the Order of the British Empire, and he has many similar trinkets from lesser governments which were also lavish with gratitude and cannon fodder.

Sir Basil was born in Anatolia of Greek parents and grew up in Constantinople and Athens. His early adult career, at least in the narrative of Dr. Lewinsohn, was obscure and apparently dubious. At the age of twenty-eight, in 1877, he was appointed agent for the Balkans for the Anglo-Swedish armament firm of Nordenfeldt. Business prospects were excellent. The Russian Czar was engaged in "liberating" his Slavic brethren in the south from the Turk, and the Balkan peninsula was aflame. From the first young Zaharoff showed a peculiar aptitude for making the most of his opportunity. Though peace was declared in 1878, by 1880 the army of Greece had increased from 40,000 to 100,000 men. Zaharoff got a full share of the business of outfitting this host and won the commendation of his employers.

In the eighties the advent of the quick-firing gun gave a great fillip to the armament industry. Zaharoff was quick to see the possibilities of the new weapon. He brought Nordenfeldt in touch with Hiram Maxim and the two combined forces. When they split a few years later Zaharoff went with Maxim. The Maxim firm was purchased in 1897 by the great British concern of Vickers' Sons and Company, and Zaharoff entered on a much broader field of operations. Members of the British government and of the aristocracy were among the prominent shareholders and directors, and the highly placed gentlemen who enjoyed generous dividends neglected no opportunity for patriotic propaganda in favor of ample preparedness. In England the armament racketeers and their confederates lied about German preparedness and in Germany they lied about British plans. Among the little nations bribery was the handmaiden of mendacity. After some years of this intensive salesmanship, interspersed with several fat little wars, the arms-laden governments sprang at each other's throats. The year 1914 arrived and with it the "great time." Zaharoff was made a Commander of the Legion of Honor by the French government on the day that Jean Jaurès was assassinated in Paris. "As the representative of Vickers, Zaharoff was the confidant of Lloyd George, the Minister of Munitions, and these personal relations continued when the latter became Prime Minister. In Paris also Zaharoff obtained access to government circles. He came in contact with the Prime Minister, Viviani, with Briand, and Painlevé."

The international armament-makers won the war from the first gun. The gigantic dog fight was their free-for-all. However, the aftermath of the ill-starred Greek invasion of Asia Minor seems to have been more or less a private venture instigated by Sir Basil and his old comrade Lloyd George. Sir Basil had started his career by getting Greece into a postscript war after the peace of 1878 and apparently this same technique was followed forty years later. Dr. Lewinsohn intimates that the Greek invasion was only an opening move of an ambitious business plan, that perhaps Sir Basil "was carrying the torch of war to the whole Mohammedan world." Even leaving that out of consideration, in his private war for Anatolia Zaharoff played for huge stakes. Had he won he would have controlled great shipyards on the Bosporus and held a rich claim in the Eastern oil fields. The failure of this enterprise is said to have cost him half his fortune.

Dr. Lewinsohn's biography is hardly a complete picture. Mysteries remain about the mystery man and about the curious relations of his business with the rulers of nations. By the thoughtful reader, however, much illumination can be gained from this narrative. One cannot fail to wonder how a society pretending to civilization can permit powerful private organizations to maintain a vested interest in war. It seems a too dangerous kind of special privilege to pass without curtailment. Before the war, Dr. Lewinsohn tells us, Armstrong, the greatest British armament firm, had among its most prominent shareholders sixty members of the aristocracy, eight members of Parliament, and five bishops. Possibly that helps to explain the persistent silence of the press, the pulpit, and the forum about the business that draws dividends from mass murder. Perhaps it helps to explain why the League of Nations, which is so voluble on minor pieties, does nothing to face the international shame of the armament racket.

HAROLD KELLOCK

Books in Brief

Rogue Herries. By Hugh Walpole. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Mr. Walpole's latest is a long novel oddly compounded of historical characters and events, various branches of an imaginary eighteenth-century English family, and, in greater detail, one offshoot of that family—a rogue. That is to say, he is called a rogue; but he is a sad disappointment. The volume has such a full-bodied look about it that one might well hope for a fine, hearty English novel in the tradition of Fielding and Thackeray with, for a rogue, one of those gentleman rascals that have come down to us from the earliest days of the picaresque novel. But one would be sorely let down. Rogue Herries in spite of his eighteenth-century clothes is a child of the romantic revolution. He is a brooding, Byronic, even Werther-like soul, who in middle life finds salvation through love of a gipsy, red-haired waif, and through his arduous but unsuccessful efforts at tilling the soil with his own hands. Although—to speak in symbols—he wears a scarlet "R" beneath his waistcoat, his title of "rogue" comes to be used more in affection than in derision. Of course, since the setting is eighteenth century, there are stinks and brawls and broken heads. And Mr. Walpole frequently finds it necessary to interpolate apologies because some of his characters, being after all but creatures of their age, are somewhat free in their language. In spite of all the trappings, however, the dominant note is strangely reminiscent of the Victorian decadence. The fact is that the whole book with its awkwardly displayed parallel narrations, its sentimental heavy-handedness, its bogus eighteenth-century atmosphere is nothing short of preposterous.

Emily Dickinson, Friend and Neighbor. By MacGregor Jenkins. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

MacGregor Jenkins was one of the children who played about Emily Dickinson's home, ate the gingerbread she romantically let down in a basket from an upper window, and received from her mysterious notes and gifts of flowers. His father was an intimate friend of Emily's brother Austin, and both his parents were numbered among the poet's closer acquaintances. Mr. Jenkins, writing of the "Miss Emily" he remembers, seeks to counteract the impression that she was an eccentric and melancholy recluse. To preserve her personal life she did, he admits, limit the circle of her friends, but he maintains that within that circle she preserved normal relationships and gave herself richly to those she loved. All this is evident enough from Mrs. Bianchi's "Life and Letters," but it is true that a contrary impression has gained currency, and Mr. Jenkins doubtless does well to make the point clear. His discussions of Miss Dickinson as poet are modest and rather commonplace; it requires no special discernment, for example, to remark that she was "an artist in words." His most important contribution to the study of her work lies in his emphasis on the individuality of her most casual acts and her most spontaneous sayings. The quality of perception that distinguishes Emily Dickinson's poetry permeated the whole of her life. Her personality was integrated in a sense that makes the jargon of psychiatry seem feeble.

Prize Poems. 1913-1929. Edited by Charles Wagner. Charles Boni. $.75.

These "Prize Poems" form an interesting survey of poetry during the twenties. And Mr. Wagner's idea of gathering them together is a very good one. They appear, moreover, in the Boni Paper Books series, an inexpensive and delightful presentation, and with a very charming introduction by Mark Van Doren. The level of the prize poems included is on the whole high. Such outstanding poems as T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land, Malcolm Cowley's Blue Juniata, William Carlos Williams's Paterson, and Wallace Stevens's Pecksniffiana would make any collection interesting. There are few really bad poems, and those are distinctly in the class of occasional verse on patriotic or assigned subjects. Most of the prizes were given by a magazine to the best poems printed in its pages during a year's time and were not for assigned subjects in verse. If the kind of poetry has been dictated in any way at all it is only by some undefined standard, literary or political, on the part of the magazine granting the prize. The Dial poems are the most distinguished, therefore, in literary quality; Poetry, with its many years of granting prizes, presents in this collection a kind of survey of the entire period, beginning with Lindsay's General William Booth Enters Heaven and running through all the well-known names of the renaissance of 1913. Contemporary Verse, truly conservative, grants its prizes to sweet lyrics. The Nation inclines toward poems on more broadly human subject matter. Altogether this anthology of prize poems is representative and adequate, a book worth having.

Dandelion Days. By Henry Williamson. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

"Dandelion Days" standing by itself and not considered in relation to other volumes of Mr. Williamson's spiritual biography of Willie Maddison is a charming story of English public-school life just before the war. As those who are familiar with Willie's childhood from "The Beautiful Years" or with his early manhood in "The Pathway" know, he is the eternally recurrent lover of nature in all her varied forms. The conflict between forest and school for possession of his time, his fine friendship for Jack Temperley, and his boyhood love-dream for Elsie are the major themes in this melodic novel of an imaginative boy's adolescence. Most of the space in the book is taken up with accounts of the perpetual feuds carried on between the boys and their instructors, many of which are richly humorous or downright and delightfully funny. But even of a good thing—as many a sage has warned us—there can be too much. The chief fault of "Dandelion Days" lies in its relationship with the other novels that belong under the inclusive title "The Flax of Dream." Willie's adolescent years are here, one feels, being too lightly dealt with. Those who do not know Mr. Williamson, however, should hasten to make his acquaintance.

Potato Face. By Carl Sandburg. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.50.

Sandburg's new Rootabaga volume contains twelve stories told by the Potato Face Blind Man to some of his little friends. They are all about Yonder the Yinder, Pigeon Foot, Longarms, Quish and Quee, the Hot Ashes Sisters; and about such extraordinary creatures as "flinyons" and "snooxes" and "spiffs" and "spink bugs." These fancies and fooleries seem, for the most part, intended to be quite meaningless, unmarred by ulterior motives. For certain imaginative children, and also for those adults who have been able to retain a childlike love for preposterous make-believe and funny-sounding cacophony, Potato Face's conversation should prove a delight. And if you have enjoyed the other Rootabaga books you will like this one.

The Loyalists in the American Revolution. By Claude H. Van Tyne. New York: Peter Smith. $4.

This work was originally published in 1902 and has long been considered the classic one on the subject. It is time that a new, thoroughgoing study was made of the Loyalists, but the lapse of years has not impaired the value of this one, and both scholar and general reader may well be grateful for a reprint of what has for long been a scarce and almost unobtainable book.

Money. By D. H. Robertson. Introduction by J. M. Keynes. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.25.

This is a revised and largely rewritten edition of a book with the same title first published in 1922, the reasons for the recasting being the important events in financial history that have occurred in the interval, including six years' experience of the Federal Reserve system and the fact that "the author believes himself to have learnt more of the truth about the theory of money." The volume is the second number of the Cambridge Economic Handbooks, edited by Professor Keynes.

Orphan of Eternity, or the Katabasis of the Lord Lucifer Satan. By Carl Heinrich. Louis Carrier and Company. $2.50.

In a day when the obviously clever is heralded as ironic subtlety, this genuine satire is likely to receive less than its due. Satan, thrust from hell, victim of a reform movement the purpose of which is to provide the inhabitants with a consciousness of guilt that they may have the pleasure of sinning, ascends to earth, where he finds things not quite what they used to be. He continues on the ascent and eventually arrives at the gates of heaven, where the denouement is, to say the least, unusual. Mr. Heinrich has chosen to couch his descriptive passages in Biblical English, which he writes delightfully, and in parts "Orphan of Eternity" rises to splendid utterance, as witness the conversation between Eve and Satan, the speeches of the three wise men (whom most readers should recognize), and the outline of living as practiced on the planet of Paranoia. Throughout most of his book Mr. Heinrich is as mordacious as Swift, but toward the end his admiration and affection for his hero get the better of him, so much so that he has yielded to the temptation of providing a superlatively happy ending.

Finale

THE season now reaching its end seems to me to have been rather more entertaining than usual. An assiduous theatergoer might easily have spent some twenty-five or thirty very agreeable evenings in various playhouses, and he might besides, in the course of his peregrinations, have accumulated a lesser but still considerable number of impressions sure to remain in his memory. Neither "The Green Pastures" nor "Strictly Dishonorable" is likely to be soon forgotten, and neither, for that matter, is "Meteor"—even though this latter play be granted to have been tantalizingly imperfect. Each had a freshness and an originality which bear witness to the fact that the American drama is genuinely alive, and each was produced with a skill equaled only by that displayed in three or four revivals of familiar plays.

"The Green Pastures" has been acclaimed with an enthusiasm surprising to certain wise men of the theater, and its greatness has been so generally recognized by the critical that it seems hardly worth while to insist again that it is almost a miracle, but the excellence of "Strictly Dishonorable" is of so light and fragile a kind that it may once more be defended against those who can never associate excellence with fragility. Mr. Sturges, its author, failed lamentably with his next play, and I do not know how far he was conscious of the qualities which lifted "Strictly Dishonorable" high above other comedies which it superficially resembles; but the secret, I think, lies in the fact that it gives a local habitation to a timeless spirit. It is comedy as comedy has always been written; it deals, as such comedy always does, with the triumph of gaiety and wit and insouciance over prudence and respectability and decorum. But conventional as, in this best sense of the word, it is, it is also completely of today. Any great comedy writer of any nation or time would recognize its spirit, and yet only an American of 1930 could get the full flavor of its allusions or guess how neatly it catches the accent of the moment. Thus it accomplishes what every such comedy should accomplish. It takes the material afforded by contemporary life and gives it the form consecrated by the intelligence of generations, showing how our own doings can be interpreted after the same fashion as those which furnish the material for the great comedies of the past. To be sure, "Strictly Dishonorable" will not last long. It has few elements of permanence. And yet it might be called eternal, in a sense which has nothing to do with duration, because its spirit is part of an eternal spirit.

These two plays—the one so completely mondaine, the other achieving spirituality by a curiously oblique route—are the two most significant new plays seen during the year, but the record of the season would be very incomplete if it did not mention three productions remarkably fine: the Theater Guild's "A Month in the Country," Jed Harris's "Uncle Vanya," and Eva Le Gallienne's "Romeo and Juliet." Miss Le Gallienne gives us one of the most satisfactory productions of Shakespeare seen here in a long time, and the two plays from the Russian are interesting illustrations of an understanding of a certain kind of art for which America seems suddenly to have developed a comprehension and a taste. And if I may, to conclude, suggest candidates for the non-existent prize for the best individual performance given by any actor during the season I should like to add to the names which I mentioned at mid-season those of Richard B. Harrison ("The Green Pastures"), Alla Nazimova ("A Month in the Country"), Leslie Howard ("Berkeley Square"), and Eva Le Gallienne ("Romeo and Juliet").

At the Fulton Theater George M. Cohan is reviving the hilarious burlesque melodrama "The Tavern," which many will remember as the source of that useful question "What's all the shootin' for?" It is a perfect actor's play. The heroine has an opportunity to denounce three men as the villains responsible for her ruin, and though there is no sense to any of the action every one of the cast is given an opportunity for continual acting of the most "juicy" kind. The pity is only that a number of our more actory actors are not permitted to play the chief roles in turn. They might thus work a good deal of the congenital bad theater out of their systems and perhaps be in a position to perform with more restraint in plays not intended as burlesque.

"Ada Beats the Drum" (John Golden Theater) is a more than usually amusing farce based upon the adventures of some innocents abroad. Mama, anxious to become "Continental," has dragged her husband and daughter to Europe in the hope that they can be made to absorb some culture and some savoir-vivre. But father resists all the efforts which are made to teach him to "sip an apéritif," and even in Venice, where everybody else floats here and there in a gondola, daughter is obviously only riding around in a boat. Needless to say, the ways of the Middle West are finally vindicated, but the satire is both pointed and moderately subtle.

Joseph Wood Krutch

Will Gandhi Win?

By RICHARD B. GREGG

THE present upheaval in India is so vast and complex that it is very difficult to foresee the probable outcome. For Americans the difficulty is increased by the fragmentariness of all the reports which we get. Having left India as recently as April 17 I should like to describe certain elements of the movement for whatever such facts and opinions may be worth.

First of all, in regard to the Hindu-Moslem quarrels, so strongly stressed in all the British discussions: It is to be remembered that these quarrels occur almost entirely in the cities and but rarely in the villages. As nearly 90 per cent of the Indian population lives in villages, the city disputes are not so all-important as some reports would indicate. While the occasions of these disputes are various, the real cause is the desire of the Moslems for more power. At present many of their leaders believe that they can get power by siding with the government.

But the Moslem leaders do not wholly trust the British. Dr. Abdullah Suhrawady, in a recent supplementary note to the Indian Central Committee, expressed at considerable length the doubts and hesitations of the Moslem community. One sentence of it is revealing. He wrote:

> Can Moslems rely, as in the past, on the pledges, promises, and assurances of British statesmen and administrators, or are pledges and promises wrung during the storm and stress of war and the turmoil and trouble of unrest and discontent to be forgotten during times of peace and tranquillity and to be treated as scraps of paper?

As perhaps another indication of this state of mind we may take the following message issued on April 19 by the Moslem leaders Mohammed Ali and Shaukat Ali to the president of the United Provinces Moslem Conference: "Mussulmans must not allow themselves to be made the tools of any party. We want freedom for all, not a change of masters for Mussulmans." It is to be remembered that these two Ali brothers in 1920-21 were fast friends of Mr. Gandhi and worked side by side with him in the non-cooperation campaign. While they and other Moslem leaders are suspicious of many Hindus, it would seem that they have not wholly lost faith in Mr. Gandhi. For instance, at the All India Moslem Conference on Palestine Affairs held in Bombay on April 19, the president, Maulvi Mohammed Yakub, who is also deputy president of the Indian Legislative Assembly, strongly opposed the civil-disobedience movement, and yet after the meeting was over, according to the Associated Press of India,* he said that "as far as satisfying Moslem demands was concerned, he was convinced that the final say did not rest with Mr. Gandhi or Pandit Motilal Nehru, who might, perhaps, be actuated by conciliatory motives."

In my judgment, however, if Britain by her policy or acts in Egypt, Palestine, Iraq, or in relation to Afghanistan or the Indian Northwest Frontier makes a mistake which offends the Moslems of India, or if Mr. Gandhi's movement gains much more momentum, then the Indian Mohammedan leaders will soon swing to Mr. Gandhi. It is possible that the trouble at Peshawar on April 28, reported by wireless, and the sudden imposition of a rigid Indian press censorship by the Viceroy on the following day are an indication that some such slip as this occurred, for Peshawar is predominantly Mohammedan. The censorship will certainly tend to make the Mohammedans, as well as Hindus and people outside of India, somewhat suspicious of all the official news from the Indian government.

If the Mohammedan leaders come to feel that Mr. Gandhi and the National Congress have the greater probability of winning the struggle, then the Hindu-Moslem tension will become quite manageable. As long as the British are in power they are compelled to use the policy of divide et impera, and so the communal quarrels continue. That is not the personal policy of Lord Irwin or of the best Englishmen, but it is the inevitable policy of the bureaucracy which controls the practical interpretation and application of all orders from above. If British power wanes, the Moslems will become reconciled with their Hindu neighbors. It happened in 1920 and it can happen again. Indeed, Indian national independence ought to prove a far more unifying force than the exterior aim of the Khilafat was in 1920-21.

Lastly, it is to be realized that the Mohammedans are not united in their support of the government and their opposition to Mr. Gandhi. Many prominent Mohammedans in all parts of the country are working heartily for civil disobedience. Mr. Gandhi expressly nominated a Mohammedan, the Honorable Abbas Tyabji, former judge of the High Court, Baroda State, to succeed him in command of the salt-making volunteers in case Mr. Gandhi was arrested.

Although the support from Moslems has been very reassuring to the British, there is a counterbalancing factor which in my opinion outweighs the Moslem support. That factor is the understanding of Mr. Gandhi's principle of non-violent resistance on the part of all classes and groups of Indians. This understanding, and a willingness to give the principle a trial, is far more widespread that it was in 1920-21. This factor of popular understanding, support, and sympathy with the weapon being used, together with the fact that the actual number of volunteers is greater now, I believe, than it was in 1920-21, looks favorable for the independence party. Another factor of Mr. Gandhi's strength is that a great many more women are taking active part in this struggle than was the case in 1920-21. In Bombay, Ahmedabad, Madras, Delhi, and Allahabad the women were, according to last reports, especially active. Mr. Gandhi's message to the women is inspiring. In his paper Young India during the week of April 8 he wrote of women:

> In this non-violent warfare their contribution should be much greater than men's.

> To call women the weaker sex is libel. It is man's injustice to woman. If by strength is meant brute strength, then indeed is woman less brute than man. If by strength is meant moral power, then woman is immeasurably man's superior. Has she not greater intuition? Has she not greater powers of endurance? Has she not greater courage? If non-violence is the law of our being, the future is with women. They have nursed these thoughts now for years.

And to the village women of Navsari he is reported to have said, "If this movement is to succeed, yours will have to be as big a share as man's, if not much bigger."

Another point to consider is the attitude of the Indian moderates and liberals. Without their support Britain could not govern India. During the past ten years they have struggled hard to win their goal by cooperating with the government in the legislatures. Now many have become disillusioned and have withdrawn, and some of the leading ones, such as Pandit Malaviya, N. C. Kelkar, and T. Prakasam, have gone over to Mr. Gandhi's camp and are active in promoting foreign-cloth boycott and the manufacture of contraband salt. Their state of mind was well expressed by Mr. K. M. Munshi after he resigned from the Bombay Legislative Council on April 14. He wrote to Mr. Gandhi asking to join his forces, saying in part:

> But after anxious thought I am convinced that the government is determined not to transfer any substantial power to Indians, that the present constitution is a mask to conceal irresponsible despotism of a well-organized official group, that no political progress or economic salvation is possible unless by magnitude of our sacrifice we compel, to borrow your inimitable phrase, "a complete change of heart" in those who have constituted themselves relentless enemies of our aspiration. In 1920 I left the Congress because at Nagpur you changed its creed. Today, in 1930, I rejoin it because I have come to believe that creed. For long I disapproved of your methods; today except through them I cannot visualize a free India.

It seems now as if the policy of the government would tend to drive more and more moderates and liberals into the independence camp. For instance, the punishments imposed upon the civil-disobedience leaders are extremely and arbitrarily different, though the offenses—sedition and violation of the salt laws—are all the same. Before the campaign began Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel, one of Mr. Gandhi's strongest supporters, was arrested and given three months' "simple" imprisonment and a fine of 500 rupees, not for speaking but simply for telling the constable that he intended to speak. About a month later Mr. Gandhi himself announced that he would go to that same village to speak, went there, and delivered a lengthy seditious speech to a considerable crowd, but he was entirely unmolested by the police. Mr. Gandhi's son Ramdas was given six months' imprisonment for making salt, but when Mr. Gandhi himself went to that village a few days later and himself likewise violated the salt law and delivered a seditious speech to the crowd, he was not interfered with or arrested. His other son, Devdos, in another province was given three months' simple imprisonment for inciting to violation of the salt laws. Mr. Jamnalal Bajaj and two others were given two years' "rigorous" imprisonment for making salt, while Mr. Nariman in the same province got only one month's simple imprisonment for exactly the same offense. In the hundreds of other cases the terms of imprisonment imposed range from one month to two years—some simple, some rigorous; some with money fines, some without. Another leader, Mr. T. Prakasam, in Madras, for the same offense of salt-making was arrested and immediately released. Upon repeating the offense a few days later he was again arrested, fined heavily, and his motor car seized and auctioned by the police to pay the fine, whereupon he was again released. According to latest dispatches he has again been arrested.

The government has followed the plan of arresting chiefly the prominent leaders and not the less-known volunteers, "lopping off the tall poppies," as Young India describes it. And in the midst of all the jail sentences and fines, Mr. Gandhi, the fountain head of sedition and inspirer of the whole movement, was allowed to go scot free until almost two months after his campaign had begun. Such inequalities of law enforcement cannot but make the moderates and liberals feel that law as administered by the British in India has no connection with justice, but is merely an instrument of intimidation and control by the alien British minority. The police are not servants of the courts but only puppets of the executive.

Other indications of ferment among the moderates are found in the resolutions of the bar associations of Delhi, Mangalore, Meerut, Bhagalpur, and other places that their members must wear khaddar (Indian homespun) for attendance at court; and in the strong protests of the bar associations of Bombay, Viramgam, and other towns against the alleged illegality of the arrest of Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel. Mr. Broker, the crown prosecutor of Ahmedabad, resigned his position on April 11 and joined Mr. Gandhi. The press censorship may have a further disillusioning effect upon some of the moderates and drive them into action with Mr. Gandhi as the sole outlet for their repressed feelings and the only way to justify their previous professions of desire for Indian self-government. Even the ruling princes of the Indian States are showing signs of discontent and have publicly notified the Viceroy that they want better treatment. Mr. Nicholson's recent book states some of the grounds for their resentment. If British India gets freedom the Indian States will not lag far behind in requests for a share of the cake.

It is said in the pro-British press that the depressed classes are opposed to Mr. Gandhi. So far as I know, only two leaders of untouchables from Poona have spoken thus. On the other hand, Deirukkhar, a leader of untouchables in Bombay, took part in the salt-making on April 12, while thousands of untouchables in Ahmedabad are among Mr. Gandhi's active followers. Mr. Gandhi's years of continuous work and achievement for the untouchables assure him ample support from them. Time will tell.

The Akali Sikhs are another accession of strength to the independence camp. On April 12 at Amritsar there was a meeting of the Working Committee of the Shromani Akali Dal and Jathedars of the district Akali Jathas. It was, according to the report in the Hindustan Times of Delhi, "resolved that . . . to keep aloof from the struggle is not in keeping with the noble traditions of the Sikhs." The meeting fixed the number of volunteers to be furnished by each district and decided that they would join the satyagrahis in twenty days, which allowed time to complete the reaping of the harvest.

The Indian business community has thrown its influence to the side of Mr. Gandhi. Mr. G. D. Birla, who resigned with Pandit Malaviya from the Legislative Assembly, is one of the wealthiest Indians, with large cotton- and jute-mill interests, and a member of the Marwari community of merchants. Mr. Jamnalal Bajaj, one of Mr. Gandhi's right-hand men, is also a wealthy member of that community. The wife, the sister, and two of the daughters of the leading cotton manufacturer of Ahmedabad are active in the satyagraha campaign. The foreign-cloth boycott is supported by the Maharastra Chamber of Commerce, the Bombay Shroffs' (Merchants') Association, the Bombay Stock Exchange, the Bombay Bullion Exchange, the cloth merchants' associations of Bombay, Delhi, Amritsar, Cawnpore, Rawalprindi, and many other cities.

A final significant item is that the movement to refuse to pay land revenue taxes, which yield a large share of the government's revenue, seems actually to have begun. According to the Associated Press of India, on April 19 at Bardoli Mr. Gandhi told the villagers that if they would use only contraband salt, eradicate the drink evil, spin and wear only homespun cloth, and stop paying land revenue taxes they would gain swaraj (self-government). Bardoli is the district in which the villagers in 1928, by non-violent resistance led by Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel, compelled the Bombay Provincial Government to grant revision of the assessment of land taxes. On April 23, according to the Associated Press of India and the Bombay Chronicle, the villagers of Raas, where Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel was arrested, decided not to pay land revenue taxes. It is fairly likely that this movement will spread.

In closing, let me quote from the Indian Social Reformer of Bombay, edited by a fine and able moderate, Mr. K. Natarajan. In its issue of the week of April 20 he reviewed the steadily accumulating power of Mr. Gandhi's movement and said, among other things:

> For our own part we do not see why a perfectly peaceful revolution cannot be achieved by Mahatma Gandhi's method in the absence of appropriate constitutional machinery, and if experience in the religious and social field counts we are sure that it can be so achieved. It is a method requiring infinite endurance, patience, and perseverance, but it is a sure method whose every failure but makes final success the more certain.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

NO PRESIDENT in recent years has received rougher treatment at the hands of Congress than was the fate of Herbert Hoover in the overriding of his veto of the Spanish War Veterans' pension bill calling for an additional expenditure of $11,712,000. To us the President's veto seems sound and just; he was not opposed to the principle of the bill but to the looseness of its drafting. He could rightly see, for instance, no reason why we should violate our historic policy of not awarding pensions for disabilities arising from vicious habits, or such causes as venereal disease, alcoholism, or drugs. No pension has been granted to a Civil War veteran of less than ninety days' service; this bill reduces the length of necessary service to seventy days. Mr. Hoover thinks, moreover, that the applicant should prove that he really needs the money. All this was a red flag to Congress. The Senate overrode the veto by 61 votes to 18, the House by 294 to 14. As he contemplates the latter figures, Mr. Hoover may well exclaim, "Et tu, Brute!" For while the Senate has frequently castigated him, this is the first time that the faithful House majority has broken away. This is the measure of the President's intense unpopularity both in and out of his party—an unpopularity evidenced also by the lack of any applause when he is heard and seen in the movie houses. It bodes ill for the rest of his term. The fault is his own, for until now he has been a leader who will not lead.

THE TARIFF BILL again hangs in the balance with a closer vote certain than had been anticipated, for some Senators are literally being deluged with protests. Competent observers even declare that if the bill could be held off three or four weeks longer it would never become law of the land. The mystery as to who wants it continues. Outside of some, relatively few, manufacturers, no one appears openly for it. Some persons are, it is true, begging that it be passed so that business may be put out of the misery of its uncertainty, with the expectation that business will then revive. Nothing could be farther from the fact. If this measure becomes a law the lot of every American citizen will be harder. He will be able to buy less because what he buys will cost him more. As for business itself, it needs export trade more than ever before and no deadlier blow could be struck at that than the passage and signing of this bill. We are well aware that Congress does not wish to see its labors of fourteen months go for nothing. It would, however, be far better for it to swallow its pride and kill the bill rather than to do such damage to American trade and prosperity. But the ignorance and stupidity in regard to economic law of the average Republican legislators are so great that they still have no conception that they are playing with fire. To all foreign complaints they retort: "What business is it of theirs?"

MEANWHILE, PROTESTS against the tariff have been piling up with unprecedented speed, and from sources which have never before spoken out in any such manner or with any such unanimity. Thus, all the leading automobile manufacturers, including Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., president of General Motors, are demanding the killing of the bill. The export managers of General Motors declare that they are "out at the front where they feel the full force of the bitter resentment stirred up in other countries by the proposal to raise the American tariff walls." Mr. Sloan believes the failure of the bill would serve notice "that the United States recognizes the important principle that it must buy if it is to sell." Experts in attendance at the National Foreign Trade Council held in Los Angeles at the end of May were outspoken against the measure, which they all believed would do great harm to American trade. Thus, Mr. T. M. Haight, secretary of the International General Electric Company, declares that the decrease in trade which will follow the tariff bill will go far to prevent the stabilization of American industry. Harvey S. Firestone, the great rubber manufacturer, is heretical enough to say that the bill "is a positive detriment to business generally and I hope that it will be defeated." The president of the Pillsbury Flour Corporation in Minneapolis and the head of the National Cash Register Company are both against the bill. France has acted again by increasing the import on wheat from sixty to eighty francs per one hundred kilograms gross. There is a strong movement in Belgium for the renunciation of its commercial treaty with the United States, containing a most-favored-nation clause. Paris reports that this proposal has been enthusiastically indorsed in other countries.

THE SECRET CABLE MESSAGES, paraphrased after the usual roundabout manner of the Department of State, which have been turned over to Senator Borah under an injunction of secrecy are not likely to help very much, we suspect, in convincing either the Foreign Relations Committee or the Senate that the naval treaty ought to be ratified. The messages, it is intimated, go to show that Mr. Hoover and Mr. MacDonald were in complete accord after their talks at Rapidan. If they do, and if this accord was what it was represented to be at the time, these cables will set the treaty in rather dismal colors, for it is clear that the treaty accomplishes no important limitation of naval armaments, that there will actually be a great deal more naval tonnage in 1936 than there is now, and that instead of financial savings the United States alone stands to pay out a round billion dollars for the elusive thing known as parity. If the treaty is ratified, it will not be because it possesses the merits which the public had been led to expect, or because it makes war very much less likely, but because Mr. Hoover is determined to jam it through.

RAILROAD NET EARNINGS for April, based on the figures of the first seventy roads reporting, show a decrease of 33 per cent from April of last year, comparing with decreases of 28.2, 29.8, and 37.3 per cent for January, February, and March respectively. Gross revenue fell 12 per cent in April, against 12.5 per cent in March, and 10.1 per cent in February. Some comfort may be found in the fact that the progressive decline of the preceding three months appears to be stayed. During the first quarter both gross and net earnings were lower than in any year since 1922. The figures suggest the severity of the present business depression, a world-wide phenomenon which the Westminster Bank of London in its monthly letter characterizes as a major cyclical movement. The disagreeable truth is that we are in the trough of a depression, and it behooves us to prepare vigorously for another difficult winter. In this connection the Wagner unemployment bills have been passed by the Senate, and the House Committee on Labor has made a favorable report on the one providing for better employment statistics. The other two measures, providing for a prosperity-reserve fund against just such emergencies as this and for federal aid in extending employment agencies, slumber in the House Judiciary Committee, of which Congressman George S. Graham is chairman. How can the Administration leaders afford to let these bills die?

A UNANIMOUS DECISION by eight justices of the Supreme Court (Justice McReynolds not sitting), affirming the right of railroad employees to be represented in negotiations with their employer by their national trade union and not by a company union, may be commended to those discouraged souls who are inclined to despair of the court. One of the Southern Pacific subsidiaries refused to treat with its employees through their Brotherhood and insisted on negotiating through the company union, the Association of Clerical Employees—Southern Pacific Lines. The District Court granted an injunction against the company, which promptly violated it. Judge Hutcheson thereupon sentenced three officials to jail for contempt, and ordered the Association disestablished and the Brotherhood reinstated as the representative of the employees. This injunction was sustained by the Circuit Court of Appeals, and is now upheld by the Supreme Court in a sweeping opinion handed down by Chief Justice Hughes which overrules completely the contentions of the company. The case is one in which legal principles are by no means necessarily of controlling force, and it is a fair question whether a decision rendered six months ago would have been unanimously favorable to the contention of the unions. By the very nature of its work the court is in the highest sense a political body. Its members on the whole are wise men, and it would be strange indeed if the lesson of the Hughes-Parker rebellion had been wholly lost on them.

A BLACK MAN in Oklahoma was arrested on the highway two miles from Chickasha, Oklahoma, on the afternoon of Memorial Day, charged with assaulting a white woman who lived in a dugout a mile from town. He denied his guilt, but the woman identified him, according to the story, and he was put in jail. That evening a mob attacked the jail bent on a lynching party. At this point the story becomes a little obscure, except that "in the melee [according to the United Press] some one was able to slip unobserved to the cell where the Negro was clawing at the iron bars, and shot him"; except that during a lull in the man hunt, when the mob had "apparently dispersed," the wounded Negro, lying in his cell, was stabbed twice by one of a handful of "curious" persons who were allowed not only to loiter about the jail but to go to the second floor, where the Negro was kept. The "loiterer" turned out to be the husband of the woman in the dugout! The cell was apparently open, for "he paused over the unconscious Negro and suddently thrust a knife into the Negro's chest." It should be added that the National Guard, charged with protecting life and property, was somewhere in the offing armed with machine-guns, that an attempt to burn the jail was unsuccessful—and that the Negro died the next day in a hospital in Oklahoma City fifty miles away. Five men, including the "loiterer" who stabbed the Negro, were arrested, but were released pending investigation. This is not a particularly forceful beginning for the "immediate and vigorous prosecution" which Governor Holloway says he will demand. Meanwhile, in Sherman, Texas, fourteen men who took part in the recent lynching there have been charged with arson, burglary, assault to murder, and inciting a riot, and have been transferred to Dallas for trial.

"A RIP-ROARING CYCLONE" is the description which a writer in the Portland, Oregon, Telegram gives of the irruption of George W. Joseph into the Oregon gubernatorial campaign. Mr. Joseph, who until a few days ago was a lawyer, attracted State-wide attention some time since by his vigorous but unsuccessful defense of the will of one E. Henry Wemme, half of whose fortune was to benefit a charitable trust in Portland. More recently he has launched some bold attacks against the Public Service Commission and the power companies, and has declared that the State courts, in certain cases which he named, have been influenced by political and financial interests. For this last he has just been permanently disbarred by order of the Supreme Court. Shortly before his disbarment, however, he carried off the Republican nomination for Governor at the primaries by about 5,000 votes, after making the fight on the issue of personal vindication, touring the State by airplane, and addressing record-breaking audiences. If he is elected, as seems certain, there may be doings in Oregon, for Mr. Joseph is a hard hitter, his following believes in him enthusiastically, and the courts have played into his hands.

THE AMERICAN WAY with Mexico has always been an alternation of kicks and courtesy, but the pending proposal to restrict Mexican immigration into the United States involves a discrimination more glaring than that which has been directed at the Chinese and Japanese. The Harris bill, which has passed the Senate and is now before the House, applies to Mexico, alone among the countries of the Western Hemisphere, the national-origins immigration quota, thereby cutting down the number of permitted entries to about 1,900 annually. Why the restriction was not extended to all the Americas was told by that sterling hundred-per-center, Representative Albert Johnson of Washington, in a speech in this city on May 16. The House, Mr. Johnson explained, wanted a blanket restriction, but a sweeping attack of that kind "creates consolidated opposition from too many minorities to be handled just at present," so the "alien-minded" and the "anti-nationalists" are to be circumnavigated by going at the dangerous countries one by one. Quite so; if you can't hand out injustice wholesale for fear of a drubbing, try dispensing it at retail. Mexican opinion, naturally, is up in arms. Thus is the good work of Ambassador Morrow being undone. Mr. Hoover ought to veto the Harris bill if it comes his way.

DOES IT PAY TO PRAY? Thus the esteemed American Magazine, in advertising a marvelous article on Dean Shailer Mathews, of the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, and his "religious laboratory." The answer to the question evidently is, You bet! Witness the following: "Could a man make more money if now and then he prayed about his business?" asks the enterprising reporter. "I think so—if he is honest and serious," answers the dean. "Could he get a better job?" "I haven't much doubt of it." If further evidence is needed that, in the reporter's homely phrase, God is still on the job, or that, in the dean's more scholarly phrasing, He is not emeritus, listen to the religious leader's account of his forgetful colleague who was loaded down with three man-size jobs involving much detail: " 'God,' he prayed in all earnestness, 'help me to remember everything instantaneously, the moment it is needed.' Within a week he was master of the jobs, and never thereafter forgot an engagement or an essential detail. Without desire so intense that it became prayer, he might have failed." We have always respected Shailer Mathews as a liberal and intelligent religious teacher; but if he and his colleagues in divinity are willing to assume responsibility for these and other statements attributed to him in this article, we can only say, may God help the state of religious instruction in these United States! It evidently ought to be transferred from the divinity school to the college of business administration.

STONE WALLS are all the more a prison when the prisoner listens in on the doings of the world outside. But in spite of painful memories and associations most of the 3,000 prisoners in the Illinois penitentiary at Joliet were thankful for the first radio program made possible by the recent innovation of a tiny radio set in each of the 1,000 cells. The program, which was selected by an official at a central receiving apparatus, was a varied one, including baseball scores, current news, humorous sketches, dance tunes, and a symphony. More than one man "cried out in despair," dispatches record, at the too vivid recollection of his own freedom; and, indeed, throughout the prison, the livelier the music, the more thoughtful the listeners. One white-haired prisoner, who has lived behind the walls for thirty-five years, was bewildered and terrified, like Rip Van Winkle, by this new world, and confessed that more than ever does he dread his approaching parole. One of our most urgent prison problems is the mitigation of this numbing spiritual isolation, and Major Henry C. Hill, warden of the Joliet penitentiary, deserves praise for his innovation.

SO THE HISTORIC CENTURY MAGAZINE, a quarterly for the past year, has been joined together with the revitalized Forum. May no man put them asunder! Under Henry Goddard Leach's editorship the Forum has shown a great deal of life and vigor, has lived up to its title in giving both sides of pending questions, and has displayed gratifying evidence of growth. We hope that the combination will bring so many readers to the Forum as to insure that its rebirth has been followed by a permanence not to be questioned. All our high-grade monthlies work on too narrow margins, whereas those of the type of the Ladies' Home Journal roll in wealth. Meanwhile, we shall not forget the Century's great achievements of the past under Richard Watson Gilder and Robert Underwood Johnson and their associates. George Kennan's tremendous exposure of Czarist Russia in the early eighties alone entitles it to immortality, while its extraordinary series "Battles and Leaders of the Civil War" is still source material of unsurpassed value. Amalgamations being the order of the day on both sides of the Atlantic, there comes the news from London of the merging of the Daily News and Daily Chronicle, both widely read Liberal dailies. It is hoped that their joint daily circulation will be no less than 2,000,000 copies. The Daily News, whose first editor was Charles Dickens, having already swallowed the Westminster Gazette, is now the dominating Liberal daily in England, with its financial control in the hands of L. J. Cadbury of the well-known family of Quaker chocolate manufacturers. Thus, one by one, disappear the journalistic giants of yesteryear.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH'S REVIEW, printed elsewhere, of his six years of service as the dramatic critic of The Nation does not mean that the editor has lived up to his agreement to do away with either Mr. Krutch or his services at the end of this period. As it happens, he goes to France for a year on a Guggenheim Fellowship, to devote himself to his forthcoming book, and will take up his work again in the fall of 1931. During his absence The Nation, we are happy to say, will be served by Heywood Broun—in person—as dramatic critic. Let the theater take notice that his humor, his sarcasm, his kindliness and good nature are all to be reckoned with! Today we should like to share with our readers our own belief that in all its history no one connected with The Nation has shown greater promise or more rapidly established himself as a critic of the drama, literature, and life than has Joseph Wood Krutch.

Prohibition Flares Up

THAT the wets are plunging with renewed confidence into their fight to alter the Volstead law, or even to amend the Constitution and do away with prohibition, is obvious. The New York World, for example, is every day putting on the first page the latest wet recruits who were formerly drys. Thus, a city magistrate, Judge Jean Norris, Miss Katharine Bement Davis, former commissioner of correction in the metropolis, Adolph Lewisohn, the philanthropist, together with the head of a social settlement and various others, are heralded to fresh fame because they have abandoned the prohibition cause. At the same time the Baltimore Sun scans the heavens in vain for a wet who has gone dry, declaring that such an apostasy would be most important front-page news. And the Supreme Court of the United States has done a remarkable bit by declaring that the buyer of liquor does not violate the law although he knows when he buys it that it is contraband and is quite aware that the man who sells it to him is a criminal.

Then when the wet looks to Congress he sees that Senator Jones, author of the proposal to make violation of the prohibition laws a crime punishable by five years in prison and a fine up to $10,000, has declared that if his State, Washington, votes for modification or repeal he will abide by its decision. Senator Walsh of Montana, an equally ardent dry, has announced his willingness to have the voters of his State express their wishes through a referendum, and he declares: "Of course, I would stand by the vote in that referendum"—thus doing violence to his own conscience. But the wet's greatest thrill of late has been, of course, the speech of Dwight Morrow in New Jersey in which he came out for the old solution of States' rights with the proviso that the power of the federal government shall be invoked in some way to prevent wet States from inundating dry States with their liquor—a situation which in the days prior to prohibition did more than anything else to stimulate the drys to demand national abolition of liquor. It is interesting to note in this connection that so good a wet as Senator Bruce has declared that Dwight Morrow's solution will mean the return of the saloon in ten States and thirty-eight varieties of prohibition in others. The Literary Digest poll is also being used to the fullest extent, despite the fact that in the face of its Pennsylvania returns that State was so unkind as to nominate Gifford Pinchot for Governor on a dry ticket.

That these are portents we are free to say, and we welcome them as we welcome anything which will bring the issue to a head. We continue to believe that the present situation is intolerable and continue to urge as a first step a nation-wide referendum on the issue. If Senator Walsh is ready for such a test in his own State he ought to be ready for it in the nation. It would be admirable if he himself should take the lead in the next Congress in demanding a poll of the entire people with a ballot stating each issue clearly, succinctly, and unequivocally. Again, we welcome the appearance in the field of wet candidates running openly as such and seeking public approval. That is the next-best way to feel the public pulse and to test its desires. Anything which will give that thoroughly obnoxious person, the legislator who "votes dry and drinks wet," the courage to wear his true colors will be a great step forward. Let us see if prohibition can be made a major political issue in this country and, if so, how the bulk of the people stand upon it.

The great weakness of the wets remains their inability to offer any definite program. They are unanimous in demanding the repeal of the amendment or the Volstead Act, and they are profuse in asserting that they are not in favor of the return of the saloon. But when it comes to specific proposals they are utterly at sea, for most of them have nothing to suggest. The herd mumbles something about the Canadian or Swedish system and lets it go at that. Any real knowledge of what those systems connote they have not. It is amusing to see that some of the richest men who are backing the Du Pont repeal association and its $25,000-a-year secretary, Mr. Curran, are apparently quite willing to put the government into the liquor business, although their daily prayer is that the government be taken out of every bit of business that private citizens could carry on. If this association really wishes to aid the repeal campaign it could do nothing more valuable for its cause than to call a nation-wide convention to formulate a definite plan for the substitute for the saloon that the drys need to agree upon. With a definite, clear-cut, specific program to offer they could rally many to their standard who would not vote in a Literary Digest poll because they cannot see whither repeal leads.

The strongest influence against the drys remains the failure to enforce the law. Mr. Wickersham believes it could be enforced approximately as well as our other laws, but Mr. Hoover, so far as we can see, makes no especial effort to bring that about. Certainly he is issuing no passionate appeals to the country to help in its enforcement; he has allowed to pass unnoticed the statements that he is drifting toward repeal. In Philadelphia the enforcement unit, we are told by well-informed newspapermen, is preventing the sale of liquor in hotels and restaurants, and speakeasies. But no one, they assert, has the slightest difficulty in obtaining the names of entirely reliable bootleggers who will deliver anything desired on shortest notice, at house or office. It would seem as if the President might, without waiting for any more reports from Mr. Wickersham's commission, make up his own mind as to whether the law can or cannot be enforced and let the country have the benefit of the decision.

Meanwhile the argument goes on. We are not of those who believe that the issue will speedily be the dominating one in our public life or that the wets are going to have it all their own way. The wet split in New Jersey probably means the defeat of Dwight Morrow in the primary, and the country will lose the services in the Senate of one who really shows some desire to lead and the courage to take a position, even if that position is no more practical than most of those taken by either side. We are aware, too, that many Americans are heartily sick of the whole business. None the less it seems to us that this is likely to be the country's hair shirt for a long while to come.

Ramsay MacDonald and India

NEVER has there been a clearer illustration of the taming effect of office-holding upon liberals and radicals than that afforded by the MacDonald Government in England on the question of India. Until a couple of years ago the Laborites were in arms against the Indian policy of the Conservatives. Now they are in office and the Nationalist uprising has been testing them as by fire. Although forewarned five months before they took office in June last by the announcement of the All India National Congress that there would be a demand for independence if dominion status were not granted by December 31, 1929, the Labor leaders took no steps toward a radical solution of the problem. In consequence they have the revolution to deal with and their fate in large measure is in the hands of Gandhi and his followers. By that we do not mean the mere question of their retention of office. It is their moral standing before the bar of international judgment which is at stake. Have they or have they not the moral courage to meet the situation in all its most difficult and trying aspects?

We must confess to doubt and discouragement when we read the cabled reports of the May 25 speech of Wedgwood Benn, Secretary of State for India. It is adequately characterized by a London correspondent of the New York Times:

> As a matter of fact, the speech of the Secretary of State for India, Wedgwood Benn, differed but little, and that little was in theory, from any statement which might have been made by a Conservative statesman. India needed England and England needed India, he said, and if the newspapers chose to exaggerate the recent troubles that constituted no reason why London should not proceed with the plans for the coming Indian conference. That Mahatma Gandhi and some others had been put in jail, it was explained, was not to punish them for their political views, but simply to place them where they could not disturb the good order existing in most parts of India among most of the 300,000,000 population.
> In so far as Mr. Benn's Second Internationalist theories may have clashed with the interests of the British Empire, the British Empire won.

Precisely. The result was that the left wing of the Labor forces was "disgusted," but the speech "satisfied a large majority of the House of Commons."

It should not satisfy Ramsay MacDonald. For that Prime Minister is on record not once but several times. For example, as late as October 17, 1927, Mr. MacDonald wrote in the London Daily Herald that further tutelage of India for self-rule was useless, and that India should receive independence at once:

> The moral justification that has always been made for the existence of our Empire among subject peoples has been that we are training them for self-government. The most typical of that is our Indian Empire. A thousand and one reasons are given for a little more tutelage. . . . Now plain, practical common sense should come to our rescue. Nobody can imagine that any harm will come from independence. Let independence be granted.

Ten days later he reiterated this position. Indeed, in the columns of our weekly there appeared on January 4, 1928, an article by him in which he said: "If any party has been conspicuously sympathetic to the growth of nationalism in India and to the satisfaction of that spirit it is the Labor Party. . . ." Nor was he the only Labor leader to speak thus. There is no finer spirit in the party than that of George Lansbury. As far back as 1920 Mr. Lansbury thus echoed some famous words of Richard Cobden:

> There are more than three hundred million people in India; there are forty million of us English in the British Isles. We claim to know what is good for those people better than they do themselves. Was there ever impudence more colossal? Because our skin happens to be white we claim more brains than those whose skin has been browned by the sun. Whenever I look at Indians I feel ashamed of myself.

Now we are well aware of what Mr. MacDonald will face if he attempts to live up to his opinions. Fenner Brockway, M.P., has stated that if MacDonald should grant Gandhi's request for the release of the many political prisoners who have been rotting in prison since 1915 eight or nine of the British governors in India would resign at once. This, Wedgwood Benn has not dared to face. The India Office is full of officials who live by British control of that teeming distressed country. Again, Mr. MacDonald is reported worn and tired as a result of the long and unhappy naval conference, his anxiety about the unemployment situation, the secession of Sir Oswald Mosley, and all the other difficulties which confront him. None the less we feel that he must meet the test which India offers; that he cannot evade the issue by falling back upon the intransigence of the Anglo-Indian officials. If he would keep his record clear he cannot long approve of Wedgwood Benn's Tory theory that it is right to jail a great leader like Gandhi on the excuse that he is disturbing or may disturb the good order of India. It is not Gandhi who is the disturber, but those countrymen of MacDonald's who insist on keeping India in tutelage. There is no moral salvation for the Prime Minister save to say again: "In all attempts to govern a country by a 'benevolent despotism' the governed are crushed down. They become subjects who obey, not citizens who act." We cannot conceive of a finer slogan for MacDonald to go down to defeat with than his own "Let independence be granted," for we believe that out of such a defeat would come lasting victory.

This question of the effect of office-holding upon the reformer is one of far-reaching moment. There is nothing so dangerous to the character, nothing so benumbing to the moral sense, no other pitfall half so deceptive—witness the fall of Woodrow Wilson. It is not to be disposed of by saying that the taming is inevitable; that the theorist must become the realist when he takes office; that practical considerations must take precedence of ideals. Those are moral traps; those are the excuses that men give for not living up to the best that is in them; for refusing to face defeat; for breaching principles they have upheld all their lives. That is the way of the politician, the professional office-holder. It can never be that of the true reformer.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

SEVERAL readers have sent questions about newspaper work. "How does anybody get to be a newspaper columnist?" asks L. T. G. from Montclair, New Jersey, and a few others have sent the same query in various forms. I'm only one columnist, I can't speak for the rest. My answer would be, "It's mostly dumb luck." I don't know why it should be so, but newspaper jobs are very much sought after in America today. Almost every young man and woman fresh from college wants to be a newspaper dramatic critic or a columnist. And editors just brush them away from the doorstep. In some respects I'm glad they do.

But just the same I think newspapers are not so smart in the barriers which they erect against the entrance of the newcomer. When somebody comes to a paper asking for a chance to work the editor's first question is, "Have you had any experience?" And when the applicant says "No," the editor shakes his head very sadly and says, "I'm terribly sorry but I can't give you a job until you've had some experience."

"Well," says the applicant, "how can I get some experience?"

"Get a job," says the editor.

I believe that's known as a vicious circle. There was something like that once in a book I read when I was a child—a book called "Davy and the Goblin." One of the characters was a butter-scotch man and he used to complain that he couldn't run until he got hot and he couldn't get hot unless he could run.

From the point of view of us working newspapermen—maybe I ought to qualify that word "working," since a columnist lives by peculiar hours. If he is employed on an afternoon paper he ought to be up out of bed and on the job by three in the afternoon. If he lingers longer than that he is just plain lazy. Writing his column takes from half an hour to an hour—depending on how many contributions he gets. After his work is done he gets ready for dinner and then he goes to a show and after that a night club perhaps—that's called gathering material and it's very arduous and every columnist has to do it whether he wants to or not.

But I'm drifting away from the subject of how to be a columnist. I must repeat that the first injunction is, Be lucky. At least that has been my experience. In the beginning, or thereabouts, I was a baseball reporter. And then the dramatic critic died. I was a good baseball reporter and so they said, "Make him the dramatic critic." Something happened at the very beginning that was extremely helpful. I reviewed a show in which Miss Ethel Barrymore appeared, and gave it as my opinion that she was not so good. Just in that show I mean. But Miss Barrymore was annoyed and gave out an interview to a Sunday newspaper in which she said, "All the critics liked me except one who I understand is a baseball reporter."

"Of course," she continued, "I like baseball. It's our national game and all that, but there is a good deal of difference between the diamond and the drama, is there not?"

That helped me a lot. It irritated sporting editors all over the country and they began to write pieces saying it was much more important to be a baseball writer than to be a dramatic critic. They said that baseball reporters were much better writers than dramatic critics. Collier's Weekly took it up and I began to get national publicity. Fate was certainly with me. Six months after I became dramatic critic the book reviewer of the paper took sick. He didn't die but he was very ill and had to go away for his health. People around the newspaper office, particularly those that outranked me, began to look at me with suspicion. They thought I had the evil eye. I remember the managing editor got very cross one night when I said: "How are you feeling this evening? You don't look well. I hope it's nothing serious."

He thought that I was after his job too. But I wasn't really after any more jobs just then. It was terribly hard work being the combined book and dramatic critic. Particularly being the book critic. I had to write a book review every day and that meant that I had to read a book every day. At least I thought so then. I hadn't learned yet what an excellent review a critic can prepare by reading the blurb on the jacket and skipping through the first fifty pages. Of course, it is a little dangerous to review books you haven't read. A friend of mine was telling me just tonight of what a fearful mess he got into. He used to do his reviewing mostly by the titles and one week he had a long list of novels to do. One of them, according to the slip sent up to him, was called "The Missing Gallon." Naturally he thought it was a story about prohibition and in his review he spoke of the book's being a lively and exciting yarn about rum-runners and revenue men and the coast guard. It turned out that there had been a typographical error on the slip sent to the reviewer—the real title of the book was "The Missing Galleon" and it was about the Spanish armada. The author was very angry at the critic.

But nothing like that happened to me. I didn't dare say anything about any book with which I was not familiar. Still a day arrived when I came down to the office without having read anything. It was one of those lazy days when it was a lot too much trouble to read anything. But there was that blank space in the paper that I was supposed to fill, this column which had over it the title Books. I was in a predicament and in desperation I wrote a piece about my dog and my small son, even though I hadn't read either of them. No editor said anything about it to me the next day, and so a couple of days later when I fell down on my homework again I wrote a column about the farm I intended to buy some day when I had enough money. And this time the managing editor did send for me. He said: "That stuff you've been writing about your son and your dog and your farm is much more interesting than your book reviews. Keep it up." I was getting praise for being lazy. After that they changed the title of my newspaper department from Books to Books and Things and pretty soon it was all Things. I didn't read any books any more. I had become, quite by accident, a newspaper columnist. Finally, on account of there not being any books in it at all they had to drop that out and call the whole business It Seems to Me. And that's how I became a newspaper columnist.

The Press Today

VI. The Philadelphia Cabbage Patch[*]

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

LIKE Pittsburgh and Chicago, Philadelphia shows clearly the devastating effects of the drift toward consolidations and disappearances in the newspaper field. Since I served on the Philadelphia Press in 1897 there have perished the following dailies: the Press, the North American, and the News, in the morning field, and the evening Times, Item, Star, Call, and Telegraph. There remain the Inquirer and Public Ledger, the Record, the Evening Ledger, the Bulletin, and the tabloid Daily News. There are, however, only four owners left: Cyrus Hermann Kotzschmar Curtis, who owns the two Ledgers and has just purchased the Inquirer; J. David Stern, an able publisher, who two years ago bought the Record; the McLean family, owners of the Bulletin; and Bernarr Macfadden, proprietor of the Daily News.

Only one of these, the Record, offers any real liberalism. Founded just sixty years ago, it prides itself upon expressing "the opinions and aspirations of enlightened men and women." It has certainly fought consistently for clean elections and better government, against debauchers of the ballot, and on behalf of exploited labor, and believes that it was chiefly responsible for the defeat of an outrageous $149,000,000 traction grab. Until recently it was a Democratic newspaper, highly individualistic in make-up, with an especially strong following in the rural territory adjacent to Philadelphia, notably in New Jersey. The Record is today conventional in make-up and independent in politics. The Democratic Party in Pennsylvania has dropped out from under it, and so it is reported ready for a new political line-up, leaning occasionally in the Republican direction. Not as to the city, however. There it refuses to go along with any of the bosses. In the national field it is distinctly opposed to reactionary Republicanism and is outspoken against the new tariff. Its editorials induced Gifford Pinchot to run for Governor again, but in the primary just ended it supported the wet ticket, Bohlen for Senator and Phillips for Governor.

It is of enormous importance to Philadelphia that the Record should succeed under its new ownership. Without it the city would be reduced almost to the pitiful level of Chicago, where there is no choice in the morning field save between Hearst and the McCormick's Tribune. For a city like Philadelphia to be dependent upon the McLean and Curtis dailies would be little short of a calamity. Hence it is encouraging to learn that this flower in Philadelphia's cabbage patch has been steadily growing under Mr. Stern's leadership—at least until the recent shrinkage in business, which has profoundly affected even the most prosperous dailies. Thus, its circulation rose from 113,300 readers in 1928 to 129,959 in 1929, and has been averaging around 140,000 of late, in 1929 catching up with the morning Ledger on weeks days. On Sundays the showing has not been quite so favorable. During the last quarter of 1929 the Sunday Record sold 122,347 papers, a gain of 23.2 per cent over 1928, while the Sunday Ledger disposed of 483,567 copies, and the Sunday Inquirer of 503,237. None the less it appears certain to succeed.

The kind of competition which Mr. Stern has had to fight can be understood from the fact that the Curtis papers sent out in April the following notice to newsboys: "If you persist in selling Sunday Records you will not be permitted to sell Sunday Inquirers or Sunday Ledgers." The Record met this attack successfully and with entire good humor, saying that "it is the first time in Philadelphia journalistic history that one newspaper has been singled out as so important that its competitors decided to combine against it." About the same time the Record printed an editorial denouncing the Ledger for instigating through a Hearst news agency a false statement that the Record was for sale. From the same source, doubtless, have come the constant reports that the Record is not worth buying by the Curtis interests and is likely to "die of its own volition." That does not appear to me to be so certain, for Mr. Stern has had extraordinary success with his Camden papers, the Courier and Post, small-town dailies which he has built up to a joint circulation of more than 70,000. He is a man to be reckoned with, though it is plainly a most difficult furrow which he has now chosen to plow. Philadelphia is notoriously unreceptive to anything independent. He who undertakes to go counter to the political contractor-gang which controls the city, and to the sodden selfishness and contentment of the middle class as well as of the very prosperous, has a man-sized job on his hands. But Mr. Stern knows how to fight. Single-handed he thrice defeated the Baird machine in Camden—more strongly intrenched than Vare's in Philadelphia. Its fight upon him was most bitter and personal—in one month it had him arrested three times in the effort to drive this "carpet-bagger" out of town. He has owned six newspapers, all successful, all liberal, anti-machine, and fearless.

When we come to the Bulletin with its tremendous circulation of 550,000 copies we find one of the cleanest, dullest, most bourgeois of American dailies; one of the most conventional as well as one of the most prosperous, but quite courageous enough to hold even the greatest advertisers at bay. One turns over page after page of advertising fringed with reading matter, and sees how it is that the Bulletin has found its way into almost every Philadelphia home. It is kindly and decent, though cheap in appearance, has the necessary amount of jokes and comic strips and news photographs, calls itself independent Republican, is always against Vare, and has fought the traction ring. But it cannot become deeply interested in such a primary contest as has recently been ended in Pennsylvania, though it will take sides sharply when the election occurs. As a whole, however, in its eyes all is extremely well with the Republic in this best of all possible worlds, and there is no reason why any and every patriot should not sleep soundly provided the tariff is very high and the Communists are properly squelched. This newspaper represents its owners' viewpoint to a T; one must know it and them really to understand democracy in Philadelphia.

[*] This is the sixth in a series of articles on the American press. The seventh, What's Wrong with the World?, will appear in our issue of June 25. —EDITOR THE NATION.

As for Bernarr Macfadden's Daily News, with its 200,000 circulation, it is not sufficient to say that it is like the general run of tabloids. There is a complication here in that ex-Senator William S. Vare, the boss of Philadelphia, owns 49 per cent of the stock—no doubt an extremely advantageous business arrangement, which can, however, hardly be said to leave the Daily News free to serve the cause of good government. The rise of the Daily News has been remarkable in its rapidity; its advertising is increasing while the other dailies are losing—Mr. Vare is, of course, able to influence the insertion of a good many advertisements, especially legal ones. Three years ago when it was losing $350,000 a year it was offered for sale. Today it is believed to be earning $250,000 or more annually.

There remain in this cabbage patch the three Cyrus H. K. Curtis dailies, and when we come to them we reach the nub of the Philadelphia situation and its most serious aspect. At the beginning of last March Mr. Curtis suddenly purchased the one-hundred-and-three-year-old Inquirer, together with land and buildings, from the Elverson heirs, for a sum variously put at $18,000,000 and $20,000,000. It is an open secret that the deal was engineered by John C. Martin, the husband of Mrs. Curtis's daughter by her first husband, who is now the real executive of the four dailies Mr. Curtis owns (the fourth being the New York Evening Post). Mr. Curtis had been in Florida; he was informed of the deal on his return, made an immediate inspection of the property, and the transaction was completed. The Inquirer has, however, been allowed to live—when Mr. Curtis purchased the Press and the North American he immediately destroyed those dailies and with ruthless cruelty turned their staffs out into the street with only a day or two's notice. Curiously enough, however, the policy has been to conceal the change as much as possible—the April 1 statement of ownership and circulation of the Inquirer being "buried" so far back in the paper that it even escaped the notice of some of the editors. The masthead of the daily is also not indicative of the Curtis ownership.

The Inquirer, which in 1840 startled the newspaper world by an entirely new departure in journalism, the purchase of the American rights for exclusive publication of "Barnaby Rudge" and "Master Humphrey's Clock" by a then rising young English author, Charles Dickens, had long been the Philadelphia Republican's Bible, aggressive in its attacks upon all who refused to worship at the Republican shrine. It was naturally extremely useful to the machine, over which it exercised a great influence; the machine had to be pretty rotten to come in for criticism at the hands of the Inquirer. As a hidebound party organ it had, in other words, no superior, and when it came to the tariff it gladly did the bidding of the membership of the Republican Club and the Manufacturers' Association. In brief, the Inquirer has stood for all the economic and imperialistic policies of the Republicans and is the most ardent advocate of the status quo that the most reactionary conservative could possibly desire.

None the less, its passage into the hands of Mr. Martin—for that is what it comes down to—is ominous. Should anything happen to the Record that gentleman will dominate the morning field of Philadelphia; as it is he reaches approximately 600,000 purchasers every week day and about one million on Sundays. This already so closely approximates a monopoly as to make it well worth while to get some idea of what Mr. Martin is after. That is not easy to define. It is, however, clear that he is extremely ambitious and that Mr. Curtis, who will be eighty years old on June 15, is more and more leaving matters in his step-son-in-law's hands.

It is also apparent that Mr. Martin is by no means hostile to the brood of politicians; during the recent primary the Curtis papers sat squarely on the fence, refusing to notice editorially one of the most exciting campaigns in the history of the State. But the Inquirer's editorial page had plenty of space for such thrilling subjects as Clean-Up Week, Dandelion Pickers Escape Fines, Lauding the Heroism of Motherhood, and Locust Plague Grows Worse in Egypt—all safe and sane and certain to offend no reader's sensibilities. In newspaper circles it is the belief that Mr. Martin has none of such principles as have guided Mr. Curtis in his journalistic ventures, and there is a great desire for more light upon his relations with the various groups of Philadelphia politicians. Certain it is that under Mr. Martin there will be nothing done to retrieve Mr. Curtis's own mistakes.

That gentleman has never even approached the success in the daily field which he has achieved with the Saturday Evening Post and the Ladies' Home Journal. He has not known how to succeed. He long tried to make a national newspaper out of the Ledger, but entirely failed, probably because he never really visioned what a national daily ought to be. There is nothing about the New York Evening Post, for example, to indicate that either Mr. Martin or Mr. Curtis can build a newspaper capable of making a profound impress upon the metropolis. Their editorial pages are never strong, or brilliant, or given to leadership. They economize in editorial salaries in accordance with the new trend which declares that the daily should not lead or seek to impose its beliefs upon others, but that it should be merely a reflection of our swift, superficial, pleasure-loving jazz age. Their editorial pages will continue to reflect the views of the rich, prosperous, and contented, and of those who profit by special privilege, who believe that the government should go into special tariff partnership with every manufacturer who is too inefficient to make money or is dissatisfied with the rate of his profit. Finally, if the columns of their dailies are clean and carry only worthy advertising, they are not wholly free from domination by the large advertisers. They will continue to be class organs—the mouthpieces of the class with which Mr. Martin and Mr. Curtis come daily into contact.

What hope, under these circumstances, can there be for an enlightened, independent, liberal public in Philadelphia? What hope, outside of the Record, that there will be a sympathetic interpretation of the aspirations and desires of the great mass of Americans? What hope that there will be a determined effort to allay the growing popular discontent by frontal attacks upon the evils of our social and economic life? These men are far too rich to look for any such leadership; millions roll in on them constantly.

Mr. Curtis himself drugs the people of Philadelphia not merely by the deadly conservatism and intellectual mediocrity of his great magazines and their special appeal to Babbittry, but by the magnitude of his public gifts. Where George W. Childs, the former owner of the Public Ledger, was accounted a great philanthropist when he bestowed checks for $1,000 or $5,000, Mr. Curtis's generosity is evidenced by many millions. Business Philadelphia admires him profoundly, despite his serious intellectual limitations, because business men everywhere worship material success and Mr. Curtis's material success is surely a wonder of the business world. But to the development of the soul of America he has contributed nothing. Every thoughtful American must look with anxiety upon a situation in which Mr. Curtis's heirs will dominate, or nearly dominate, the mentality of the historic City of Brotherly Love and the sources of its news—and should aid as best he can the fight of the Record against that domination.

Big-Business Brains

An Open Letter to Senator Norris

By J. G. CURTIS

MY DEAR SENATOR NORRIS: In the recent discussion of Mr. Hughes's confirmation as Chief Justice you described the conflict between the interests represented by Mr. Hughes and those represented by yourself; and, according to the news dispatches, you said that you were frightened by the prospect of the America toward which mergers and combinations were hurrying us, an America in which every citizen would be the slave of a captain of monopoly sitting in Wall Street with his feet on a mahogany desk. Your foreboding and your description interested me intensely. I admired the stand you made, as I have often done. But as one who is in business, who works for such enterprises as you condemn, who believes in their social desirability, and who yet sympathizes with your purposes and admires your leadership, I should like to report, so to speak, from behind your target. I should like to tell you what that target looks like to an observer who is not alien to you in spirit, but who views the enemy from a different mental angle.

In the first place, I see nothing essentially personal in the forces you are attacking. Consequently, all that part of your attack which personifies monopoly with its feet on a mahogany desk misses because there is nothing like that here to be hit. In all my years of business experience, I have never seen a business man with sufficient intelligence to fit, even approximately, the picture you draw. Business men are notably lacking in intelligence of any breadth; what they do notably possess is either an ingenious alertness or a ponderous tenacity. And they exercise either the one or the other of these qualities almost exclusively in current emergencies, almost never in comprehensive programs covering long periods of time. The evil that they do is therefore to be stopped by an attack on their intellectual deficiencies rather than on their assumed intellectual powers. An illustration of my meaning may be found in a well-known incident in the earlier career of Mr. Justice Brandeis, now one of the members of the liberal minority of the Supreme Court. A number of years ago, as one of the attorneys in the Shippers Case before the Supreme Court, Mr. Brandeis supported his attack on the carriers' rates by showing that the railways were losing a million dollars a day by blindly neglecting improvements which scientific management would make possible. He made the issue not one of malignancy, but of stupidity. He won—and so did the railways, as a matter of fact, for instead of being merely thwarted, they were taught a lesson to the benefit of everyone, themselves included.

In the second place, the forces you assail, not being personal, are themselves social. Being social, they transcend all individual wills. You yourself apparently see them at times in this aspect, for you speak as if you sensed something inevitable in them. I confess that I see them habitually in that aspect. The breakdown of individualism seems to me a perfectly natural and wholesome thing. The needs of a great society, highly specialized as they are, cannot be served by individualistic means. We no longer live sparsely in the wilderness as our fathers did; the hardiness and versatility they exhibited were not matters of free election with them, but were required of them, on pain of death, by an inexorable environment. Our environment, on the other hand, requires of us, on pain of death, quite different virtues: it requires specialization, functionalization, division of labor, rationalization. A hundred years ago it was a virtue to chop down trees and build your own house; today to do such a thing would be a luxurious vice. Society cannot tolerate such ill-directed expenditures of individual effort. Neither can it tolerate such ill-directed expenditures of effort as the individual ownership and operation of business. It is quite as anachronistic to have groceries supplied by an independent grocer as it would be to have your clothes made at home.

And I urge this on behalf of the very people in whose interest you are active and valiant—on behalf, that is, of the great masses whose consuming needs are the starting-point and the criterion of every motion of economic activity. They are, as you contend, doing without too much that they should have and paying too much for what they get. The burden is laid on them, however, not by malignancy, but by ignorance.

Business men, I repeat, are not characterized by breadth of intelligence. I have worked with them for years, and there are few serious things that could be laid morally to their charge. They are children. They need leadership. They need something besides a shouting of Don't! Our great economic and social confusion is due to the fact that the entrepreneur has been taken at his own rating as a responsible moral agent. He is not. He is a good technician, a good man at routine, an industrious fellow. Like most specialists, he thinks that everything depends on him, but in reality he has no more notion where he is or where he is going than a bat at noonday.

The leadership that he requires is, consequently, of a comprehensive and positive sort that you yourself should supply, a leadership based on a firm sense of the public good. It should be a leadership that looks in the same realistic fashion at a corporation as at a telephone instrument. The corporation is a social agency. It has marvelous potentialities. But it is so new that as yet we don't know what to make of it. It is like Watt's steam engine or Edison's first electric lamp. Its capabilities for social accomplishment on behalf of those masses of people whose interest is yours are incalculable. But those capabilities need to be developed under a comprehensive leadership such as your own with a view to deriving the greatest social good out of the instrumentalities that our peculiar modern genius has developed—such instrumentalities as the laboratory, the electric motor, the radio, the tractor, the corporation, the large-scale enterprise.

Viewed organically, the concentration of commercial and industrial control is a process of socialization. And it is not peculiar to this country, but universal. In England, they are trying to give it leadership, but so belatedly that the case looks pretty hopeless. In Russia, they are going about it much more determinedly. And the significance of what they are doing is probably beyond anything else in modern history. In Russia, as here, there are enormous populations, enormous social potentialities, enormous natural resources. In both countries, things are moving together on an enormous scale. But this is the difference. In this country, we try to go forward with our scientific discoveries, but still holding on to an eighteenth-century individualism that is contemporary with phlebotomy and the hanging of sheep thieves; whereas in Russia they see modern culture as a whole, and in one comprehensive plan they sweep together and coordinate farm, school, factory, dwelling, movie, distribution, hygiene, research, invention, and technique. We do misgivingly what they do with a will. Personally, their bloodiness is hateful to me, and I shrink from it. All Americans do. But our squeamishness will not make the Soviets fail. And it should not blind us to the intelligence of their program in its civil aspects. It is not a time for us to quote Oliver Goldsmith's venerable lines in "The Deserted Village," but to grasp the realities of twentieth-century mechanistic civilization and master them. If we don't, the Soviets, without lifting a finger against us, may see us crash some day because we neglected to learn our own job.

I trust that the importance of the issue and the sincerity of my own concern will excuse the informality and impetuousness of my address. I believe I am not presumptuous in declaring that I share your hatred of privilege and selfishness and your desire for a universally diffused welfare. I believe I am in a position within the structure of what you call Big Business to see certain things you do not see. And I feel that I should tell you of them in the respectful hope that I may contribute even in a little way to the effectiveness of your leadership.

Very sincerely yours,

J. G. CURTIS

In the Driftway

AN unexpected gift, gratifying but alarming, has disturbed the Drifter's usual tranquillity. A rash admission to a friend of a mild taste for exotic flora and fauna is responsible. When he said "exotic" the Drifter had in mind nothing more daring than a vague preference for, say, scarlet hibiscus flowers as against geraniums, a tribe which he has never looked upon with favor. He is not an expert, and has been known to confuse larkspurs with hollyhocks, but he is quite clear about geraniums. As for hibiscus flowers, he is not sure that he has ever seen any, but they call to mind a South Sea island and a beach and lovely girls who would wear them in their hair.

* * * * *

NOT long after this admission the Drifter found himself the perplexed guardian of a Darlingtonia Californica. The Darlingtonia, though a plant in name, is carnivorous, and has something the appearance of a cobra rearing up to strike. The florist's boy who brought it was coldly superior. "Just give it a bit of raw meat when it's hungry," he said; "steak will do." The implication was that steak would only just do. "Perhaps it prefers human flesh," suggested the Drifter facetiously. "Couldn't say, sir," said the boy, and he left the room, whistling. The Drifter cautiously experimented by putting a scrap of meat into the capacious mouth of the Darlingtonia. There was something a little sinister in the gradual and complete disappearance of that meat. Since then the Drifter has felt himself on the horns of a dilemma. Should he, in the interests of his peace of mind, overfeed his charge, or starve it? He has not been able to decide, and has pursued a wavering course. On the one hand, he has a feeling that carnivorous animals, lions, for instance, are rather less savage when not given meat. A lion whose diet is porridge and sprouts is excused from certain of the more formidable conventions of his kind. On the other hand, the Drifter has sometimes an uneasy feeling that, if denied red meat, the creature might make shift with a bit of Drifter, creeping on him in his sleep, perhaps, or hiding behind a door. True, up to now it has remained rooted like any geranium, but he has his doubts, and on the days when these doubts assail him he may be seen ambling into the nearest restaurant, ordering for himself a meal which he may or may not want, and asking the waiter for a bit of raw meat to carry away with him. "For a cat, sir?" said one waiter with a sympathetic gleam in his eye. "No. For a plant." "I see, sir," said the waiter coldly.

* * * * *

A SOLUTION has at last occurred to the Drifter, a solution not entirely kind, but interesting. He plans to present this jungle hybrid to a vegetarian friend of his. He cannot help wondering how his friend will cope with it. First, of course, he will try to teach it to love string beans or nut bread. But if it proves obstinate, will he go out and round up bits of steak to keep it alive, or will he let it go into a decline and die? And if the latter, will his conscience hurt him? The Drifter would love to know, but unfortunately he has lost his friend's address.

Veto the Tariff!

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have seen with much pleasure the words in large capitals Veto the Tariff on the front page of The Nation. That subject has been on my mind for some time, and there is a point that, as I think, needs emphasizing. President Hoover won the admiration and the affection of the world for his heroic and beneficent anti-starvation work in Belgium and elsewhere. The spirit in which the tariff bill has been conceived and formulated is the very opposite of that which expressed itself in the relief work of the war period, and the effects of it, in quarters where near-starvation prevails, will correspond with the unworthy spirit. Happily, the final shaping of the measure is, in some degree, still in our President's hands.

Has India Rejected Non-Violence?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It is ironical that, simultaneously with the publication of S. K. Ratcliffe's statement in The Nation of May 28 that Indians have rejected the central doctrine of Gandhi's teaching, non-violence, we should have news from India that, censored though it is, proves beyond doubt that Indians are keeping to this doctrine in an amazing fashion. Casualties (I use the Herald Tribune figures from Webb Miller's admittedly mutilated account) to the number of 630 on one side, with no mention of anyone injured on the opposing side, surely do not indicate any great departure from the non-violence to which the Indian satyagrahis are pledged. Lest anyone set this down to cowardice, I should like to say that Indian publications, which come to me regularly, tell quite a different story. One eyewitness to some of the frightful cruelty—and this against men who are merely offering themselves for arrest—writes, "Never have I seen such bravery . . . the meekness and non-retaliation under attack is nothing short of superhuman."

Paying for one's freedom in the "coin of suffering" is not the part of cowards. Courting arrest—to the end that available jails may be filled to overflowing—does not come from any but the most selflessly brave. The type of resistance employed by Gandhi is far more dangerous to the individual than the ordinary type of insurrection, as it is harder to combat.

What Gandhi calls, for want of a more definite phrase, "indecent assaults" have been the treatment of the satyagrahis right along, as highly reliable reports show; and yet this extreme of pain and humiliation is not alone borne, but courted, day after day. When all the facts have come through we shall know that Indians have not rejected their great leader's Ahimsa—doctrine of non-violence—but have, in the acceptance of it, risen to heights of courageous and spiritual achievement.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Let me enter a protest against the inadequate and lopsided review of C. F. Andrews's book, "Mahatma Gandhi's Ideas." When George Washington was leading the American Revolution, what would have been the force of a discussion of his ideas that dwelt chiefly on the irrational points in Washington's theology? There are irrational points in Gandhi's, but this extraordinary man, though in prison, is still leading a revolution much bigger than ours, and prompted by wrongs infinitely greater.

There are two sides to British rule in India. We all know of the good side; we have been hearing about it all our lives. To most Americans, the bad side is as unknown as the dark side of the moon. Those wishing to understand it should read three books: "The Economic History of India in the Victorian Age," by Romesh Dutt (E. P. Dutton and Company); "England's Debt to India," by Lajpat Rai (B. W. Huebsch); and "India in Bondage," by J. T. Sunderland (Lewis Copeland Company). If they have not time for all, let them read the last. In India it is a penal offense to sell this book or to own it.

The British are the best administrators of colonies and dependencies in the world, but even they cannot make a bad system work well. Imperialism is a system inherently vicious. What the British have done in India is not a bit worse in principle than what we have done in Haiti and elsewhere, but it is on a larger scale, and has had a longer time to work out its bad results. Gandhi's ideas on this subject are as sound as they are strong. Even his emphasis on the spinning-wheel, which seems so strange to Westerners, has a good reason under present conditions in India. Many of his ideas show a singular union of saintliness with practical sagacity.

His great effort to achieve his country's freedom without bloodshed is worthy of the highest respect. However much violence may develop, there will be less than if the most beloved man in India had not used all his great influence against it. And whatever aspect the struggle may take on, every lover of liberty should wish success to India's cause.

The Economics of Dollar Books

By HENRY HAZLITT

IT is too early to make any facile predictions regarding the ultimate effect of the announcement by a group of publishers that they are cutting their prices of new novels from the present level of two dollars and two dollars and a half to a dollar, the "most sweeping revision in new book prices in the history of modern publishing." The most one can confidently do at the moment is to indicate certain possibilities.

The question must first of all be considered in its economic, even in its bookkeeping, aspects. How is such a radical slash possible? If publishers can sell novels at a dollar and still make a profit, most laymen will want to know, haven't they been making an inordinate profit with books at two and two and a half dollars? The answer lies in the fact that the publisher's unit cost of production on any book decreases with the number of copies he produces of that book. If the lowering of price increases sales sufficiently, then a publisher who makes only a moderate profit with a novel selling at two dollars may still make a moderate profit when he cuts the price of that novel to a dollar.

Let us see how this works out for a typical novel. We shall assume that two thousand copies of this novel are printed to retail at two dollars a copy and that (publisher's paradise!) every copy is sold. Costs and profits will then run something like this (the following calculations are based on actual figures supplied to the writer by publishers):

Cost of plates	$700
" " printing	100
" " paper	80
" " binding	240
Author's royalty	400
Publisher's overhead	240
Advertising	160
Total cost of production	$1,920
Income from sales	2,320
Publisher's net profit	$ 400

In this account it has been assumed that the author's royalty is 10 per cent of the retail price of the book, that the publisher's overhead expenses average 12 per cent of the retail price of each book, and that the book has been sold to booksellers, jobbers, and others at an average discount of 42 per cent, i. e., that the publisher gets $1.16 for a book that retails for $2.

Now if the publisher were to cut the price of such a book to $1, and if this reduction did not result in any increase in his sales, it is quite obvious that his net profit would be transformed into a heavy loss. Still selling to the "trade" at a discount of 42 per cent, he would receive only 58 cents a copy for his books, or a total of $1,160. When we allow for the fact that the author's 10 per cent royalty would automatically be reduced by $200, and even if we assume that the publisher might save $100 on a cheaper binding, he would still confront a deficit of $460 in place of a profit of $400.

But what the price-cutting publishers are counting on is their belief that books at half their former prices will meet a very substantial increase in sales. Suppose that the publisher is able to sell ten thousand copies of the book at a dollar. His cost sheet (assuming that he uses a cheaper binding, and assuming, also, that he can still keep his overhead expenses down to an average of 12 per cent of the retail price) will run like this:

Plates	$700
Printing	300
Paper	400
Binding	700
Royalty	1,000
Overhead	1,200
Advertising	800
Total costs	$5,100
Income from sales	5,800
Net profit	$ 700

I do not mean to suggest here that a reduction in the price of a book would result in a sale five times as large, but merely to indicate the very great reduction in unit cost possible when a comparatively large number of books is originally published. This result arises from the fact that the chief single item in the cost of a book is usually the cost of the plates, which remains fixed regardless of the sale, while other items (with the possible exception of overhead expenses) vary approximately in direct ratio with output. For two thousand copies of a two-dollar book the cost of plates is almost 40 per cent of total costs; for ten thousand copies of a dollar book the cost of plates is only 14 per cent of total costs. The unit cost to the publisher, consequently, falls from 96 cents a book to 51 cents. On a second ten thousand copies, the cost of the plates may be written off altogether, and the unit cost of production becomes 43 cents.

Whether novels at an original price of a dollar become economically feasible, then, depends solely upon the extent to which a radical reduction in price will increase sales. The plan cannot succeed unless the demand for books proves to be what economists call elastic—i. e., the number of books sold must increase in more than an inverse ratio to the reduction in price. In other words, if a publisher sells only double the number of books he otherwise would have, the plan will fail; if he sells only 50 per cent more it will of course fail worse. Where the publisher at present has to sell 2,500 copies of a book to "break even," he will have to sell anywhere from 5,000 to 6,500 to do so with a dollar book. To make the same net profit from a dollar book as from a two-dollar book, he will have to sell at least two and a half times as many; to make the same net profit from a dollar book as from a two-dollar-and-a-half book, he will have to sell at least three times as many.

(And the early results of the present move may easily be misleading. As long as a few publishers cut their prices and the majority do not, dollar books—popular novels, detective stories, and the like—may increase their sales merely at the expense of "replaceable" two-dollar books in the same class. The increased sale of these dollar books, in other words, would not necessarily indicate any real, or at least any proportionate, expansion of the book market as a whole. In that case, a large part of the sales increase would be found to disappear if competing publishers met the lower prices; which would mean, of course, that publishers would simply be in a worse plight all around.)

It is not difficult to see, therefore, why there is such a wide difference of opinion among publishers on the present price war, with the majority still declaring that to price books originally at a dollar is economically unsound. The price-cutting publishers are making a bold experiment; for no one yet knows just how "elastic" the demand for books is—just what effect changes of price can have on sales. On the one hand, there are such precedents as "The Story of Philosophy," selling at five dollars, to indicate that high prices do not keep the public from buying the books it wants; on the other hand, there are the very large sales of the dollar reprint series to indicate that a reduction in price may have a very material effect in increasing sales—that a book which has stopped selling at two dollars to five dollars may start selling again at a dollar.

If the various price-cutting plans succeed (each of those so far announced is slightly different from the others) what is likely to be their broader effect? Here again it is better to indicate possibilities than to attempt confident predictions. It must be kept in mind to begin with, however, that when a publisher turns to dollar books his mistakes become more costly than when he is dealing with two-dollar books. There has always been a large gambling element in the publishing business. It has been estimated that the average sale of a novel is only about 1,500 copies, and perhaps one is safe in saying that the publisher loses money on four out of every five books he sells. He must depend on his successes to carry his failures. As a dollar book, if it failed, would involve more serious losses, it seems probable that the tendency of publishers would be to print fewer books. Such a result is commonly regarded as a consummation devoutly to be wished; but it is not the number of books that is important, but their quality. Whereas today the publisher who wishes to avoid losses must ask himself whether a book is likely to sell at least 2,500 copies, he will have to begin asking whether it is likely to sell at least 5,000 to 6,500. And this question seems likely to hurt two classes of books—those too bad to have an assured mass appeal, and those too (subtly or esoterically) good to have an assured mass appeal. There is a possibility, in short, that the dollar-book field may develop into a sort of publishers' Hollywood. Certainly it would accelerate the present tendency toward concentration of advertising and selling effort on fewer titles. On the other hand, there is the possibility that, just as the tabloids obtained an enormous circulation without materially affecting the circulation of the regular newspapers, so popular novels at a dollar may find a field of their own while more expensive volumes with a narrow appeal will continue to sell in the same quantities as at present. Still again, it is possible that American publishers may begin on a wider scale the European practice of printing all books of whatever quality in paper covers first, and then leaving it to readers to decide which books are worth keeping and binding durably after they have once been read. If the present experiment should succeed, it seems likely to have important secondary effects. Will existing dollar reprint libraries become fifty-cent reprint libraries? What will happen to the business of the rental libraries? Will the so-called drug-stores become regular instead of crisis bookstores? From many angles the new experiment is extremely significant. Can mass selling be applied to belles-lettres? We must wait and see.

Dialogue in Kansas—1850

By THOMAS HORNSBY FERRIL

Some dim rememberer of quarter-decks had brought
A globe of the earth to Kansas and had given
This fading world to the new bride in the clearing,
And the bride loved best the blue where the ships were driven.

"The prairie rolls like sea, new bride, but is not sea,"
The globe had said, "but you are a woman fair
Enough to be a shining harbor's name, or the dream
In the wind that makes the tallest ships go there."

"I will be shining harbor then," she told the globe,
"With the oldest prairie beating on my breast,
And the blue of it shall sing like sea in me forever,
And my tall man will say that this is best."

"But your tall man will never stay," the globe had said.
"He plows as if no women wait for ships,
For there's a westering, ever a westering,
That is another lover to his lips.

"You must be that to him, if you be shining harbor,
And you must be another prairie far
From here, and another home he cannot see from here,
Perhaps the Oregon will be his star.

"After the ice, but still before the grass has come,
You will know this. Gently he will have curled
His fingers through your hair at night and darkly stroked
Your body with the circles of the world.

"Those hours when you are Oregon and not his bride,
He'll be your lover home a night from sea;
Morning will pull his draw-knife on new oxen yokes,
Sundown will hack an axle from a tree.

"He'll say this little world is like a wagon wheel,
And he'll get a wheel and prop it in a yoke,
He'll show you that from here to Oregon is less Than a span from one spoke to another spoke.

"And wheels like this will roll to Oregon, you'll say,
But not to him, and if you must go there,
Who must you be to him in Oregon at night,
To feel sea fingers moving in your hair?"

The New American Drama

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

WHEN I joined the staff of The Nation there was an understanding between its editor and me to the effect that all dramatic critics should be shot at the end of five years of service. Six seasons have now passed since I thus gaily set a term to my existence, but justice has been tempered with mercy and it has been agreed, not only that my life shall be spared, but that, after a banishment of fifteen months' duration, I may return to the practice of my profession. Accordingly and with a muttered Auf Wiedersehen I depart from Broadway—though not without the few words which follow by way of farewell.

I am aware of the fact that dramatic critics are popularly supposed to view the stage with a jaundiced eye. The necessity of making a business out of what ought to be a pleasure is thought to result inevitably in bad temper, and to produce a state of mind which leads naturally to the choice of What's Wrong with the Theater? as the topic which the critic is most eager to discuss. Yet it is not, in my case at least, a "loathèd stage" which I quit, for I must confess that I find in myself an optimism which others may not have noticed, and that, after a good many hundred evenings in our various playhouses, I still believe the New York theater to be a not unadmirable institution. Indeed, the contemporary American drama seems to me to compare very favorably both with the other departments of contemporary American literature and with the plays produced during any except a few widely separated epochs in dramatic history.

Perhaps neither our dramas nor our novels have achieved that perfection of form which alone is capable of enabling any work of literary art to endure beyond the age in which it is written, but our plays, like our novels, have at least been the result of a conscientious effort to be as sincere and as significant as their authors could make them. And though I have heard graybeards lament our decline since even the recent days of Daly and Mansfield and Drew, I cannot bring myself to regret the change which has given us the dramas of O'Neill, Behrman, Stallings, Anderson, Barry, et al., in place of those of Boucicault, Clyde Fitch, and Bronson Howard. Perhaps the plays of the generation before this were better acted. I am willing to take on faith the statement that they were. But from my own reading I know that those of our own day have more substance in them.

The drama is, of all the forms of art, the one which seems to have the greatest difficulty in maintaining contact with the interests, the opinions, and the tastes of the most enlightened portion of any general public. Not without reason the adjective "theatrical" has come to be used as synonymous with all that is false, artificial, and preposterous, for the drama has been content to remain during whole half-centuries at a time a form which no one regarded as a possible vehicle for a "criticism of life." Twenty years ago the American drama was, moreover, still in the condition from which the European drama had begun to rescue itself some twenty years before that. By comparison with the novel it was timid, superficial, and trivial—all but untouched by the intellectual and moral forces which had revolutionized the thought and feeling of intelligent people. It was as flaccid and simple-minded as though Zola and Tolstoy and Nietzsche and Anatole France—to say nothing of Ibsen and his followers—had never written. The same people who read Hardy and Wells and George Moore in their libraries complacently accepted the most trivial sentimentality in the theater, because they had come to regard the theater as an institution not to be taken seriously. On entering its doors one regressed by force of habit to a simpler level of intelligence, and anyone interested in it might have been pardoned for doubting whether or not it could ever again be used by an adult mind.

Yet today our theater is at least once more a part of the main stream of our artistic life. I do not mean merely that it is once more a place where "problems" may be discussed with the same frankness as in the novel, but also that the attitudes which it exhibits toward characters and deeds are the same as those exhibited in other forms of creative writing. It has rescued itself from a set of infantile conventions which were almost as absurd as those which now stultify the movies, and it has become once more a channel through which intellectual and artistic impulses can flow. The playwrights who have written during the past twenty years have accomplished this rescue, and even if they have not written a single play likely to endure they have accomplished much by making the theater once more intellectually and artistically respectable. Twenty years ago the drama was hardly a department of contemporary American literature; today it emphatically is.

By a stroke of good fortune it so happened that the first play which I was called upon to witness in my professional capacity was the Anderson-Stallings "What Price Glory?" and that play may be taken as typical of the kind of excellence that has been found in the drama of the six years which followed. Scarcely had the curtain risen upon this play before one was aware that one was in the presence of some kind of originality and power. Out of the rich, living, and Rabelaisian language there was gradually built up a tale unlike any tale of war hitherto presented upon any stage, and marked by certain excellences which were, moreover, of a purely dramatic kind. It had, to be sure, no easily definable thesis. Indeed, the public argued hotly concerning the question of whether it was to be regarded as "for" or "against" militarism and war. And yet, without any recourse to didacticism, it achieved something beyond even the striking naturalism which characterized it. Here, translated into dramatic terms, was the record of a terrible experience set down in a manner which managed to convey some sense of the peculiar quality of that experience and thus to differentiate it from the experience of other generations with the same ghastly phenomena of war. It was certainly no mere cold academic retort to those who have glorified martial adventure, for it communicated something of the excitement, of the fierce atavistic joy, which its protagonists sometimes felt. And yet, at the same time that it thus communicated to the spectator the extent to which the typical American soldier was like all other good soldiers of all time, it managed to suggest how different he was also—how far, for example, he was from feeling the unmixed emotion which Shakespeare had so perfectly described when he spoke of the "pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war." Here, in other words, was a play which did what only a play, and only a play written in the twentieth century, could have done—which, that is to say, reconstructed with a vividness almost equal to the vividness of experience a series of events, and at the same time discharged the tension of an audience by formulating for it the confused emotions to which a knowledge of, or a participation in, the war just past had given rise. When the curtain descended I felt that a theater which could even occasionally reveal plays like that was a theater worth studying, and I have not, during the six years which have followed, changed my opinion.

Europe today has no group of young playwrights comparable in importance to that which founded the modern drama a generation ago. The impulse which led the earlier group to create the drama of social discussion has pretty well exhausted itself, leaving the newest generation of playwrights in England, France, and Germany to write without the advantage of any common trend. And while I do not by any means wish to maintain that the contemporary American playwrights are sure of a historical importance equal to that achieved by the Ibsens, the Shaws, and the Hauptmanns, I do believe that one may see from such a play as "What Price Glory?" both that they are superior to their present European fellows and that there is at present in the process of formation an American tradition of dramatic writing which is gradually detaching itself from the tradition out of which the established classics of modern European drama grew. Let me see if I can suggest what that tradition is.

In various of their plays, Ibsen, Hauptmann, and Shaw achieved a purely dramatic excellence in varying degrees, but there is no doubt of the fact that their chief significance is to be found in what they taught. The best measure of their importance is the influence which they had upon the moral and social thought of their contemporaries, and Shaw, at least, so far accepted this as a generally applicable measure of dramatic importance that he declared Shakespeare to be a trivial dramatist, because, in effect, "Romeo and Juliet" contained no criticism of the Elizabethan social system. But when, to choose at random, we consider such plays as "What Price Glory?" "Strange Interlude," "Street Scene," and "The Green Pastures," it is obvious that these plays do not teach anything definable and that, if we consider them "important," it cannot be for the reasons that "A Doll's House" or "Man and Superman" is important.

Now I do not for a moment believe that the authors of these American plays said plainly to themselves, "Art can achieve an importance which is not identical with the importance of the doctrine taught." As a matter of fact, the American drama began as an offshoot of the European, and it began to be serious when it began, like its model, to deal with material sociologically significant. But even in the work of certain individual dramatists like Eugene O'Neill or Elmer Rice one may trace the process by which didacticism is gradually replaced by a feeling for effects more purely aesthetic, and the result is that plays like "Strange Interlude" and "Street Scene" are, whatever one may think of their absolute merit, obviously efforts to write plays more like the plays of Shakespeare than like the plays of Shaw—in the sense, that is to say, that they aim less at the enforcement of a moral than at the achievement of that miracle by which pain is transmuted into beauty, which goes under the name of Tragedy. I would not, be it understood, be thought to maintain that art has no human importance, but I do maintain, first, that the American drama has differentiated itself from that of the masters of the modern European drama by ceasing to cultivate the "problem play," and second, that the direction of this differentiation is admirable because comedy and tragedy perform for the human being a function not performed by either the profoundest sociological treatise or the plays whose purpose is primarily sociological.

I have sometimes been asked what "Strange Interlude" means, and I could reply only that no answer of the sort which the inquirer obviously expected is possible. The question is a question of the sort which we learned, and quite properly, to ask in connection with "An Enemy of the People" or "Man and Superman," but it is not the kind of question any sensitive person would think of asking in connection with "Othello." Such a play does not, in that sense, "mean" anything. It has, that is to say, no doctrine. And if we are considering not magnitude but manner, "Strange Interlude" is like "Othello." Defending this same play before a hostile audience in Boston I was once interrupted by a Communist who demanded to know whether or not the author had in this play "any message for the workingman." I replied—without, I am sure, being understood—"Yes, in so far as the workingman is also a human being." But in that question and that reply lie, if only they might be elucidated, the whole meaning of the relation of art to life and the whole defense of the effort of the contemporary American dramatist to make out of the materials of contemporary American life comedies and tragedies acceptable to the souls of contemporary American audiences.

The sciences of sociology, politics, and economics have as their purpose the adjustment of the individual to his material surroundings. There is, besides, the science of ethics, which endeavors to teach us how we ought to act, and there are, still further, schools to train us for the practice of the professions by which we hope to earn the means of sustenance. But every man is something more than a citizen, a parent, and a breadwinner. Even the Communist workingman is a human being also, and as such he has a problem only distantly related to the problem of making his living and raising his family. He has the problem of learning how to accept, with fortitude if necessary and with joy if possible, the experience of living, and of seeing others live—the problem of finding a way to "accept the universe." And it is the answer to that problem which art attempts to give, by showing how the chaos of experience may be contemplated under one or another of those various patterns among which comedy and tragedy are the most inclusive and the most satisfying.

I am not deluded into supposing that the American theater achieves for us that purpose as well as, let us say, the theater of Shakespeare achieved it for the Elizabethan age. But I respect it because it seems to me to be addressing itself to the effort to do so.

Hardy's Other Life

The Later Years of Thomas Hardy: 1892-1928. By Florence Emily Hardy. The Macmillan Company. $5.

MRS. HARDY'S biography, of which this is the second and concluding volume, seems to be little more than a chronicle of her husband's thoughts and movements as he himself recorded them in his journal. But she makes up for the meagerness of her method by having a great man to reveal, and she reveals him, or allows him to reveal himself, with a most interesting fulness. There will be more orderly and ingenious books about Hardy than this, for criticism surely is not done with him; but Mrs. Hardy will remain the authority on the subject, at least as long as she lives and keeps possession of the journals and the letters.

Whether she has held back anything important, whether she is aware of any secrets, one can only guess. For my own part, although I have found in neither of the two volumes the thing I wanted to find, I am willing to believe that it never existed. What I have always wanted to know is the reason, if any, for Hardy's inclination toward tragedy. This man whose every story and poem, almost, is concerned with failure or disappointment—did this man suffer once himself? So far as I can see he did not; any more, at least, than most men do, and that may be a good deal. He seems never to have been thwarted or blasted in any of the numerous ways he invented for his heroes. The answer, if this be true, is simply that he was possessed of the tragic temperament, and possessed of it in some extreme degree explainable only in terms of his genius. When "Jude the Obscure" was under fire in 1895 he wrote to a friend: "As for the story itself, it is really sent out to those into whose souls the iron has entered, and has entered deeply at some time of their lives." That may be enough. Certainly the iron was in his soul, and it may make no difference when or how it got there, or whether, as is possible, he was born with gloom in his eyes and a dagger in his heart.

Mrs. Hardy naturally makes much of the furor over "Jude the Obscure"—an epidemic of stupidity among the English (and American) reviewers which, coming as it did just after the unpleasantness concerning "Tess," confirmed Hardy in his resolve to quit the field of prose fiction. The reviewers of the poetry which followed were scarcely less stupid, and Mrs. Hardy naturally becomes exercised about all that too. She almost makes her story, indeed, the story of Hardy's reception by the public. But it is not the main story. The main story is of how a man at fifty-five went on to live another life, of how a seasoned novelist who might very well have been exhausted by the composition of seventeen extended narratives took up another kind of pen and produced, in the more than thirty years to come, ten volumes of verse which made him—though few persons seem to be aware of the fact—one of England's greatest poets, past or present. A year or so before his death he told his wife that his only ambition, so far as he could remember, had been "to have some poem or poems in a good anthology like the 'Golden Treasury.'" He has already achieved that end, but a greater end is easily in sight—fame for the "Collected Poems," and a general acknowledgment that "The Dynasts" is so far the masterpiece of the twentieth-century muse.

Mrs. Hardy says enough to convince me of what I had suspected, that Hardy's interest in his poems was deep and serious. The hoarseness of their note was studied; their cacophonies were carefully planned; their oddities were almost regular. He was constantly experimenting with meters, as he was constantly searching the world for subjects sufficiently unusual. "We tale-tellers," he said, "are all Ancient Mariners, and none of us is warranted in stopping Wedding Guests unless he has something more unusual to relate than the ordinary experience of every average man and woman." He sought subjects in newspapers, old books, and the numerous histories of real people which came to his ears; he found them also in himself, for he was rich not only in fancy, but in observation and reflection. "Courage has been idealized; why not fear?—which is a higher consciousness, and based on a deeper insight." "I often think that women, even those who consider themselves experienced in sexual strategy, do not know how to manage an honest man." The whole point, I suppose, is that Hardy was himself an unusual man. I wonder, finally, if any light is thrown upon his character by the entry which he made in his journal on November 13, 1917: "I was a child till I was sixteen; a youth till I was twenty-five; a young man till I was forty or fifty."

MARK VAN DOREN

Mr. Sinclair's Alger Novel

Mountain City. By Upton Sinclair. A. and C. Boni. $2.50.

"MOUNTAIN CITY" is exactly the kind of novel Horatio Alger might have written if he had possessed a social conscience. It is a rapid-racing narrative, gaspingly rapid after it achieves its momentum, vivid with episodes one more incredible than another, rising to a climax cinematographic in intensity and thrill. Its characters, however, are no more, or no less, real than those in "Phil the Fiddler," and its theme is hardly more convincing than the old familiar one that is to be found in almost any Algeresque fiction. One never comes to know the people in the book in any more intimate sense than one comes to know the people one reads about in the newspapers. The names of the people in the newspaper are there; their features are described with photographic precision; their actions are recorded in definite detail—and yet we somehow never know them, and, what is more, seldom become very anxious to know them. There is no doubt about the fact that they are real, as real as ourselves. But their realness is never communicated to us unless we happen to know them personally, which means that we know them in terms of something which is more intimate than names, features, or actions. We know them, it might be said, as part of ourselves, and can realize their presence even when they are not to be seen or heard. Now it is the task of the artist to make his characters into personal creations of that variety. In doing this lies the subtlety of his art. Fiction which does not do this is not art. And it is for that reason, namely, because it fails to achieve that subtlety, that "Mountain City" is not art.

Most attacks upon Sinclair's fiction have attempted to explain its weakness in terms of its propaganda. That, I believe, is a false emphasis. Propaganda, after all, is too vague and mischievous a word to be employed as a critical tool. A strong case can easily be made out to show that much great art has been propagandic in purpose. For a long time English literature served as an agency for moral propaganda. Addison, Pope, Johnson, Dickens, Trollope were all propagandists for morality in one way or another. George Bernard Shaw is one of the most avowed propagandists of our age. Even T. S. Eliot today has asserted that "the greatest poets have been concerned with moral values." It is not propaganda that ruins fiction, then, but the failure of the writer to achieve that contactual communication between his materials and his audience. It is not propaganda that makes "Mountain City" an inferior piece of work. It is its failure to communicate its conception that is the cause of its failure.

Every intelligent American, liberal as well as radical, is in sympathy with Sinclair's satire—and "Mountain City," it should be added, is a satire. The difficulty in appreciation, therefore, is not with the theme but with its execution. The story of the novel is simple. Jed Rusher, a poor boy, the son of "a driver and a handy man," learned early in life that money is the root of all success. When he grew up he soon saw that money was the source of privilege as well as power. Hinks, the rich ranch-owner, was able to "beat his women because he had the money and they didn't." Jed Rusher, as a consequence of this realization, decided that at all costs he would not remain poor. "Get money, Jed Rusher, get money"—this became the challenge and inspiration of his life. Everything else was sacrificed to that end. Every action that he undertook, once he had got into the good graces of the millionaire single-taxer, Mr. Warrener, was as carefully calculated as the hours on a clock. Even his marriage, effected by subterfuge and vicious stratagem, was an expression of this same logic. His success as a financial titan, which was marred but slightly by his wife's desertion, found its finale in his decision to reward his former university chancellor with an endowment of fifty thousand dollars to establish "a chair to combat single tax and other economic fallacies."

Now this whole story, we are informed, is not an invention. It is based upon the real life of a certain individual in Mountain City, which to all appearances and intents is Denver. The reality of the story, however, as was pointed out before, does not make it a reality for the reader. Authentic as a living fact, it is incredible as a literary fiction. Its satire fails because it never gets beneath the surface of its material. In other words, it is interesting as a newspaper report but unconvincing as a novel.

Credo of the Engineer

Toward Civilization. Edited by Charles A. Beard. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

PROFESSOR BEARD, the doyen of American political scientists, has here edited a sequel to "Whither Mankind?" In the former book literary gentlemen expressed their views on a civilization founded on the basis of a machine technology. In the present volume technologists, "insiders looking out," tell us their reflections on the upshot and outcome of their work. For, as Professor Beard adds, "are not technologists thinkers as well as doers?" As is customary with collections of this kind, the key in which the articles are set varies considerably—all the way from contributions adipose with facts to Dr. Pupin's personal explanations of why he does not regret that "fifty-four years ago I deserted my beloved Serbian oxen and ran away to the land of machines."

The heart of the whole matter is to be found in a phrase used by Mr. Harvey Davis:

> All that can be said either for or against the machine is that it is making possible (not probable—or improbable—but merely physically possible) a spirit and culture which, both in intensity and in depth of penetration into the masses of the population, can conceivably far outshine anything that the world has ever known.

The issue, of course, is precisely whether the civilization of the machine has anything at all to do with intensity of culture and whether, in so far as there is a relation, it is not an inimical one. Let us grant that machine technology at the moment increases worldly prosperity (Mr. Stuart Chase warns us that, under capitalism, it may increase goods while decreasing jobs). It enables the undertaker to buy an automobile and to call himself a mortician—an outrage which shocks the sensitive soul of Mr. Aldous Huxley. Indubitably it renders possible more cheap books, more cheap film shows, more cheap radio sets broadcasting to those who would (and those who would not) hear the insistent dialogues of Amos 'n' Andy, more automobiles, more traffic regulations, and more sheep-herding.

This may be "depth of penetration of spirit into the masses of the population." In a sense it is true: humble men who before only gossiped about the tavern, the dance, or the prayer-meeting now entertain hopes of sending their sons to a hotel-management course at college or even read a Harper's article on Einstein or the Duty of Disobedience. Dignity is démodé, inconsistent with this age of speed. Mr. Kenneth Burke has told us, in the New Republic, that "dignity is Ptolemaic, indignity Copernican." And nobody would wish to be "Ptolemaic," that is, self-centered, when he can revolve round something else (it doesn't matter much what), in fact, be "Copernican." It nevertheless happens to be true that, from the point of view of those who believe that the external means of expressing culture are the rewards of those who have first attained admission to a class disciplined in internal culture, this whole system is topsy-turvy. From the point of view of the introvert, from the point of view of the entire European tradition which traces from the Hellenic antithesis of busi-ness and culture, the whole system is an anathema, a nihilism of values.

We are at the parting of the ways. On the one side lies all that we have, through the ages, meant by culture: introspection; cultivation of the soul; leisure for some; distinction between those who did attain a standard of human dignity, whether as aristocrats above the vulgar or as elect above the worldly, and those who did not attain this standard; a civilization controlled from above by rare standards of excellence; wealth negligible save as a conspicuous means of displaying these standards. Over against this we have the new philosophy with its heterogeneous affiliations to equalitarianism, democracy, and the rise to power of money. It is pronouncedly extrovert and objective. It frankly accepts the world and the flesh and has its doubts about the soul. Values are to be found by steeping oneself in the living stream of external affairs. Not leisure for some, but the chance of an executive position for all. Skepticism of distinctions as, at the best, self-conscious, probably sham, and always priggish. Democracy and the abolition of class power. Prosperity and the welcoming of every new technical invention. The importance of wealth as a means to prosperity for all. That is the new program, and the writers of this book contribute to show how inventions, engineering, and business have conspired to make it feasible.

With this new philosophy of Americanism I confess to a profound sympathy, as well as to a speculative curiosity about what is the most momentous spiritual change of our age. To the Hegelian there is nothing shocking in substituting the values of objective reality for those of subjective reality, to finding individualism only in adventure and initiative and not at all in self-cultivation. The cultural connections of this philosophy are not with Paris and Weimar, but Moscow and perhaps Rome are connected with it. Its greatest dangers would seem to be that its exponents will not realize how immense is the movement that they have started. It is foolish to nourish a blind hope that a man in spare hours, which improved machinery may allow him, can acquire the old culture which was a manner of life masterly with a sense of superiority and power. To its very marrow it is hostile to him. The new philosophy cannot be taken so easily, as if it were a patchwork of all colors, a ragout of all desirable things. The facts on which it has to be based are coming into existence fast; it requires master-minds to think out all the implications. It may very well be that this denial of the unique individual, this elevation of all individuals to efficient cooperation, this zest for the technological, the external, the organized whole, spell in the end the philosophy of communism. Not for nothing Count Keyserling (who has inspired moments) declares America to be the most socialistic of countries. The engineers and experts who soberly contribute to this volume supply us with lines of thought—one wonders whether or not unwittingly—which may end in our subscribing to the Count's belief. Let those who have eyes to read, read.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN

Art Without Chest

Poems. By Peter Quennell. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

ELSEWHERE, in the epilogue to his book on Baudelaire and the symbolists, Mr. Quennell remarks on a contemporary preference for those forms of art anticipated by Jules Laforgue in his phrase, "l'Art sans poitrine," as if the artist belonged to a race already conscious of exile and, retreating steadily before the new barbarians, demanded a goddess not too ponderous to embarrass him in the years of his flight and banishment. Mr. Quennell's own twenty-one poems, the labor of nine years, handsomely printed for this American edition, are themselves excellent specimens of that "slender, bosomless Art," sexless, exacting, abstruse, serious, and elegant. An evasive, disquieting art, engaging in no trade with the conventional emotions; a personality dividing and dividing again, as if to escape integral annihilation; a voice threading out of a hero's tomb, a sea grave, a fountainhead, an angel's brain; a distinguished address to goddesses and hermaphrodites; a sidelong vision, fugitive, with "thoughts all turned back like birds against the wind."

The flexible, but never loose, rhythms of Mr. Quennell's unrhymed verse depend mainly on the image rather than on the idea.

> Round an external stimulus [he writes in a short foreword] like the branch or twig which Stendhal speaks of, tossed into the salt mine, images, gradually accumulated, sometimes from experience, sometimes from reading, had suddenly flown together and formed novel and disturbing shapes. It seemed important then that the spontaneity of the process should not be impaired; that the oddity of the crystals might excuse their fewness . . .

When the crystal is of this nature:

> Now huddled waves had lulled their bursting foam
> And slight clouds laid their breasts upon the sea;
> The sullen winds, head downward from the sky,
> Solicited his movement on their viols,

I fear that it is more odd than virtuous, and I should be glad for a cleaner vision, more proper to sight, with less of the ballooning phantoms of twilight and the waking dream.

The Sunflower, a short early poem employing concealed rhyme, the record of a single moment of intense perspective, is flawless and powerful:

> See, I have bent thee by thy saffron hair,
>   O most strange masker,
> Towards my face, thy face so full of eyes,
>   O almost legendary monster.
> Thee of the saffron, circling hair I bend,
> Bend by my fingers knotted in thy hair,
>   Hair like broad flames.
> So—shall I swear by beech husk, spindle-berry,
> To break thee, saffron hair and peering eye,
>   To have the mastery?

Much of Mr. Quennell's work appears neither inevitable nor decisive, more like fragments of a larger poem unwritten than like achieved entities, the images accumulating without fusing, accumulating often without manifest purpose, either because the genetic emotion has been strangled (in fear of the obvious?), or else because that emotion is too ambiguous, too "poetic," to sustain its identity from stanza to stanza. The more ambitious pieces are successful only when the crystals of imagery cohere to a central branch of impulse; cohering in The Flight into Egypt to a narrative device, in Leviathan (I) to a profound symbol of the perfectible and corruptible flesh. I have space to quote only a few lines from Leviathan:

> Leviathan drives the eyed prow of his face,
> With the surge dumbly rippling round his lips,
> Toward the Atlantic shore;
> Not flat and golden like the Cherubim,
> Or a face round and womanish like the Seraphim,
> But thick and barbed—the broad, barbed cheeks of Donne.
> . . . .
> The salt had scurfed his body with white fire
> And knotted the rough hair between his breasts,
> And as he rose delicate Atlantis trembled,
> Tilting upon the sea's plain like a leaf.

A broad full-bosomed poem it is for Mr. Quennell to take with him from "the twilight of literature" into the spiritual exile that he prophesies!

STANLEY J. KUNITZ

A Transcendental Prude

Philine. From the Unpublished Journals of Henri Frédéric Amiel. Translated by Van Wyck Brooks. With an Introduction by Edmond Jaloux. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

AMIEL is in many ways the most complete example of that malaise—called, variously, spleen and Weltschmerz; Wertherism, Faustism, Hamletism; epigonehood, the sick will—to which, some hundred years ago, the Western world fell prey. To describe that malaise here is neither possible nor necessary, for a great part—perhaps the most relevant part—of the literature of these hundred years has been engaged in its description, from Arnold and de Vigny to Eliot, from Stendhal and Turgenev to Hemingway. And there is no space to guess at its social causes, which must include the whole history of the West.

Whatever its name, its kind, and its causes, it has manifested itself in the feeling that between the soul of man and the uses of this world there is a necessary and rigid divorce. This is not a philosophical and reasoned conclusion; indeed, the trend of philosophy has been in quite the opposite direction. Rather is it a multiple personal intuition. Sometimes it is experienced as a loss of savor from the world (as in Stendhal), sometimes as a loss of strength and desire from the individual (as in de Vigny and Amiel), sometimes as both (as in Eliot). In a more religious age these manifestations would have been regarded as a normal part of the preliminary paraphernalia of religious conversion. This, indeed, they sometimes become, but on the whole the sufferers from cosmic despair have adjusted their lives—if at all—without the ministrations of orthodoxy.

Amiel was not only one of the greatest sufferers from the malaise but he was its most thorough and devoted investigator. In him the sense of the divorce between man and the world was raised to a pathological intensity and he lived his whole life in it. "Journal of a man who has been poisoned (the hour and a quarter before his death)"—so runs a note which Amiel made, perhaps for a projected piece of fiction. And his own journal is almost exactly that: he too has been poisoned, and he keeps the record of the many years before his death. He has been poisoned by the ideal, which, as he understands it, is necessarily a foe to the real. Physically and spiritually he is oppressed by listlessness and inertia. The ordinary deeds of life have little significance; the ordinary personal fulfilments attract him in spite of his philosophy, but he despises them.

So thoroughly did Amiel live his life in the melancholy disease and so thoroughly did he canvass it in the best pages of his "Journal intime" that he has become the very symbol of the sick will. Edmond Jaloux, one of the editors of this new selection from the Journal which has been called "Philine," objects, in his introduction, to the literary handling which has petrified Amiel into a symbol and to the diagnosis which has declared his will sick.

M. Jaloux's first objection has point, but it must be directed rather at Amiel's editors than at his critics. The first editor of the Journal, Mlle Mercier ("la belle Calviniste," as Amiel called her), adored Amiel and had no intention of representing anything less than the platonic beauty of his soul. By her selections (published in 1883)—and by her alteration of the text—she placed him in a moral and emotional vacuum. Bouvier's edition of 1923, by adding to the selections and restoring the original readings, by lightening the religious emphasis and by allowing the diarist's religious musings and a first kiss at thirty-one, gave back to Amiel some semblance of humanity. But even Bouvier's edition was largely a collection of "beauties" which left Amiel still in a vacuum. "Philine," which is Amiel's record of his only love affair, gives him the full reality of a man and takes considerably from his value as a symbol. It becomes hard to interpret him in terms of a world tendency of the spirit and necessary to interpret him in terms of psychological predisposition and physical economy.

But M. Jaloux's second contention, that Amiel's will was not sick, is scarcely borne out. M. Jaloux cites Amiel's activity as a teacher, as a writer of bad verses, and as a diarist, and concludes that no sick will could have carried on such activity. But it is, of course, not by physical activity or achievement that we may measure soundness or sickness of will but by the subjective reaction to events.

What the quality of that reaction was in Amiel, "Philine" gives us perfectly. An unknown young woman has written to him and, after tortuous doubts, Amiel meets her. After tortuous doubts he becomes intimate with her. For a while the friendship is simple enough; they fall into the relationship which is usual between Amiel and sensitive women, in which, much like Richardson, he plays father confessor. (He could not always keep the relationship paternal, however; he remarks that, though he has made none, he has received five or six proposals—and refused them all.) Very soon Philine wants more than paternalisms. As for Amiel, he cannot fall in love; he has a terror of the real; he is disgusted by physical love. But at thirty-nine he is ashamed of his virginity. He develops a lust for lewd books and pictures. His dreams disturb him. And he sees in Philine his Madame de Warens, with whom he can have his experience and have done with the whole business of sex.

This most delicate of men, by his very excess of delicacy and hatred of the gross, begins to coarsen his friendship. In his desire to learn about sex and have it over with, he begins to see Philine very simply as a sexual instrument. He decides to attempt a consummation and does not. He moralizes away his indecision and despises himself for restraint. At last he takes Philine. But what a disappointment! Is that all? And (astounding phrase!) "at the price of my first fruits."

"The fear of what I love is my evil," Amiel says. The relationship continues but Amiel is constantly attacking it. It fades from passion back to friendship. He contemplates marriage but is deterred. In his fiftieth year, moved by gossip and the suspicion of disingenuousness on her part, Amiel breaks with Philine.

It is not a new Amiel that "Philine" gives us, but merely an Amiel whose sick will is turned from the cosmic and eternal to the mundane and diurnal. The cosmic priggishness of Amiel

Nevertheless, it is not mere charity that dictates to us the necessity of respect for this transcendental prude, for he is, as M. LIONEL TRILLING

History as Fiction

Guerra. By Alfred Neumann. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

IN "The Devil," "King Haber," and "The Rebels" Alfred Neumann showed with what success psychological values can be applied to historical characters and events. In each one of these books we note that the author has proceeded on the assumption—an anathema, I imagine, to most professional historians—that the arcanum of facts must not be too reverently searched or worshiped. To put it another way: history-writing and fiction meet at that focal point where both the historian and the novelist begin to revise and color the available data, which has been, of course, already tainted by the dust of time. Both go in quest, not of "ultimate truth," but of sound values. In modern philosophy these values are called percepta; nor need we think that they are themselves apprehensions of pure reality; for there are, it is conceded, many veils between our ordinary perceptions and the thing we are seeking, commonly called the truth.

Alfred Neumann in the present book takes up the revolution of the Carbonari, as in "The Rebels," and rewrites it for us from the viewpoint of Guerra, the leader. The story begins with Guerra's release from the island of Elba. It is both effective and plausible, and the dramatic crises—of which there are many—are not at all forced. They occur naturally in the flow of the tale, which is thick with intrigue, dark plots, the scheming of prelates and aristocrats, love and lust, the shedding of blood, and the half-finished talk and action of conspirators who scarcely dare trust one another.

Guerra is in love with the Princess Maria, who is the mistress of the Grand Duke, the enemy of United Italy. He is also sinisterly attached to his own sister, who marries the head of the Radical Party. In the end he is shot when about to address his faithful followers in the piazza at Rome. From a balcony a blind man exclaims: "Why—why isn't he speaking?" The novel is full of just such dramatic touches. And it is this sort of literary device that best gives us the clue to the difference between the ordinary kind of history and the historical novel that perhaps justifies itself by the urgency of its inner truth.

PIERRE LOVING

The Mahabharata Blues

The Art of Reading. By A. R. Orage. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

A. R. ORAGE has a vast reputation for profundity, and indeed is more than a literary critic in the eyes of his intimates: he is a sage. But I fail to see what it is that so interests our Columbuses of the spirit, for I can find nothing in the man except an Englishman who happens to be a fairly interesting critic. And it would be a gross bit of flattery to say that as a critic he deserves the majuscule.

This latest book of his is made up of selected excerpts from literary notes originally printed in the New Age. It is amusingly miscellaneous, and whoever tried to get some order into the chaos did not do a very good job. In fact the book would have been just as interesting if it had not been marked off into sections, and more interesting if the labor so expended had gone into dating the excerpted passages. Fortunately Orage knows how to write, and however they are presented his remarks have point. They were, most of them, written controversially, and they still bite and sting. They make good literary paragraphs.

Of course in a book made up of paragraphs the number of ideas which the author presents is large, but with a fair degree of accuracy it may be said that Orage's principal beliefs are these: (1) that the first duty of a literary critic is that he study texts; (2) that style is the man; (3) that biography and literary gossip are a plague and a nuisance; (4) that most current literature is journalism; (5) that we have gone as far as we can with the intelligence, and what we now need is to draw upon some other human faculties for knowing; (6) that Western European literature is hopelessly dry and uninteresting and needs to be revived by contact with a radically new fecundating force, which force, in his opinion, is bound to be the "Mahabharata."

(1) No one in his right senses would deny that Mr. Orage is quite correct in insisting that the business of criticism is the study of the texts of literature. (2) In his effort to prove that style is the man Mr. Orage carries his dogma to absurd extremes, even deducing the moral character of a writer from the nature of his prose. (3) His anxiety that the text be studied leads him into an excessive depreciation of biographical fact. So far does he go in this direction that my impulse is to defend even literary gossip rather than admit the validity of Orage's strictures. (4) Calling what one doesn't happen to like "journalism" is a quite popular dodge, but so overworked as to be unimpressive, especially when one's author writes: ". . . popular writers (I mean journalists) like Zola, Bourget, Maurice Barrès, and André Gide . . ." (5) I have many times lately had occasion to say that I do not agree that intelligence has yet proved itself an incompetent instrument for solving the problems facing mankind. And certainly when the appeal is from intelligence to mysticism, true or false, one cannot but draw back with reasonably polite disdain. (6) Orage's appeal to the "Mahabharata" as the body of literature which is to bring in a Western European renaissance leaves one pretty cold, since it is obvious that his reason for thinking so is its mystical content.

Together with these major ideas one finds in Orage a host of minor notions which are even less appealing. He makes a monotonous appeal to tradition. For instance, he writes that a "critic's principles of judgment should be the established principles of the world's literature," and on another occasion makes reference to "the established laws of literature." What are these "laws" beyond such elementary ideas as the necessity for communication, the revelation of original insight before the writer deserves the honor of praise, and others of the kind? So long as they remain undefined they are concealed blackjacks for knocking out the unsuspecting aspirant. Orage is a linguistic imperialist, holding that anything written in the so-called English language must be judged by English standards. This is a curious notion to find in a man like Orage, but it is there. At bottom every Englishman is a nationalistic patriot and most of them are imperialists. Orage talks too much about the common and vulgar (like an Englishman!) on the one hand, and the noble on the other, that is, he is a snob in his thinking and has never analyzed these terms to discover that they are survivals from a feudalistic social situation and have a distinctly snobbish connotation when used today.

Mr. Orage's reputation as a sage seems to rest on two pillars: first, his constant reference to Sanskrit writings, and, second, his devotion to "psychological exercises," whatever they may be. There is, it is alleged, an aura which hangs about him, and his mere presence plus the utterance of a few commonplace words is enough to change the course of one's life. By way of

In any case, the point is that Mr. Orage is a pleasant fellow, well read in literature, who has a weakness for the esoteric and the vague. He makes a pretty obvious appeal to the soft spot in the American mentality, the spot that allows men like Count Keyserling to flourish in this country.

It is not at all curious, I think, that but two American critics, so far as I know, would acknowledge the influence of Mr. Orage: Gorham B. Munson and, with a chuckle in his beard, Ernest Augustus Boyd.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

Notes on Fiction

Money and Other Stories. By Karel Capek. With a Foreword by John Galsworthy. Translated from the Czech by Francis P. Marchant, Dort Round, F. P. Casey, and O. Vocadlo. Brentano's. $2.50.

An interesting group of tales, noteworthy for their keen insight and for Capek's restrained sympathy for his characters. These latter are all men and women of weak will tortured by circumstance into one proud gesture of defiance—after which they sink back into their habitual spiritual mediocrity. What one misses in these stories is style (though the stiff and undistinguished prose may be the fault of the translators) and that warmth and depth which fiction has when it is rooted in a recognizable national life. Capek's civilized cosmopolitanism, admirable for a play of ideas such as "R. U. R." works against him in this little volume of short stories. They have that curious coldness which results from a conscious desire to make them comprehensible to many different peoples.

Wishbone. By Stirling Bowen. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

This volume, by a new young writer, consists of three long short stories. The first, An Imperfect Crime, is a clearly conceived if somewhat lengthy fictional indictment of American judicial methods; the second, Townsman, by far the best of the three, is a realistic study of the minor tragedy implicit in the wasted life of a small-town moron; the final story, Some Go Away, deals with more subtle psychological states and falls into sentimentality and vagueness. Mr. Bowen has an honest and searching mind and a feeling for little souls that reminds the reader of the early Sherwood Anderson. The first novel from his pen should be worth reading. His main defect is his insensitive Middle Western prose, which suffers from a youthful revolt against undue color or variety. Mr. Bowen's career will be hindered rather than helped by the stupid publisher's blurb which informs us that his style "recalls the structural beauty and strength of modern architecture."

The Fiery Dive and Other Stories. By Martin Armstrong. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

Only one of these stories attains a higher level than that of merely agreeable or sympathetic writing. Sombrero is a remarkable account of a court martial held in 1810 upon an English captain who was guilty of needlessly marooning a disobedient sailor. The tale, which appears to be drawn from actual maritime records, is stamped with a grave and bitter irony. The others, though they are all nicely written, are less notable, and seem to be the products of a patient mind studying life at second or third hand. The Widow of Ephesus and Saint Hercules are merely pseudo-classical exercises of the sort which delight the "literary" English reading public. The Fiery Dive would be a good story if A. E. Coppard had written it. In the Wilds, with its ridiculous portrait of a "strong" lover, is perilously near to the bathetic. The longest story of the group, Portrait of the Misses Harlow, is a study of the contrasting temperaments of two sisters. It is intelligently conceived and well enough written, but the characterization has an abstract, almost pedantic, quality. In general, the volume is not up to Mr. Armstrong's earlier and fresher work.

O. Henry Memorial Award Prize Stories of 1929. Edited by Blanche Colton Williams. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

This is the annual selection made from the more conventional American magazines. As the editor, with the persuasiveness of a circus barker, puts it: "Here are realism, romance, fantasy, humor; stories of character, plot, and local color; here are, besides one of Paris and one of England, stories of the South, the West, and the East of America." The prize-winner, Big Blonde, by Dorothy Parker, is one of those slick, ironic, modernist character studies that is likely to fool an unsuspecting reader into overrating it. Mr. Howard's story of mental telepathy is too attenuated for our taste. Mr. Wilbur Daniel Steele contributes his annual unreadability; and Margaret Leach bears off the palm for contributing the cheapest and vulgarest tale in the collection. Her contribution, Speakeasy, is one that Fannie Hurst might be proud to sign. By far the cleverest writing is that to be found in Mr. Bromfield's The Apothecary, which, despite its melodrama, is a fascinating macabre yarn; but the stories which gave us the most pleasure are precisely those which are least pretentious and "artistic," namely, the humorous pieces: The King of the Cats, by Stephen Vincent Benét, Two Red-Haired Women, by Don Marquis, and Professional Pride, by Ruth Burr Sanborn. The last-named, which is a farcical tale of the misadventures of a circus fat lady, is really funny. In general, however, one finishes the volume wondering why year after year it continues to get itself published. It is only necessary to read the editor's introductory remarks to realize that her standards of selection are hardly artistic ones.

Fables. By Theodore Francis Powys. The Viking Press. $2.50.

Mr. Powys remains the strangest writer in English, but his uniqueness is likely to lose some of its savor if he continues to repeat himself. "Mr. Weston's Good Wine" was a remarkable book; "The House with the Echo" was not, and these "Fables" bear still more obviously the mark of a talent that should not expend itself so prolifically. One tires a bit of Mr. Powys's peculiar, morbid pessimism which was so fascinating in his earlier books. In these "Fables" his spring winds are too consistently "cold and clammy," his ponds too inevitably "filled with sour mud and cold tadpoles." After a few pages of this his twisted view of the world begins to appear a trifle funny, and one begins to think of him as a sort of Gloomy Gus, carrying on interminable muttering conversations with corpses, fleas, withered leaves, worms, spittoons, and blind hens —the heroes of these philosophical chronicles. Here and there one catches a glimpse of the pure gold, but for the most part the mine seems overworked.

The Royal Woman. By Heinrich Mann. Translated from the German by Arthur J. Ashton. The Macaulay Company. $2.

Heinrich Mann is looked upon as a kind of godfather by certain of the younger German novelists, and in his own country enjoys a reputation almost equal to that of his brother Thomas. But to those not afflicted with the myopia which goes with joining literary schools and movements there seems to be no good reason for comparing the two. Heinrich Mann scarcely touches the foot of Olympus. "The Royal Woman"

EUGENE V. DEBS

A Man Unafraid

By McAlister Coleman

There was about Debs a spiritual magnetism which won the loving allegiance of all sorts and condition of men. Rarely had a man in public life been so deeply loved and so desperately fought. But even those who fought him respected and admired him. There are few biographies richer in human material or so full of drama. Illustrated.

There are thousands who honor Debs for what he thought. There ought to be tens of thousands, quite antagonistic to what he thought, who revere him for how he thought. He was as pure a soul as ever lived. . . . All these things come to the reader very poignantly from Mr. Coleman's book—Boston Transcript.

is a skilfully executed social comedy played in an atmosphere of impending doom. The time is shortly after the Franco-Prussian war. Consul West and his lovely French wife are each in conflict with powers of darkness. The consul is entangled in questionable speculation. His girl wife, victim of her instability and romanticism, finds herself through her flirtations, fears, and fancies enmeshed in intrigue. A play based on the fortunes of Napoleon III and the Empress Eugénie, which is in rehearsal throughout the novel and which is being presented when the climax occurs, is like a grotesque shadow cast by the actual, living drama in which the amateur players are involved. Perhaps in its original language the beauty of the style serves to bring about a full emotional response to the symbolism. In its English version, however, the overtones of the novel have a hollow ring.

Bourru, Soldier of France. By Jean des Vignes Rouges. Translated from the French by Ernest Hunter Wright. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

Written by a French soldier before the armistice and first published in France over ten years ago, "Bourru" stands second to Barbusse's "Under Fire" in order of publication among the serious war novels. It is not, strictly speaking, a novel at all, but a series of sketches describing the hard fighting around Vauquois in the Verdun region in 1916 as it affected Bourru, the peasant soldier, who is less an individual than a type, a composite poilu created to serve as a point about whom the sketches may cluster. Comparing it with recent war novels, one is struck by a difference which appears to be due chiefly to the difference in the times. The novelist of the World War who looks back from the vantage-point of today tends to give his characters the full and comprehensive bitterness which only the intervening years have brought to realization. "Bourru," while equally realistic, sensitive, and sincere, is nevertheless impregnated with a spirit of idealistic patriotism. This Bourru suffers, he hates it all, he trembles and sometimes flinches; but the little poilu carries on, happy to seize any respite that may come his way, willingly undertaking the most desperate assignment if he must. That the emotionalism of these stories is overkeyed is natural under the conditions.

Films

Stark War

ACCORDING to one of Bernard Shaw's pet theories the stage in the matter of ideas is usually ten years behind literature. It would be difficult to say how far behind the movies are, for as a rule they care precious little about ideas. But there is one exception. Let the idea attract public interest, let the book in which it has found expression be a best-seller, and no expense will keep the film companies from producing the book as a movie as quickly as they can get the rights. During the past year the Great War was the most popular subject in literature, and for once, to refute Bernard Shaw, also on the stage; and so "All Quiet on the Western Front," as well as "Journey's End," has already found its way on to the screen. Need it be added that both cost tremendous sums to produce (it is said, two millions in the case of "All Quiet"), and that both have been unprecedented box-office successes?

There can be little doubt that Remarque's "All Quiet" is not a great literary masterpiece. At least this was the conclusion that I arrived at after I had found that nearly every page of the book required a special focusing of imagination in order to bring out in clear relief the episodes and facts that stud the author's guileless and inarticulate prose. Nevertheless, there is no denying the interest and importance of the story as a human document. No book had spoken so courageously and, granting the necessary effort of mental readjustment, so vividly of the sheer horror of war—of man's relapse into bestiality with its frenzy of fear and rage, of his physical suffering and moral prostration. It is just as such a document that "All Quiet" emerges in a film of the same name (Central)—a terrifying document that reveals the carnage of war with staggering force. Battle scenes have been represented in many a picture, but "All Quiet" surpasses them all in the stark horror and madness of the business of fighting. Although the picture is not devoid of gentler moods, and is sprinkled generously with captivating humor, the predominant impression is that of life in the raw, of existence stripped of all adornments and bared to the bone. For this reason the total effect produced is not so much the tragedy of war as its callous bestiality. One is staggered, and shaken, and almost ready to sob, but one is not really thrilled. It is probably because of the elemental quality of its material that "All Quiet" is not so good a drama as "Journey's End"; but its appeal is more immediate, and technically it is a superior piece of cinematic craftsmanship, for which achievement Mr. Milestone, who directed the picture, deserves unstinted praise.

Considered as a picture of an unfamiliar land, "Turksib" (Eighth Street Playhouse) is quite exciting. The strange Asiatic types and the primitive mode of living, contrasted with the invading mechanical civilization, provide sufficient material to make the picture extremely interesting. There is also an imaginative touch in the treatment of detail which does credit to the picture's director, Mr. Turin. He is not so successful, however, in his attempt to dramatize the stirring feat of the construction of the Turksib railroad. There is a great deal of hectic movement in his characteristically Russian technique of "cutting," but this movement lacks the necessary force to make the progress of the construction, its strain and effort, its setbacks and its victories, as dramatically effective as a subject of such potentialities would have been made if treated by a Griffith. This defect notwithstanding, "Turksib" is a fine picture, and should not be missed by anybody who is interested in the art of the movies.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE FIRST VOLUME of the Simon report is out at last and appears to be heralded by all sections of the British daily press as epoch-making. It does not contain the promised definite proposals, which are to be published in the second volume two weeks hence, but it does declare that "progressive realization of responsible government in British India as an integral part of the Empire" should be the goal of British policy. This is interpreted to mean dominion status—but only after a long period of evolution and further tutelage. Ancient social and economic customs are correctly blamed for most of India's ills. The report is thoroughly temperate and friendly in spirit, but the question whether India will longer accept government by England is another matter. Certainly there will be no adequate representation of India at the proposed Round Table Conference in October unless the promise of dominion status is clear, unequivocal, and convincing, and fixed for an early date.

STARTLING, INDEED, IS THE NEWS that comes from Bombay that the native medical profession there has declared a boycott against all British medicine. These doctors are very largely graduates of British universities. In general assembly by unanimous vote they have decided to use hereafter only non-British drugs. The significance of this action lies in the fact that it is a protest by this learned profession against the "violations of the laws of humanity committed by government authorities in different parts of India against non-violent Indian men, women, and children during the present non-violent struggle for national liberation." More than that, the profession has appealed to the Swiss Federal Council to appoint a commission of inquiry into these violations of the laws of humanity and has called the attention of the Red Cross societies throughout the world to the "atrocities perpetrated by the government." This is confirmation of the charges of horrible cruelty reported from Indian sources which we have been reluctant to believe and to report. We do not see how Mr. MacDonald and his Government can now fail to make immediate answer to the world. Meanwhile, England has a full-fledged frontier war with the Afridis on her hands despite her persistent bombing of some of their refuges—in the name, we presume, of Christianity and the brotherhood of labor. Last week the Afridis raided up to the very walls of Peshawar under a huge fort manned by strong British forces.

PRINCE CAROL OF RUMANIA is home again, with the prospect of having things pretty much his own way until he suffers another outbreak of temperament. The dear lad has had rather an uncomfortable time of it for the past four years and more, wandering about with his uncanonical lady-love and scheming to get back the crown which Rumanian politics forced him to renounce in January, 1926. Now, however, all is lovely. Carol has "unexpectedly" plumped down on Rumanian soil in an airplane, Parliament has restored him to the throne with only one dissenting vote, and the delighted populace is shouting and weeping for joy. Little King Michael, of course, is set back a peg in becoming crown prince, but he will probably be glad that he does not have to dress up for royal functions quite so often or so much. Even Carol's divorce, which has been a stumbling-block to some Rumanian Christians, is likely, it is said, to be annulled and the family bond may be restored. Queen Marie, for once, is badly flustered, but she is expected to pull through—she usually knows how. We are all for self-determination when it comes to kings, and if Rumania is satisfied with Carol everybody else ought to be.

DESPITE THE DIPLOMATIC ATTITUDE of Premier Tardieu and the reasonable self-control of the French press, it cannot be said that the relations between France and Italy are in anything like a happy condition. It is not surprising, therefore, that some of the Paris correspondents look for the failure of any further fleet negotiations between Italy and France. It is all very well to say that one must not take Mussolini seriously, but his rattling of the saber remains precisely as menacing to the peace of Europe as were the similar speeches of Kaiser Wilhelm in ante-bellum days. In one sense Mussolini is more dangerous, for dictators invariably turn to foreign complications when things begin to go badly at home, and there appears to be plenty of evidence that the Fascist finances and industry are in anything but satisfactory condition. As for Mussolini himself, he has recently been interviewed after eight years by Theodor Wolff, the distinguished editor of the Berliner Tageblatt. Herr Wolff reports him in the pink of health, showing no strain whatever from the heavy burdens that he carries, and ready to talk quite freely about the relations of his country with Germany. To Herr Wolff Mussolini gave the assurance that Italy would stand with Germany on two questions—the desired colonial mandates and universal disarmament! Indeed, in his general political remarks Herr Wolff found nothing aggressive, but on the other hand thoughtful and sober expressions of opinion. This reminds us of the way the Kaiser's private conversations were similarly praised until it was suddenly discovered that he was really bent on conquering the entire world in the interest of the devil.

IF CHIANG KAI-SHEK'S ENEMIES had any points of agreement except their common dislike of the Chinese President, that gentleman would long ago have started on what Chinese generals call a "study tour" of Western countries. But the enemies consist in part of old-fashioned rival generals, and in part of those curious bands which the correspondents call "Communist armies," and the two cannot possibly get on together. Not even one rival general with another, or one "Communist army" with another. Everywhere in China today there are roving bands of unemployed soldiers, many of them once loyal and convinced soldiers in the early Nationalist armies, where education in revolutionary nationalism went hand in hand with training in shooting. Such men, united in little armies, would five years ago have been called "bandits"—and, in a way, they are. They live off the land, but they live as Robin Hoods, pillaging, by preference, the rich. Convinced Communists have gone among them, preaching a hatred of landlords and encouraging the peasants to throw off the feudal yoke. In South China such armies appear to be acquiring an increasing measure of organization. But it is difficult to believe that the movement has the solid basis in either peasant or industrial-worker organization which any really significant economic revolution must have, and a Communist movement can hardly be seriously Communist so long as it accepts the leadership of generals. Yet this will bear watching.

IT IS A MAD WORLD, indeed, with our master, Secretary Mellon, reported shaking his head over the tariff bill and wondering whether he can approve it, and rumor declaring that both Senators from Pennsylvania are in doubt as to whether to vote for it. A tariff bill beaten by the votes of "Joe" Grundy and David Reed—both acting from diametrically opposite points of view—would be a sight to make the gods shake their sides. Grundy, of course, would denounce it because it is not drastic enough. Reed will do what Mr. Mellon tells him; Mr. Mellon, it appears, has not definitely made up his mind. Like Mr. Reed he will "study the measure" in complete philosophic detachment. He must "compare the rates"—several thousand of them—before, Solomon-like, he judges. Meanwhile, the Democrats are trying to decide whether or not they want the bill defeated by the Republicans or passed by just enough Democrats to give these conscienceless hypocrites the chance to go before the country next fall deploring this betrayal of the American people. The final vote is, as we write, scheduled for the day after publication of this issue of The Nation. The next one, Friday, June 13, strikes us as the right and proper one to be a day of sadness and wrath-to-come for the American people.

SAINTLY BISHOP CANNON! The unfortunate man, according to his own statement, "fell into the hands of a bunch of sharpers" when all that he wanted was to do a little honest speculating with the material rewards of his righteousness. Confronted with these facts, the Episcopacy Committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church South voted by fifty-four to eleven "that the character of Bishop Cannon be passed." Unhappily the committee does not tell us what its passing mark is. And now the godly man has flatly refused to tell the Senate Lobby Committee anything about the distribution of $48,300 given him to help defeat Al Smith in Virginia, and has walked out of the committee room in defiance. We leave aside all question of his technical rights and all question, too, of the unenviable position of the committee if the recusant Bishop is allowed to get away with it. We ask simply, how long will a great American religious body rest content with spiritual leadership of this character?

TO THE RESCUE of the good name of the State of Ohio has come the District Appellate Court of St. Clairsville, Ohio, which reversed on May 25 the convictions of the three Communists who were sentenced to five years in jail and fines of $5,000. The court found that the convictions were against the weight of evidence and that the Communist literature distributed at Martin's Ferry, Ohio, last August was "intemperate, improbable, vague, and absurd," but that it did not incite to any overt act; no charge was made that the Communists had uttered a single word. Meanwhile a Communist organizer in Newark has been convicted of "sedition" under the Sedition Act of 1918 passed at the height of war-time hysteria, the sedition being speeches urging the organization of white and colored workers against unemployment. Eight others under indictment merely attended the meeting. In Pennsylvania a Communist boy of twenty-three has been sentenced to prison and fined $5,000 for sedition. In Georgia the situation is still worse. Two white women and two Negro men have been held for the Atlanta grand jury without bail on charges of "insurrection" and "attempting to incite insurrection." They are labor-union organizers and, like two Communists soon to be tried, they face the death penalty if convicted under the archaic statute involved. All this in the home of the free—not in the land of the Czar of 1890.

ANOTHER ENLIGHTENED DECISION of the United States Supreme Court has relieved the railways of a menace that has been hanging over them since 1925. The Hoch-Smith resolution, passed when Congress, in its zeal to do something for the farmers, was elaborating the McNary-Haugen bill which President Coolidge vetoed, directed the Interstate Commerce Commission, "in view of the existing depression in agriculture," to make such changes in freight rates as would promote the movement of agricultural products "at the lowest possible lawful rates compatible with the maintenance of adequate transportation service." Accordingly, the commission ordered a reduction of rates on California fruits destined for points east of the Mississippi River, and the order, against which the Ann Arbor Railroad appealed, was upheld by the Northern California District Court. The order has now been swept aside by the Supreme Court in an opinion written by Associate Justice Van Devanter and concurred in without dissent. The decision reminds the commission that the primary law regarding railway rates is the Interstate Commerce Act, and that it is not within the power of the commission to go counter to that act by establishing discriminatory rates, especially since most of the roads affected by the order in question have not yet earned the fair return on their property which the act designates as one of the means of insuring the maintenance of an adequate system of transportation.

THE DEFEAT OF SENATOR SIMMONS of North Carolina in the Democratic primaries leaves the political situation in the State decidedly mixed. In 1928 Senator Simmons bolted the nomination of Governor Smith and gave his support to Mr. Hoover. Some 80,000 voters, it is thought, followed his lead in the election, and North Carolina went Republican. For his breach of party regularity Senator Simmons was denounced by Josiah W. Bailey, a Tarheel Baptist who had been one of Simmons's most faithful supporters, and Bailey has now carried off the Senatorial nomination with a majority of more than 60,000. His success ends Senator Simmons's long political career, but the prospect of a return to power of the Old Guard Democrats, steeped in regularity and invincibly opposed to anybody and anything that lacks the party label, is far from agreeable. For one thing, party regularity in the South means insistence upon white supremacy. The evident care that was taken by the Bailey forces to avoid attacking Senator Simmons personally or raising the anti-Catholic issue seems to indicate a purpose to draw to Mr. Bailey's support in the election those who voted for Senator Simmons in the primaries—another way of keeping regularity to the fore.

MASSACHUSETTS, home of the Watch and Ward Society, sticks to its guns. Its Supreme Court has upheld the $300 fine imposed on Donald S. Friede for selling to Lieutenant Hines of the Boston police a copy of Theodore Dreiser's "An American Tragedy." At the same time it upheld the thirty-day jail sentence and the $500 fine imposed on James A. Delacey, of the Dunster Book Shop in Cambridge, for the sale of a copy of D. H. Lawrence's "Lady Chatterley's Lover" to an agent of the Watch and Ward Society who had induced him to send for it. Later the prison sentence was remitted, but the verdict stands, though Delacey had contended that he had been unfairly entrapped, and both the prosecuting attorney and the judge had condemned the provocative methods by which the Watch and Ward Society procured its evidence. These methods call to mind the famous wire-tapping case of two years ago, in which the government obtained the necessary evidence for conviction by tapping telephone wires, though this was against the law of the State where it was done. The United States Supreme Court upheld the conviction thus obtained, but Justice Brandeis, in dissenting, observed that "to prove its case the government was obliged to lay bare the crimes committed by its officers on its behalf. A federal court should not permit such a prosecution to continue." For Friede and Delacey there was no dissenting voice.

HOUSING IN NEW YORK CITY, especially low-priced dwellings for persons of moderate means, should make progress if the plans of the Housing Association of which former Governor Smith is the head are carried through. The association proposes not only to cooperate with individuals or other organizations in dealing with the whole question of housing and regional planning, but also to extend financial aid to well-devised, low-cost housing enterprises either for new construction or for the improvement of existing structures. The need for such concerted effort is lamentably great. Notwithstanding the enormous expenditures for new subways, bridges, wider streets, and costly skyscrapers, "thousands of families," as Governor Smith pointed out, "are still living in old-law tenements declared unfit for occupation forty years ago, and bringing up children in them." Comparatively nothing has been done to keep the population of the city "properly housed at costs which meet low incomes and within reasonable distance of work." There is a State housing law establishing a State Housing Board, but only a "very inconsiderable amount of new housing has been built." The difficulty, of course, is largely financial. The acquisition of land is only the first step; there must be also a willingness to build and an opportunity to obtain money at low rates. If the Housing Association can find the money on really sound economic terms and at the same time stir up a building spirit, there is no limit to its usefulness.

PRIVATE ENTERPRISE has no monopoly of business efficiency. We publish in this issue an article by Major General T. Q. Ashburn describing the organization and work of the Inland Waterways Corporation, created by the federal government to handle the barge fleet on the Mississippi and Warrior Rivers, and thus help control freight rates. There is far too much of loose assumption that all private business is efficient, and all public business inefficient. General Ashburn describes with particularity how this government corporation has been organized to do business economically, and he indicates concretely the success with which it operates. To those who want to study a specific example of high-grade organization and operation of a public enterprise in the field of transportation we commend a careful reading of this interesting and highly important article.

THE UNTIMELY DEATH of William Bolitho removed one of the most interesting of contemporary journalists. He was versatile, informed, and cultured. Perhaps the most striking of his virtues was an extraordinary liveliness which seemed to spring from a passionate interest in life and an unfailing sense of the dramatic. Mr. Bolitho, whose real name was William Bolitho Ryall, was born in Cape Town and rose from poverty in a most dramatic fashion. He had been in bad health ever since he was injured in the Great War—which made his gay spirit and his literary achievements the more remarkable. Americans knew him best for his regular contributions to the New York World and for his two recent books "Murder for Profit" and "Twelve Against the Gods," but he was extremely prolific and his disappearance will leave journalism very distinctly the poorer. No one could comment upon passing events in a fashion more sprightly than his.

The Hoover Happiness Boys

NOTHING is more admirable than courage and cheer in the face of difficulties. The American people have been treated to a truly notable display of these qualities in the months since the stock-market smash. On October 26 President Hoover stated: "The fundamental business of the country, that is, the production and distribution of commodities, is on a sound and prosperous basis." On November 24 friend Julius Barnes pointed out: "The factors of previous depressions are absent." Therefore, he sent to 200 business leaders the cheering word: "The problem now is fortunately not one of starting a stalled engine, but of facilitating the present momentum on which employment and earnings and buying power have risen to high levels." On the same day Dr. Julius Klein, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, in a radio speech dispelled public misapprehension by pointing out that the White House conferences had not been for the purpose of alleviating any let-down in business because there had been no let-down of any consequence.

At the turn of the year, on December 31, Secretary Mellon profoundly stated:

> I see nothing in the present situation that is either menacing or warrants pessimism. . . . During the winter months there may be some slackness or unemployment, but hardly more than at this season each year. I have every confidence that there will be a revival of activity in the spring and that during the coming year the country will make steady progress.

On the same day the Secretary of Commerce declared:

> It is impossible to forecast what temporary ups and downs may occur, but the nature of the economic disposition of the United States is such that one may confidently predict for the long run a continuance of prosperity and progress.

Happy disposition, that! On the first day of 1930 Francis I. Jones, director of the Employment Service of the Department of Labor, gave the country a New Year's message:

> Confidence, the fulcrum of business, was considerably shaken, but the vigor and strength of the nation are evidencing themselves, and after a careful survey of the business outlook we enter the new year with optimistic spirit and high hopes, and predict that 1930 will measure in volume of business with the preceding year.

Bless that fulcrum and its careful survey of our optimistic spirit! What a volume of vigor and strength the Unemployment Service has! We thank Mr. Jones.

His optimism was soon justified. Only twenty days later President Hoover, in a statement that has become historic, announced after the Cabinet meeting that the Department of Labor had informed him that for the first time since the stock-market crash the employment trend had assumed a favorable aspect. In another week he was able to assure us that "the increase of employment is current in practically every industry," and on February 10 Secretary Lamont stated that "industrial production and distribution have reached an approximately normal level for this time of year." The Employment Service on the same day predicted that "within the next sixty or ninety days the country will be on a normal employment basis." Not perfect teamwork, to be sure, but still not bad, coming from another department of the government and a busy one at that.

Lest the public officials weary in well-doing, pinch-hitter Julius H. Barnes, chairman of the National Business Survey Conference, came to bat on February 18. After surveying encouraging reports from all sections of the country, which he said indicated that the shock of the stock-market slump had been absorbed in three months, he declared that the danger of a long depression appeared fairly over, "with every evidence of early renewal of the normal onward march of living standards and business prospects." Unfortunately Secretary Davis on March 3 suffered a fit of temporary depression. "I admit," said he, "that there is distressing unemployment"; but his usual cheery optimism quickly reasserted itself and he added that the Administration by its policies had "held unemployment to less than one-half that of previous crashes," and that as a result "work is being provided in a way that should relieve most of this within the very near future."

Under these circumstances the President naturally took the people into his confidence. On March 5 "it was revealed at the White House" that "President Hoover is hopeful that the unemployment situation will be greatly remedied in the next sixty days." He "believes that the machinery already set in motion will bring the desired relief." Again confidence was well justified, for it was only two days later that he was able to announce that unemployment "amounting to distress" was limited to twelve States and that all evidence indicated that the worst results of the crash would be over in sixty days. Another month, and once again Mr. Barnes saw "a trend to recovery"; business recession, happily, had been only "a temporary interlude" in national progress.

And now clear the decks again for the President in a brand-new month. Speaking before the United States Chamber of Commerce on May 1 he said in happy vein:

> While the crash took place only six months ago, I am convinced that we have now passed the worst and with continued unity of effort we shall rapidly recover. There is one certainty in the future of a people of the resources, intelligence, and character of the people of the United States—that is, prosperity.

Bearing this in mind, we do not find it strange that on May 19 Secretary Lamont was able to point out that if present tendencies continued, "normal conditions should be restored in two or three months." Just ten days later Assistant Secretary Klein injected a note of wise caution by pointing out that no instantaneous revival could be expected in a short time, but that a healthy revival of business may be expected by the end of the summer.

We are more than grateful for all these reassurances. There have been dark hours when we thought that business men and workers were in real difficulties, and even that we were in the midst of a world-wide economic depression. But no more! Like the apostle when the brethren met him at the Three Taverns we thank God and take courage.

A Jugoslav Trial

WHEN King Alexander proclaimed an absolute royal dictatorship in Jugoslavia on January 6, 1929, he did so with high-sounding words. Parliamentary government, he declared, was his ideal, but it had been so abused by blind party passions that he felt it his duty to withdraw parliamentary government for a time. A "truly democratic" regime was promised when the task of unification and reorganization was ended. No one could deny that both were needed. The struggle between Serbs and Croats, the most serious obstacle to peace, had reached a crisis seven months before when Stefan and Paul Raditch (Stefan, the head of the Croat Peasant Party) had been fatally shot within the walls of the Belgrade Parliament, and that event had not served to decrease the bitterness of the struggle. The dictatorship was received complacently both in and out of Jugoslavia. Even the Croats at first were pleased, for King Alexander was popular in Zagreb. They were only mildly disturbed by the fact that the Cabinet included but four Croats as against nine Serbs, and that none of the Croats were of the Peasant Party. It was freely predicted that the dictatorship would end and a new constitution be granted within six months.

That was a year and a half ago. Since then the dictatorship has become notorious for its absolute and brutal suppression of all forms of liberty. Zagreb not only hates Belgrade. It hates King Alexander. Red-hunting has become the national pastime; hundreds of political prisoners, charged with communism, are rotting in Jugoslav jails, where unspeakable torture produces a prolific crop of "confessions"; and Croatians seem to have been the special objects of persecution.

There could be no more sorry commentary on the state of life and liberty in Jugoslavia than the accounts of a trial now in progress in Belgrade. Dr. Vladimir Matchek, whom Stefan Raditch designated to succeed him as leader of the Croat Peasant Party, is the most important of the twenty-four Croats who are being tried for treason before a special court for the defense of the state, a court created by Alexander from which there is no appeal. Dr. Matchek is charged with financing certain terrorist activities against the dictatorship—the amount named is about $270!—and with publishing an anti-Serb article in a Croatian newspaper. The first charge is based on "confessions" made by several of the other prisoners. All these confessions, except one, have been repudiated on the ground that they were obtained by means of torture. The trial has consisted largely of descriptions of this torture too detailed and specific to be entirely discounted. Moreover, the chief physician of the police in Zagreb, where the arrests were made, testified, on being released from official secrecy, that he had found the bare soles of one of the prisoners covered with blood, the injuries obviously having been caused by the bastinado. As for the one prisoner who reiterated his confession incriminating Dr. Matchek, it was brought out by the defense that during the last weeks of his imprisonment he alone of all the prisoners had been given special treatment on account of his health and had received several hundred dinars with which to buy clean linen, as well as fifty dinars daily for extra food. It is hardly surprising that this man should have stuck to his story!

Undoubtedly, most of the prisoners are guilty of what appear to have been amateur and not very dangerous demonstrations against the dictatorship, but there seems to be no reliable evidence that Dr. Matchek was involved. He has denied all charges against him. As far as he is concerned, the whole affair has the unsavory air of a frame-up and a clumsy one at that. There is the rumor that Dr. Matchek was offered his freedom if he would declare allegiance to the present regime, but this is now denied. There is the fact that Dr. Matchek's leading counsel was arrested on a minor charge shortly before the trial began. The 163 barristers who offered to defend him were barred by the court. He was finally represented by M. Trumbitch, formerly Foreign Minister of Jugoslavia.

Although all the testimony is in, the verdict has not yet been announced. The conduct of the presiding judge during the trial does not augur well for Dr. Matchek's acquittal but public opinion may prove effective. Western Europe has been awaiting the verdict with obvious sympathy for Dr. Matchek, with obvious belief that the trial is a tragic farce. And King Alexander, who cannot escape responsibility for the affair, must surely remember that unconstitutional government cost three of his predecessors their thrones and one of them his life.

The Cup Races

LOVERS of yacht-racing have before them the most interesting summer in the history of the sport, because Sir Thomas Lipton has issued his fifth challenge for the America's Cup and because there are no less than four new contestants for the honor of defending that historic trophy. More than that, the conditions of the race have been so completely altered as to make the contest more nearly equal and just to the challenger than ever before. That is something to be proud of, this fact that American sportsmanship has voluntarily ended conditions and requirements which seemed to make success for the challenger altogether impossible. A new generation of our yachtsmen has evidently far higher racing ideals.

Thus, the custodians of the trophy have agreed that the race shall be sailed over a course beginning nine miles southeast of the Brenton's Reef lightship near Newport instead of over the old Sandy Hook course which not only gave an advantage to those locally expert, but usually afforded only light winds in early September. The new course is a genuine offshore racing one, certain to be much fairer to both boats and likely to produce wind enough. Again, the challenger has hitherto had to be a stouter boat than the defender because it must cross the Atlantic, and supposedly under its own canvas, though actually at times towed. That again gave an unfair advantage to the American boat, and it has now been done away with by new racing rules which compel an equally heavy defender and thus insure not flimsy, freakish racers, but genuine seagoing boats capable of sailing the seas after the race and not having to refuse ignobly to sail if the wind should be as much as twenty-five miles an hour, as has happened more than once. In other words, the contest is between boats and not mere racing machines. When one considers the evil effects upon small-boat designing of the extreme fin-and-bulb keels of the racers from 1892 on, the change is of the utmost importance.

The four competing American yachts are the Weetamoe, designed by Clinton H. Crane and owned by a syndicate headed by George Nichols and Junius S. Morgan, of the New York Yacht Club; the Yankee, designed by Frank C. Paine and owned by a Boston syndicate headed by Mr. Paine, Chandler Hovey, and John S. Lawrence; the Whirlwind, designed by L. Francis Herreshoff, the syndicate owners of this boat being headed by Paul Hammond, winner of the ocean race to Spain last year, and Landon K. Thorne; and the Enterprise, designed by W. Starling Burgess and owned by a syndicate headed by Winthrop W. Aldrich and Harold S. Vanderbilt. There are thus pitted against each other four of the leading American designers, all experienced in yacht-racing and thoroughly familiar with the requirements of the contest. It is especially interesting that Mr. Burgess is the elder son of Edward Burgess, who designed the Puritan, Mayflower, and Volunteer, all of them successful defenders of the cup, while Mr. Herreshoff is the fifth son of N. G. Herreshoff, the most famous of American yacht-builders.

All four of the competing craft embody the latest design, carrying between 7,550 and 7,583 square feet of canvas as against the 7,540 square feet of the challenger, Shamrock V. From mast-heel to truck the height of the mast runs from 162 to 168 feet—enormous spars for such hulls. The waterline lengths range from 80 to 86 feet, and the overall length from the 120 feet and 9 inches of the Enterprise to the 130 feet of the Whirlwind. The new rules have in fact produced boats almost identical in nearly all important features, the Shamrock displacing 134 long tons as against the Whirlwind's 158 and the Enterprise's 128. It is interesting to note that the centerboard, which has played such a part in American yacht-racing, is entirely missing in Mr. Herreshoff's Whirlwind. Weetamoe and Enterprise carry only the small centerboard familiar in the racers of 1920, while Yankee has a small auxiliary centerboard of bronze at the after end of the keel. Finally, the masts are all hollow spars; that of the Yankee is a rectangular section, practically a long hollow tube with corner pieces joining the four sides.

The four cup defenders are already afloat and are busily tuning up; they have three months before them before the first cup race, which is to be sailed on September 13. Their own first race was scheduled for June 11; in it were also the Resolute and Vanitie, former cup contenders. The interesting and sportsmanlike suggestion has been made that if the challenger should get over here earlier than usual one or more of the defenders might be placed at her service for tuning up in actual racing, the lack of which has also been one of the great handicaps of the challenger. In any event, the conditions this year are entirely favorable to a genuine test, one which will leave behind no feeling of discrimination. That the contest will have its effect upon the sport as a whole is beyond question. Yachting has grown at a tremendous rate since the war, and the development of power craft has not hurt, but apparently helped, sailboat-racing. At least, last year's season was the best ever known. Whether bad business conditions will cut down the number of boats this year remains to be seen.

Hammock Reading

THE automobile has been held guilty of most of the ills of modern life, from polluting the countryside with carbon monoxide and gaudy filling stations to corrupting the morals of youth and killing 30,000 persons a year; but at least it may be said to its credit that it seems in some indirect manner to have rid us of the hammock. It is hard to discover the old knitted hammock nowadays except perhaps in the most remote outposts of civilization, and that is an excellent sign. The hammock was probably responsible for more bad novels than any other single contrivance. Until a few years ago no romance could be fluffy enough for reviewers to condemn it roundly. There was always a qualifying sentence somewhere admitting that it might make good enough reading for a hammock. The hammock, of course, was merely an excuse for bad taste, and as such was on a par with the plea of great statesmen and executives that they read cheap detective stories because their tired minds needed a rest. If their minds were really tired, one naturally wanted to know, why didn't they try taking a nap?

There is no reason, in common candor, why a person who naturally enjoys good reading in the winter shouldn't enjoy equally good reading in the summer. There are days, of course, when the weather is hot enough to make one mentally languid, but such days are after all comparatively few. Among the large group who give their poor tired minds three months' vacation there seem to be few persons willing to give up during the same period their golf or tennis, although there is no case on record of a man dying from sunstroke or heart disease from reading even Hegel.

There is no sound reason, in short, why just as many solid and important books should not be read in July and August as in any other two months in the year. Indeed, one would expect more of them to be read in the summer months if only because the vacation period allows more leisure for reading. Here the publishers, perhaps, are hardly less to blame than the reading public, for it has long been a superstition in the publishing business that any books of real weight and lasting value must appear either in the early spring or the late fall.

Now there are healthy signs of a change. At least the hammock has been abolished, and hammock reading should logically go with it. The much-abused book clubs do not suspend business during the summer months; last year, in July and August, they chose such volumes as "The Wave," by Evelyn Scott, and "They Stooped to Folly," by Ellen Glasgow, which did much to raise the summer average. The public at that time, too, was avidly buying "All Quiet." Things do change. There was a time, not so long ago, when even producers of musical shows thought it a risk to try continuing through the summer, but in recent years plays like "What Price Glory?" "Porgy," "Strange Interlude," "Volpone," "Street Scene," and "Journey's End" have broken the old habits, and we enter the present summer with "The Green Pastures," "The Last Mile," "Strictly Dishonorable," and Chekhov's "Uncle Vanya" still running, and even a revival of Aristophanes. If the quality of summer plays can so improve within a few years, what may not be hoped for in the quality of summer books?

It Seems to Heywood Broun

WHAT are we to do about the books that children read? I do not altogether trust the judgment of librarians who arrange lists of things they think are good for little ones. Still less am I certain that grown-up judgment is eminently right as to the things that children like. I want to hear from the unpolled masses of the immature. Many fallacies have been perpetuated for generations. For instance, there is some reason to doubt the popularity of "Alice in Wonderland" among boys and girls. I am not attacking this work of sheer genius, but it is a book aimed above the heads of the readers usually assigned to it. Distinctly this is an adult book. You have the privilege of checking me up and furnishing such correction as comes out of your own experience, but all the really rabid "Alice" enthusiasts I ever met were well beyond twenty-five.

The idea will not down that children adore fairy stories and other chronicles of fantasy. That can quite reasonably be doubted. Of the popularity of the Dr. Dolittle books I can raise no question, but these seem to me to be written in a far more straightforward way than is customary in most yarns of the outlandish. I think that the average child is not richly endowed with imagination. The growth of this faculty is one of the steps which mark the departure from adolescence. Fables and parables lie mostly beyond a youngster's comprehension. Other readers are able to compel editors to hand out what their particular section of the public wants. Children must pretty much take what is handed to them. Their capacity for protest is distinctly limited. I am inclined to believe that if there were ever such a thing as the Amalgamated Union of Tiny Tots the whole tenor of juvenilia would be changed.

The sort of reading which is deplored by most associations of mothers is precisely the variety which children crave. I'm for the rights of small people. The most important thing with which a youngster should be imbued at an early age is the notion that reading is good fun. Better by far, I believe, that a child should turn to trash which he enjoys han be forced to worthy books which he hates. I was told at ten that I must not read the nickel novels dealing with the adventures of Frank Merriwell and his brother Dick. Such preoccupation, they informed me, would ruin a possible aste for good literature in later life. Fortunately, I paid cant heed to these injunctions and continued to peruse the ively chronicles which I liked. And now, at forty, I realize hat many tales have been fashioned more sprightly than "Frank Merriwell, the Young High Jumper at Yale." And yet I am prepared to acknowledge my debt to Burt L. Standish for that series. It was he rather than Walter Scott who first taught me the fact that a book could be absorbing.

Many of the books eagerly placed in the hands of the young and impressionable by generous aunts and uncles are much too sadistic. In this class I place very many of the raditional fairy tales. Even such a familiar story as Red Riding Hood has done its share in bringing night terrors to little boys and girls. To be sure, there is a postscript to the tale in which the wolf when killed disgorges the living grandmother of Miss Hood. But a child has every right to assume that it was a most distressing experience for the old lady. The child makes identification with characters in a story very readily, and naturally a little girl shakes with fear during the encounter between Red Riding Hood and the beast concealed in proper night dress.

My contention goes no farther than the claim that it is not well to frighten young people too much, and there is ample material in approved books to convey to them many horrors. For almost forty years I've carried with me a nightmare about a barrel filled with boiling pitch into which an old lady was nailed by means of long and lacerating spikes. This was no Love Fiend's Crime from any tabloid. We didn't have tabloids when I was a boy. It was merely an incident in a tale by the Brothers Grimm. And who would hesitate to choose Grimms' "Fairy Tales" as a very proper book for any nephew's birthday? I would for one, but the revolt is not yet general. Of course, the old lady who met such cruel and unusual punishment was a wicked old witch, but I should not care to have a son of mine grow up serene in the conviction that any sort of torment is suitable for the transgressor. In maturity he may quite likely find, as I have done, that some of his best friends are transgressors.

And where does Hans Christian Andersen get off to be the kindly patron of the little lover of good reading? Against the high gifts of Andersen I raise no objection whatsoever, but this melancholy prose poet is by no means always suitable for children. He is as gloomy as Ibsen.

Well do I remember what he did to ruin an entire Christmas as far as I was concerned. It was my ninth Christmas, the year I had the measles. To my sick bed where I lay, ill-satisfied with life, yet fearing dissolution, there came a kindly aunt bearing the fairy stories of Hans Christian Andersen. Eagerly I picked up the book and surveyed the interesting pictures. And then, as was my wont, I plunged into the middle of the book and struck a story about a little match girl. She had ventured forth into a blizzard to ply her trade in a period of depression. It was, as I remember, Christmas Eve upon which the poor child got her taste of what we know as Hoover prosperity. There were none to buy her matches. She grew colder and colder and finally froze to death most realistically. That tale surely did nothing to promote the spirit of a merry Yuletide.

The same mothers who blithely place the most savage fairy stories in the hands of their youngsters raise strenuous objection to having their children look at the comic strips in the daily or Sunday newspapers. I don't understand why. I am aware of the fact that many of the best-known comic series are built upon personal encounters in which the chief characters behave to each other with consummate cruelty. "Zowie!" indicating the impact of a heavy object upon a human skull, and "blug! blug! blug!" meaning that an individual has been dropped from a high place into deep water, are common enough. But at least the comic-strip characters do serve to illustrate to the adolescent mind human stamina and the indestructibility of matter.

HEYWOOD BROUN

India Confronts Britain

By RICHARD B. GREGG

DESPITE the government censorship in India, the news that leaks through the cables, together with British journalistic comments, makes a very interesting picture to one who is familiar with the forces at work. The arrest of Gandhi has not weakened but strengthened the power of the Indian Congress movement. That was natural, for not till he was imprisoned did the full force of his example and ideas begin to tell upon the hearts and minds of Indians.

More and more of the Indian liberals and moderates have openly deserted the government, and many others are wavering. In addition to the earlier resignations of Pandit Malaviya, Mr. Birla, and others, Pandit Kunzru, a prominent liberal, has recently resigned from the National Assembly. Two members of the Viceroy's Council of State, Dewah Bahadur Ramchandra Iyer of Madras and Mr. Ratansi Morarji of Bombay, have resigned. The Council of State is in effect an Indian Cabinet and its members form the closest official Indian advisers to the Viceroy. Mr. Morarji stated that his resignation was in protest against "the ruthless repression culminating in the arbitrary internment of Gandhi." Mr. Iyer said that he resigned as a protest "against the imprisonment of Gandhi without trial, the revival of the Press Act, and the illegal, unwarranted use of violence against the satyagrahis and innocent members of the public in Madras and elsewhere." The Bombay Presidency Association, of which Mr. Dinshaw Petit, the Parsee merchant and cotton-mill owner, is president, passed a resolution on May 8 protesting against the detention of Gandhi "without fair and open trial" and against the revival and use for that purpose of an obsolete, century-old regulation.

Many noted Indians are giving up the decorations and titles bestowed upon them by the British. Official district and municipal boards are resigning in great numbers throughout India, according to the Chicago Tribune's special correspondent. The meeting of the All Parties' Conference on May 15 and 16 was very thinly attended, only seven out of a membership of thirty-four being present. Notable for their absence were the prominent Hindu leaders, Pandit Malaviya, Mr. Jayakar, and Dr. Moonjee, and the influential Mohammedans, Mr. Jinnah and Sir Mohammed Shafi. Messrs. Malaviya and Moonjee are actively working for full independence. On May 14 the Working Committee of the All-India Non-Brahman Conference passed a resolution disapproving of the government's "repressive policy," as well as of the civil-disobedience movement, and regretting that there had been no clean statement by the government as to its policy in regard to aims and objects of the Round Table Conference. These meetings and that of the National Liberal Federation were supposed to prepare the way for the Round Table Conference, but the results were such as to lead the correspondent of the London Morning Post to state that "it is abundantly clear that liberal support of the government is valueless"; while Mr. E. Ashmead-Bartlett, the Daily Telegraph's correspondent, wrote on the same day in regard to the Indian liberals: "They are of no support to the government and the Nationalists ignore them altogether."

With the melting away of Indian moderate and liberal support to the government, the value of Mohammedan allegiance has been greatly lessened. There cannot be a Round Table Conference with only Mohammedans present from the Indian side, nor can the country be governed with only Moslem support. Moreover, it would seem that certain influential Mohammedans are themselves wavering. Maybe they are wondering where they are going to find themselves if the Nationalist movement continues to gather speed and momentum. The failure of two such important Moslem leaders as Mr. Jinnah and Sir Mohammed Shafi to attend the All Parties' Conference is significant in this connection. The Palestine Arabs are urging the Indian Moslems to join the Nationalist Hindus. Many Indian Moslems have been active supporters of Gandhi from the beginning and are now in prison for their convictions, thus moving the others. On May 8 the Council of the All-India Moslem Federation passed a resolution disapproving of civil disobedience. But it also passed a resolution expressing the widespread alarm and anxiety of Moslems throughout India on account of the recent firing at Peshawar and the consequent loss of life, and declaring that the government communiqué on that matter fails to carry conviction. It asked that the federation be permitted to send a deputation to Peshawar to learn the facts.

Throughout the country prominent Indian lawyers are showing their sympathy by failing to attend court on days of hartal. (A hartal is a sympathetic suspension of all business.) On May 16 a meeting of the All-India Journalists' and Press Owners' Conference protested against the rigid press censorship and restrictions, and also passed a resolution demanding the immediate release of Gandhi and urging the need of negotiating with him. The Sikhs have swung more strongly into the Nationalist movement. Following the April resolution of the Akali section of Sikhs, several jathas or bands, of them started to march from Amritsar to Peshawar. One of their leaders, Tara Singh, was arrested at Lahore, and on May 17 ninety-nine others were arrested near Jhelum, but another band has started to take their place The Central Sikh Committee has voted to join the Nationalist movement.

Women are taking very active part in the campaign This was not so in Gandhi's campaign of 1920-22, and it is a momentous break in Indian traditions of womanly conduct. It marks the increase in Gandhi's influence and the depth and power of the Indian desire for independence Three prominent Indian women have been arrested and imprisoned, all in connection with the salt-law violations Madame Naidu was arrested at Dharasana and given nine months' imprisonment. Her sister-in-law, Mis Chattopadhyaya, got a sentence of nine months in Bombay Mrs. Lakshmipathi, a leading social worker of Madras, wa given a year's imprisonment. More than 300 high-caste women paraded at Delhi, 200 at Karachi, and large numbers at other places in addition to those mentioned.

The Indian business community is strongly supporting Gandhi's movement. One clear indication of this is the nation-wide boycott of foreign cloth, the results of which are being felt in Germany, France, and Italy as well as in England. On May 7 there was a meeting in Bombay of fourteen Indian commercial organizations at which a resolution was passed requesting the Indian Merchants' Chamber to call on its representatives in the Indian National Assembly and in the Bombay Legislative Council to resign.

This cloth boycott puts tremendous pressure on Great Britain. Her cotton industry produces nearly one-fifth of the total exports of the United Kingdom, and even during the last three years has averaged more than £140,000,000. A substantial part of British cotton cloth was absorbed by India. The market for British cottons in China has been greatly reduced by the boycott and trouble there. Now comes the Indian boycott to increase British unemployment and financial losses still further. The Indian boycott applies also to British drugs, banks, ships, and other enterprises.

The campaign to violate and nullify the government salt tax and monopoly proceeds with increasing momentum. There are said to be more than 3,000 persons imprisoned already for violation of this law, as well as an equal number for sedition. Extemporized prisons and detention camps are being created, but the feeding and guarding of so many will be a great expense and difficulty to the government. As I write (May 26), the wireless tells of a new raid at Wadala salt works in which 40,000 Indians took part and in which apparently only seven were arrested.

The Congress Working Committee's resolutions to encourage the peasants to refuse to pay land tax and showki (police) tax are bearing fruit. The peasants of the Sarbhon division of Bardoli district in Bombay Presidency have resolved not to pay land-revenue taxes until Gandhi or Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel, both of whom are now in prison, order them to pay. Bardoli district defeated the Presidency government by a no-tax campaign only two years ago. The land-revenue tax is due, I understand, on July 1, just after the proposed date of issuance of volume two of the Simon Report. The example of Bardoli will doubtless be followed elsewhere. The correspondent of the London Times described the land revenue as "the very pith and marrow of government in India." In Bihar the peasants are eager to refuse the police tax. On May 19 there was a report of a refusal to pay water tax at Multan, in the Punjab. The peasants' opposition to taxation will have good opportunity to reveal its strength before the proposed date of the Round Table Conference, October 20.

It is impossible to keep from wondering whether this tax-refusal campaign is not partly responsible for the sudden flotation in London on May 20 of a Government of India loan of £7,000,000, whose officially described purpose is "to provide funds for capital expenditure on railways in India and for general purposes." The last phrase is both vague and elastic. According to the Daily Telegraph, the loan "came as a surprise." It seems quite possible that the Government of India expects a very considerable shortage of funds due to the boycott, decline of trade, and refusals to pay land tax, and to increased police, troop, and prison expenses.

Just what happened at Peshawar we do not yet know. That it was shocking and not creditable to the government seems probable in view of the instant application of government censorship. The government issued an official communiqué describing the events and placing all blame on the Congress party, but somehow none of the Indians seem to believe it. The National Liberal Federation and the All-India Moslem Federation have both officially expressed their doubts and requested permission to investigate the Peshawar occurrences. Mr. V. J. Patel has done likewise on behalf of the Working Committee of the National Congress. Pandit Malaviya has individually requested permission to go to Peshawar to help the wounded there. But the acting governor of the Northwest Province has refused such permission to Messrs. Patel and Malaviya, and probably also to the two organizations. Public opinion has been so aroused, however, that the government has had to appoint a special commission to investigate occurrences there.

Sholapur has been played up in the Western press as a place of horrible riots, but now the horrors begin to appear as mythical as many of the war-time Belgian atrocities. The Bombay Presidency government has officially announced in regard to Sholapur:

> Nearly all the rumors of hideous brutalities by the mob which have been freely circulated are without foundation. It is not true that policemen were tied together and burned alive, or that one had his eyes gouged out, nor is there any suspicion whatever that two were thrown into a well. It is hoped that all the missing policemen will yet be found.

This statement was printed in small type at the foot of a column in the London Times of May 20. But the heavy fines, long prison sentences, and floggings imposed upon the Indians of Sholapur by the military there have turned Indian opinion still farther from the government and raised doubts even in the minds of some Europeans in India.

Of course, the London Tory papers are full of stories of communism in India. But Mr. Benn, Secretary of State for India, stated in Parliament on May 12 in response to a question: "There has been no evidence that Communist agents were responsible for any of the recent disturbances, though the use of red uniforms and hammer and sickle badges has been mentioned in some of the official Peshawar telegrams." There are undoubtedly some Communists in India, as in all other countries, but their numbers and, in my opinion, their influence there are very small.

When the censorship and prejudices have cleared away, I feel sure that it will be found that a large number of the stories of violence were pure fabrications. We know from our war experience what happened in the British and American press in that time of national excitement and crisis. The people of India are more pacific even than the Chinese. Of course, there are some Indians who disagree with Gandhi and believe that violence is an efficient weapon. But they are not the majority. The more recent reports speak of the continued insistence of the Indian leaders upon non-violence, and we have the old war correspondent, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, reporting to the Daily Telegraph on May 21 that "the perpetual struggle for the salt pans at Wadala, just outside Bombay, continues, but there has been no violence."

That the whole struggle is predominantly non-violent on the part of Indians is indicated by the continued desertions of moderates and liberals from the government. Violence by the Independence Party would only have driven these men more strongly to the British side. But the voluntary non-violent suffering by Nationalists for the cause of Indian independence is too much for the moderates to endure. It touches them too deeply, as indeed it must eventually touch all men, including the British themselves. The West understands violence, so the cables are full of stories of violence; but the much greater amount of wholly non-violent resistance is not understood and so does not get reported. But non-violent resistance is the great power that is moving events in India.

At all events, it seems to be touching the Indian troops and perhaps it will soon touch the police. Two platoons of Indian troops evidently mutinied at Peshawar, for they were immediately removed from their regiment and sent to another station, where preparations were made for their court martial. There were also rumors published in the Times of May 18 about a mutiny of Gurkhas at Calcutta and of trouble in a Sikh regiment at Delhi. How long Indian troops can keep their morale and continue to see their countrymen voluntarily and without violence enduring suffering for their country remains to be seen.

Evidence is not wanting that the morale and obedience of the Indian police will progressively weaken, and that they may transfer their loyalty en masse the moment they come to feel reasonably sure that the followers of Gandhi have more power in India than the British. We shall see. Even the Indian servants are beginning to stir. The special correspondent of the Chicago Tribune stated on May 19 that "a new feature of the campaign was introduced today when cooks and other servants, including barbers, refused to serve wearers of foreign-woven clothing." This was in Calcutta. The day may come within a few months when Indian servants of all British people will go on strike. It is undoubtedly a fact that one link in the chain of British power in India is the cooperation of Indian cooks, body servants, and scavengers. Indeed, the only two reasonably firm bulwarks of British power today in India are the landowners in the provinces, where the land revenue is paid through the large landowner as a combined rental and tax, and the few individual rulers of Indian states. But even these two groups may come to see that although they will lose much by transferring to the Independence Party they will lose all if they cling to Britain.

Altogether the situation points definitely to the failure of the proposed Round Table Conference. I think it will not occur at all. By October the campaign of repression will have alienated practically all the Indian moderates and liberals and most of the Mohammedans and proved to their minds that Britain will yield nothing of real power without coercion. The no-tax campaign will not permit the government to let up on repression. The Simon Report will, I believe, prove to be a dud. Probably it will make concessions which a year ago would have seemed large, but now will fail to satisfy. This prophecy is easy when you realize how completely the British fail to understand the Indian situation. They do not understand Gandhi, or his weapon of satyagraha. Most British officials and the British press have steadily sneered and jeered at Gandhi, and since 1922 have wholly underestimated his moral and political ability, fluence, and power. The Viceroy himself has been led into same error of underestimating Gandhi. The Vice-an honest and high-minded man, but his class limitations hamper him and he is surrounded by a bureaucracy who are misguiding him.

A sentence in a leader in the Manchester Guardian Weekly for May 16 scolds Gandhi for "compelling the government of India to choose between confessing impotence and appearing brutal." Yes, Gandhi's tactics have compelled the government of India to reveal to all Indians and the rest of the world that imperialism is fundamentally predatory and brutal. So when trustful, comfort-loving, ostrich-minded, yet kindly and conscientious, liberals and moderates of India or England are compelled to recognize and admit the ultimate ugly and brutal nature of empire, they will reluctantly, but inevitably, renounce their loyalty to it.

Englishmen ceaselessly talk about the many divisions, "minorities," races, languages, castes, and religions of India. That fixed idea about Indian divisions is blinding Britain and the West to the rapidly increasing unification of Indian opinion around the Congress program and the personality and tactics of Gandhi. By contrast, British opinion is becoming more and more divided, wavering, and weak. In Great Britain the Independent Labor Party has come out in favor of complete Indian independence, while the Tories are, of course, all for the status quo and stern repression. A good many members of Parliament are for dominion status. Much of the rank and file of British labor and the traders, especially Lancashire textile interests, want trade resumption and consequent increased employment immediately, and are not so sure but that it will come sooner by giving up political control over India. The big investment bankers and steel interests, however, want no concessions to India, because their profits come out of Indian government bonds, Indian railway securities, and the control of Indian funds.

In India, British opinion is also divided. Mr. Richard Lane, who has recently returned from India, writes in the English Spectator:

> The few thousand Englishmen who are responsible for India's government are in despair, disheartened by the seeming ingratitude of those whom they have sought to serve, disheartened by the consciousness that whatever the course of their action it will be unsupported by the people at home, and themselves not untouched by feelings of sympathy for Indian nationalism.

I would say that the British bureaucracy and military men in India are against all concessions and many are in favor of harsh repression, because their jobs depend upon maintenance of the status quo. British commercial interests there, however, would probably be willing to make very great concessions if thereby they could get a resumption of their business. Even if they have to lose much, they don't want to lose all. And they know that Japanese, Germans, French, Italians, and Americans are all eager to jump in and get a bigger share of the trade. The India Chamber of Commerce, a European organization, I believe, with headquarters in Calcutta, about May 20 informed the Viceroy, according to the Chicago Tribune, that "the continuance of the present political policy will lead to chaos in business."

Besides these divisions of British opinion there are the probable conflicts in the minds and hearts of the Labor Cabinet. It is disquieting no doubt to two professed pacifists such as Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Snowden to be acquiescing in the imprisonment of Gandhi, the greatest pacifist in the world.

So the push and pull of forces, the currents of opinion and feeling and will eddy and whirl and surge. But it is important to note that the Indian Nationalists have the initiative and Britain is on the defensive both morally and materially. The question of India's ability to govern herself is merely academic. The real question is whether India has sufficient power to prevent Great Britain from governing her. If she has that power, then no outside nation can govern her either, and she will learn to govern herself. It seems to me that no matter what Britain does, whether repression or conciliation, withholding or yielding, she will lose heavily, both politically and economically. The probability is that all concessions will be made too late, for the combined effect of British ignorance and seven hundred million pounds sterling of British investments in India is inevitably conservative.

The political self-liberation of one-fifth of the human race is a momentous event. Primarily it is a moral and spiritual affair, and it touches all of us. In forming our opinions and reaching our decisions we can no longer limit our loyalties to any one nation or any one civilization. We must be loyal to the highest interests of humanity as a whole.

The Government in Business

By MAJOR GENERAL T. Q. ASHBURN

CAN the government successfully carry on a business? I believe that it can if the business is rightly organized. In the case of the Inland Waterways Corporation, I believe that we have shown how it should be organized, namely, so that it may function as any private business corporation functions. The Inland and Coastwise Waterways Service lost nearly $1,000,000 a year from 1920 to 1924, inclusive. Reorganized in 1924 as the Inland Waterways Corporation, it has turned that loss into an average annual net income from operations of $82,000 for the years 1925 to 1929.

The Inland and Coastwise Waterways Service was created in 1920 under the jurisdiction of the War Department, to succeed the Railroad Administration in the operation of certain boats and barges upon designated streams of the United States. Its function was to carry on a water-transportation system analogous to a great trunk rail system, providing cheaper transportation to the public than all-rail. From 1920 to 1923 the service existed under the greatest difficulties. It was poorly equipped, its yearly life depending upon the temper of Congress in the matter of appropriations. These appropriations were subject to technical restrictions that prevented the use of funds for purposes for which they were clearly intended. It had no assurance for the future and could therefore make no plans; its very existence was threatened by interdepartmental quarrels, while it was continually coming up against the national slogan: Less Government in Business; More Business in Government. Moreover, there was in Congress a gradually growing resentment against appropriating an average of $1,000,000 a year, to be sunk, as Senator Warren once remarked, "in the deep black mud of the Mississippi."

The service was absolutely doomed to fail unless it could have a fair chance to operate as any other transportation agency would operate. Realizing this fact, and being responsible to the Secretary of War and to Congress for the operation of the service, I suggested in my annual report for 1923 that since there seemed to be a sincere disposition to develop common carriers on our interior streams there must be a general recognition of what our experience had demonstrated, and that there should be presented to Congress a concrete program based on that demonstration, this program to be accepted or rejected.

Congress was to be fully informed in regard to the following points: (1) the inherent difficulties of government operation, including the handicaps of a pioneer demonstration of government operation; (2) the necessity of conferring upon the Secretary of War, as the mandatory of Congress, power to do all that the head of a great private transportation agency ordinarily does; (3) the necessity of providing the Secretary of War with sufficient capital; and (4) the necessity of having a permanent executive head and a continuing policy exactly as in a private corporation.

> The duties and the demands made upon the time of the Secretary of War [said the report] are so stupendous as to preclude his giving more than a very limited time to the study and administration of this particular national question, although he is the mandatory of Congress. In spite of that, the responsibility for the success of the project lies with him, and his is the final decision. He must delegate a personal representative to do many things which he cannot possibly find time to do himself, and give him such authority to act as he may see fit. Not only must this man devote his time and attention to the problems, but he must be continually acquiring useful knowledge that does not spring spontaneously to the brain of any man, and much of which is not written in books; he must gain by experience, feel his way carefully in view of past pitfalls and mistakes, and grow with an institution as it grows. Fulfilling his duties as the Secretary of War's representative should be his permanent vocation.

The creation of the present Inland Waterways Corporation was then recommended. The argument for such a corporation was set forth, in brief, as follows:

Congress has invested hundreds of millions of dollars for the purpose of making streams navigable in the hope that cheaper transportation will result. It is appropriating nearly fifty million dollars annually; it has created an organization to carry into effect its policy, but has so hamstrung this organization that its annual loss averages almost a million a year. It cannot overcome its losses as long as it must operate under the same restrictions regarding its disbursements as an ordinary bureau of the government. Continuance under the present form of operations is hurting the cause that Congress seeks to foster. We believe that if a corporation is created, provided with $5,000,000 capital, and given all the powers necessary to fulfil the purpose of its creation, we can so function as to demonstrate in five years either that water transportation can be placed on a self-sustaining basis or that our whole policy of making streams navigable is a colossal mistake and should be abandoned.

There was never a more interested audience than the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, or the Commerce Committee in the Senate, as I presented this argument. The proposition aroused interest because of its very audacity. It was finally recommended by these committees and enacted into law, although no such corporation had ever before been created by Congress.

In the drafting of the bill every conceivable form of government corporation was studied. The object was to create a corporation with all necessary powers, to place it under a single responsible head, and to eliminate any merely supervisory authority over this head. The corporation was granted therefore all the powers possessed by any private transportation agency, and in addition "such other powers as may be necessary or incidental to fulfil the purpose of its creation." If the public was to have assurance that it might safely patronize government lines it was necessary to make certain that operations would not suddenly be discontinued and that new projects would not dissipate our funds. The law accordingly provided that "the operation of any such facilities shall not be discontinued and new lines shall not be developed or operated until authorized by Congress." For the further protection of the public, the corporation was made liable before the courts and it can be sued without the consent of the United States. In order that it might operate like a private corporation the necessary money had to be available at all times and subject to no restrictions except that it must be spent to carry into effect the policy of Congress. This end was achieved by having a capital stock of $5,000,000 appropriated by the United States, which money was to remain available until expended. Such action obviated technical objections to our expenditures, removed any limit on the time during which the appropriation should be available, and created a revolving fund capable of being used over and over again.

Congress thus created a corporation with capital stock fully paid up, with all necessary powers definitely granted, with a continuing executive head, and with all the responsibility for the success of the enterprise vested in one man, the Secretary of War, who represents in himself the stockholders and the board of directors. Nevertheless, the law provides for the appointment of a board of six members which meets at such times and places as the Secretary of War deems necessary. Its functions, however, are purely advisory, and not binding on the Secretary.

Power and responsibility are lodged in the Secretary of War because he is in charge of those non-military activities which pertain to the construction and the maintenance of harbors and channels. During the hearings Secretary Weeks told the committee:

> I do not want a board of directors. . . . The Secretary of War has no time to sit down and discuss things in the way that is done by a corporation which has an executive officer and a board of directors. . . . There must be mandatory authority in the Secretary of War to enable him to perform, even in a reasonable degree, the duties of his office. . . . I do not wish to be responsible for a thing I cannot direct [italics mine].

The Secretary's approval or disapproval is final, and not subject to review by any authority except the courts. Under the by-laws, the chairman of the board is the executive of the Secretary of War in the performance of the duties vested by the act in the Secretary, who under the law may delegate all his authority to the chairman. In general, the chairman's position corresponds to that of the president of a railroad, but his actions are less restricted because of his intimate personal contact with the Secretary and his ability at any time to get immediate and definite instructions from him.

The chairman is in direct control of the executive department, which is located in Washington. Its total overhead is less than $50,000 a year. Each year the chairman prepares and submits to the Secretary of War a budget covering all salaries for the next year, which includes every employee except laborers paid by the day or hour. Owing to our accurate cost system this budget, prepared a year in advance, has rarely if ever been exceeded. Within this approved maximum budget the chairman is authorized to classify offices and positions and maximum rates of pay for each, and to employ, promote, demote, or discharge employees. Each department head has the same authority within the limits of the budget prescribed for that department. These men are made as independent as possible within the limits of their departments, and while there are certain general rules and regulations defining their duties and powers no attempt is made to dictate the manner of performance as long as results are satisfactory. All capital expenditures, regardless of amount, must be approved by the executive department, but all operating expenditures within the limits of the by-laws may be made by department heads. The prescribed system of reports keeps the executive department in constant touch with the other departments.

The corporation operates mainly on the Mississippi and Warrior Rivers. Because of different operating conditions separate operating managers are necessary for the Upper River Division, the Lower River Division, the Warrior Division, and the Warrior River Terminal Company. The managers, who are charged with maintenance and repair of terminals, have full authority within the limits prescribed by the by-laws, their activities being coordinated through the executive department. The budget for hull and machinery repairs for line and harbor vessels is prepared annually by the executive department, and as long as this budget is not exceeded and the by-laws are not violated the managers can make repairs without reference to any further authority. In erecting the functional organization to operate our facilities we followed the best lines of railroad practice. We consulted freely with outside experts and paid them well for their services. We continue to do so.

All line vessels are equipped with wireless, and we have four land stations. Each tow or express boat reports to a central station every two hours, giving its position and any difficulties encountered. These reports are charted, and any necessary information regarding channel conditions or other matters of importance is constantly available.

Our bills of lading are similar to railroad bills of lading. We offer insurance against all hazards. Each shipper, wherever he may be located—on the river or in the interior—gets precisely the same saving in cents per hundred pounds when he ships by our lines. In the making of joint rates the normal 20 per cent river saving is applied to a combined rail-river haul. For example, if the river saving from St. Louis to New Orleans by water were one dollar per ton, this saving would be subtracted from the all-rail ton rate from Chicago to New Orleans, and the joint rail-water rate, Chicago–St. Louis–New Orleans, would be one dollar less per ton than the all-rail rate from Chicago to New Orleans.

What have been the results of this government enterprise? The history of the Warrior River Terminal Company, a subsidiary of the Inland Waterways Corporation, offers one striking example of the efficiency with which the corporation operates.

The Warrior River Terminal Company was originally the Ensley Southern Railroad, and was owned by the Southern Railway. The Southern Railway claimed that the Ensley Southern was a non-paying line, threw it into the hands of a receiver, and finally asked for its abandonment. This action was not approved by the court, which ordered the road sold for $500,000. It was bought in 1926 by the Warrior River Terminal Company, the entire stock of which is owned by the Inland Waterways Corporation. We have rehabilitated the road and provided equipment at an additional cost of about $383,000 up to November 30, 1929. The total corporation investment in the Warrior River Terminal amounted to $775,018.26 in 1928. On April 18, 1929, the Interstate Commerce Commission wrote us a letter of which the essential paragraph follows:

> In your letter of April 12, transmitting the return of the Warrior River Terminal Company to the commission's order of January 18, 1929, you state that although the return shows net operating income of $30,885.98 in excess of 6 per cent on the value of the property of this company, no remittance of such excess has been made.

Thus, the corporation took over a railroad nineteen miles in length which had been thrown into the hands of a receiver and ordered sold by a court in 1926, and rehabilitated the property so that in 1928 it earned more than $30,000 in excess of 6 per cent on the value of the property.

When the Inland Waterways Corporation was organized a survey was made by the American Appraisal Company to adjust and appraise the value of the assets of the Inland and Coastwise Waterways Service transferred to the corporation. The sound value, with nothing allowed for good-will, thus entered upon the books of the corporation amounted to $9,762,858. In November, 1929, the book value of the corporation was no less than $19,746,350.06. The capital stock of the corporation, originally fixed at $5,000,000, was later increased to $15,000,000. On December 31, 1929, there was a little more than $2,200,000 of cash on hand and unissued stock to the amount of $6,000,000.

A study of the accounts of this corporation, its methods of operation, and its financial results will, I believe, demonstrate that its operations have been highly efficient. In my opinion, any similarly organized government corporation can be made just as efficient.

The Bishop's Challenge

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, June 7

IN the contest of strength between the United States Senate and Harry Sinclair it was finally and satisfactorily demonstrated that a hundred million dollars can be put in jail in this country. The issue raised by Bishop James Cannon's curt refusal to testify before the Senate Lobby Committee this week is far more interesting and significant. It involves not the mere power that resides in great wealth, but the combined political influence of the Methodist church, the Anti-Saloon League, and half a dozen other religious and dry organizations. If the Bishop gets away with it, as it seems he may, the prestige of the Senate will be seriously impaired, and its most useful function—that of making investigations—will be crippled for a long time, and the committee, therefore, ought to be the more vigorous. Writing as one who witnessed both incidents, I can testify that the contempt for which Sinclair served a jail term was the perfection of deference compared to the Bishop's insolent and calculated challenge. Politely, on advice of counsel, the oil magnate declined to answer four questions. After refusing to answer at least forty, Cannon crowned his defiance by deluging the committee with abuse, and walking out of the room in contempt of an order to remain on the witness stand. It was the most complete, direct, and deliberate affront ever administered to a body of Congress. It was planned in advance, carried out with deliberation, and delivered with a degree of rank insult perhaps unequaled in Congressional history.

THE committee had ascertained that E. C. Jameson, New York insurance broker, supplied a total of $172,000 to accomplish the defeat of Al Smith in 1928 and that $65,000 of it went to Cannon. At his insistence some of it was delivered in cash, and none of the checks covering the remainder bear his indorsement. Subsequently, in accordance with the Corrupt Practices Act, he accounted for $17,300. When Congressman Tinkham called attention to the $48,000 not accounted for, Cannon declared that it was expended through the Virginia Anti-Smith committee. In a lively desire to learn how the entire sum was spent, Chairman Caraway summoned Jameson before the committee and subjected him to a thorough cross-examination, in which Jameson admitted that Cannon's explanation was incorrect. Caraway also sent the committee investigator to New York to examine the books of a defunct bucket-shop with which the Bishop had dealt. Three days before the Bishop's scheduled appearance before the committee Caraway departed for Arkansas to deliver a series of speeches. Cannon appeared, made tentative objections to being questioned about his politico-financial operations, whereupon the absent chairman issued a statement apparently upholding him. Thus emboldened, Cannon flatly refused to testify, and after accusing Senators Walsh and Blaine of conducting a wet, Roman Catholic persecution against him, walked out, leaving them holding the bag. Being fairly familiar with Caraway's mental processes and habits of speech, I think it altogether probable that he did not intend to convey the impression which his statement left. I surmise that he actually intended to say that if a man in Cannon's position, confronted by such charges and such evidence as had been presented, was unwilling to explain them, the committee should be content to let the public draw its own conclusions, without forcing him to testify against himself. If that is true, his statement was unfortunately worded, and it does not change the general situation. Cannon does not greatly improve his case by basing his refusal on the technical ground that he is a voluntary witness. The chairman's absence at such a time is difficult to excuse.

* * * * *

ASIDE from whether it will attempt to restore its sadly shattered dignity through contempt proceedings, the committee is confronted with other important questions. In its possession is evidence disclosing how Bishop Cannon disposed of large sums of money. Will it place this evidence in the record and wait for the Bishop's explanation, if any, or will it be content to drop that phase of the inquiry? There have been blunt intimations, supported by some documentary evidence, that Jameson did not actually give the money, but that it was contributed through him from other sources deeply interested in the defeat of Smith and the election of Hoover. One hears the familiar name of the power trust. How far will that inquiry be pursued, if at all? Many persons believe that under its authorizing resolution the committee lacks the necessary power to complete its investigation. Will it ask for an extension of authority? And if it does, will the Senate have the courage to grant it? These questions are pertinent and vital. The committee and the Senate are on trial, and this humble observer is by no means sure of the verdict.

* * * * *

IF the Senate fails in courage or leadership, God help the country, because every passing hour adds to the panic and confusion which prevails at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. The relationship between the White House and the Republican leaders in the Senate can no longer be described as mere discord; it has reached the stage of a singularly vindictive feud, and the condition is spreading to the usually dumb and docile members of the House. At this moment the attitude of Senators Borah and Norris toward the President might be characterized as effusively cordial in contrast to that privately manifested by such Old Guard leaders as Jim Watson and George Moses. The situation is constantly aggravated by the amazingly indiscreet expressions of petulance and distrust which emanate from the White House. Among the staunchest party regulars the feeling deepens that the President is not only a weak executive and a poor politician, but that he is ready to sacrifice anything or anybody for his own political safety. They complain that he seeks advice only to disregard it; that he ignores the rules of the game in making appointments; that his secretiveness about his intentions keeps the regulars in hot water and often makes them ridiculous; that his fear and indecision are endangering the welfare of the entire party. Obviously, such criticisms do not disclose the noblest motives on the part of their authors, nor are they so intended. They are the plain, practical complaints of the plain, practical men who compose the working organization of the Republican Party, and they arise from the plain, practical desire to keep the party, including themselves, in power. Official Washington is suffering from a case of prickly heat from which winter will bring no relief.

* * * * *

IT assumed a malignant form around executive quarters a few days ago as the result of the well-meaning but misguided effort of Old Guard Senators to delay action on the anti-injunction bill. These amateur Machiavellis, inspired by the ineffable Steiwer of Oregon, concocted the scheme of sending the measure to Attorney General Mitchell for an opinion on its constitutionality. Apparently it never once occurred to any of them that the natural result of their action would be to make Mr. Hoover responsible for the bill's fate. That harassed statesman discovered it promptly when the representatives of organized labor descended on him and his Attorney General with vigorous demands for a quick and favorable report. On his other side, demanding the death of the measure, were the representatives of organized business. There was a great deal of perspiring, accompanied by no little pain. Finally the issue was met in characteristic fashion when Attorney General Mitchell sent the bill back with a letter explaining that he didn't see why he should pronounce any opinion at all.

* * * * *

INCIDENTALLY, such is the President's desire to elevate the tone of the federal judiciary, and such is the esteem in which the Attorney General is held by his chief, that he is reported to be scheduled for an early vacancy on one of the Circuit Courts of Appeal. The whisper is current that Solicitor General Thacher will succeed him. There has been some indication in the neighborhood of the White House that the amiable Mr. Mitchell does not possess all the qualities of firmness and decision which are desirable in his present post. I am reluctant to believe this, and for two reasons. Did not Mr. Mitchell eventually decide to institute a prosecution, albeit a genteel one, against the radio trust? And would lack of firmness and decision tend to disqualify any man for membership in the present Administration? The replacement of "Puddler Jim" Davis as Secretary of Labor would not seem to require deep thought unless drastic improvement is contemplated—and apparently it is not. Mr. Hoover is toying again with his original desire to name William Doak, of the Brotherhood of Trainmen. Doak enjoys the distinction of being known to labor men as a politician, and to politicians as a labor man. Filling the hole left by "Puddler Jim" is not a task requiring the talents of a Great Engineer—a dentist could do it.

Dulcinea and Dorothea

By ALFRED KREYMBORG

When Don Quixote rode on Rosinante,
    Challenging windmills in his lady's name,
Imagination drove his mind astray—
    Illusion his love, and love, his own heart's flame:

Though wings I ride are ten times madder still,
    And things ten times as mad are riding me,
The girl I love, the woman, lady, all
    Are all I know on earth of certainty.

In the Driftway

IN the Drifter's early back-yard days a cork was one of the minor mysteries. Here was neither wood nor rubber, yet it looked like the one and reacted like the other. He never got around to asking about it. Children, the Drifter has long since concluded, ask relatively few questions of their elders in view of the innumerable queries that rise between four and fourteen. Most of them rise and are forgotten in those long solitudinous hours that children spend. The Drifter accepted cork much as he accepted rubber balls and all-day suckers. In fact, he never realized what cork was and where it came from until one day many years later when he happened to take a bus ride from Seville to Algeciras.

* * * * *

THE Calle Serpiente, that narrow street which is the center of Seville's existence, was utterly deserted at four-thirty on a morning in mid-June when the Drifter, breakfastless and porterless because he had not been able to obtain either comfort at that hour, set out for the square from which the bus for Algeciras was scheduled to depart at five. The winding street was still warm with the heat of the day before and of many days before that. The day that was just breaking would be no cooler. The deep silence and the shuttered shops gave the Street of the Serpent an exhausted air. The crow of a rooster from a roof-top chicken yard and the Drifter's heavy footsteps as he lugged two weighty bags intensified the stillness. The bus was waiting when the Drifter arrived. Moreover, it left on time, and as the first rays of the sun silvered the waters of the Guadalquivir, the wide river which makes Seville a seaport, the city had become a patch of white on the farther edge of the fertile green valley. The wind increased as the road ascended toward the high country that lies between Seville and Algeciras, and the bus driver maintained such speed that he endowed the wind with the velocity of a gale. The windows of the bus proved unclosable; the window shades refused to roll up; a few hours from Seville, in June, the Drifter was shivering midwinter shivers as the awkward bus with flapping blinds careened crazily over and around and down the hills of south Spain. It was all a little fantastic, and the country was hardly less so.

* * * * *

IT was unfriendly but impressive country. Gaunt mountains rose on every side, crowned with slabs of gray rock. Ruins of old Moorish towers topped many a hill; and on one high, treeless place stood the ancient Moorish city of Medina-Sidonia, its white walls and cobbled streets scoured and worn by the wind. But the Drifter remembers most vividly the cork forests through which the road led for many miles. Cork trees are low and round of top, and they look indescribably old, perhaps because of their queer denuded trunks which are stripped of the outer bark every ten years to provide stoppers for the world's bottles. Little donkeys, loaded with the bark, plodded the roads and impeded the speed of the bus as they climbed slowly up the road's embankment. And the forests, the purple thistles on their spiked stalks, the tails of the patient donkeys, the sombreros of the men who drove them—everything in sight leaned away from a wind that had been blowing from the same direction since the world began.

* * * * *

THUS the Drifter learned about cork. Yet cork and the strange country in which it grows are still as mysterious as ever. For the Drifter's castle in Spain is a ruined Moorish castle on a gaunt hill flanked with cork forests. Purple thistles nod on their stalks, the sky is blue, cloud shadows play over gray cliffs, the sun shines fitfully; but the whole world is wrapped in a wind that strips it not only of all warmth but somehow, too, of all reality.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Jewish Morning Journal and Mr. Zukerman

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Since you have seen fit to introduce Mr. William Zukerman, the author of the article Zionism Finds Itself, in your issue of June 4 as the "manager of the European bureau of the New York Jewish Morning Journal," I am asking for the privilege of stating that Mr. Zukerman's views on the present status of Zionism are not necessarily expressive of the policy of the Jewish Morning Journal, but reflect his own personal opinions and reactions. With Mr. Zukerman's remarks about the more favorable attitude of the British press and public toward Zionist achievement in Palestine, I have no fault to find. I would fain wish that every word were true, though I have a feeling that he is over-optimistic. It is with Mr. Zukerman's categorical statement that "there has been a break in its [Zionist] ideology," and that "the political aspects of Zionism have been obscured" that our paper differs widely.

Mr. Zukerman bases his beliefs on the proceedings of the conferences of the Zionist General Council and of the Administrative Committee of the Jewish Agency held in London at the end of March. It is true that the economic questions were stressed then, but this was mainly owing to the fact that the report of the Shaw Commission had not been published then, leaving these gatherings in the dark about important and major policies of the British government. Since then, however, there has developed a definite deadlock between the Zionist organization and the Jewish Agency on the one side and Great Britain as mandatory for Palestine on the other. It is inaccurate to give the impression that either Dr. Weizmann or the other responsible Zionist leaders have "scrapped" Zionist political aspirations. It is true that the extremist point of view did not prevail, but this has been the case for the past decade in Zionist affairs. Generally speaking, the body of Zionists are as firm today as they have ever been in their conviction that only political stability and clarity can pave the way for further economic progress and peace in Palestine. This, it seems to me, is axiomatic about every country and every people.

I believe also that Mr. Zukerman has permitted himself to fall into error when he characterizes Zionist political aspiration as a purely Eastern European product, and when he states that Jewish labor in Palestine "has been indifferent to the political side of the Balfour Declaration." With regard to the last statement, the very opposite is true.

A Great American

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: José Carlos Mariátegui has died in Lima, Peru. These words sufficed to plunge the intelligentsia of all Hispano-America into sorrow; and nothing could be more eloquent of the cultural separation between the two halves of the new world than the fact that to most of us these words convey no meaning.

Mariátegui was the leader in Peru of the literary and intellectual revolutionary movement. He was a young man, about thirty-two or thirty-four. But he had already won a place of far more than local or even national importance. He was revered and loved as a guide by the younger generation in all the South American countries. He was perhaps the clearest mind, the purest and most devoted spirit which our century has given to our continents.

When a man's greatness inheres in the whole human being rather than in a particular gift it is hard to define his essential value. Mariátegui reached farthest, perhaps, as the founder and editor of a magazine called Amauta which now for several years has been the home of the enlightened groups of Peru and a forum of creative revolutionary action for all America. Mariátegui called himself a communist, although he had no affiliations with the orthodox Moscow party—nor indeed with any strictly political organization. He based his revolutionary creed on a profound aesthetic and intellectual acceptance of the Indian of the Andes, on an evolution of the values of the Inca culture in terms of modern life, and on a harmonization of these with the basic laws of industrialism and of modern socialism. His two latest books, "In Defense of Marxism" and "Essays in Interpretation of the Reality of Peru," might be called the inception of an American communism rooted in our Indian soil and functioning in our industrial world. But Amauta is no more a political organ than are the murals of Diego Rivera in Mexico City. Mariátegui was above all an interpreter and a fomenter of the creative spirit, a believer in the potential spirit of the Americas. And his magazine was the home of the Peruvian painters and poets and story-tellers who expressed this spirit. It was even more their home than it was that of the sociologists, economists, and archaeologists who are beginning, in Lima and Cuzco, to bring Mariátegui's Peru into birth. In these pages, moreover, the literature of Europe and of North America was fully represented. Mariátegui was no sentimental enemy of the United States: he recognized with his passionate clarity that we have the same cause and the same enemy as have the Americas of Spain. Appearing month after month on cheap paper with cheap reproductions of superb native art, Amauta has been one of the most dynamic and creative organs of our days.

Amauta was only part of the man's work. He founded a popular weekly, Labor, addressed more immediately to the worker who was barred from Amauta by its high intellectual standards. The weekly, last year, after several suspensions, was finally suppressed by President Leguía of Peru. In addition Mariátegui had begun to publish books and regularly arranged exhibitions in Lima for the superb new generation of artists who called him master: José Sabogal, Julia Codesido, Carmen Saco, Camillo Blas, among others. By such means, at thirty, Mariátegui had become a "maestro" for the intellectual and the studious along the whole Pacific littoral, from Colombia to Chile and north to Cuba and east to Argentina. On my recent journey through these lands university men everywhere came to speak to me of Mariátegui. "You are going to Lima," they said, "you will see him. Tell him for us that we read him and love him, and that we follow him."

In Lima I found him, a short lean cripple with burning eyes of black in which, it seemed to me, lived the power and passion of the Spaniard together with the exquisite sensibility of the Quichua—the Andean red man. He suffered from a tubercular infection which had required the amputation of one leg and the other was useless. He lived in a wheel-chair. But he was active, mobile, happy, beyond any of his American brothers. All day he worked in one of those tropical apartments open to an uncovered patio, among his family and his friends. And all day they came to him there—the writers, the painters, the scholars, the boys, and the girls, to win sustenance from his mind and from his heart. There also, periodically, came the police of President Leguía (the last of these assaults had been just a week before my arrival) and stuck him into jail, while they rifled his papers, bivouacked in his home, and then released him until the next of their visits.

Mariátegui lived in a state of perpetual siege. Often his letters never reached him, his papers were wantonly destroyed; in a hundred petty ways life was made miserable for him and work almost impossible. Yet the spirit of the man was so hale that these misfortunes did not touch its happy bloom. Nevertheless, he knew that he had reached the limit of his usefulness in a Peru stifled by Leguía. His activity was continental; it was high time he removed to some greater and freer center. This next step had been arranged for him. The intellectuals of Buenos Aires, chiefly through the propaganda of the brilliant Argentine publicist, Samuel Glusberg, had invited him to settle in their city. There he was to write, to lecture, possibly to edit a continental organ. In Buenos Aires he would be free, since Argentina is one of the freest countries in the world; he could earn money, almost an impossibility for a man of his stamp in Peru, and he would, moreover, find the type of medical aid which, he trusted, would save his life.

Everything was prepared, and he was to have gone this May. His journey would have been a turning-point in the cultural history of America Hispana. All his friends attached great importance to this transference of Mariátegui from the Pacific to the Atlantic. To me it seems symbolic of the potential cultural coordination of Hispano-America, even as the passage a hundred years ago of Bolívar and San Martín from the Atlantic to the Pacific was symbolic of the continent's liberation, political and economic, from Spain.

Mariátegui's death is one of those bitter and irreparable losses which try a man's faith in life and test his courage to go on living. He was truly a great man in a great cause, a continental cause—the cause of the cultural and spiritual freedom of America. He died poor. The expenses of his burial had to be met by a collection among his friends—most of them as poor as he. And he leaves absolutely penniless his widow and three children. His friends in the different American countries have therefore determined to raise a fund for the support of his family. They have asked me to take charge of any contributions from the United States.

I shall be glad to forward any contributions to Lima. Or money may be sent direct to Dr. Alberto Luis Sanchez, Apartado 12-53, Lima, Peru.

Letters of Edward Carpenter

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The literary executors of the late Edward Carpenter have in preparation a memorial volume, and I have been asked to write the chapter on Walt Whitman and Carpenter's other American friends. If any of your readers have any letters from Carpenter, or letters from Carpenter to Whitman, I should be grateful for copies.

Rushbrook Williams Replies

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: My attention has been drawn to your criticism of an interview which I gave on landing in New York. In answer to a question as to whether Mr. Gandhi's views were progressive, I quoted from his "Confession," which he has never retracted or modified in his copious speeches and writings. To speak of my having produced this quotation from among my "private state papers" appears to me an attempt to invest my uninteresting personality with some romantic glamor. I can only conclude that a similar spirit has converted the ordinary courtesy call which I said I hoped to pay at the Embassy in Washington into an "official mission" of the true best-seller brand.

I termed Mr. Gandhi a reactionary because I consider the appellation strictly accurate. Mr. Gandhi dislikes all that is most characteristic in Western civilization, from modern transport to modern medicine. I am unable to see what my connection with the Chamber of Princes has to do with the matter. If the chamber were, in your words, "probably the most reactionary body in India," why does it not support Mr. Gandhi, who never attacks the Indian states, publicly expresses his admiration for Indian kingship, and in general desires to revert to all that is time-honored? But it is perhaps news to you that the Indian states, through the chamber, have accepted, and are working for, dominion status, with cooperation with British India as their watchword. Their attitude toward Western civilization is more liberal than that of Mr. Gandhi, and they have a clearer realization of world tendencies. But is not all this beside the point? I mention it only since you seem to think that I have described Mr. Gandhi as reactionary because I am the envoy of a still more reactionary force. With shame I confess my inability to follow your reasoning.

The Ambience of Love

By ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

I

The ambience of love
incores us like a fruit that huts and feeds the seed and leads its root.

The ambience of love is as spring's napless rain that clothes the earth and seeks to take earth's stain.

The ambience of love is like a brooding sun filial, to whom, like flowers animals may run.

II

I lift myself to you as often I have stood and shook the slept-with sun out of my blood;

and laid me down again,
and again rose up in thinned
new shadow to let rinse
my hot hair in the wind.

Liberty, Classic and Romantic

Liberty. By Everett Dean Martin. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

TO write a book on liberty in general seems at first glance an unenviable task. What, after Milton, Locke, Voltaire, Mill, and a score of other great champions, is there left to say? And how can one write a full-length book in defense of abstract principles to which nearly all of us are already willing to pay our best lip service? "There are three irrefutable reasons," writes Charles Horton Cooley, "why views that seem dangerous, unpatriotic, or otherwise abominable should be freely expressed: (1) Discussion is the only way to modify or control them. (2) It is the only way to mobilize conservative views in order to combat them intelligently. (3) They may be right." When one can say the thing so compactly, why spread it over three hundred pages?

It is with such misgivings that one approaches Everett Dean Martin's "Liberty." These misgivings soon dissolve, however, before the flow of Mr. Martin's eloquence, his gift for felicitous and forcible statement, his attractive historical summaries, his broad, humane culture, his shrewd analysis and unfailing clarity. His "Liberty" is not perhaps a profound book or a remarkably original one, but it is none the less admirable. For in spite of the great existing classics, and of the fact that much of his argument is necessarily repetition, Mr. Martin has done a task that greatly needed to be done. So long as we have new forms and examples of censorship we shall need new tracts against them. When one learns that in the last month six newspapers and fifteen books have been suppressed in what is called the Irish Free State one can hardly regard Mr. Martin's book as academic. With the suppression of free utterance in Italy and Russia, the present censorship of news from India, and the relentless activity of our own Smoots and Sumners, we should be impressed today as never before with the truth of the aphorism that the price of liberty is eternal vigilance. And books like Mr. Martin's are an essential part of such vigilance.

Perhaps the most valuable contribution of the present volume is its analysis of the confusion and inconsistency among present-day liberals. Mr. Martin defines a liberal as "a rationalist who walks by faith in the wisdom of the irrational majority." Because the liberalism of today stems partly from the Renaissance and Voltaire, and partly from Rousseau, most liberals are not quite sure whether they are champions of culture or of nature, whether they are advocates of reason or of instinct:

> Today the liberal proclaims himself a rebel against authority, a free spirit who must be rid of his inhibitions, and tomorrow he announces that liberty is a myth having no reality in an industrial civilization. It is good liberalism if one holds with Jefferson that that government is best which governs least. It is also good liberalism to work for the extension of the activities of the government, especially its control over industry. I know liberals who at the same time invoke the Bill of Rights in defense of civil liberty and denounce the Constitution because it is a barrier to the absolute rule of the majority. In one sentence a liberal will say that the public is always wrong because the average man cannot and will not think for himself; in the next sentence he will cry, "Let the people rule!" Liberalism is undecided whether it is individualism or socialism; whether liberty is a human achievement or a gift of nature; or whether the "progress" in which liberals believe should be directed toward further advance of civilization or toward revolt against civilization and a return to nature.

This confusion, according to Mr. Martin, results from the permeation of the liberal tradition by the philosophy of Rousseau. The "classical" view of liberty, which Mr. Martin supports, conceives of liberty as a name for certain concrete rights; it appeals to historic precedent, to reason and experience; it is a cultural achievement, dependent on personal responsibility, and it holds that sovereignty must be limited by law. The "romantic" view, stemming from Rousseau, conceives of liberty as freedom in general, a gift of nature to be restored to all mankind in equal degree by the emancipation of the masses from social bondage to the institutions and traditions of civilization. Its hope of freedom is based on a belief in the good intentions of man acting as mass, and it regards any other guaranty of the individual as unnecessary. Its slogan is, "Let the people rule," and the "self-government" it worships is, in the words of Mill, "not the government of each by himself, but of each by all the rest." Liberty as unrestricted rule of the people, holds Mr. Martin, destroys liberty as individual right. Such liberty is merely "the tyranny of all over each," or, worse, merely the tyranny of the best-organized faction. Liberalism today can survive "only if it can de-Rousseauize itself."

Mr. Martin carries his advocacy of individual liberty almost to the lengths of Thoreau. He takes no stock in the view that men are under moral obligation to give support to laws "the enforcement of which can work only injury, until they are repealed," nor in the view that if a law is wrong the surest guaranty of its repeal is its rigid enforcement:

> I am at a loss to discover what psychological or historical facts have led to this generalization. The idea is apparently both unpsychological and un-American. It is at least not the way such matters have usually gone in this country. Bad laws are seldom repealed. The statute books are still cluttered with them. They merely become "dead letters" through inability to enforce them or some shift in popular interest which no longer demands their enforcement. . . . The assumption that the people will not accept a bad law if it is really enforced has little to support it. People are very likely to do the opposite, for, once enforced, the law is held to be a success; it is an accomplished fact. . . . It is because bad laws cannot be enforced, rather than because they can, that persistence in them is ever abandoned.

In spite of the cogency of this argument, one regrets that Mr. Martin does not give the opposing view a fuller consideration. The general principle that the individual, even when guided by his "moral conscience," may choose which laws he is to obey and which he will ignore is not one to be advocated without mature consideration of its probable consequences.

HENRY HAZLITT

The War for Modern Art

My Thirty Years' War. By Margaret Anderson. Covici-Friede. $4.

THE revolutions of poetry and art in the United States during the twentieth century were conducted largely by inspired women. These female crusaders and zealots—Amy Lowell, Isadora Duncan, Harriet Monroe, Margaret Anderson, and numerous others—toured and stumped the country in behalf of free verse and realism, free dancing, or free love. Many of the younger writers of today may recall how in their youth, somewhere between 1914 and 1924, they were sheltered and nurtured by the forensic prowess of these amazons. Their first effusions were examined by the indefatigable Miss Lowell and printed either by Miss Monroe in her Poetry or by Miss Anderson in her Little Review. Militant women were making literary history and artistic history in those days; and often in so doing they showed strong points of resemblance to their grandmothers or great-aunts of Abolition and Temperance-Ball days, save in one important respect: that they were largely for "self-expression" rather than for measures of repression.

It was for self-expression that Miss Anderson left her old-fashioned home in Indiana and took the first step toward the metropolis of Chicago, and along the aesthetic-sensuous-intellectual highways which led so many Middle Westerners to the left bank of Paris. It was for self-expression with fanfares of enthusiasm that the unforgettable Little Review was launched. The pages of this militant modern magazine which, courageously enough, made no compromise with the public's taste were opened to Sherwood Anderson and Ezra Pound, Ben Hecht and William Carlos Williams, Yeats and the "Baroness," Henry James and Mary Garden, the Mason and Hamlin piano, dadaism, anarchism, Hart Crane.

That Miss Anderson had in her mind an articulate plan or program is doubtful. What she had in abundance was her vague, powerful enthusiasm. For whenever she bends herself to apologetics or interpretations of her brood of artists, characters, experimenters, they become a little compromised in her hands. Indeed, the whole modern movement, as we look back upon it in America, rescued and nursed as it was by crusading women, assumes peculiar overtones; it suffers from being entangled with all sorts of "causes," such as birth control, Greek dancing, Lesbianism, psychoanalysis. Its motives, its growth, its orientation seem obscure and become all the more so in the emotional, subjective prose of Miss Anderson's memoirs.

The whole exciting, fermenting epoch, in which we still move, can be characterized already by its greater "self-consciousness" about art. A decade or two earlier no American would have dreamed of canvassing Wall Street for the sake of revolutionary modern artists! And yet this is precisely what the heroic Margaret Anderson does. The writers of the Little Review take literature as an art, explore its technical resources, listen for the latest note from Paris or Dublin, and labor for their own pleasure; whereas for older Americans the only writing that was ever heard of to any extent was a "business" that "paid."

For a long time Miss Anderson wages stoutly her "thirty years' war" for modern art, until in fatigue she drops her armor and becomes an exile in France. It is a war that will take all of thirty years; its outcome is still doubtful; and its peace will probably involve strange terms.

During hostilities Miss Anderson's instinct was generally true, and she had her luck, if I may call it that. She was lucky to have secured the collaboration of Ezra Pound, and to have joined forces with so provocative a person as Jane Heap. For years Pound, from Europe, carried on a magnificent work; he brought home much bran, but also a surprising quantity of talent. (The letters he wrote, freely cited, make delightful, acrid reading and one hopes for more, in another form.)

The Little Review, at any rate, was for some time the only American periodical which one opened with the hope of being surprised. The culmination of its brave work came with the publication of Joyce's "Ulysses," a book which has had amazing repercussions upon modern writers everywhere, and for whose presentation the Little Review was peculiarly fitted. The campaigns and trials that followed have become part of our literary history. All of Miss Anderson's twentieth-century Odyssey through the cultured purlieus of Chicago, New York, and Paris offers valuable documents for the future biographies of many potential immortals. But is it good history? Why do so many presumably fascinating and original characters among whom she passed shrink to small stature in her narrative? Why—save for the inimitable mad "Baroness"—do they seem to forget their lines when they stride the stage? We must have more memoirs of the twentieth century and more brilliant actors.

MATTHEW JOSEPHSON

Civilization and Unreality

Kindness in a Corner. By T. F. Powys. The Viking Press. $2.50.

Apples Be Ripe. By Llewelyn Powys. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

THE Messrs. Powys will doubtless not thank the reviewer who lumps them together, as if all books labeled "Powys" came out of the same bag. But there is enough similarity in these two novels to make their joint consideration something more than a caprice. Mr. T. F. Powys's tale of the Reverend Mr. Dottery and the little parish in which he is the great and good man is of course very different in its externals from Mr. Llewelyn Powys's account of Chris and his loves. But both books have a complete absence of reality—of which Mr. T. F. Powys is perhaps the more aware—that makes them charming; and both are written from precisely the same vantage-point of civilization. These two writers are civilized in the same way. That they know the same country and the same people in it is an accident of birth; that they see the same things as fresh and good and the same things as vulgar and empty is an accident of mind worth noting.

Mr. Dottery, the good, innocent, natural man, whose taste is for excellent wine and a good table, who lives the quiet life of a scholar and might be expected to be terrified by the world, is as ready to accept experience as is Chris, the hero of "Apples Be Ripe." Mr. Dottery is willing to learn of love, although his heart is as pure as new milk. Chris is born with a natural yearning for what is joyful and unashamed in the relationships of lovers; because he could not capture her without marriage, he marries a wife who finds love-making filthy and disgusting. He leaves her and takes to the road; winds hardly touch him, he is almost not wetted by the rain. Without effort he learns the hard labor of a farm hand and makes love to the farmer's beautiful daughter on Sundays. His heart, however, remains faithful to the playmate of his youth, whom later he runs off with on a wild winter night that gives him pneumonia from which he dies. He is as much a child of nature as Mr. Dottery, learning of love from Lottie, the kitchen-maid.

If I understand Mr. Aldous Huxley, these Powyses, in their naturalism, are civilized in the way he would have the world be. This is the naturalism that accepts all experience, because all experience has been perceived; that is surprised at nothing, because life is full of surprises. The honest countrymen in both these novels take birth and death and bedding maids and receiving Holy Communion in much the same spirit. Those persons who shy at love, like Chris's wife, or who are looking for sin, like the wife of Canon Dibben in "Kindness in a Corner," are vulgar, ignorant, uncivilized. They are unnatural, when naturalism means the height of sophistication. They refuse life and will not expect death.

These are frank books, amusingly so in the case of "Kindness in a Corner." They are bold and at the same time gentle. And they are written with expertness and delicacy.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Eighteenth-Century Emotion

The Stricken Deer. The Life of Cowper. By David Cecil. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $5.

COWPER'S face itself illustrates the theme, that decorous, pleasant, witty, urbane, gentle face with the mad eyes; and Lord Cecil states it in a brilliant introductory essay on the eighteenth century. The form taken in our minds by that much-invoked period is too homogeneous to be true, he says, adducing Cowper as an example.

> Past periods, like foreign countries, become the fashion. Today the eighteenth century is the fashion. . . . [People] like its sensibility because they dislike emotion. . . . They profess to like pure form, whatever that may mean, and the eighteenth century had a talent for form. . . . Finally they dislike the nineteenth century, and they see the eighteenth century as its opposite.

They see it as worldly-wise, modish, mocking, decorous, elegant. And in fact some of its typical figures are modish and elegant—Casanova, Voltaire, Lord Chesterfield. But Casanova shocked his own Venice; many Englishmen agreed with Johnson that Chesterfield's "Letters" taught "the morals of a whore, and the manners of a dancing-master"; while "to imagine that Voltaire expressed the general opinion of his time is to imagine that Jonah expressed the general opinion of Nineveh."

Outwardly fashionable society was

> . . . at once narrow and cosmopolitan, as much at home in Paris as in London. . . . It liked painting and politics, but painting meant Leonardo and Raphael and nothing else, and politics meant the Whig cause and the balance of power and nothing else.

Its classical learning was more Roman than Greek and more French than Roman. But underneath its formal appearance

> . . . it was really very English, impulsive, copious, untidy, full of exceptions to the rule, of eccentric characters, excited by sudden gusts of enthusiasm.

It made up only a small part of eighteenth-century England. There was the middle-class England of Fielding, and Smollett, and Gillray, and the Beggar's Opera, and Hogarth—

> . . . the life of the plain man in a decent brown stuff suit and shoes with steel buckles, who lived over his shop and went to Vauxhall on a holiday and sat under Seed or Jortin on Sunday; who gave money to an orphanage, and took his wife to see an execution.

There was the adventurous England too—

> . . . the adventures of the young men who were pressed for sailors, or taken by pirates, like Captain Singleton; or who explored New Zealand with Captain Cook; or were shipped off as incorrigible rakes at eighteen years old, to make fortunes as Indian nabobs, like William Hickey. It is a whimsical contrast between the dying Mogul empire, still illumined by gleams of fantastic splendor, and its prosaic red-faced conquerors with an unappeasable thirst for good living, and without a nerve in their bodies.

Without a nerve in their bodies, and there were the three volumes of "Clarissa Harlowe"! There were also Gray, and Cagliostro, and Mesmer, and the Jacobites, and the miners of Cornwall, "howling and foaming at the mouth under the eloquence of the Methodists." There were—

> . . . the bishops whose dioceses were in Wales and whose residences were in London, and who edited, with dignity, the more scabrous classical authors.

There were Burke, and Garrick, and Goldsmith, and Miss Burney, and Gibbon, and Doctor Johnson, and there was William Cowper, whose life presents one of the most teasing of all literary enigmas, alternating as it did between extremes of decorous placidity and wild emotional anarchy.

Three times Cowper went mad and twice he struggled successfully out of the black slough in which he suffered. Religious ecstasy saved him the first time.

> Alone among the philosophies of its day [evangelical religion] could satisfy the temperament of the artist. It alone set a supreme value on that emotional exaltation in which the greatest art is produced, it alone made the imagination the center of its system, and not a mere decorative appendage to it. . . . Wesley could have understood Dante as Voltaire, or even Doctor Johnson, could never have done.

The second time he was saved by the placid domestic routine which he and Mary Unwin had been building up together for many years. Both experiences open up to us intensely interesting vistas of eighteenth-century life that are left out of the current fashionable picture.

In presenting this life Lord Cecil is tentative and intelligent. He puts forth no ironclad explanations of Cowper's madness. To be sure, the loss of his mother at the age of six made a deep mark on Cowper. His first experience of public-school bullying shattered his nerves, though it did not prevent his being very happy in his second school. He had, or thought he had, a physical deformity, which may or may not have been the cause of his failure to press his suit of his cousin Theodora when difficulties intervened. His failure to marry and to have a normal sex life may or may not have had anything to do with those recurrent fits of melancholy which led at times to black madness. The reader wishing easy conclusions or the airing of his favorite theories will have to look elsewhere. But whoever wishes to explore in minutest detail all the recorded facets of an intensely alive personality will find this copious though not untidy book a mine of interest. A dozen neat, dogmatic, little titillating biographies could be made from its generous wealth —Cowper's relations with Mrs. Unwin, with that tempestuous Evangelical divine Mr. Newton, with the vivacious and perceptive Lady Austen, with the vivacious and steadfast Lady Hesketh, with Theodora, with the "mad poet" Hayley, his madness, his hidden deformity, his faith, his gallantries.

Lord Cecil has, in fact, written a biography after my own heart. He has taken advantage of modern methods of organizing a great mass of material into a readable narrative, without subjecting that material to a falsifying simplification. When facts fail him he refrains from the dubious virtue of invention, and he displays a quite unusual knowledge of and sympathy with the chaotic processes of human nature. My only discontent is with the rapidity with which he passes over Cowper's boyhood and early manhood. I wish more letters and concrete incidents had been introduced here. Failing them, one feels a little as if Cowper first came on the stage in his proper person, instead of as someone talked about, after his first attack of madness. When he comes he takes his place at once as one of those few individuals, like Pepys, and Horace Walpole, and Montaigne, and the younger Pliny, whom we know almost better than ourselves.

Alice Beal Parsons

To Make Thinking Beautiful

Intellectual Things. Stanley J. Kunitz. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

STANLEY KUNITZ'S poetry, even upon rereading, gives the curious impression of a divorcement from life. And in this the poet is very much in the main trend of the times. He handles romantic themes without anything other than an intellectual emotion. His theme is beauty, and he is capable of stirring up in his reader considerable vibration of feeling without once being passionate himself. As José Ortega y Gasset has said in an essay in the Symposium, there is going on today a general "dehumanization of art"; the period of romantic work is over, at least temporarily, and the poet is no longer bent on sharing his emotions, which are identical with those of the bourgeois:

> I do not know, but I believe that the new poet when he writes poetry aims simply to be a poet. We shall see how all the new art, agreeing in this with the new school of science, the new politics, new life, repulses above all things confusion of frontiers. It is a symptom of mental health to wish that frontiers between things should be sharply defined. Life is one thing and poetry is another—let us not mix them.

And Mr. Kunitz is a very expert poet who does not mix them. He entitles his book "Intellectual Things," but bases his title on Blake's mystic analysis—"For the tear is an intellectual thing." Mr. Kunitz is not, as are some "cerebral" poets, striving after metaphysical abstractions, nor is he concerned with the fever of the brain in revolt against its physical world; he is concerned with writing modern poetry which interprets the modern remoteness from reality, the passionless motion of the mind moving over its scenes, the reflection in the thought of all that is felt through the senses.

It is easy enough to point out this poet's affiliation in method with the metaphysical school—his use of delicate and strange conceits. There has been so much comparing of modern poets with Donne and his school (more or less without distinguishing one poet from another in that century) that one hesitates to indicate how a modern employs the same manner of association in image between two very different objects, as, for example, here, between the violet and the thoroughbred:

APPROACH OF AUTUMN

The early violets we saw together,
Lifting their delicate swift heads
As if to dip them in the water, now wither,
Arching no more like thoroughbreds.

Slender and pale, they flee the rime
Of death: the ghosts of violets
Are running in a dream. Heart-flowering time
Decays, green goes, and the eye forgets.

Forgets? But what spring-blooded stock
Sprouts deathless violets in the skull,
That, pawing on the hard and bitter rock
Of reason, make thinking beautiful?

And this is what Mr. Kunitz attempts: to "make thinking beautiful," glamorous, almost, one might say, romantic in itself. And he succeeds, partly because he knows his own limitations—and this type of lyricism has them—and never sings too stridently or importantly. He is a graceful writer of very feminine tone, perhaps almost over-delicate in gesture and accent; he is nevertheless beautifully in command of his medium and of his own subtle shadings through language and rhythm:

Only, when loosening clothes, you lean
Out of your window sleepily,
And with luxurious, lidded mien
Sniff at the bitter dark—dear she,
Think somewhat gently of, between
Love ended and beginning, me.

He strikes no profound note. His is the art of creating poetry for poetry's sake. Mr. Kunitz gives the reader always the impression of the romantic image of delight seen through the fragile lense of the mind, no impact against the flesh, but, nevertheless, a wistful, remote eagerness. His unique quality is the perfection with which he accomplishes this, and his waving, scarflike rhythm.

Vive la France

A Short History of the French People. By Charles Guignebert. Translated from the French by F. G. Richmond. Two volumes. The Macmillan Company. $15.

France, a Study in Nationality. By André Siegfried. Yale University Press. $2.

HERE are two attempts of distinguished Frenchmen to explain their country to Americans. Professor Guignebert, in response to the compelling patriotic call of 1918, turned aside from his studies of early Christianity to lecture American soldiers on the history of France, and the results are now available in English translation in two fat volumes. Professor Siegfried, heeding a later and more subtle call to patriotic service, has published in a little volume his Williamstown lectures on contemporary France.

English-speaking people have certainly been in need of a readable, reliable, up-to-date survey of the whole history of the French people, and Guignebert's work comes nearest to satisfying the need. It covers chronologically the whole span of French history from the Gaul of the Celts and of Caesar to the France of the World War, and it is based largely on such well-known secondary writings as those of Lavisse, Rambaud, Glasson, and Viollet, with honorable mention of Michelet. But it is not wholly reliable. It is marred by a considerable number of factual errors and inaccuracies, and preeminently so by the author's biases, notable among which are his inveterate prejudice against Catholic Christianity and his sterling devotion to French patriotism of the Jacobin variety. As a good Jacobin, he applauds the Revolution and especially its quickening of national spirit, and he is highly critical of Louis XIV, Napoleon, and royalists in general. As a good patriot, he perceives an almost providential evolution of the French people, always, however, with a fixed national character of moderation and mental lucidity; he interprets the Hundred Years' War, not as a civil feudal war, which it was, but as an international war between France and England, which it was not; he rejoices that the Revolutionaries extended French frontiers to the Rhine and regrets that Napoleon lost them; he maintains that Germany in 1914 was dominated by Pan-Germanism but overlooks the propagation of revanche in the schools and press of his own country after 1870.

Nor is Professor Guignebert's work up to date, according to American standards. It is narrowly political, with a few paragraphs here and there on intellectual developments, but it is not economic or broadly social. It is really a history of French politics rather than a history of the French people. Besides, it is badly proportioned. Almost half of the first volume is consecrated to obscure kings of the Dark Age (Thierry IV, Childeric III, Louis the Stammerer, and the Charleses—Bald, Fat, and Simple), while the vitally important modern events since 1815 are thinned out in the last quarter of the second volume. The translator, moreover, has done his worst to make the work unreadable. He bestrews the undoubtedly lucid French text with such curious English words as "aeonian," "energumens," "distemperature," "Napoleonean"; he injects into it every once in a while a sentence that defies syntax; and he astounds the historian by writing about "Philip the Handsome" when "Philip the Fair" is meant, and by referring to "Etienne de Blois" for "Stephen of England," "Gand" for "Ghent," "Charles Quint" for "Charles V," "Vienne" for "Vienna," "Toussaint" for "All Saints," and "patrice" for "patrician." And why hyphenate MacMahon?—he was Irish, even if President of the French Republic. And why the awful "civism," "civicist," and "incivism"?

Professor Siegfried's book is bright and easy to read, but its title is misleading. "A Study in Nationality" creates the expectation of a painstaking, scientific inquiry into the origin or nature of French national consciousness. It is nothing of the kind. Actually, it is a popular sketch of the political groups in contemporary France, with some attention to their general attitude toward international affairs and with a few incidental ipse dixits of the author on French "character." On the political groups, the sketch is notably clear and useful: it should enable the American reader to understand the purposes and practical operation of French politics. At the same time, the American reader should be on his guard against some of Professor Siegfried's easy generalizations, such as his insistence that the French "personality" is fixed, that it is far older than the American, the German, or even the English, and that its supreme attribute is "individualism," or his notion that the contemporary Frenchman does not have any "export complex" and is therefore not interested in imperialism or foreign affairs. The French "personality" is plural, not singular; there are among Frenchmen many different and frequently conflicting attitudes and behaviors, and about them there is more fluidity than fixity. If the author had centered his attention upon economics instead of politics he would have observed that the French "personality" is undergoing in our day, as surely if more slowly, the same industrial transformation as the English, the German, or the American is experiencing. Of course, the French are individualists—about some things—as are the other Latin peoples and most nations of the Continent, but they display relatively great conformity in their school system, in their obedience to army demands, and in their patriotism. In these respects the French are anti-individualists par excellence. Nor may the French be quite so disinterested in world affairs as the author would have Americans believe. It is true that they export certain kinds of manufactured goods in smaller quantities than some other nations, but they do export capital to their colonies and to foreign countries, they do have a Comité des Forges, they do form cartels with foreign manufacturers and bankers—and the French are human; where their treasure is, there will their heart be also. It is convincing evidence of Frenchmen's interest in foreigners that both Professor Siegfried and Professor Guignebert have addressed their books to us Americans.

"The Frenchman," says Professor Siegfried, "looks life straight in the face, with no trace of hypocrisy or childishness and with no illusions"; and Professor Guignebert echoes and re-echoes the self-flattering refrain. Why is it, then, that both professors metaphorically weep when they refer to the wrongs done France by nineteenth-century armed invasions of their country—three within fifty-six years? Both professors should look those invasions straight in the face and realize that the first, in 1814, was the outcome of French support of Napoleon's ambition to dominate all Europe; that the second, in 1815, was the result of the French rallying to Napoleon after he had broken his most sacred promises; and that the third, in 1870, was preceded by popular French opposition to German unification and was precipitated by a French declaration of war against Prussia.

CARLTON J. H. HAYES

Galleries of Women

Daughters of Eve. By Gamaliel Bradford. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

Three Women: St. Teresa, Madame de Choiseul, Mrs. Eddy. By H. E. Wortham. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

WITH the exception of Catharine the Great, Mr. Bradford's seven daughters of Eve are French. French women have always been allowed by Anglo-Saxon male commentators a wider unrebuked latitude in experimentation than is accorded to Anglo-Saxon women. So one is not surprised at the enthusiastic tone of the concluding paragraph: "They were all adventurers, all free, joyous, careless experimenters with life." Mr. Bradford does utter a mild warning not to regard the case as typical when the accepted conventions of morality seem to be pretty thoroughly contradicted by the career of Ninon de Lenclos: "There is not one girl in a thousand who could start as Ninon did and end as she did"—in the port of peaceful and respected age. But of Catharine the Great he ventures to say that "she was good, though she was an empress and she had her little eccentricities"—a euphemism perhaps for lovers. Eve's daughters have a wide range of activity. Ninon de Lenclos had a delightful time in the apple orchard; Mme de Maintenon, combining the talents of dove and serpent, held the devotion of a king for thirty years; Mme Guyon achieved a mystical union with God but split the church into factions; Mlle de Lespinasse experienced the ecstasies and miseries of earthly love and analyzed them with amazing intellectual precision; Catharine ruled her empire and managed her lovers; George Sand and Bernhardt deeply stirred the imagination of their time with their art. They did in fact nearly everything except function as mothers. It is interesting that none of the ten women selected for portrayal by Mr. Bradford and Mr. Wortham regarded her children, if she had any, as other than a minor issue. They all found family life quite inadequate for their satisfaction and sought that satisfaction elsewhere. All but the Duchesse de Choiseul. Her devotion to her husband was the guiding force of her life; but although he was agreeably surprised that his wife did not follow the accepted fashion of other wives at the court of Louis XV he took it rather lightly and made no pretence himself to marital fidelity.

There is a touch of the "let us now join the ladies" manner in Mr. Bradford's deft "psychographies"—an excess of consideration. Yet one has confidence in the soundness of his scholarship and in the balance and the sympathy of his judgments. Mr. Wortham is less scrupulously considerate, and more prodigal with his facts and opinions; and he has to be watched more alertly for ironical implications. One suspects him of malice in his frequent quotation from Mrs. Eddy's verse—though of course that suspicion rests on the reader's estimate of its quality. He offers the miracles of St. Teresa and the marvels of Mrs. Eddy on a platter and commits himself to no psychological theories. Referring to St. Teresa's skill in cooking, he remarks that there was a Martha as well as a Mary in her: "She had at least one rapture in the kitchen when, frying-pan in hand, she was seen to rise off the kitchen floor." If God spoke to St. Teresa in praise of poverty, and advised Mrs. Eddy to charge more for her lessons, these divine inconsistencies must be left to pundits to explain.

Both authors appear to have a very real admiration and respect for the women they portray. On the surface there is little trace in either book of that irritated concern with male superiority that Virginia Woolf recently amused herself by tracking down through the many volumes written by men about women. Mr. Bradford finds it humiliating to detect in so shrewd and clear-sighted a person as George Sand a "vast instinctive contempt" for the human male. But he evens up the score elsewhere by a touch of that patronizing flattery that conceals contempt for the human female. "Are there not millions of American wives," he says in commenting on Mme de Maintenon's managing ability, "apparently considerate and deferential, keeping suavely and deftly within their province, yet at the same time having their little dainty fingers on every pulse of their world?" If Mr. Wortham—an Englishman—happens ever to see this remark about American wives he will be more than ever convinced of what he casually refers to as the predominance which women have won for themselves in American life. His opinion of American life is as flattering to American pride as the opinion of Englishmen usually is. Hence his opinion of American women—but he had better be turned over to Virginia Woolf for cross-examination.

DOROTHY BREWSTER

Books in Brief

The Canterbury Tales. The Prologue and Four Tales with the Book of the Duchess and Six Lyrics. By Geoffrey Chaucer. Translated into Modern English Verse by Frank Ernest Hill. Illustrated by Hermann Rosse. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.50.

Mr. Hill has adhered more closely to Chaucer's line and word than any other modernizer, from Dryden on, has done. Whenever possible he has preserved Chaucer exactly as he was, changing only the orthography to meet the demands of a modern eye. Unfortunately this has not been often possible, since there is that little matter of the final "e" which we no longer pronounce, and which therefore wrecks the rhythm for us. Mr. Hill has constantly needed to throw in a word or two to complete the line; or has had to find another word than Chaucer's altogether. On the other hand he has usually left the last word in a line as it was, the only difference being that it now sports no superfluous, mellifluous syllable wherewith to charm our ears. Mr. Hill, to be brief, has done all that can be done to translate Chaucer faithfully. But this, one fears, is not enough. Dryden produced something better with his modernizations, which, being free, were free also to achieve some sort of poetry of their own—as it happens, a very fine sort. And Dryden actually came pretty close to Chaucer; at least he came close to being as rich and entertaining as the original. He could not reproduce the peculiar caressing softness of Chaucer's rhythm. Neither can Mr. Hill or any other modern. All that Mr. Hill gives us is the sense. He is to be thanked for that; but one wonders whether he is right in insisting upon the difficulties of the original for any except a scholarly reader. The reviewer believes that a modern person, without any linguistic training whatsoever, can get the most pleasure out of Chaucer by being thrown into his text as it stands.

Stresemann. By Rudolf Olden. Translated by R. T. Clark. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

Mr. Olden, formerly on the staff of the Wiener Tag, now on the Berliner Tageblatt, writes a sympathetic biography which briefly reveals the childhood, the modest youth, and the political achievements of Germany's greatest reconstructive statesman. There was nothing unusual or spectacular in the course of Stresemann's early life. He was born in Berlin, the son of a merchant of the middle class. His parents, by thrift and careful management, accumulated enough capital to enable them to send Gustav through the university, after which his career was not unlike that of the ordinary university graduate until the World War called him to participate in events which made him a world figure. With his later life the readers of this notice are generally familiar. The narrative, which is well written, does not attempt to give a history of the period but holds rather closely to the subject. However, it may be said that the last decade of Stresemann's life, cut short on the third of October, 1929, was the political history of Germany, and of Germany—largely because of his achievements—at her best.

A Study of the Principles of Politics. By G. E. G. Catlin. The Macmillan Company. $6.

It is difficult to indicate just wherein the present volume offers a new departure. The thesis that politics is concerned with all forms of human relations in which one will attempts to influence other wills, and that politics is a science, in the same sense as economics is a science, the author has already presented in a former book on the "Science and Method of Politics." Again, not only does the list of political "laws" consist of adaptations of those given by other writers, but the author's argument on behalf of their relevance to concrete issues is not invulnerable. Nor does the discussion in the second part of the book of some of the major problems of political philosophy, as, for example, liberty, equality, and sovereignty, offer much that has been hitherto unexplored. Here, the author's frequent profession of his devotion to "social facts" and his use of an improvised terminology do not conceal the fact that the view offered is not uncommon among those who accept a position midway between Bosanquet and Laski. It does not appear that the difference between Professor Catlin's analysis and those of Hobhouse, Maciver, or A. D. Lindsay is crucial. In fact, this book, together with those recently published by Bernard Shaw, Cole, and Hobson, tends to indicate that the contemporary current of political ideas in England is already a spent force. Nevertheless, while the present volume does not promise to be of seminal significance, it is far from containing merely a solemn iteration of the tolerably obvious. The book is generally lucid and incisive. Professor Catlin, too, possesses the fatal gift to challenge and provoke.

influences, particularly those at work in the relations between his native France and his adopted America. The letters and papers which he now prints, in most cases for the first time, are in themselves sufficiently important additions to our knowledge of the mind of Jefferson. In the second place, and on this the editor lays most stress, they illustrate very happily how individual minds influence the historic process as well as do the generalized and now all too popular "social forces." The editor rightly attacks the overemphasis which in the past few decades has been placed on economic factors, and in the correspondence printed offers his evidence for the value of highly individualized intellectual and spiritual factors. Although the book is not likely to prove popular reading it was well worth compiling from both editorial standpoints, and Professor Chinard has done his own work on it with his usual qualities, too infrequently combined, of scholarship and sanity.

The Life of Miranda. By William S. Robertson. The University of North Carolina Press. Two volumes. $10.

Francisco de Miranda is one of the most fascinating of the many romantic minor figures who appeared upon the stage of our earliest national history. Heretofore little attention has been paid to him other than in his relations to the men and events—relations obscure enough—of our own country. Perhaps no other man of his time, however, had so many personal contacts with the great of a score of countries in Europe and the two Americas, or spun such tangled webs of world-wide plots as did this Venezuelan adventurer. Professor Robertson's unflagging zeal for his subject has unearthed a vast mass of manuscript material of the greatest importance in relation to it, and in two massive and scholarly volumes he has given us the story of the man's whole life with a wealth of detail at every point. The result is a work for the reference rather than the private library. The scale is great for a minor figure. It is a good deal as though the tenant of a flat were presented with a full-length, life-size portrait of a great-uncle. A miniature would suit his quarters better. The historian, however, will be grateful. Miranda is no longer a shadowy figure. The amount of new material concerning him is immense, and is presented lucidly and accurately. Anyone handling the period of Hamilton and Jefferson has a new tool of prime importance.

Baudelaire. By Lewis Piaget Shanks. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

Professor Shanks has no brilliant theories to offer in regard to either Baudelaire's life or his poetry. He is content to give a straightforward and well-informed account of the poet's unhappy struggles, together with much interpretative and appreciative criticism. Often an illuminating critic, he is seldom a profoundly judicious one, and one feels that he never quite succeeds in defining Baudelaire's peculiar qualities or in explaining his importance. It is always a temptation to emphasize the romantic and decadent elements in Baudelaire, and though Professor Shanks, both in his translations and in his interpretation, avoids this evil more acutely than some others have done he often blurs the essential clarity of the poet's thought. Thus it is that Shanks's Baudelaire is not quite the Baudelaire that interests us today. His book, however, is valuable as an introduction to the poet and praiseworthy as a careful, sympathetic, and rightly directed attempt to understand a peculiarly difficult personality.

Songs of the Coast Dwellers. By Constance Lindsay Skinner. Coward-McCann. $2.

Constance Lindsay Skinner has for a number of years been a student of American Indian verse and song. And this volume of interpretations of Indian moods (not of translations at all) is based upon familiarity with the literature and culture of the British Columbia coast tribes. The poems that result are often very beautiful and simple statements of Indian religious symbolism and ritual. The identification of the poet with the Indian and his world, an identification which in both literature and painting has led to the enrichment of American art, is very nearly perfect. Miss Skinner understands these people and feels them very deeply; she becomes one of them. Therefore her poems, although they are not translations, have usually a definite authenticity of rhythm, mood, and expression. Only occasionally is there the false note of sentimentality—of the Anglo-Saxon mind too much persuaded to be emotional over primitive feelings—and therefore of restraint lost. The problem of presenting another literary art than one's own, through either translation or interpretation, is always a difficult one to solve, and any satisfactory result is achieved only when the artist is completely saturated with the art he wishes to interpret. Miss Skinner is one of the few poets so imbued with the thought of the Indians as to be able to re-present their creative passion, the world as they see it.

Cornered Poets. By Laurence Housman. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

Mr. Housman, himself a poet and a critic, has written a series of possible dialogues between well-known poets and their literary friends or acquaintances. Blake refuses to paint according to a patron's dictation; Donne orders his tomb carved; Burns composes a poem on love while he is being rebuked by the village pastor. The incidents are characteristic of the poets, but the dialogue is not particularly suggestive or interesting. The book throws no new light on the characters of the poets nor does it greatly familiarize us with them as human beings. Such dialogues should be as definitely a work of art as is a good poem; as were, for example, Walter Pater's or Walter Savage Landor's. Mr. Housman's are a bit obvious and dull.

Town Government in Massachusetts, 1620-1930. By John Fairfield Sly. Harvard University Press. $2.50.

There have been many scholarly studies of the origins of New England town government, as well as several theories to account for them. There is little that is new (there can hardly be now) in this volume concerning the earliest New England period, but the various theories of origins are well summarized and appraised. The most valuable portion of the work is that which treats of the town in its modern aspects and forms. The subject remains local but the treatment is not antiquarian, and the book offers an excellent history, in moderate compass, of the New England town considered as a living cell in the body politic from the earliest period to today.

Mengelberg and the Symphonic Epoch. By Edna Richolson Sollitt. Ives Washburn. $2.

If Willem Mengelberg should become a candidate for the presidency of a musical league of nations, this monograph might be used as a campaign document. Any other value is vitiated by the author's fulsome and gushing eulogy. She proclaims that the appreciable growth of interest in symphonic music during the last three decades ("the symphonic epoch") is due entirely to Mr. Mengelberg's activities.

Walt Whitman. A Brief Biography with Reminiscences. By Harrison S. Morris. Harvard University Press. $1.50.

Mr. Morris's account of Whitman's life adds nothing that is new until the end, when the fact that he knew the poet in his dotage at Camden makes it possible for him to indulge in reminiscence. Even then he adds few strokes to the picture already drawn by Horace Traubel. Yet in its modest way the volume takes its place among the first-hand biographies of Whitman.

Britain's Vanishing Farmer

By J. A. HOBSON

THE inability of farmers to make a decent living out of growing foods and raw materials is a world trouble of our times. But it presses with a special urgency upon Britain. It is no new trouble. For the past fifty years with a growing population England has been producing at home a continuously smaller proportion of the staple foods and raw materials which her climate makes it possible for her to raise. Since 1913 this tendency has been accelerated, notwithstanding the lesson afforded by the war of the perils of dependence upon overseas supplies. No other important country is anything like so dependent for its living upon outside supplies, or has so small a proportion of its population engaged in work upon its soil. During the war years a special effort was made to increase the amount of our food output under the stimulus of high prices and the submarine menace, but our latest statistics show that the normal pre-war economic tendency has resumed its sway. We do not produce much more than a third of the foods we consume. Since 1854 our production of wheat has fallen by something like 45 per cent, barley by approximately 30 per cent, oats by 15 per cent, while horses, cattle, and sheep show a large absolute diminution. Since 1913 every crop has fallen in amount of yield, including potatoes, turnips, and hay. Less land is in cultivation and the agricultural population steadily diminishes. The new generation of townsmen hardly realizes the significance of the change; it doesn't matter to them where their food comes from; they see it abundant and in ever-increasing variety as foreign fruits and meats come to play a larger part in their diet.

But the more thoughtful of our politicians recognize the extent to which we have given hostages to fortune in our dependence upon other countries over which we have no control. Even the convinced free-trader is disturbed in his old indifference as to sources of supply when he realizes how the new bristling array of tariffs makes it harder for him to make payment in manufactured goods for the foods and materials he is willing to import. Though unemployment in our export industries is the chief ingredient in our new protectionism it is supplemented by alarm at the decay of agriculture. While the main cause of the trouble is low prices, the result of actual or potential world overproduction, there are special features in our situation that make adjustment to the world situation difficult. The tripartite division and conflict of interests between owners, tenants, and laborers still persists. Though it cannot be held that agricultural lands, save in rare instances, yield any income rightly termed rents (as distinct from interest upon recent improvements of a capital character) the hand of the owner upon the tenant farmer is still oppressive as regards restrictions upon cultivation and sporting rights, and the yearly or short-lease tenure on which most land is held is a deterrent to enterprise and improvements on the tenant's part. The hired laborer is mostly ill paid for his skill and industry as compared with town workers, though the rises secured by the county agricultural boards have somewhat improved his position. Higher pay, greater freedom, and more amusements still drive the younger men and women into city life, even with the greater risks of industrial unemployment.

No political party can produce a confident and a convincing remedy for what has come to be regarded as an inevitable, perhaps a desirable, process. Can we produce increased quantities of foods at a price determined by the world market under conditions of pay and social satisfactions agreeable to our farmers and agricultural workers? In theory, yes. Though we could not become a completely self-sufficing nation for wheat, meat, and other food supplies we might use our land far better than we do. Denmark is a largely exporting country and our land is better than hers. Improved tenure, smaller holdings, with cooperation in buying and selling and use of electricity, could go far to increase our products. Credit facilities could do much to furnish the capital needed for machinery and for the improvements which the "impoverished" landlords cannot now afford, and which farm tenants, who bought their farms during the post-war boom at exaggerated prices, are unable to provide. Credit, organized marketing, and security of tenure are the three chief requisites to meet immediate needs, according to the new Liberal program. Labor politicians—pending land nationalization, a formal part of their program—pin their faith largely upon control of prices and the elimination of middleman's profit, and an attractive proposal is urged by Mr. Wise for state purchase of overseas supplies with the view of stabilizing prices and enabling our producers to escape the disastrous fluctuations in prices that disable them from planning crops ahead. Farmers are not good business men, and yet the application of their efforts and enterprise is subjected to fluctuations of price more incalculable than those of any other business. If the state undertook to buy in bulk foreign supplies it would be in a stronger position to bargain with great exporting organizations and to hold their supplies so as to maintain a level of prices in this country sufficient to encourage home production. Part or most of the risks of unexpected falls of price would be passed from the feeble farmer on to the broad back of the government.

But the proposals which for a time excited most attention were the product of the journalistic enterprise of Lords Beaverbrook and Rothermere, two great newspaper magnates who used their huge engines of publication to boost an economic United Empire scheme involving free, or at least freer, trade within the Empire, with a tariff on foreign imports, inclusive of foods. It was accompanied by all kinds of specious propaganda to show that the Empire, with adequate application of capital and immigration, could speedily be converted into a virtually self-sufficing economic area, with an inter-exchange of surplus goods that would release this country from dependence upon the unreliable foreigner, while it would bind the Empire into a close political as well as economic union. This proposal has rent the Conservative Party. All sections would like to accept the gospel, if only they could believe it. But Mr. Baldwin and other party leaders, who remember the food-tax election of Mr. Chamberlain twenty-five years ago, dare not touch it. They would be prepared to extend preference to manufactures and to apply to them an enlarged safeguarding scheme, but they dare not face the electorate with a proposal to tax bread and meat, or commit themselves to persuading the city electorates that their food will not cost them more.

It may well be that the decline of our agriculture has touched bottom, and that with a cessation of our growth of population and some provisions of secure tenure and prices for our farmers we may even recover some of our lost land, but to suppose that any large return to the land or any great diminution of our dependence upon overseas supplies can take place is a quite quixotic notion. Nothing short of a near-impending famine, through inability to find any export means of paying for overseas foods, would turn the cityward tide of the past few generations, or put sufficient enterprise into our food producers to enable the country to keep alive on its own resources. If there be, as some of our idealists affirm, some human feeling of attachment to the soil, some Adamite instinct, which will come to find the machine life of the city repellent, or if the old rural communities can be provided with sufficient of the valued interests of town life, it is possible to conceive that men and women may come to regard the calmer and less driving life of the country as preferable to the megalopolis. But I can find no immediate indications of a widespread desire for this return to nature. Nor do I believe that any of the proposed reforms of tenure, credit, improved cultivation, or better marketing will go far toward removing the preference for town life with industrial and trading occupations as the means of livelihood.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

SENATOR PAT HARRISON was correct when he declared in the Senate on June 16, in referring to President Hoover's statement as to his reasons for signing the tariff bill, that there was never "a document sent out with the approval of a President of the United States that had more misleading statements in it and more alleged facts that do not exist than in the statement [of Mr. Hoover]." Unfortunately, Mr. Harrison talks so much, and at times so loosely, that these words will not carry the weight they should. Far more than that, however, is the fact, which Senator Harrison was careful to conceal, that but for shameless ratting by five Democratic Senators Mr. Hoover would not have had a chance to sign the bill. These Democrats who were purchased by local tariff favors are Broussard and Ransdell of Louisiana, the beet-sugar Senators, Trammell and Fletcher of Florida, and Kendrick of Wyoming. They should be blacklisted not only by their party but by men everywhere who believe that the interests of the American people as a whole should never be sacrificed to local logrolling. But they are not the only Democratic offenders, heaven knows. All through the struggle Democratic Senators voted for higher rates even when they later turned around and voted against the bill. Never was there better proof of the need of a new, decent, and honest party. This whole tariff crime is a challenge to liberals everywhere.

FOR MR. STIMSON, too, the admirals have gone too far. In a speech over the radio on June 12 he paid his respects to them in unmeasured terms. Those who opposed the treaty he declared to be "blindfolded," "intolerant," and "against all naval limitation." "Never," he declared, "was the narrowness and intolerance of militarism exhibited in a more striking light." Precisely. This is what The Nation has been saying for years past, when Mr. Coolidge, Mr. Hoover, and Mr. Stimson, too, were kotowing to the naval "experts"—who are, as Mr. Stimson also said, "handicapped by a kind of training which tends to make men think of war as the only possible defense against war." He most effectively showed that the die-hard admirals in England and Japan are also crying treason and betrayal and reminded his hearers:

> From the very foundation of their government the American people have placed the decision of these matters in the hands not of their admirals and generals but of their civilian representatives. By our Constitution the size and character of the American fleet, so far as it is determined by appropriation, rests with the President and Congress; so far as it is determined by treaty it rests with the President and the Senate. The naval officer is relegated to the function simply of giving advice on technical matters to these civil officers who have the duty of making the decision.

This is all the exact truth. But why does not Mr. Hoover act? He is the commander-in-chief and could at once relegate these dangerous militarists to their proper places. But he has not even spoken out as has Mr. Stimson. No wonder the admirals are insubordinate and disloyal to their chief. It is not a question of the right of free speech. Every officer abandons that when he puts on the uniform.

SECRET DIPLOMACY comes to the front again, rather arrogantly and quite needlessly as far as the Administration is concerned, in the controversy between Secretary Stimson and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations over the naval-treaty documents. The committee asked for certain confidential memoranda and other papers relating to the London negotiations. Secretary Stimson, with Mr. Hoover's approval, declined to transmit the papers on the ground that to do so without the consent of the other governments concerned would be an act of bad faith. The committee, accordingly, was asked to take the treaty as it stands, with only such relevant documents as the Administration saw fit to communicate to it. Both sides, in a way, are right. Diplomatic documents regarded as confidential have often been withheld by the Presidents, and there is no way to get them if the President refuses to give them up. To ask a Senate committee, on the other hand, to content itself with only what the President hands out is to deprive the Senate of a constitutional right to know all it wishes to know about diplomatic business. A little less high-hatting on Mr. Stimson's part and a little more openness on Mr. Hoover's would have avoided an unseemly clash and allowed the committee to examine the documents privately without having to ask for them as a matter of right.

A CLEAN BILL OF HEALTH has been handed to William B. Shearer of Geneva-naval-conference fame by Senator Shortridge, chairman of the Naval Affairs Subcommittee which investigated Mr. Shearer's activities. According to the Senator, Mr. Shearer's record, which looked rather bad as it was set out in the newspapers from day to day while the investigation was going on, was in fact of unsullied purity. There is no evidence that the shipbuilders who employed him sent him to Geneva to defeat, if he could, the naval-reduction plans of the American government. "He may have been extravagant and assertive," the Senator remarks, "but so far as I see it there is no reason for criticizing him." Even a formal report on the case appears to the Senator to be unnecessary, and if one is made it will not radiate any censure in the direction of Mr. Shearer or his employers. Mr. Shearer himself, who writes a plaintive letter to the New York World arraigning a press which "as a whole either ignores entirely or buries in a remote paragraph in a most obscure corner this exculpatory statement," actually claims that his Geneva activities were "merely directed in behalf of parity." Mr. Shearer ought to be content even if he no longer gets front-page publicity.

"GET THE REDS" is to be the blithesome slogan of Congressman Fish and his committee associates during a part, at least, of the heated term. The red menace is upon us, and the business of the committee will be to expose it in all its terribleness so that Congress may go at it hammer and tongs. Judging by the reports of the first few committee hearings, the same old gang of treason-smellers and bomb-hunters is ready to offer its services. The committee is to depend "in large measure," it is reported, "on leads furnished by the Departments of Justice, State, and Labor"—the three executive departments whose imaginative facility in dealing with evidence that is mostly bunk has hitherto been exceeded only by their stupidity in giving their case away. The Reverend Edmund Walsh, of Georgetown University, led off at the opening hearing with the startling allegation that Soviet Russia had officially "declared war against all humanity." What mystified the good father was where all the Russian propaganda money came from; he thought, he was reported as saying, "it must come from the outside." The great labor philosopher William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, followed with a vision of Communism gnawing at the vitals of the American trade unions and carrying on "a vicious campaign of propaganda in the central coal fields of Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, and Pennsylvania." It is earnestly to be hoped that Mr. Fish, with $25,000 for his committee expenses, will keep on in the way so convincingly begun. We have no doubt that the committee, if it will only stick to its job, will find that American radicalism, backed by Russian gold, is largely responsible for the market slump and the low price of cotton and wheat.

WE ARE GLAD that the bill providing for a full-time Federal Power Commission has been passed. Power is the economic question of the immediate future. Three honest and able men giving their whole time to the important duties devolving on them under the Federal Power Act can perform a great public service, and President Hoover should spare no effort to secure high-grade appointees. In its report for 1928 the commission pointed out that applications then pending involved no less than 20,500,000 horse-power, a total more than one-half greater than the entire hydro installation of the country at that time. The public needs all possible assurance that its interests in the remaining federal water powers will be safeguarded against the manipulations of those great power companies which, with much talk of service, have given only too clear evidence of a determination to carry off everything that is not nailed down tight. Muscle Shoals, Boulder Dam, Flathead, and a dozen lesser cases all illustrate the bitterness of the fight waged by these interests. As long as we cannot get the basic advantages of public operation, so long must we wage the unequal struggle for effective public control of private operation. Public attention, therefore, ought to be directed narrowly at the further and more controversial features of the Couzens and Parker power-commission bills when they come up for consideration at the next session of Congress.

THE ATTEMPT TO SIDESTEP the Shipstead anti-injunction bill by referring it to the Attorney General for an opinion on its constitutionality failed ingloriously. Mr. Mitchell sent it back with a letter reminding the Senate Judiciary Committee of the notorious fact that in accordance with the statutes and the uniform practice since 1818 "the Attorney General is not authorized to give his official opinion upon the call of either house of Congress or any committee or member thereof." Chairman Norris, over whose protest the committee applied to the Attorney General, "agrees wholeheartedly" with the position of the latter. The committee, driven into the open, on June 9 voted by 10 to 7 to report the bill unfavorably, and Senator Steiwer was allowed until June 20 to file a detailed adverse report. Senator Norris is seeking a unanimous-consent agreement for a vote in late December. In urging the confirmation of Judge Parker some of his supporters maintained that the way to cure the injunction abuse was not to reject the North Carolina jurist, but to change the law. Among them were four members of the Judiciary Committee, all of whom later were also of those voting to send the Shipstead bill to the Attorney General. These statesmen were Senators Gillett, Hastings, Overman, and Waterman. As we recall it, Dickens, in a work by no means wholly forgotten, created a character known as the Artful Dodger.

IN THE LAST PRESS OF BUSINESS before the adjournment of Congress certain bills stand out as deserving of attention. Chief among them are the Wagner bills for dealing with unemployment, which are now before the House Judiciary Committee. Another measure, long overdue, is the Vestal bill, now before the House. This bill affords protection from piracy to the designer, whether he be a designer of printed materials, fountain pens, glassware, or clothes. The bill defines design in a manufactured product as a pattern, shape, or form which is "original . . . by reason of an artistic or intellectual effort," and stipulates that an original design shall receive protection from the time of its registration. Passage of this bill would be welcomed abroad and at home. A third and extremely important measure which should be pushed through before adjournment is the proposal to appropriate $1,500,000 to acquire for the Library of Congress the famous Vollbehr collection of incunabula, including a unique fifteenth-century Gutenberg Bible. The House unanimously voted the appropriation on June 9, but the Senate has not yet acted. A rich university is known to be angling for the collection, and if Congress does not make up its mind to accept the offer, Dr. Vollbehr, who brought the books to this country several years ago, may be forced to seek another buyer. The Senate should act at once to secure this famous collection to the nation.

SO BISHOP CANNON gets away with it, as far as the Lobby Committee is concerned. That body ingloriously concluded its work by resolving "that it should not insist on answers to questions propounded to Bishop James Cannon, Jr., and the transcript of the whole record be laid before the Senate." At the same time it made public a mass of correspondence between Bishop Cannon and the bucket-shop with which he dealt with such fidelity that even on the Sabbaths he telegraphed or wrote to his bankers in his eagerness for 1 per cent profit. A servant of the Savior gambling with low-down hucksters in the marts of trade like this? It is so disgusting that his church in common decency ought to act at once, and would—if it did not happen to be the Methodist Church South in America.

A LOSS OF $13,000,000 since April 25 is the result, up to June 14, of the Farm Board's effort to support the price of cotton by the use of its revolving fund in large-scale speculation. Of course this is a paper loss and no one can tell what the final actual outcome will be, but the prospects are not flattering. In March, when cotton went down to fourteen cents, the board came to the rescue of the hard-pressed cotton cooperatives, and it is now supposed to hold more than 1,000,000 bales of the fleecy staple, out of a 1929 crop of 14,500,000 bales. The statistical position is thoroughly bad: foreign consumption during the nine months ending April 30 was down more than 1,000,000 bales from last season, and domestic consumption in the ten months ending June 13 was off by 679,000 bales; the carry-over on July 30 is expected to be at least 1,000,000 bales greater than last year. So much for the immediate situation. Fundamentally, does the board really believe that it can keep acreage down at the same time that it keeps prices up? Chairman Legge, in reviewing the first year of the board's work, feels that "fairly satisfactory progress has been made in the short time the board has been at work." Perhaps so, but has the board abolished the immemorial relation between the production and the price of commodities sold in a competitive world market?

WHAT PRICE NATURALIZATION? is the question which the friends of the alien in this country are asking. The Cable bill, which as it passed the House of Representatives made provision for equalizing the citizenship of women who had lost their citizenship through marriage with an alien, has been amended in the Senate by the requirement of educational qualifications so high and rigid as to make naturalization extremely difficult. The knowledge of the English language and American history which the Senate changes prescribe is so considerable as to make possible the rejection of a large proportion of applicants if the court chose to interpret the requirements strictly. If the Senate amendments prevail the alien would find himself caught between two fires. He must register if he is an alien; he must pass an oversevere educational test if he wishes to become a citizen. Meantime the applications for naturalization are being kept down by high fees and unemployment, although on the financial side the Treasury is not worrying; in Boston, for example, in November, 1928, 1,066 applied for their first papers and paid a fee of one dollar apiece; in November, 1929, the 106 applicants paid ten dollars each. There is no question that a considerable number of members of Congress would like to see naturalization made as difficult as possible, short of prohibiting it altogether, and that the advocates of a more generous policy need all the support they can get.

WELL, THE POOR OLD NATION and the New Republic and others of their ilk have been exposed again. This time it is Paul Elmer More, one of the two chief exponents of humanism, who has done the trick. Listen to his words:

> The chief opposition to humanism is confined to the would-be leaders of intellectual life in the New York newspaper world—chiefly the weekly newspaper world. But this is no advantage, because the intelligentsia of New York is the most tawdry and dingy ever found in history.

We confess to being entirely crushed; not even the fact that in tawdriness and dinginess we have set a new record consoles us. Something in his words suggests to us that Mr. More is rather mad about something. Could we be wrong about this? In our pitiful blindness we had suspected that humanism suggested a philosophy of kindliness and human sympathy as well as the insistence that individual life and the life of the world have a purpose. Waiving that, however, we are compelled to admit that Mr. More knows something of what he is talking about, for "Who's Who" verifies our recollection that for five years Mr. More was editor of The Nation. Can it be that after enjoying for that period the benefit of his gospel to the heathen the intelligentsia of New York is really as tawdry and dingy as he thinks?

ALL HONOR to Ernestine Schumann-Heink! Her sixty-ninth birthday has found her still singing and singing well and hoping to die while singing her last song as her valiant spirit takes flight. Truly a heroic figure! There was a day when, deserted by her husband, with no money, with no furniture left in her apartment save three chairs and a bed, she tried to throw herself and her children before a train. The engine was at hand when her little girl saved four lives by screaming "Mamma, mamma, I love you, I love you, take me home." The appeal was irresistible. If there was fortunate infirmity of purpose then, there has been no other case of it in all Schumann-Heink's long life. Rising above several deep tragedies—one son was lost in a German submarine—she has been the great artist. Exemplar of many another heroic woman to whom public recognition has not come, we rejoice at her courage and her perseverance and hope that we may salute her on her seventy-ninth birthday with similar words of gratitude and admiration.

IN OUR ISSUE of April 18, 1928, we referred at some length to a libel suit brought by Captain Calvin H. Goddard against The Nation. As a matter of record we are glad to state that the suit has been voluntarily withdrawn by Captain Goddard.

The Tariff Crime Complete

IT was a crime against the American people—yes, against the whole world—to sign the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, but Mr. Hoover has done it. He has done it moreover in a way to inflict the greatest possible damage on his own reputation for intellectual honesty and straightforwardness. Not ten days ago he let it be known that he would not act until he had referred the bill to experts, to Mr. Mellon, and to other Cabinet officers. Instead of doing so, he announced within twenty-four hours of the passage of the bill, before it had even reached him, that he would sign it, and accompanied his decision with a statement which for moral obfuscation and mental confusion is almost without parallel in our history. Anyone who may hereafter maintain that his is a first-rate mentality can be laughed out of court by the mere citation of this memorandum. It proves beyond question that in economic matters he is a child and that the idea that he is especially versed in economic affairs is another one of the long list of Presidential myths.

Mr. Hoover has, moreover, taken this fatal step—we believe it will prove fatal politically—in the face of an unprecedented outpouring of protests. Doubtless the speed of his decision was due to a desire to head off the avalanche of demands for a veto of the bill which was certain to descend upon him. Never in our entire tariff history has there been such a volume of protests from sources heretofore favorable to tariff legislation. When before did the president of the American Bankers' Association denounce such a measure? When before did the leading exporters of the country unite in their protests and declarations that it would gravely injure business? When before has a majority of the leading newspapers of the country demanded a veto? When before have the leaders of the business world declared that the signing of such a measure would retard the recovery of business and further injure our serious economic situation? When before has Wall Street reacted so unfavorably to a bill raising the tariff? During the week when the bill was actually being passed by Congress the average price of fifty industrial and railroad stocks, as reported by the New York Times, fell 13.79 points. The news that the Senate had passed the bill caused a bad break in prices. The news of the Presidential approval sent prices into a collapse. As for aiding the farmer, cotton and wheat slumped badly. How pleased our rural population must be as it reads that while the bill was becoming law there were declines in wheat, corn, rye, oats, flour, butter, and eggs!

To fly in the face of all this would in itself have been bad enough. To excuse it with such arguments as Mr. Hoover offers is really incredible—no wonder that even the New York Times asks if Mr. Hoover has saved his official integrity. Take, for example, the question of the effect of this tariff upon the rest of the world. Three or four weeks ago Mr. Hoover assured a group of editors that the bitter protests from thirty-three countries amounted to nothing—they would all blow over. In his memorandum he dismisses all these protests with this trifling reference: "The complaints from some foreign countries that these duties have been placed unduly high can be remedied, if justified, by proper application to the Tariff Commission." What chance could a foreigner have before such a commission? Indeed, almost at the very moment that the President was writing these words, French manufacturers were moving to organize those of other countries against us, and the French Minister of Commerce, M. Flandin, publicly denounced the measure as a "false remedy," "a dangerous procedure," stupid and unsound. Even more striking is his remark that "it is unfortunate that on this economic ground the warlike instincts of men are now let loose." Precisely. That is inevitably the net result of such legislation. It menaces peace.

What of the rest of Mr. Hoover's excuses? He signs the bill to relieve business from further anxiety due to uncertainty—when a veto could have established the only real certainty. He forgets his own demand of Congress "for limited revision of the tariff" and cites the Kansas City Republican platform as justifying the present measure. Why then did he not urge general revision from the first? Again, he rejoices that the flexible-tariff provision has been voted because, he quite truly says, "Congressional revisions are not only disturbing to business, but, with all their necessary [!] collateral surroundings in lobbies, log-rolling, and activities of group interests, are disturbing to public confidence." No better bit of state's evidence has come from an authoritative source in years. The protective-tariff principle, he says, remains, and the commission is to see to it that it adjusts "the rates so as to cover the differences in cost of production at home and abroad"; it can make changes up to 50 per cent. The commission is thus to have legislative power, subject to his approval, over the 3,300 items in the bill, which he declares are far too numerous for any President to pass judgment upon. The commission is to make over an admittedly bad job by revising all the schedules that call for change—something that everybody knows is impossible in view of the influences that are certain to be brought to bear upon the commission.

But that bad job, due, as he says, to log-rolling, to pressure by special interests and lobbies, is, it appears, not so bad after all! "No tariff bill has ever been . . . perfect"; so why should you expect this not to be full of errors and wrongs? Aren't we all fallible? Let us all sit back and think no more about it, and let the Tariff Commission do it. This is childish enough, but it is as nothing compared to the President's utter failure to realize the vital thing—that the protective principle strikes today at our national welfare as never before. At the very moment when we need our export trade more than ever before, when our tremendous production in many lines has outrun domestic needs, when the streets are full of unemployed, when our foreign debtors more than ever need low tariffs in order to pay what they owe us, we strike a deadly blow against each and every one of these parties in interest. Let the President say what he pleases about the 2,170 schedules that are untouched; everybody else in the world knows that this is protectionism run mad. If it does not bring the swiftest political penalty with it, it will do violence to unbroken precedents of our tariff history.

Germany Sets a Pace

THE successful flotation of the so-called international loan under the Young Plan marks another stage in the settlement of the reparations issue and the progress of Germany toward economic and political rehabilitation. Properly speaking, the loan is not an international loan at all, but a series of national loans each of which is payable in the currency of the country of issue. American and British bankers in particular objected strongly to a loan represented by bonds payable in gold anywhere, fearing, apparently, that the international backing of such a loan might give it a prestige which would work to the disadvantage of purely national loans. The present loan, accordingly, achieves a unique straddle of the difficulty. The terms exacted by the cooperating banks, too, are heavy. The American syndicate pays 85.25 for bonds which it offers to subscribers at 90, while in France, where the bonds are put out at 98.25, the Treasury takes 8.25 in return for an exemption of the bonds from taxation.

Nevertheless, with the loan successfully out of the way, Germany can proceed with unwonted assurance to put its economic house in order. Under the Dawes Plan, such steps as were taken to improve financial and economic conditions were essentially tentative, for the reason that no agreement had been arrived at regarding the total amount of reparations that would have to be paid. No country can make any but temporary arrangements to meet its obligations as long as it does not know how great the obligations are. A good deal was done when the currency was stabilized and the railways reorganized, but the annual payments under the Dawes Plan were largely offset by receipts from foreign loans. Moreover, as S. Parker Gilbert, Agent General for Reparation Payments, again points out in his final report on the operation of the Dawes Plan, the German budget has not been balanced and the financial system of the Reich is still in disorder. The public revenues have been sufficient to insure budgetary equilibrium, but "any determined effort to control public expenditures" has been lacking, and Germany has been living beyond its means. It has been easier to be extravagant because, while the Reich collects the revenue, the states and communes claim a large share of it for their own purposes and spend it without any effective central control. It is this situation that enables Dr. Carl Bergmann, a high authority on German finance, to maintain in the June issue of Foreign Affairs, in opposition to Mr. Thomas W. Lamont, that even the Young Plan "is not the final solution of the reparations problem," but must be classed as "a political venture" rather than as "the result of economic experience." Whether final or not, however, both the reparations total and the scale of annuities have been fixed, and for a number of years at least the figures are likely to stand. How will Germany now proceed? It is already producing more goods with less labor, it is reorganizing its industries so as to reduce the number of separate establishments, and it is multiplying its cartels and trade associations. It now proposes a further step intended to enlarge its share of world trade. There is in contemplation, it is announced, an immediate reduction of 10 per cent or more in the prices of products sold for export, the reduction to be effected through a lowering of wages and a cut in the price of coal. The Westphalia iron workers, it is reported, are about to agree to a 7½ per cent cut in wages preliminary to a 10 per cent cut in iron, and the export price of coal, of which there is a large excess stock in the Ruhr, has already been substantially lowered. The gain, it is expected, will be in a marked increase of German exports during the present period of world depression in trade, a further recovery of foreign markets, and the possibility of higher prices when trade conditions improve. Incidentally, the grave unemployment situation, with some 2,800,000 persons out of work, should show marked amelioration.

Germany, in short, is now in a position to regain the trade of which the Allies, in the peace treaties, sought permanently to rob it. It is ready to go farther than it has already gone in capitalizing for its economic benefit the international good-will which it has won since the war. Only in the stuffy circles of superheated hundred-per-centism is Germany any longer an outcast. Mr. Dwight Morrow's recent repudiation, in one of his New Jersey campaign speeches, of the vindictive allegation of exclusive German "war guilt" is a gratifying sign of the changed attitude of sensible people. There is more to the matter than reconciliation, however. If the economic policy which Germany is thinking about goes into operation, the industrial and commercial world will have to meet the vigorous competition of German intelligence, ambition, and hard work. For the United States, saddled with a Congress and an Administration whose tariff philosophy is the acme of stupidity and national arrogance, a stiff fight to keep its economic head above water would be an unmixed blessing.

The War for Freedom

IF anyone doubts that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, we advise him to send to the American Civil Liberties Union at 100 Fifth Avenue, New York City, for a copy of "The Story of Civil Liberty—1929-30," being the annual report of the Union for the year just past. He will read in this fascinating pamphlet, illustrated by extremely interesting maps, the story of the unending war waged by this admirable organization against repression, intolerance, official lawlessness, and all the combined forces of political bourbonism and economic greed that forever menace our liberties. It is an extraordinary report, and no genuine American can read it without a fresh realization of the strength of these powers of evil, and a new sense of gratitude for the Union's work in combating them. The field of campaign is nation-wide, extending literally from Boston to Los Angeles, and the battle rages almost constantly on a dozen different fronts.

How many of our readers, we wonder, know that thirty-two out of our forty-eight States have criminal-syndicalism or sedition laws, twenty-six of them passed in 1919 or later; that twenty-eight States have laws against the red flag, all passed in 1919; and that twenty-three suffer from both abominations? Only ten States are free of both, and of these the most are Southern States, many of which have old laws, coming down from reconstruction days, aimed at "incitement to insurrection and rebellion," and equally adaptable, as current events in Atlanta show, to the suppression of labor organization and radical activities of every variety.

How many persons are cognizant of the actual state of the law regarding Negroes as it exists in these United States of ours in this year 1930? Despite the Constitution, ten States deny Negroes the right to vote and to marry with whites, and segregate them both in public schools and on public conveyances. Five more impose all these disabilities except the denial of voting rights. Most surprising of all, perhaps, to the ordinary uninformed American, no less than thirty of the forty-eight States, including many of the most liberal ones in the Union, still prohibit intermarriage of Negroes with whites. We have scarcely made a beginning in guaranteeing the full civil rights of our colored fellow-citizens.

The machinery of repression embodied in our law has been strengthened rather than weakened during the year by legislation and court action. There are some gains to be recorded, like Judge Thacher's decision that mere membership in the Communist Party does not make an alien deportable, the decision of the United States Court of Appeals reversing the conviction of Mary Ware Dennett, and the appointment by the Federal Law Enforcement Commission of a special committee on official lawlessness. On the other hand, there have been plenty of setbacks, like the conviction of strikers and the acquittal of their assailants in trials filled with religious and political prejudice in North Carolina, the denial by the Supreme Court of the United States of citizenship to Rosika Schwimmer for her refusal to bear arms in time of war, and the conviction of five young women in California for displaying a red flag. Concerning the general situation the report says:

> The police and prosecuting officials always respond to the urge of employers and red-baiters. The machinery is chiefly used in strikes and against radical propaganda in industrial centers. The constant violations of Negroes' rights continue unabated. Religious and racial intolerance is firmly intrenched.

Though 1929 showed only 228 free-speech prosecutions against 418 in 1928, yet during the first three months of 1930 no less than 920 such cases were brought, as against only 36 in the same months of last year. Unemployed people must not talk too much. Public opinion, however, the Union finds, is on the whole more alert to defend civil liberties, and defense organizations are stronger than in the past.

We wish that there were space to record fully the work done by the Union in fighting repressive laws, in opposing censorship, police lawlessness, and the activities of the professional patriots, in asserting the rights of strikers, aliens, Communists, and other unpopular minority groups. It is a fine story of the old traditional Americanism functioning under new and more difficult conditions, offering a splendid contrast to the intellectual and spiritual pusillanimity of so many of those who sit in the seats of the economically and politically mighty. We hail with admiration and gratitude the completion of ten years' work by the Civil Liberties Union, and we agree heartily with the more than moderate statement of its report:

> Our services are essential for whatever degree of tolerance we can achieve, and will be until a political and economic opposition arises strong enough to defend its own rights, and in so doing to stem the tide of intolerance and repression which marks the country today.

Apostles of Passive Resistance

THE scene at Peshawar described in an article in the present issue—the spectacle not only of revolutionary leaders voluntarily giving themselves up to the authorities, but of unarmed men deliberately baring their breasts to British rifles and calmly allowing themselves to be shot—all this seems almost incredible to the Western mind. But it should not be forgotten that the doctrines of non-cooperation and non-violence, though they are at present taken far more in earnest and held against greater provocation in India than they have been anywhere else in the modern world, are not exclusively Indian doctrines. Within the last century the idea of passive resistance has been held by several great predecessors of Gandhi. Gandhi himself, as was pointed out in an article in our issue of May 21, has frequently confessed his debt to Tolstoy. Tolstoy, in turn, acknowledged his debt to William Lloyd Garrison:

> The principle of non-resistance to evil by violence, which consists in the substitution of persuasion for brute force, can only be accepted voluntarily. . . . Garrison was the first to proclaim this principle as a rule for the organization of the life of men. . . . Therefore Garrison will forever remain one of the greatest reformers and promoters of true human progress.

The doctrine of non-violence, in short, though it has remained for India to give it by far the most remarkable application in our time, owes a great debt to American thinkers. We find the doctrine clearly enunciated not only by Garrison, but by Emerson; and it was acted upon by Thoreau.

> The country [remarked Emerson in 1844] is frequently affording solitary examples of resistance to the government, solitary nullifiers, who throw themselves on their reserved rights . . . who embarrass the courts of law by non-jury, and the commander-in-chief of the militia by non-resistance.

In Thoreau we find the American archetype of such figures. He was opposed to a government that was supporting slavery and prosecuting a war of aggrandizement against Mexico. "I quietly declare war with the state," he said, "after my fashion." When he refused to pay his poll tax, he was put in jail. But he declared:

> If the alternative is to keep all just men in prison or give up war and slavery, the state will not hesitate which to choose. If a thousand men were not to pay their tax bills this year, that would not be a violent and bloody measure, as it would be to pay them and enable the state to commit violence and shed innocent blood. This is, in fact, the definition of a peaceable revolution, if any such is possible. If the tax-gatherer, or any other public officer, asks me, as one has done, "But what shall I do?" my answer is, "If you really wish to do anything, resign your office." When the subject has refused allegiance, and the officer has resigned his office, then the revolution is accomplished.

If the followers of Gandhi adhere steadfastly to this plan, their ultimate success is far from hopeless. As they love liberty, let them not break faith.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

ALTHOUGH I was among the voters who had no enthusiasm for Herbert Clark Hoover I must admit that the gentleman has fallen far below my expectations. A violent partisan of Governor Smith, I felt that the election of Mr. Hoover would be unfortunate. I did not begin to realize its catastrophic quality. Let it not be forgotten that President Hoover has established two records already in his Administration. Under his leadership more men have been put out of work and more put in jail than America has ever known.

The stock-market crash and the business decline which hit the country late in the year 1929 may not justly be attributed directly to the President. It was hardly Mr. Hoover's fault that the nation had indulged in a wild orgy of overproduction and consequent inflation. It is true, of course, that a firmer and a prompter policy upon the part of the Federal Reserve might have toned down the excesses of speculation. But that is surmise. Wall Street had the bit in its mouth and was running away. It is at least possible that no living man could have stopped the mad gallop to the edge of the precipice.

But it can clearly be charged against Mr. Hoover that he has been an exceedingly ineffective leader once the accident occurred. His boosters presented him to us under singularly false colors. Here was the great engineer, the great executive. They said that he knew nothing of practical politics and that his worth lay along the lines of quiet unobtrusive efficiency. By now we know that President Hoover's greatest flair—his only one as far as can be ascertained—is a capacity for publicity. Not for a minute would I deny his great skill as a ballyhoo artist. Upon retirement from the White House there is no reason why he should not obtain a lucrative position in one of our great advertising agencies.

He performed an extraordinary feat first of all in selling himself. Even today there are little groups here and there who look upon Mr. Hoover as the trained expert. The notion is not yet gone that he feeds upon statistics and grows strong thereby. A few still believe that he lives and moves and has his being by clinging to sagacious graphs embodying subtle wisdom hidden from the brain of common mortals. Not many think this any more, but it is a mark of sheer genius that a single disciple should still remain. The plain fact is that Herbert Clark Hoover is the most ignorant man to sit in the White House within the memory of any living man. And I am not forgetting that there was a Warren Gamaliel Harding.

This is by far the kindest view which can be taken of the leadership of President Hoover. It would be simple and silly to look upon him as a deep-dyed villain. His mistakes have been made in good faith. God help him, he could do no other. We have been living for the better part of two years on slogans. No hungry man has ever been denied the benefit of an optimistic Presidential statement. And the curious quirk in Mr. Hoover's mind is his childlike belief in "psychology." One has but to smile and smile and chirp a little and everything will be for the best in the most perfectly adjusted of all nations.

I ask you to recall the manner in which Mr. Hoover is said to have saved the nation after the Wall Street panic. His device was simplicity itself. He encouraged the business leaders to do some tall talking. Down to Washington they flocked, the public-utility princes and the railroad kings. One said: "I will spend a hundred million," and under the emotional appeal of the revival meeting another raised the bet and pledged two hundred million. Industry must hum because all citizens both great and small had announced the starting of vast projects. It may be argued that such a process of expansion would have been economically fatal in a period of readjustment. But there is no need to argue that, because no one save Mr. Hoover took these promises of vast expenditure as anything more than ballyhoo. Many a captain of industry hotfooted it back from Washington where all had grown drunk on figures and in the cold dawn of the morning after proceeded to lop a few more thousand employees off the pay roll.

But the problem of unemployment never bothered the President very much. That, too, he met like a true press agent. He solved unemployment by saying that it didn't exist save in the usual seasonal quantities. People close to him learned that he could grow furiously angry if unemployment were mentioned. If it were not talked about it would not exist. That too was psychology. To say a thing was to have it come immediately into existence. To refrain from mentioning a condition would assure its immediate disappearance.

Take, specifically, Mr. Hoover's attitude toward the tariff. He made public announcement that he would consult with trained experts before affixing his signature. All the practical economists of the country from Henry Ford up and down rushed into print to denounce the pending tariff. They assured America that it would deal a heavy blow to our already dwindling export trade. The President's response to this testimony was a hasty statement that he would sign the bill. He said that business needed it. Once again Mr. Hoover was content with the gesture.

The advance man of a circus comes to a small town and placards every billboard and assails all the local publications with the information that the show will bring with it a herd of twenty elephants. When the attraction arrives the populace finds that there are but two. Nobody is particularly indignant. The townsfolk have had experience with press agents before. They allow for natural exaggeration. There is no suggestion that the man be pursued and required to produce the eighteen missing animals. The press agent has done his duty after his fashion. It was up to him to make the community elephant-conscious. It was a good story while it lasted and so he moves on to bring hope and excitement to another village.

But the circus plays each stand for a single day. The government of the United States is a show which functions 365 days in the year, and so I think we have a right to ask the press agent in the White House: "Where are those eighteen elephants, Mr. President?"

The Press Today

VII. What's Wrong with the World?*

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

MUCH is wrong with the New York World. Any practiced eye perceives it and the unpracticed also. The fact disquiets liberals everywhere, but especially those in New York because the World's editorial page has been the last remaining morning one in the metropolis that did not bow the knee to the god of things as they are, that felt that there is a better kind of America and a juster one to be achieved, that stood ardently for the rights and liberties of the individual. The solicitude that one hears on all sides is the best tribute to what the World has been and could be. Such criticisms as are uttered—and those to be found in this article—are born only of friendship and good-will, and the fear lest something happen to the one powerful New York morning daily which still in the main recognizes liberalism when it sees it.

Primarily it is, I suspect, the will of Joseph Pulitzer which is largely at fault. It has laid down conditions and made dispositions which on the one hand have harassed the managers and on the other have lulled them into a too easy security. The will specifies that the World cannot be sold, and otherwise has caused the World to suffer the evils which are certain to attend every endowed newspaper. Its increasing deficits—said to be over a million dollars annually—have been carried by the other members of the Pulitzer newspaper family, and it appears to have been only recently recognized that, will or no will, this situation cannot continue indefinitely. So there has been since the retirement of Ralph Pulitzer and the assumption of managerial direction by his younger brother, Herbert, a great effort to help the situation. This resulted about Christmas time, 1929, in the ruthless discharge of eighteen or more employees, some of long service and advanced years, and in radical cuts all along the line in each department. The result upon the morale of the staff has been precisely what could have been expected. Only a few of a staff of brilliant reporters remain; its ablest men are in Washington. In other words there was economy just at the time when, if in any way possible, a good deal more money should have been spent upon the paper.

The World lost its great opportunity when it did not deliberately pattern after the Times a few years ago. Had it done so under able managers it would not only have built itself up, it would also have challenged the community leadership of the Times. That this is no idle theory is proved by the success which the New York Herald Tribune, although handicapped by a conservative tradition and a heavy and conservative editorial page, has achieved by pursuing just this policy. Two factors have contributed to bring about the World's present position—and to prevent its seizing the opportunity which the Herald Tribune took—the inherited admonition of Joseph Pulitzer to hold its labor-class support and at the same time to maintain an able and liberal editorial page, and the latter-day belief that the World could not be a newspaper with all the news but must be one of selective news. The result of the first has been that the World has continued to indulge in a cheap-looking typographical make-up and news display, while maintaining an editorial page that appealed especially to the highbrows, the liberal-intellectuals, and the thoughtful lawyers and business men who for years followed the fine leadership of Frank I. Cobb.

As for the theory that the World was superior to the need of printing all the news and could become purely a "selective" journal—that called for journalism of the ablest type to justify itself. That ability has not been forthcoming. As the Times and Herald Tribune waxed steadily in the size of their issues, the World shrank by contrast until the very feel of the paper seemed to suggest that it was an incomplete product. And that it has been. It is not as if there were a deliberate attempt at condensation so as to cover completely a great field. The scarcity of white paper in the World office has, it is true, led to condensation of a type one would like to find in the seriously overwritten Times, which so often tells the same story four times in succession, beginning with the headlines. Unfortunately, however, the selection of the news has not even been second-rate; excellent news stories go to waste in the World office. Its admirable Washington staff, for instance, often wakes up in the morning to find its stories cut to pieces, or badly displayed, without any recognition of the news value of the telegraphed matter.

Thus, newspaper Washington is still smiling over the treatment accorded to a World beat in the World office. Its Washington bureau discovered that Senator Grundy, soon after taking his seat, had moved his tariff-lobbying staff into his office in the Senate office building. It led to an immediate explosion on the floor of the Senate. The Washington Post, which gets copies of the World's special dispatches, "played up" this dispatch on its front page. The World cut it down and buried it on an inside page. This is not an isolated example. One has only to contrast the news service of the St. Louis Pulitzer newspaper, the Post-Dispatch, with that of the World to see how much valuable matter is lost to the latter because of its selective process. The simple truth is that the men in the World office are not nearly so live or able newspapermen as they ought to be; there lies the chief weakness. Like most of the other metropolitan dailies the World does not really know what is going on. Under the elder Pulitzer it was often a terror to Tammany Hall. For many years it went out after, and got, big and original stories. One felt that it was really behind the scenes both in the City Hall and in Albany; one felt its ability to deal the sledge-hammer blows it gave; one knew that it was virile and powerful.

Curiously enough as it has grown less forceful and less newsy its news pages have become more and more respectable, thus appealing less and less to the great working class in which Mr. Pulitzer found his greatest support, especially in the time when no well-bred household would permit the "yellow" World—of those days—to pass its doors. The loss of prestige and of news value came largely after the death of Frank I. Cobb in 1923 and during the managing editorship of Herbert Bayard Swope. Here one must write very carefully, for Mr. Swope at his best was one of the most brilliant reporters and newsmen in the entire profession. For him as a journalist it was a pity that he reached the position that he did; there came days when he had other interests and other irons in the fire—and we cannot serve two masters in journalism any more than anywhere else. There came days of entangling alliances; of much absenteeism—often in successful search for good news; of the development of hostile cliques within the office. It is an old problem which confronts the newspaperman of today: shall he have intimate social contacts with those he might at some time have to pillory? Should he, in order "to be in the know," be the friend of the men with whom his newspaper may have to disagree?

* This is the seventh in a series of articles on the American press. The eighth, on the newspaper situation in Montana, will appear in our issue of July 9.—EDITOR THE NATION.

As for Ralph Pulitzer, who during these years was the titular head of the daily, it is impossible to think of him without recalling Heywood Broun's generous tribute to him in The Nation of February 26, 1930—a tribute all the more remarkable because Mr. Pulitzer had felt it necessary to dismiss Mr. Broun because of the latter's criticism of the World in its own columns and in The Nation. Mr. Broun wrote:

> Curiously enough, the task of continuing the Pulitzer tradition was intrusted to a man who had little in common with his father. The force, the drive, the vitality which animated Joseph Pulitzer were never in his eldest son Ralph. But at the outset I might as well pick my side in this duel between the living man and the dead hand. I was and am for Ralph Pulitzer. The paper's peak during his period of control constituted a higher journalistic achievement than it had ever known in his father's day. Though the younger Pulitzer lacked the founder's force he did bring to the job a far more sensitized intelligence. He brought the paper up out of the field of cheap sensationalism into which Joseph Pulitzer plunged it back in the days of the duel with Hearst. And so, though he may have plunged it at last into the red, he did remove it from the yellow.

No one who knows Mr. Pulitzer can fail to respect his personal standards, his kindly feelings toward his associates, his earnest desire to uphold his father's and the World's traditions. But sometimes it appears that sons in inheriting newspapers do not inherit enough; to succeed, they must also be endowed with journalistic ability. There have been others besides Mr. Pulitzer in New York who have inherited daily newspapers and failed to make good with them, as, for instance, the editor of a certain liberal weekly! To follow in the footsteps of Joseph Pulitzer, that restless, dynamic, dominating personality with its touch of genius, and to live up to his standard was to subject anybody to a dreadful test; was to demand the almost impossible. Yet a newspaper built up by a great and virile character, which put its hall-mark on everything it touched, needs a virile successor to carry it on.

Editorially Joseph Pulitzer had such a successor in considerable degree in Frank I. Cobb, one of the most beloved men in the profession of his day, who but for his untimely end would today still be making the editorial page of the World what Mr. Pulitzer wished it to be—a great leader in liberalism. Not that his judgment was beyond fallibility. I, for one, remembering the fight the World put up against the Spanish War, cannot believe that Joseph Pulitzer would have declared as did Mr. Cobb that there was nothing else for Woodrow Wilson to do but to go to war with Germany—especially if he had written as Mr. Cobb did on January 24, 1917, that when Mr. Wilson declared for a "peace without victory" he "uttered a profound historical truth." But Cobb had vision and ideals. He was the first daily editor to come out after the war against the public hysteria about reds and dissenters, in favor of the old American ideals which have never yet regained the position from which they were driven by the hysteria and the intolerance of war. More than that, he knew, and exercised to the full, the power of reiteration. Once he began on a crusade he could no more be driven from it than a bull-terrier can let go of the tennis ball between his jaws—as witness his extraordinary series of articles on the theft of the Panama Canal, those dealing with Theodore Roosevelt's shortcomings as President, and those treating the insurance scandals. He had, as Woodrow Wilson wrote of him, "a peculiar genius for giving direct and effective expression to the enlightened opinions which he held." His death was an irreparable loss to the World.

To its editorial page. Here again writing is not easy and not only because of a valued friendship. Walter Lippmann's abilities are beyond question. His reputation as a speaker and writer grows month by month; his books command a wider and wider public. The skill of his pen is beyond denial. Yet the fact remains that editorially the World is much weaker. There appears to be not only a lack of driving force, but often an inability to take a position and hold it through to its logical end. Too often it charges right up to the breastworks and then slowly retreats or even yields its arms and its entire position. Again, it sometimes abandons its historic principles. I am well aware of Heywood Broun's sentiment: "You cannot run today's newspaper by assuming what some dead man would have done if he still walked the earth." Surely a dead man's hand should not control; but if his fixed principles were the points of the compass by which he successfully steered his course, those fixed principles are as good forty years after his death as when he was alive. If there is to be a new chart and a new course that is another matter. But newspaper principles, like those of individuals, should be fixed. There will always be new problems and positions, new ways of approach, but the point of attack should remain the same.

So it was profoundly disconcerting to have the World haul down the flag of uncompromising opposition to all tariffs save for revenue only and to find it falling for the childish economics of Al Smith, who declared that if elected "it will be the prime aim and prime purpose of a Democratic administration to extend the benefit of tariff favors to all classes, and to spread prosperity generally throughout the United States," while at the same moment he promised to put an end to the tariffs sheltering "extortion and favoritism." Yet the World actually hailed this nonsense in these words:

> Governor Smith has offered something more than a mere tariff prescription. He offers a pledge of full and free economic opportunity to labor, industry, commerce, > and agriculture alike. . . . Governor Smith offers a plan for eliminating the existing evils and abuses while at the same time presenting wider opportunities for prosperity.

But the World is not content to take two positions; it can sometimes take three or four. To quote Broun again, "So constant were the shifts during the Sacco-Vanzetti case that the paper seemed like an old car going up a hill." Then there was the battle for the child-labor amendment to the Constitution. On June 4, 1924, the World declared that it (the amendment) should not have become necessary, "but it has become necessary because the United States Supreme Court, by a close decision in each case, has denied the right of Congress either to use its taxing power to this end or its power to regulate industry or commerce. . . . In form the amendment is as it should be . . . there should be little objection to ratification." On August 25 it was still true to the faith, declaring that "the regulation of child labor should be a State function, but the truth is the States have shown themselves incapable of handling it. The sudden growth of textile factories in the South has had too much influence on a number of State legislatures." On December 8 of the same year the second thought came. Again the World admits the magnitude of the evils, but, "after careful consideration, has come to the conclusion that it [the federal amendment] is not necessary and may be highly undesirable." It was kind enough to add that "in opposing the ratification . . . the World recognizes the educative effect . . . of the campaign for the amendment itself." On January 29, 1925, it recorded the death of the child-labor amendment and declared that the opponents of child labor should now "in our opinion concentrate on the States," quite forgetting that it had pronounced the States "themselves incapable of handling it." Time has at least shown the correctness of the latter opinion.

That year of 1924 was a thoroughly bad one for the World's editorial page. In April, very much worried about the possibility of John W. Davis becoming Democratic candidate for President, it called him "the ablest conservative lawyer in the party," and declared that if the party were not looking for a conservative it would not for an instant consider Mr. Davis's name. It felt that "Mr. Davis as President would have too many difficult problems of conscience to handicap him." By the end of July, Davis having been nominated, it was sneering about the intolerance of those who voiced its own April views, who, like the World in that month, condemned John W. Davis "before he has had a chance to open his mouth." This violent prejudging of Mr. Davis, it opined, "will injure him far less than it will injure the cause of liberalism." It had previously declared, after the nomination, that his was "as spontaneous a popular choice as any convention has ever made . . . his friends and followers can accept with enthusiasm the leadership of John W. Davis." By October it discovered that his admirable personal qualities "are combined with an experience in government, law, business, and diplomacy that has marked him for years as a man of Presidential size." As for Mr. La Follette, he was quite as bad as Ramsay MacDonald, the same Ramsay MacDonald that the World has been praising to the skies since he became Prime Minister and offered to move for disarmament in consultation with Mr. Hoover. In 1924 MacDonald was a "disaster both for Labor and for the Liberals, plus a triumph for the Conservatives. . . . Mr. MacDonald has burnt down the progressive house to roast the Liberal pig." Of course La Follette in his campaign exhibited in the eyes of the World "every folly and weakness which conservatism could desire, the same ambition [as MacDonald's] to rule or ruin, the same far-fetched, ill-informed theorizing, the same top-lofty self-satisfaction, the same inevitable but unconscious assistance to reaction."

Whoop-la! Four years later the World was even more enthusiastic about Al Smith. It discovered that his homely speech reminded it of Gladstone, Balfour, and Asquith, for it had "some qualities of this parliamentary oratory." When the last New York mayoralty campaign came on the World was at least consistent, though entirely confused. Thus, it would not support Norman Thomas though it had "no hesitation in saying that he expresses the only intelligent opposition to Tammany. . . ." Independent voters might support him, it said, with a good conscience. Indeed, it rather urged them to vote for Thomas, and it hoped that his vote would be large enough "to show that the State is lost to the Democracy if the Democracy does not hasten to win back the independents"—as if there were the slightest possibility of Tammany being affected by any such argument. Any independent who voted for Walker or La Guardia would, the World said, "waste his vote." But for itself it would, like the Times, "take no definite stand"! Finally, it said that if the contest were a real one with a chance of La Guardia's winning, the World would at once urge the election of Walker as the lesser of the two evils. It is all very well to talk about the dead hand; that rests very lightly on the World of today when such stuff can appear on its editorial page. Certainly if Joseph Pulitzer is aware of it in another sphere it must cause him the sharpest pain.

And so on and so forth. All through the contest against American imperialism, against which the old World stood foursquare, this same twisting and turning is to be found. As to Nicaragua it has blown hot and cold, and it took no lead in the fight to free Haiti of government by, for, and with our marines. It even supported the fifteen-cruiser bill on the naive theory that if an international agreement is to be made "the United States must enter the conference with enough ships laid down, appropriated for, and authorized to convince the naval authorities abroad that limitation is necessary and desirable . . . the conclusion is . . . inescapable that the influence that the United States can hope to exert . . . is very largely dependent upon its strength as a naval Power." The London conference has given the full answer to this policy of bluffing your adversary while publishing abroad the fact that you are out for bluffing, with the result that we are faced with the possibility of adding a billion dollars worth of additional ships to our armaments. The long series of articles in which Mr. Lippmann belabored the conference during its sessions illustrates clearly the difficulties under which the World's editorial page labors. They were extraordinarily learned, very well written, but so clever as to be Machiavellian in their finesse. One feels that there is something metaphysical about it all; that here is a special pleader weaving his web with singular skill, but enticing nobody. One longs for the straightforward slashing of Cobb, his clear-cut analyses, and his going to the heart of the thing, to the principles involved; one longs for less dialectics and more straight thrusting from the shoulder. Finally, it is a commentary upon where the World's policy leads that in playing into the admirals' hands by supporting the cruiser bill it helped to make them so arrogant and pestiferous that the World has finally come to an almost hysterical demand that President Hoover should make them shut up and stand aside. There are so few newspaper editorial pages left in America which retain the critical faculty that it is really a great misfortune when one which has so long exercised admirably the critic's role, which can examine and analyze and dissect a politician's speech or argument with genuine intelligence and with very considerable background, should fail in the quality of its criticizing. Most of the editorial pages of today are written by yes-men who always approve whatever the man in authority says. The World has, fortunately, never come to this.

Only one other point. When Charles E. Hughes was nominated it jumped into the breach by saying that his appointment "has been received with universal approval . . . he is ideally suited to the office." But the liberals whom the World ought to lead looked at the situation differently. Had there been one week longer in which to fight, Mr. Hughes would have been defeated. As it was, he had a close call, instead of "universal approval." Call it what one will, this sort of thing is neither liberalism nor leadership. And so the simple fact is that in a growing city the circulation of the morning World was 51,000 less on April 1, 1930, than on October 1, 1924, and the Sunday circulation 17,000 less for the same period; the advertising lineage has dropped in greater proportion.

The remedy? It is easily stated. The question was once put to me by one high in the Pulitzer organization. My answer was: Make the World as admirable a paper as the St. Louis Pulitzer daily, the Post-Dispatch. What Joseph Pulitzer, Jr., has done there can be repeated in New York. It requires similarly able managers and a fixed editorial course, steadily steered in unequivocal fashion, with no twistings in the wake. I have listened to many arguments as to whether the Baltimore Sun or the Post-Dispatch is the finest liberal daily in America. There is no need to decide the question. The point is that the New York World is not regarded as being in their class and there is no earthly reason why it should not be. It has a greater field, a greater opportunity, as fine a tradition, and heaven knows that American journalism never needed the leadership the World used to give as much as it needs it today. Until the World renews that leadership, liberal causes in America will suffer and the keen anxiety felt by its friends will not die down.

Japan and the Naval Pact

By K. K. KAWAKAMI

TESTIFYING on the London naval treaty before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations the other day, Secretary Stimson gallantly said: "I take off my hat to the Japanese government in this treaty." He had in mind the great courage that was required of the Cabinet at Tokio in accepting the London agreement in the teeth of the solid opposition of the navy. There is no doubt that the treaty, so far as it affected Japan, was made possible largely by ignoring the theories and contentions advanced by her naval experts. There is reason to believe that ex-Premier Wakatsuki, head of the Japanese delegation, approved the celebrated Reed-Matsudaira understanding without consulting his naval advisers. Evidently he and Matsudaira acted upon the theory that America would be faithful to the Kellogg pact, and that Japan's acceptance of a naval arrangement satisfactory to the United States would contribute toward the improvement of the Pacific situation. They hoped, perhaps, that the good feeling thus created might even help solve the vexed problem born of the American immigration act of 1924. With such beliefs and such hopes the civilian members of the Japanese delegation cast the die, and virtually confronted their naval colleagues with a fait accompli.

To appreciate the real significance of this bold step taken by Wakatsuki and Matsudaira we must note the prerogative long enjoyed by the army and the navy in Japan's political organization. In our government the Minister of the Army has always been a general and the Minister of the Navy an admiral, both in active service. Technically, neither is responsible to the Prime Minister or the Cabinet, much less to the Diet, in so far as they deal with matters of national defense, but both are responsible directly to the throne. Neither the army nor the navy, accordingly, is under the direct control of the Cabinet except that appropriations for national defense must be initiated by the Cabinet and approved by the Diet. They are controlled, respectively, by the army and the navy ministers and by the chiefs of the General Staff and of the General Board. Theoretically, the two ministers are not required to resign with the Cabinet, though as a matter of fact they are obliged to follow the example of their civilian colleagues in a cabinet crisis.

At the time-honored tradition of military control of defense the present Hamaguchi Cabinet and its civilian representatives at London have dealt a blow by accepting an agreement strenuously objected to by the navy. Replying to an interpellation from the Opposition in the House of Representatives, Premier Hamaguchi virtually declared that the Cabinet, and not the army and the navy ministers alone, nor the chiefs of the army and navy general staffs, was responsible for national defense. Plainly, the declaration was a challenge to the prerogative long enjoyed by the army and the navy. It may even prove a step toward the appointment of civilians to the portfolios of the army and the navy —a revolutionary change in Japan's political organization.

Japan's thesis at London was a peculiar mixture of liberal and reactionary ideas. It was liberal in so far as it advocated reduction and not mere limitation. It was reactionary in that it claimed for Japan 70 per cent of the auxiliary-craft tonnage allocated to the biggest navy in the Pacific. Had she concentrated upon the first point, and called upon the Powers to prove their fidelity to the Kellogg pact by substantial reduction in their respective tonnages, her voice would have rung through the world and she would have become the recognized champion of the disarmament movement. But her demand for 70 per cent, however justifiable from the naval standpoint, vitiated her admirable advocacy of reduction and compromised her otherwise enviable moral position.

In the early stages of the discussion Japan felt that the cruiser tonnage tentatively allocated to Great Britain and the United States was too great, and that it should be scaled down in conformity to the professed aim of reduction. But of course she was powerless to secure any change in the figures agreed on. The only point which she thought still open to discussion was the ratio of 60 per cent allocated to her, quite arbitrarily, as she saw it, by Anglo-American understanding.

The result was the provisions developing from the now celebrated Reed-Matsudaira conversations. What are those provisions, which created such a furor and turmoil in Japan? First, they allow Japan 60 per cent of American tonnage in eight-inch-gun cruisers, whereas she considers 70 per cent her irreducible minimum compatible with safety. Secondly, they give Japan 70 per cent in six-inch-gun cruisers and destroyers, whereas she would have taken 60 per cent in these categories. Thirdly, in submarines they give her 52,700 tons on a basis of parity with the United States and Great Britain, while she thinks something between 70,000 and 80,000 tons her minimum requirement, irrespective of what America may choose to build. She is still convinced that sixty or seventy submarines are absolutely needed to defend her long chain of numerous islands.

Secretary Stimson has told the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations that "our problem was to ask Japan to stand still for six years and let us build past her." That is quite true, but it is not so much the "standing still" which irritates Japan as the ratio which her navy thinks has been arbitrarily fixed for her. Rear Admiral Mark L. Bristol, chairman of the Navy General Board, testifying before the same committee, insisted that Japan's ratio should not be higher than 60 per cent of American force, and said: "If any differences should arise which might result in war or threatened war between the United States and Japan, we would necessarily have to carry the campaign into Japanese waters."

When Senator Reed reminded the admiral that even with the higher ratio Japan could not invade America, the admiral agreed with him, but added: "But we should lose the war." I am afraid the chairman of the General Board has let the cat out of the bag. He has implicitly admitted and confirmed the Japanese suspicion that America's naval policy in the Pacific is offensive, that its objective is to invade Japanese waters in time of war, that the American navy can conquer Japan if Japan's ratio is held down, as he thinks it should be, to 60 per cent of American force. No doubt our Japanese navalists will hail him as an unexpected champion for their consistent demand for 70 per cent!

It has long been plain, and the Senate hearings have made it plainer, that America's naval aim in the Pacific is twofold: first, to defend the Philippines, and second, to protect American interests in China, which interests are usually called by the less mundane name of the "open door." This raises the question whether force should be considered the only or a justifiable means of attaining these aims, especially after America made so much of the Kellogg pact.

Now, if the United States is apprehensive of Japan's possible aggression against the Philippines, Japan is no less afraid that the United States will use the Philippines as a base of aggressive operations against her. Let Japan pledge itself not to attack the Philippines, and the United States pledge itself not to use the islands as a base of operations against Japan in case of war, and the naval problem in the Pacific can be made much easier of solution. Japan need not insist upon 70 per cent of American force, nor does America need to be afraid of the Japanese navy as long as it is too small to carry war into American waters.

But there remains the more knotty problem of the open door, or American rights and interests in the Orient, especially in China. It is, perhaps, in this connection that America wants to keep the Philippines rather than for what the islands may in themselves be worth to her. Asked by Senator Black whether Philippine independence, if granted, would lessen American naval responsibilities, Admiral Bristol replied that in any event the United States must have a naval base there. Why? Because America must stand guard over the open door. Admiral Jones, also before the Senate committee, frankly said so.

American ambition to establish and maintain a naval base in the Far East is an old story. Even Admiral Perry, to whom Japan is sincerely grateful, recommended the seizure of a Japanese island as a base for the American fleet. Again, thirty-odd years ago the American navy tried to secure a base on the coast of Fukien Province, China. The scheme, abandoned because of Japanese objection, was revived in 1912 in another form, though this, too, failed to materialize.

The American naval doctrine of the open door is well expressed by one of its exponents, Captain Melvin F. Talbot, in this language:

> Distant battle fleets still mount guard over the trade of the Orient, lest one national appropriate to itself the sole right to buy cheap, sell dear, and lend at high interest in the unsettled markets of the Far East. The policy of the open door rests today on a solemn treaty backed by the fleets at target practice off Chatham and San Pedro.

Strange that it does not occur to the American navalists that other Powers are just as much interested in the open door in the Caribbean or in Central America as the United States is in the open door in the Orient. Suppose we paraphrase the preceding quotation somewhat as follows:

> Distant battle fleets are today powerless to enforce the open door principle in the Caribbean Sea and in Central America, for one nation has long since established hegemony over those regions, and has appropriated to itself the sole right to buy cheap, sell dear, and lend at high interest in a closed market. The closed door under the aegis of the Monroe Doctrine can be opened only when the Powers combine forces in the interest of international fair play.

Surely, such a variation of Captain Talbot's sentences is not entirely impertinent. Yet the sentiment expressed therein is decidedly anachronistic. In these days, when the outlawry of war has come to occupy an important place in international thought, no one but ultra-navalists and ultra-militarists believes the arbitrament of force to be a justifiable means of maintaining one nation's economic interests in another's jurisdiction against such monopolistic policy as may be concocted by a third nation in the same jurisdiction. The only means that conforms to the best spirit of the age would be consultation, conciliation, or arbitration such as is envisaged by the Pact of Paris. In any event no single nation has a right to set itself up as the world's sole judge of what constitutes the open door—as the world's only custodian of international justice.

The testimony before the Senate committee is bewildering, discouraging, disquieting. No one listening to these voices can help wondering whether America was sincere in initiating the Kellogg pact or was only jesting when she declared so solemnly that the same pact should be made the starting-point in the deliberations of the London conference. Washington, which six months ago cooed the song of peace, is now singing the hymn of war couched in the naval jargon of tonnage, and gun caliber, and cruising radius, and naval bases, and what not. And the world is at a loss to know which of the two Washingtons represents real America.

American Sports and American Life

By JOHN R. TUNIS

EVERYONE who gets behind the scenes of American sporting life must be struck with the fact that there is amazingly little real sport left in the United States today. Over-organization has throttled the real spirit of sport, the feeling of the game for the game's sake. It has substituted in place of this spirit not merely a desire for victory, but an alarming insistence on winning. Laugh if you will at the misguided idealism which sent our fathers out to die for dear old Yale; at least it was idealism. There is precious little idealism of any sort at present when a squad is asked to go out and die for a $15,000-a-year head coach.

The American attitude toward athletics is simply a part of the general attitude toward life in this country, the belief that civilization consists chiefly in bigger and better Buicks. Who is a success in the United States? The scientist working alone on a cure for some disease that has baffled the research of centuries? The unknown school teacher who struggles toward death on an insufficient salary, without praise, without thanks, without reward, performing year in year out one of the most important tasks in the nation? The country doctor, underpaid, frequently not paid at all, working twenty hours a day? No, the real success in this country is the president of the soap factory, or the man who makes a half-million in half an hour on the stock market. When we wish to know about a man we do not inquire about his character, his intellectual or artistic integrity; we ask what kind of car he drives. "He is a ten-thousand-a-year man."

Notice how this attitude is exactly paralleled in our sport. Decent and sincere sportsmen, of whom there are many thousands in the ranks of the sporting throng, pass unobserved. The unfortunate scrub who takes his punishment each afternoon for the sake of the varsity without benefit of trainers, doctors, rubbers, masseurs, dietitians, and the other indispensables of the star player; the pacemaker for the champion half-miler; the number 4 on the third freshman crew—no one knows or cares about them. Here the success element enters into our sports. What young American cannot name you the two all-American ends, or has not by heart the names and prodigies of our golf and tennis champions? Never mind if the two all-American ends should happen to be known by players the country over as the two dirtiest men in the game, never mind if the champion should be celebrated among his acquaintances as a point pincher without a peer. After all, are they not champions?

To descend from the general to the particular, who got the praise from the mob—Knute Rockne, the Notre Dame coach who turned out a championship eleven that played before a half-million people, made a half-million dollars and a joke of an institution of learning, or Arthur Sampson of Tufts, an unknown coach of a small college in New England, who actually made his men love football and taught them even to enjoy daily practice? Who received the applause and the congratulations—Frank Hunter who, pushed aside at the last minute in an important Davis Cup match by the orders of an ignorant noncombatant superior, refused to sulk but stayed with the team, practicing and encouraging them up to the final minute, or Henri Cochet, the amateur tennis player with sporting-goods stores in Lyons and Paris, who defeated all opponents and became the champion of 1929?

Sitting on the sidelines at a big athletic contest recently, I expressed a timid surprise to the veteran sports reporter beside me at the attitude of the numerous officials. They were as merciless and rude as subway guards at the rush hour; they bellowed and delivered their pronunciamentos with the manners—and the voices—of traffic cops. At my surprised ejaculation when one of these gentry in the white golf pants which are apparently the insignia of the profession was more than necessarily brutal, I was told by my companion: "Aw . . . they hafta be hard-boiled or the game'd get away from 'em." The same excuse the traffic cop gives when he draws the car up to the curb and proceeds to insult the victims to the extent of the traffic-cop vocabulary.

But the closest analogy between American life and American sport is perhaps to be found in our prohibition law. Here is a law which no one obeys or makes any pretense of obeying, a law which was voted for but which everyone openly flouts. Yet the American public, as it tolerates prohibition and its attendant abuses, tolerates our ridiculous system of amateurism with exactly the same faults. The hypocrisy is as apparent in the one case as the other.

Thus with prohibition we have federal authorities often cognizant of bootlegging trips, policemen on duty enjoying their liquor with the rest of the citizenry, wet goods smuggled in at every turn and on every frontier, and all the other amazing paradoxes of this law. So, too, in sport, you have an amateur law voted for by the constituted majority and upheld by no one. The governors of the various sports know perfectly well that the athletes are taking money on the side; the recent Carnegie report showed many of the football players in the colleges to be as plainly bought and paid for as the players on the New York Giants. And as you have liquor smuggled into the country you have athletes smuggled into the colleges and paid to stay there. All this the heads of the colleges know; but they subscribe to the subterfuges by which the athletes are rewarded because—well, because it is good publicity for Dear Old Blank to have a winning team. The officials of the various sporting associations may be said to correspond to the policemen; they know that the athletes under their aegis are breaking the amateur law in a dozen ways every day; but they do nothing, for if the champion is disqualified there will be no crowd to watch the championships, and if there is no crowd there will be no gate.

Of course, a few hundred courageous sporting writers could do something toward influencing public opinion; but they seldom say anything, for like the politician who votes dry and makes money out of being wet, they too can draw a profit from the established order. "Huh, call that kid an amateur!" "Football . . . a great, commercialized spectacle." These are the remarks you hear the sports writer make but do not often see in print. The current belief that all is for the best in American life has him choked intellectually. "Don't Sell America Short." So they don't sell America short—not, as is commonly supposed, because they are afraid for their jobs, but because anyone who is not a booster in stocks and sports today is looked on with intense suspicion. "Be constructive," says some jackass, which rendered into the vernacular means "Be flattering." And they are.

The sports and athletics that we get, then, are not only the sports we deserve, they are the sports that a materialistic civilization would naturally bring in its train. You may not like the American idea of sports; but it suits the moving-picture masses, the Army–Notre Dame game thousands, to a T. After all, one shouldn't be pessimistic about these things. In a few hundred years some changes in our civilization and in our athletics are more than likely. And besides, didn't we break all possible track and field records, and records in every sport, during 1929? Didn't we get crowds of 110,000 out to see the big games? Didn't we sell more golf balls and polo sticks than any other nation last year? Something wrong with American sport? Come, come, don't be sacrilegious.

Atlanta's Communists

By WALTER WILSON

Atlanta, June 10

SIX young Communists are held incomunicado without bail in Atlanta for trial, June 19, on charges carrying the death penalty. Their crime was to hold an unemployment meeting of white and black workers and later a protest meeting against the Sherman (Texas) lynchings. They are held under an archaic law originally aimed at slave uprisings.

In 1833 an act was passed by the Georgia legislature to guard against possible insurrection of slaves and "free persons of color." At the end of the Civil War agitators in the Southern States began raising the question of Negro rights. Friends of the Negro, many of them ex-slaves who had traveled the "underground railroad," came South intent upon turning the proclaimed emancipation of the slaves into fact and upon making the Negro fully cognizant of his new prerogatives. In North Carolina a Negro minister from Connecticut, together with a native Carolinian, organized an Equal Rights League and started a newspaper at Raleigh. Georgia also was invaded by the agitators, and the ex-slaves were singing: "We ain't agwine ter hoe the white fo'ks co'n no mo." The whites were alarmed. Stories of rape, arson, murder, and insurrection circulated in the press. A constitutional convention, meeting in 1865 at Milledgeville, Georgia, then the State capital, authorized the appointment of a commission to draw up tentative regulations establishing the relations of freedmen to the rest of society. In 1866 the legislature enacted the Freedmen's (Black) Code, denying suffrage to freedmen and applying to them the insurrection laws of 1833, and also punishing agitators, both white and black, who attempted to enlighten the freedmen concerning their constitutional rights.

Only one case ever came into court under the insurrection acts of 1866. In 1868 "John T. Gibson, a 'free person of color,' a preacher, was charged with an attempt to incite an insurrection by encouraging his congregation to attempt to rescue one Charles Fryer from jail." He was convicted without jury recommendation for mercy, and was therefore held liable to the death penalty. The Georgia Supreme Court, however, reversed the lower court on the ground that no penalty was provided for mere attempt to "incite." The legislature of 1871-72 accordingly passed an act prescribing the death penalty for even "inciting to" insurrection. This is the law under which the Communist organizers are on trial for their lives.

The history of the cases in brief is as follows. A meeting of the unemployed was scheduled for Atlanta on March 6 as part of an international unemployed demonstration. Negroes and whites were invited. Because of stormy weather locally, the gathering was postponed until March 9. When the meeting started, police under Captain Fain raided the hall and asked for the "boss." Joseph Carr, eighteen, of Wheeling, West Virginia, and W. M. Powers, twenty-four, of St. Paul, Minnesota, the father of two small children, were arrested and carried to police headquarters, being abused and threatened on the way. Both are Communist Party organizers. Robert H. Hart, a young Emory University student who was presiding at the meeting, asked the audience to wait, stating that their two fellow-workers would return soon. A man who was thought to be a detective threw a tear-gas bomb into the hall in order to break up the meeting.

Meanwhile, the Chief of Police, after talking to Powers and Carr, released them, as he could find nothing to hold them on. They went back to the meeting, but by this time the audience had been driven out of the hall and had congregated near the doorway. The two organizers said: "We have been released and can hold our meeting. Come on in." At this point they were rearrested and held on police evidence for disorderly conduct and throwing a tear-gas bomb. Cash bail of $100 each was furnished by Mr. Oliver C. Hancock, attorney for the International Labor Defense.

On March 10 Carr and Powers were tried in the Recorder's Court before Judge Calloway on the original charge and also one of "spieling" (based on a city ordinance forbidding merchants to call customers from the streets into shops). The charges were all dismissed, but the accused were now held on $1,500 each to the Fulton County Grand Jury on the present charge of "attempting to incite insurrection and circulating insurrectionary literature." It was the fertile brain of Assistant Solicitor General John H. Hudson, of Fulton County, which conceived the idea of trying the Communists under the ancient statute. According to a United Press interview of May 31, he "will demand the death penalty for every Communist who comes into the State and publicly preaches their doctrines." Indictments were returned and a date for trial was set, but when Carr and Powers appeared for trial the prosecution announced: "Not ready." The sheriff was ordered to hold the accused without bail because of the possible capital sentence involved. They have been confined in the Fulton County Tower ever since.

On May 21 a local protest meeting against the Sherman (Texas) lynching was called by the American Negro Labor Congress, with Gilmer Brady of New York as the principal speaker. About fifty persons, mostly colored, attended the meeting. Just as Brady began speaking, the meeting was broken up by the police. Six persons were arrested on charges similar to those against Carr and Powers. They included two white girls—Ann Burlak, eighteen, International Labor Defense organizer, from Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, and Mary Dalton, twenty, of New York, organizer for the National Textile Workers' Union; two Negroes—Gilmer Brady, twenty-five, of New York, organizer for the American Negro Labor Congress, and Henry Story, twenty-three, an Atlanta printer; and Julius Klarin and his wife, local whites. On the intercession of a local politician the Klarins were released, though they are still actively carrying on work along the same lines. The grand jury, on May 30, returned indictments against Story, Brady, Miss Burlak, and Miss Dalton, and the trial was set for June 19. At present Joe Carr is in the death cell, while Powers, Brady, Story, Miss Dalton, and Miss Burlak are being held incomunicado—all without bail. The International Labor Defense, whose local attorney is Mr. O. C. Hancock, is in charge of the defense. The American Civil Liberties Union has retained Mr. W. A. McClellan, of Macon, Georgia, to assist. Both attorneys think the situation critical in the extreme because of the issues of religion, race, and "outside meddling" that are almost sure to be introduced into the case. It is to be feared that there will be many difficulties in the way of securing a fair trial.

In the indictment the prisoners are charged with circulating a long list of "insurrectionary" literature which was found either on their persons or in their office, or had been advertised by them. The list includes the "Communist Manifesto," Lenin's "The State and Revolution," and many other books, papers, and pamphlets. Both the "Manifesto" and "The State and Revolution" are in the circulating room of the Atlanta (Carnegie) Public Library, and the "Manifesto" constitutes required reading in a class in social reform in Emory University, located just outside Atlanta in De Kalb County. When this latter fact was called to the attention of Prosecutor Hudson, he intimated that some ground for legal action could probably be whipped into shape against the Emory professor by an alert public attorney.

Meanwhile stories of "communal women, 'nigger' equality, atheism, outside meddlers," and the like are being circulated in Atlanta to inflame the common mind against these six young enthusiasts for promulgating their strange new religion, which includes equality for Negroes and organization for the textile workers of Atlanta. According to Miss Mary Barker, of Atlanta, president of the American Federation of Teachers, Jerome Jones, editor of the Atlanta Labor Journal, Carl Karston, secretary of the Atlanta Federation of Trades, and others, the cases are plainly persecutions. "The National Textile Workers' Union was organizing the employees of the Fulton Bag and Cotton Mills here," these laborites say, "and the textile interests became frightened. The same tactics will be used against the American Federation of Labor as sure as we continue in our apathy." The young woman secretary of the local branch of the International Labor Defense has been warned to cease her activities or leave town. Gilmer Brady reports that he has been threatened by police and others that they will get him either way—electric chair if convicted, mob if released.

In connection with these charges, the facts of the arrests deserve attention. In one instance the Communists were arrested before anybody had made a speech. No literature was distributed and there was no incitement to insurrection. In the other, one speech was being made denouncing unemployment. "Atlanta police," says the Macon Telegraph (founded in 1826), "could hear the same speech any day in the Senate from the Democratic side. It is no incitement to insurrection."

The Telegraph goes on:

> It strikes us that despite the ancient statute the Communists have some rights on their side; they have the rights of free, lawful, orderly assemblage. There is no evidence so far that the meeting was unlawful or disorderly, except as the police made it so. As long as they do not violate such sedition laws as we have, they have a right to speak even to urging membership in the Communist Party.

No matter what the purpose of the statutes of insurrection that still grace the statute books of some Southern States, no matter who is back of the present prosecutions of the Atlanta cases, there is little doubt as to the future role of the laws if the State is successful in using them in the present cases. In 1919 Marvin L. Rich, Charlotte organizer for the United Textile Workers' Union (an American Federation of Labor organization), was indicted under an old North Carolina law of 1868. Soon after the Marion killings last summer, Alfred Hoffman, organizer, and Lawrence Hogan, striker, were indicted under the same act of 1868 for "attempting to overthrow the government of North Carolina." In Atlanta, Georgia, six young Communists held orderly meetings and organized textile workers. For this crime they are being held in rigid imprisonment and threatened with death under an obsolete law of 1866. To what other fields can these old laws be applied? Small wonder that ex-Senator Hardwick, of Georgia, calls them "dangerous."

In the Driftway

THE Drifter's plea for good bread has not fallen on deaf ears. From Massachusetts one who signs himself, simply but eloquently, A Brother Sufferer, writes as follows:

> You're right about this bakers' "sandwich loaf." The only serious objection I have to your objections is that they are not half virulent and vitriolic enough. When I am served at home with the abominable powdery chaff, I insist on designating it as "dog bread"—albeit I apologize to all dogdom therefor. I'm told that a chap in a small town called Vineyard Haven, in Massachusetts, was given some loaves of it by a grocer friend to feed to his forty-odd pullets. Actually, they all died. In the old town of Edgartown, Massachusetts, those natives whose wives are too lazy to cook are a little better off, for there are so many local, private-home bakeries that the regular bakeshops are obliged, their proprietors ruefully complain, to eschew the ordinary bakers' recipes.
> Your article deserves the highest commendation by all those whose epicurean instincts have not quite died. It is splendid to see the signs of revolt appearing among the intelligentsia.

"Do not be mystified, though," continues A Brother Sufferer, "as to why the American public puts up with the most accursed stuff. It is due to the so-called emancipation of women." Well, perhaps it is, but the Drifter fails to see in that recrimination any practical suggestion toward the improvement of our bread. The emancipation of women and the machine age look pretty permanent at this writing. We shall have to achieve good bread in spite of them.

* * * * *

MEANWHILE those who suffer from the lack of good bread will continue to solve the problem by devious ways that lead to Little Italy or to some "little white shop" like that described in a letter from another sympathizer and another New Englander:

> Let me say [says Mrs. Florence L. C. Kitchelt of New Haven] that in our family our bread is better than our automobile! Our loaf is as large as a cartwheel and provides excellent motor power—for walking. Nor do we, being busy people, make it ourselves. We buy it at a bakery. It is so heavy that we carry it home on a trolley. It has that highly prized sponginess and chewiness of the grains of the field. It is no processed lily, but a rich brown substance. The people in the trolley-car sniff the air, and look our way.
> But this bread is not for the heedless. Only an exploring drifter may hope to find it. Occasionally its imitation is found in shops on Main Street, but beware! It is as different from the genuine as the cowbird's egg in the bluebird's box on our oak tree.
> How is it to be acquired? A secret to be disclosed. Pass by the windows of fashion and the big hotel. Trail down the back and unadorned byways where the immigrant Jews live in old houses cheek by jowl with barnlike factories. Amidst the clutter of papers, persons, and pickles shines a little white shop, its windows heaped with every size and shape of breadstuffs, its rear door opening into a room of great ovens. "A five-pound loaf of pumpernickel, please." You will receive a hot and fragrant mound, made of whole wheat and whole rye, its center slices twelve inches long, half as wide, and as thick as you please. A shining brown, seeded, snappy crust serves as an envelope, the whole both grainy and brainy.
> The origin of pumpernickel is simple. One lowly Nicholas, a dolt, fell down with a thump, or "pump" as the Teutons have it. So, in the humor of Westphalia, rye bread in all its heftiness was christened after Nicholas. But the Jews have bred a better namesake. It is so good that many a Gentile has adopted it, and the Dean of our Episcopal Divinity School carries home almost daily, for his wife, his children, and his students, that forty-cent mound with a five-pound look.

A Quaker Memorial

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Chicago, in a competition of 113 architects, recently awarded a prize of $20,000 for the design of a vast war memorial for the shores of Lake Michigan. Harvard, in the Bulletin, published for her forward-looking alumni, announces the growth of the fund for the Harvard war memorial. Meanwhile little bronze soldiers carrying little bronze guns guard the Town Hall greens of forty-eight States of the Union, to warn us of America's hourly peril from invasion. In America there is not one completed memorial to commemorate the practical work of peacemakers, or to visualize the spirit of conciliation that stirs in the world today.

The Quakers for a hundred years have been the American pioneers in interpreting the ideal of peace in terms of active good-will, yet no pioneers' monument has been raised to their conquests. The American Society of Friends has a membership of a little more than 100,000 persons. This organization, equivalent in numbers to a small American town, sent 600 volunteers to France in 1917. Its work in village reconstruction, evacuating refugees under heavy shell fire, removing insane to safety, feeding, nursing, buying from our government materials from army dumps to convert into houses, creating and giving to the Department of the Marne the Maternity Hospital of Châlons—all this in a way paralleled the work of the other relief agencies that had begun to make France the center of sympathetic reconstruction. The Friends then turned to Germany, which was under the blackest cloud of hostile suspicion. There they found a terrible food shortage. Jane Addams, Dr. Hamilton, and the Quakers' medical emissary, Dr. Haven Emerson, reported back to the Quakers at home that a large proportion of the child population of Germany was becoming crippled, dwarfed, and tubercular from the diseases of malnutrition. In 1919-20 almost a thousand Friends had rallied to a German child-feeding campaign. The Quakers gathered to themselves and trained a vastly larger force of other volunteer workers to struggle against the rapid advance of starvation.

It was ten years ago, in the summer of 1920, that one million German children were fed each day at the Friends' soup kitchens. When zeal for relief work had faded out everywhere else the Quaker volunteers stayed on, pumping life and blood into the famished bodies of German children and expectant mothers. For six years the spirit that lifted them through these years of grinding labor, combined with great administrative ability, made it possible for this whole child-feeding campaign to be accomplished with the expenditure of only $7,750,000 in money and food supplies. But it was the swiftness and fearlessness of the Friends' decision to go at once to Germany in her defeat and humiliation that had a value no one has computed.

President Ebert, thanking the Society of Friends in 1925 in a public address, said:

> Not only have many, many German children been saved from hunger and long illness through . . . material aid, but still greater than this is the moral value of the work. We will never forget that America, against all opposition, reached out to our children the hand of friendliness in the time of greatest need.

A German teacher wrote:

> It will not be easy for you to realize what all this means to us. For years we were cut off from everything; for years . . . nothing . . . but hatred. Now, suddenly, you come to us and show us that behind the world of political strife the real world still exists, the world of brotherhood and love.

Remembering these things, six years ago several Americans—not Quakers—a German artist, a Swiss wood-carver, a Russian metal-worker, began to build a memorial to keep the Quakers' long fight a living memory. An American architect, builder of many libraries, gave his conception of a design for the Altar of Good-Will; the half-fed European carvers gave more work than their commissions required; Samuel Yellin beat out on his anvil symbols of good-will for the Friends. With sweat and rejoicing the building fund grew, dollar by dollar. A Negro poet gave five dollars; the Christus of Oberammergau, from his gaunt old purse, sent more. It was possible to order our bas-relief carvings a little faster from Bavaria. Through lean years and years a little less lean $10,000 was gradually gathered in money and gifts of labor. Now all the original carvings and the metal work for the memorial are finished.

We are almost at the tenth anniversary of the feeding of the children of Germany, when a million cups were held up each day for soup from the Quakers' caldrons. To complete the memorial $7,500 is still lacking. Curiously, this amount is almost exactly one one-thousandth part of what the Quakers spent, in money, upon their child-feeding campaign.

Justice Holmes Dissents

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The rebellion of the Senate in the recent debates on the confirmation of the Hughes and Parker appointments has just been met by a similar outbreak within the domains of the Supreme Court itself. None other than our beloved Mr. Justice Holmes has expressed himself on the court's deification of the Fourteenth Amendment in terms that for bluntness and frankness have no counterpart in the history of American constitutional law.

The occasion for this unprecedented and important declaration was the case of Baldwin v. Missouri, in which the prevailing opinion of Mr. Justice McReynolds held that the State of Missouri did not have the power, that it was a violation of the "due-process clause," to impose an inheritance tax on a bank account or a negotiable bond or note within the State owned by a non-resident decedent. Justices Holmes, Brandeis, and Stone (would the name of Roberts be found here?) dissented, Mr. Justice Holmes speaking for the dissent in the following scathing language:

> I have not yet adequately expressed the more than anxiety that I feel at the ever-increasing scope given to the Fourteenth Amendment in cutting down what I believe to be the constitutional rights of the States. As the decisions now stand I see hardly any limit but the sky to the invalidating of those rights if they happen to strike a majority of the court as for any reason undesirable. I cannot believe that the amendment was intended to give us carte blanche to embody our economic or moral beliefs in its prohibitions. . . . Of course the words "due process of law" if taken in their literal meaning have no application to this case. . . . We . . . should be slow to construe the clause . . . as committing to the court, with no guide but the court's own discretion, the validity of whatever laws the States may pass.

Is this not refreshing? Such straightforwardness could only come from a man like Holmes. This scintillating opinion will be the polestar for countless opinions to come—and unless the Parker rejection is truly the sign of a new era they will all be dissenting opinions.

"Forceful English"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation some weeks ago Heywood Broun undertook to belittle the Communists by saying they had "only two writers of forceful English in America."

On important counts this is unworthy of Heywood Broun and violates the liberal tradition under which he proceeds. I could imagine that the poverty of the "commies" in the respect indicated is explained by an insufficient budget. No one knows better than you that expert writers and jesters of the fancy variety are for hire; even that they will leave particular adherencies in flocks for higher pay, as witness the Hearst-Pulitzer war when whole staffs migrated to the ocherous banners of the Western marauder. And this is by no means meant as a reflection upon the good names of the baneful one of the world today and the smaller fry of "independent" thinkers who through investment interests find less difficulty in developing the personal point of view.

When all is said what is "forceful English"? In writing that is perhaps better understood by those more immediately concerned, namely, the unemployed, the Communists are explaining unemployment as due to withholding, beyond the need and application of development capital, from producers and their useful colaborers the surplus value of production. I protest that they are saying something forceful.

The Last, Worst Month

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial comment on the sad case of John Santanella who attempted to escape from Sing Sing so near the expiration of his sentence brings to mind the following passage from Stendhal's "Love":

> If there were any period at which, according to vulgar theories, called reasonable ones by ordinary people, prison can be bearable, it would be when, after several years of confinement, a poor prisoner is only separated by a month or two from the moment at which he is to regain his liberty. But crystallization [the italics are Stendhal's] ordains otherwise. The last month is worse than the previous three years. At Melun prison M. d'Hotelans has seen several long-term prisoners die of impatience within a few months of the day which was to give them back their liberty.

Posthumous Libel

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In The Nation of May 28 Mr. Villard, in his review of the Means book, uses the words "were there libel laws to protect the dead in this country as abroad." Whatever may be the law of the District of Columbia to which he refers, that of New York is very clear. Section 1340 of the Penal Law provides as follows (italics mine):

> A malicious publication, by writing, printing, picture, effigy, sign, or otherwise than by mere speech, which exposes any living person, or the memory of any person deceased, to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes, or tends to cause any person to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure any person, corporation, or association of persons, in his or their business or occupation, is a libel.

An English Subscriber Speaks

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: As an English subscriber, I follow your comments on things British with added interest. Your attitude on India, I beg to submit, shows a lack of appreciation of the realities of the situation and also an absence of knowledge of even the most salient points of Indian development since the war which are surprising.

Again, on page 613 of your issue of May 28, you give a wholly wrong impression of the Egyptian situation. The Egyptians have no share in the administration of the Sudan; they want it, and that is the crux of the whole matter. The British are endeavoring to lead the Sudanese to self-government (or are dominating them, as you would put it) and share the administration with them to a small degree. The Sudanese and the Egyptians are separate races and that is what your comment fails to appreciate.

Soldier and Newspaperman

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The marine officer mentioned in Mr. Villard's article on the Associated Press is General F. E. Evans, commandant of the Garde d'Haïti as well as the correspondent in Haiti for the Associated Press.

While I do not uphold the practice of having a partisan act as a newspaper correspondent there is something to be said in favor of General Evans. Although he was often charged with the duty of arresting Haitian newspapermen and other political offenders he performed this function without the usual odiousness that characterizes police action. Under General Evans's command the Garde d'Haïti has earned the respect of a large body of anti-Occupationists.

A few weeks ago I visited Haiti on a newspaper mission. When I met General Evans I found a well-mannered, sensible fellow. He did not assume any military arrogance, and in his answers to queries gave uncolored information which did not always vindicate the Occupation. General Evans's A. P. dispatches carried no animus; they drew a picture of Haiti which, if it was incomplete, was as accurate as he could make it. I believe that he displayed inordinate honesty and fairness in his treatment of Haitians—considering, of course, his oath to the American government and his high office in the gendarmerie. One of the warmest impressions made by any person in Haiti came from this officer. It is to the credit of the Occupation that such a gentleman was placed in charge of prisons, communications, traffic, military intelligence, and fire control.

Incidentally, General Evans is as much a newspaperman as a soldier. He formerly was on the staff of the New York Sun.

Skull of Ecstasy

By STANLEY J. KUNITZ

Five dewy russets and a hill's sweet curve
Burst in his forehead with a rainbow-spray
Of atoms; tender phantoms of the nerve
Melted in unrevolving light one day.

Now that his heart is quiet, let him climb
Over and under the mind; catch in his skein
The shapes of things interior to time,
Hewn out of chaos when the Pure was plain.

Used bees with golden bellies ripped, be still.
The bitter spider ravels out his wit
Deep in the grated dungeon of the eye
Where old gods shaggy with gray lichen sit
Like fragments of the antique masonry
Of heaven: snared by five russets and a hill.

Emerson Mauroisized

Emerson: The Enraptured Yankee. By Régis Michaud. Translated from the French by George Boas. Harper and Brothers. $4.

THIS, I suppose, is a good biography of its kind. It impressed the Abbé Dimnet, M. Edouard Herriot, and M. Henri Bergson, whose tributes are carried on its jacket; and Mr. Ludwig Lewisohn writes an approving preface for it. The book, indeed, reveals admirable narrative skill; its portraits and incidents are handled dramatically and vividly; its prose is graceful and sometimes affecting. M. Michaud, I doubt not, has read his Emerson through, and he reveals a knowledge of minor figures and of our national mind and history that in a Frenchman is remarkable.

The very first sentence, however, warns us that our biography is to be discreetly fictionized, that M. Michaud is a disciple of his compatriot M. Maurois:

> In Boston, two steps from the house of Benjamin Franklin, on May 25, 1803 (one year before the coronation of Napoleon at Notre Dame), the blue eyes of a little boy opened to the light. May—the late and violent spring of America! Pink maple buds give place to pretty triangular leaves. The elm (Ulmus americanus) sways in the wind its harps and lyres. The bluebird, arriving with the snowflakes of the last blizzard, has begun to make its nest under the roof of the old shed. The American thrush tunes its flute in the cedars. The American redbreast . . .

And so on. And a few pages farther on more of the same:

> On an Indian summer night flooded with lingering warmth, serenity, beauty, abandon, mirage, when the fields of New England were full of goldenrod and when maple woods were more resplendent than the purple of kings, Ralph was conceived.

M. Michaud appears to have had unusual sources of information. Had he consulted the family physician? Did he secure that day's weather reports to make sure the night was not rainy and chilly?

This purple padding, when it is done with caution and skill, as it often is by a Strachey, may have its own attraction, but there are two serious objections to it: it contributes nothing essential to the knowledge of the intelligent reader (who can fill in his own birds and weather), and it may lead that reader to distrust a biography through his inability to know exactly when an author is reporting reasonably well-established facts and when he is merely drawing upon his imagination. One's suspicions of M. Michaud's biography in particular increase when one observes the liberties that he sometimes takes with chronological order. One would gather the impression from this volume, for example, that Margaret Fuller edited the Dial after her work on the Tribune, and that Fort Sumter was fired on toward the end of the Civil War.

More serious is the patronizing tone that M. Michaud consistently takes toward his subject. He is not above cheap witticisms at Emerson's expense. Thus when the sage was in Paris during the revolution of 1848 he was "slightly intoxicated" by the city: "It gave him the effect of lemon soda, the equivalent of champagne for a Yankee." When Emerson lectures in the West, he is an "intrepid peddler of the ideal," and so on. The Emerson that emerges from these pages, in brief, is grievously diluted. His ideas are sometimes watered down to the point where they lose all meaning and savor. What we get is an amusing and sometimes touching portrait of a Yankee transcendentalist, full of dreams and naive optimism; what we miss is any profound recognition of Emerson's significance either as a literary artist or as a philosophic force.

Slovenly proofreading has been responsible for such errors as Carlisle for Carlyle, defied for deified, casualty for causality.

HENRY HAZLITT

Mystery and Mystification

The Life and Mind of Emily Dickinson. By Genevieve Taggard. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

THE position which Mrs. Bianchi takes—that the world has no right to know the identity of Emily Dickinson's lover and that the desire to learn his name is merely a matter of cheap curiosity—is, as has been said before and as must be said again and again, extraordinarily objectionable. It assumes both that an artist may be regarded as family property and that the facts of an artist's life are irrelevant to the appreciation of his work. The first assumption is arrogant and stupid. The second might possibly be defended, but surely not by one who has written a biography of the poet in question. If any fact of Emily Dickinson's life is important to the world in general, it is precisely the fact that Mrs. Bianchi makes such a show of concealing. To understand the growth of the poet's mind we need to know something of the mind of the man whom she loved and renounced. If Mrs. Bianchi knows his name she is under heavy obligations to reveal it. If she does not she should admit her ignorance and lend her assistance to every earnest effort to discover the truth. Her present attitude, which apparently involves complete unwillingness to cooperate with a biographer of independent spirit, is a monstrous barrier to the intelligent appreciation and criticism of the poet whose apostle Mrs. Bianchi asserts herself to be.

One result of this obstructionist attitude is apparent in Genevieve Taggard's "Life and Mind of Emily Dickinson." It has forced Miss Taggard, whose gifts and interests would normally limit her functions to those of the interpretative critic and biographer, to become a literary Hawkshaw, and it has made her book, which would otherwise be unified in tone and purpose, a combination of creative character portrayal and pedantic sleuthing. The results of the sleuthing are, no doubt, interesting, and they may briefly be summarized. A friend of the Dickinsons, who insists that her name be concealed, swears that she was told by Lavinia Dickinson, Maggie the servant, and Mrs. A. B. H. Davis that the man Emily loved was the Reverend George Gould. Another person, also anonymous, states that Lavinia told her the same. Aside from these assertions, Miss Taggard's case for Gould closely resembles that which Josephine Pollitt made for Lieutenant Hunt, and the evidence is no stronger in one case than the other. Miss Taggard has not disposed with any certainty of either Lieutenant Hunt or the Reverend Charles Wadsworth, and her minute examination of all records connected with Dr. Gould has failed to find any confirmation of her correspondents' claims. The strongest defense of her position lies in the fact that one can see little chance that her authorities could be mistaken and no reason for their lying.

So much has to be said about the question of Emily's lover because, until it is settled, that question has an interest out of proportion to its intrinsic importance. Nevertheless, it should be made clear that Miss Taggard's book, in even greater degree than Miss Pollitt's, derives its value from qualities other than the accuracy of its detective work. It is more successful than Miss Pollitt's book, both in its evocation of Emily's life and in its criticism of her poetry. The attempt to define the attitude which lay behind the poetry is suggestive if not wholly satisfying, and Miss Taggard's remarks on specific themes and methods are uncommonly discerning. As a whole the book is by far the best that we have on Emily Dickinson. There is perhaps only one person who could improve on it, and that is Genevieve Taggard herself if she were given the proper resources, including all available data on Emily's life and the manuscripts of her poems.

One's attention comes back in the end to Mrs. Bianchi. The situation is this: apparently less than half of Emily Dickinson's poems have been published; those that have been published have been edited arbitrarily and perhaps stupidly; important facts regarding her life have been concealed. This is a situation so appalling as to be almost ridiculous. Here is America's greatest poet, and here is a large and appreciative audience for her poetry placed entirely at the mercy of a woman who, much evidence goes to show, is unworthy of such a responsibility. In countries whose inhabitants are both more demonstrative and more deeply concerned about literature than we there would be riots and mass meetings. In the United States we calmly invite Mrs. Bianchi to be the principal speaker at centennial celebrations.

GRANVILLE HICKS

Pleasant Poetry

Fire for the Night. By Babette Deutsch. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.

Fifty Poems. By Lord Dunsany. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

The Wind in the Cedars. By Glenn Ward Dresbach. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

If poetry is a skilful manipulation of words and meter, an ability to paint word pictures, if poetry is an easily composed and pleasantly read lyricism and very little else, then Babette Deutsch, Lord Dunsany, and Glenn Ward Dresbach are authentic poets. If, on the other hand, poetry is passionate realization of experience, if it is interpretative of contemporary scenes or of any milieu, if it is the sincere expression of emotion, then these are not authentic poets. Of the three Miss Deutsch has the largest range, although Lord Dunsany is equally skilful in technique. All three write the type of verse, popularly defined as poetry, most frequently printed in magazines, most acceptable to publishers because it soothes and it sells. It is a kind of somniferous eloquence which lulls the senses and the mind. One reads it; it sounds well, but it means very little. It is too facile and too completely apart from any complete realization, emotional or intellectual. Of strikingly original poetry, poetry arising out of necessity, most readers are afraid; of this familiar and pleasant poetry they are not afraid at all. They find it expressive of their momentary moods and completely unilluminating of life. And this is what they choose when they choose poetry at all.

But the results of this type of verse-writing are rather appalling. After reading a few such pleasant books of verse one reaches the conclusion that a poem may be composed by picking out and combining stanzas of poems by various poets. Here is such a poem from stanzas written by the three poets under scrutiny. Suppose we call it The Heart at Autumn Season.

Gray among dead leaves deep
The sad November fires
Burn in the land asleep
All among old desires.

And rested there, the rover,
Safe with that shape alone,
Unharmed, unfrightened, over
The gentle heart of stone.

The crimson leaf has fallen
After the shining thing
That slid from it and glistened
Down like a silver wing.

So in this autumn of our love,
My heart, night being at its noon,
Woke, startled, and began to move
On the cold roadways of the moon.

All this is a little unfair, but one can grow so tired of mere words: "pines that cool the grass with shadow spray . . . under a hot sky as blue as Persian tile"; "afternoon edges toward evening like a tired stallion snuffing the yellow grain that the road spreads before the bin of sunset"—all very pretty, all very fanciful, but not very important. Miss Deutsch has, in her volume, some poems original in their conception—Pithecanthrope, for example, or the Nation prize poem, Thoughts at Year's End—but one wishes there were more of those and fewer like this:

NARCISSUS

Pale as translucent wax, intense and frail,
Whiteness of stars, poised in immaculate flame,
Ivory fire, unflickeringly the same,
Holding a cup red-rimmed; the elfin Grail
Wherefore the sons of Oberon wear mail,
And vainly,—O rapt flower, whose antique name
Remembers beauty loving without shame
Its own adorable image doomed to fail!

O incense-breath'd, dove-breasted flame, O star
Caught in a trance of sweetness still as frost,
Shall then your candid perfectness be lost,
Fade, wither, drop away, and leave no scar
Even, to show what's gone, nor petulant ghost,
Unhoused with innocency's avatar?

"Caught in a trance of sweetness" is exactly a definition of this kind of verse.

And from the West, a stern, dramatic land, Mr. Dresbach writes simpering lyrics like this:

When a spring goes dry in the desert
More than the spring is lost,
Death creeps in the little willows,
Sands fill the trails that crossed.

Doves come and blink in wonder
To find no silver pool—
Only the cracked bowl, only
The cattle that stare and drool.

Such rhythm would ruin any serious poem. As for Lord Dunsany, whose literary reputation in general is high, he is, as a poet, still in the tradition of the minor English poets and without great originality. For example:

IN A WILD-ROSE GARDEN

An evening like an opal,
The air one scent of May,
A nightingale beginning
To practice at his lay.

A moth along a laneway
Of air goes like a ghost,
A sense grows deeper round me
Of something, near, but lost.

The Jesuits

The Power and Secrets of the Jesuits. By René Fülöp-Miller. Translated by F. S. Flint and D. F. Tait. The Viking Press. $5.

MR. FÜLÖP-MILLER seems to have grasped the wisdom of the Jesuit Gracian's maxims: "Leave others in doubt about your attitude . . . what is likely to bring disfavor get others to do" (p. 472); for he leaves readers uncertain regarding his real views on most of the great questions connected with Jesuitism. Did Jesuits hold that the end justifies the means? Mr. Fülöp-Miller will only say that Jesuits did not "coin the maxim" and that "many Jesuit casuists hold that to whomsoever the end is permitted must also the necessary means be allowed, yet the qualification is always added that wrongful means are always to be deprecated" (p. 153). Did the Jesuits obey or disobey the brief, "Dominus ac Redemptor," by which Clement XIV suppressed the society in 1773? Mr. Fülöp-Miller shirks this question also, and contents himself with stating that "the Society of Jesus, notwithstanding all royal edicts and papal briefs, did not for one moment cease to exist" (p. 384). Only in regard to non-controversial matters such as art and literature does the author express himself clearly, as when he states that in these fields the Jesuits produced "only a few men of talent" (p. 424), and that "Jesuit literary criticism frequently bases its estimate of great imaginative writers not so much on their creative power as on their religious faith" (p. 465).

The most interesting parts of this book are concerned with the picturesque exploits of Xavier, de Nobili, Ricci, Marquette, Possevino, and Parsons, the great Jesuit missionaries and "political conspirators" (p. 26). But their exploits have been already recorded a thousand times, and in any case they are rather indicative than explanatory of "the power of the Jesuits." The long discussions of free will, philosophy, moral theology, atomization of morality, and confessional practice suggest the idea of a university thesis on ethics incorporated into this book on the Jesuits. Neither Part III nor Part IV helps a great deal toward elucidating the question: What is the secret of the Jesuits?

The author is at his best when adroitly introducing apposite sayings of great men—Adams, Jefferson, Voltaire, and others—about the Jesuits, and when describing the curiosities of the Jesuit theater and ballet, but he has not half a dozen passages worth reading on the Spiritual Exercises or the Constitutions. No Jesuit could read Part I without discovering a hundred errors and inexactitudes. Mr. Fülöp-Miller shows (p. 23) that he has not taken the trouble to find out even what "a professed father's" status is. About the inner life of the Jesuits, and about such men as Acquaviva, who remade the society after Ignatius's day, he has not a word.

When it comes to the touchy question of the relationship of Jesuitism with Christianity the author pleads an alibi. "The purely lay observer has no sort of qualification to enable him to judge whether the Jesuits in accommodating the demands of religion to the level of humanity and in utilizing worldly means for the attainment of religious ends are fulfilling or contravening the real spirit of the gospel" (p. 475). He shifts on Dostoevski the responsibility for the statement—a propos of Jesuit Catholicism—that "the mind which distorts Christianity by bringing it into harmony with the aims of this world destroys the whole meaning of Christianity."

Mr. Fülöp-Miller holds that the actual political power of the church is due to the Jesuits, but we miss any allusion to the fact that the Papal-Mussolini pact was negotiated by Father Tacchi-Venturi, S. J., and that Jesuit interests were safeguarded in that pact. He holds that "the rapid rise of neoscholasticism" is due to the Jesuits, but does not explain their bitter opposition to its founder, Cardinal Mercier. He dwells largely on the achievements of modern German Jesuits to the exclusion of American and English Jesuits of recent times, like Tondorf and Martingdale. Among the modern German Jesuits whom he praises highly is the Father Friedrich Muckermann, whose cordial indorsement on the cover leaf declares that with Mr. Fülöp-Miller's book "the order may well be content." But one wonders whether many Jesuits will read with content that "with the Jesuits the confessional is to no small extent connected with politics" (p. 476). All save liberal Catholics will find themselves embarrassed at seeing in many cases the order glorified at the expense of the honor of the papacy and the good name of the Franciscans and Dominicans.

This reviewer feels that Mr. René Fülöp-Miller has failed to cast any light upon the ultimate source of Jesuit power—its secret, namely—for he had not the means of approaching its hiding place. That hiding place is in the form and spirit of the routine life, religious and social, of the ordinary Jesuit community.

E. BOYD BARRETT

The Man on the Train

Harm's Way. By Roberts Tapley. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

RICHARD ANNESLEY, the hero of "'Harm's Way," thinks of himself as a young man seated in a railroad train that is rushing head-on into an abyss. Throughout the course of the novel the analogy of the train is repeated again and again, unifying a series of events that carry the action of the story forward.

What happens is this: Richard Annesley is expelled from college. Through the social connections of a well-to-do Uncle Baxter he obtains a job in a high-powered department store in Boston. By hard work he becomes editor of the Busy B, the store's house organ. Slowly, imperceptibly, the economic and social machinery that has made the store possible rises before him. He leaves the job to take another in a factory. Meanwhile, Uncle Baxter, vigorous lodge member and patriotic business man, becomes involved in a scandal that concerns the government at Washington. He is made a scapegoat of Administration politics and neatly stripped of everything he owns. He and Aunt Isabel come to live with Richard in the slums of Boston, and Richard is forced to deny himself the luxury of a love affair. He finds himself accepting another job in an advertising agency, very like the one he held as editor of the Busy B. And the train roars onward.

So much for the story. The value of the novel lies in the ironic implications surrounding its episodes and in the personality of the author. Roberts Tapley has written a first novel of unusual interest and distinction. It would be an easy matter to compare his method with that of Proust. In fact, a bit too easy. For Tapley's hero is indelibly a product of our New England bourgeoisie, elevated for the past hundred years into all that we can claim for an American aristocracy. Whether Richard Annesley happens to be living in Boston or Paris, the young man is trapped. Highly sensitive and frustrated in all his efforts to exist as an individual human being, he is a perfect specimen of his class. In his conflict with contemporary civilization a great part of his strength is dissipated in a war against his own inhibitions. He has the ability to perceive the monstrosities that dance behind the patterns of modern society, but he has no weapons with which to combat them, nor can he close his eyes to the spectacle before him.

Here is an incident that shows Richard Annesley's relation to the people with whom he is thrown into contact. He is living in the same boarding-house that feeds and shelters his immediate superior in the department store, a Mr. Finsbury. Miss Fell, a clerk in the hosiery department, and Mr. Finsbury conceive a vague, timid, and altogether hopeless affection for each other. The situation is grotesque and very real. Here is Mr. Finsbury, a thin, prim, schoolmasterish sort of person who has vaulted himself into an executive position in the store, and there is Miss Fell, a fluttering, chattering, pathetically eager old maid. They are united by an equal faith in reciting the flowery success platitudes which have contributed much to Mr. Finsbury's self-confidence and will-power. Richard is unable to stop the progress of a ridiculous and futile tragedy. Miss Fell loses her job and becomes (more pathological than ever) a priestess in an evangelical temple. Mr. Finsbury, threatened with the loss of his position, commits suicide under the wheels of a subway train.

Richard Annesley can do nothing more than to sit tight, safely riding to his destination, reading the banal and fascinating literature of the advertising section of a magazine.

HORACE GREGORY

Is Unity Inevitable?

The Unity of the World. By Guglielmo Ferrero. With a Foreword by Charles A. Beard. A. and C. Boni. $2.50.

THE best part of this book is Professor Beard's foreword to it. But to the statement that "this book will be read with Plato and Aristotle," unless it be by mistake, the reviewer must demur. Professor Ferrero's treatment, for example, of the question of the freedom of the seas, which he considers one of the essentials of world unity, is quite incredibly vague considering the importance of the subject and his own great distinction as a scholar. One wonders what international lawyer he could find to indorse his apparent thesis that before the war everybody was of the blissful belief that no such thing as right of search existed, whereas since the war "it is known that one day Might will close the oceans." These are days when writers like broad canvases which must be viewed in their cosmic stretch from a distance and must not be judged on nugatory details. But much fine talk about "suddenly one day in 1914 the gates of the Apocalypse were thrown open" can scarcely excuse dangerous generalizations such as the above. It may be, however, that the present reviewer is congenitally unsympathetic to the apocalyptic school.

Professor Ferrero, moreover, in his short chapters on great topics seems frequently to point out the obvious but to omit the generalization which is perhaps more valuable because less patent. The process of world Americanization is emphasized. The highly interesting consideration is left unnoticed that this is largely due to inventions which know no nationality and is not concurrent with political commitments. The revolution is about an attitude, a manner of life; almost for the first time it is not a crusade for an imperial city or for a nation. Again, Professor Ferrero rightly insists that the unity of the world is not to be won by forcing people to change their mother tongue. But no allusion is made to the interesting phenomenon of American immigrants desiring for prestige reasons to forget their ancestral language and religion. In Europe, Professor Ferrero records, increase of natural prosperity in the artisan class seems to lead not as in America to a stable democratic republic, but only to a "messianic faith in the efficacy of world revolution" and an endeavor to encompass the destruction of their superiors. Even were this generalization, pregnant of reaction if true, to be accepted, it will not be forgotten that the American republic began not with stability, but with a certain rising against aristocratic privilege. That the difference between America and Europe may not be due to some temperamental deficiency of European workers but to the role played by the birth-rate and population pressure is not mentioned.

Professor Ferrero's pessimism concerning the probable future of the educated class, much better discussed by Julien Benda, is suffused and justified by a fatalistic philosophy which has the appearance of profundity. The question whether the democratic idea and the idea of progress contribute or not to the welfare of the human race "is unanswerable and useless, because our welfare has little to do with these great historic changes."

Why anyone should accept or work for the democratic idea who does not think it will have a bearing on one's welfare is not made plain. However, if movements are inevitable, at least book readers need feel no obligation to think about them. Even Professor Ferrero, however, seems to welcome, as the bulwark of freedom, a world-uniting polymorphous democracy, too incapable of agreement to be capable of intolerance. The reviewer does not for a moment wish to appear to deny that the democratic movement has sprung out of environmental conditions, but that little of it which has been consciously connected with our psychological urge to pursue our own welfare is a little that matters mighty much. If, in brief, I turn to the present volume from such a great book as Dibelius's "England" or from Siegfried's admirable survey, "France," or from the excellent "Decline of Rome" and "Triumph of Christianity," by Professor Ferrero, himself a distinguished defender of liberty, honesty compels me to record that I feel unhappy. It is no good Professor Beard's telling me that I ought to feel exhilarated.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN

Books in Brief

Medal Without Bar. By Richard Blaker. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Orderly. By M. R. Werner. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

In Spite of All Rejoicing. Anonymous. With an Introduction by Henry Williamson. Duffield and Company. $2.50.

Here are three honest war books, documents worthy of a place among the growing list of serious books on the personal side of the war. Mr. Blaker's volume is a long novel built up on a vast accumulation of detail and telling the story of the artillery on the British front through the medium of a middle-aged subaltern, his fellow-officers, and his battery. The novel is thoroughly realistic. But through it runs a strain of sentiment—the theme of man's fundamental brotherhood with man under suffering and fear. Mr. Werner's book is strictly autobiographical—a lucid, undramatic account of his experiences as a soldier in a unit of the American medical corps attached to the British army for two unforgettable years. For the greater part of the time he served as an orderly in a base hospital where wounded, gassed, and mutilated British soldiers came and went in batches. He neither spares his readers gruesome details nor dwells upon them. As a result the narration is admirable in its restraint and balance; but it is too slight for its subject, and lacking in power. The anonymous English diary is even less dramatic. One must read it imaginatively and have some knowledge of what the war was like to get much out of it. A bath becomes a much more important thing to jot down in one's notebook than an emotion on killing a man. But the mere fact that these pages were originally scribbled down day by day by an infantry soldier and (later) aviator, whatever the conditions in which he found himself, gives to the volume a certain importance.

The Obelisk. By William Rollins, Jr. Brewer and Warren. $2.50.

Mr. Rollins's novel, parts of which appeared in "The American Caravan," is an unusual and engaging piece of work. It consists of a medley of assorted episodes in the life of Lewis Raey, a young man who from childhood has been fearful before the powers of his vivid imagination and, inwardly, painfully self-conscious. At the same time, to all outward appearance Lewis is a normal boy, Harvard student, and young business man. He dreams of escape, but at bottom feels that every place is about the same. His sense of futility keeps him from making any strenuous effort to break away. Some of the episodes are penetrating and luminous, particularly those which deal with this New England boy's adolescence. Some are highly amusing. Two or three are dramatic. And several seem merely imitative, echoes of Huxley, Dos Passos, even Joyce.

The Saint. By Conrad Ferdinand Meyer. Translated by Edward Franklin Hauch. Simon and Schuster. $2.

"The Saint" is the first of a series of books for which the Germanic Society is sponsor in an effort to bring before American readers the little-known works of German nineteenth-century novelists. For this reason alone it deserves a welcome. Meyer, writing in German, is one of Switzerland's foremost literary figures, his fame resting chiefly on his series of historical Novellen. The present translation tells the story of Henry II and Thomas à Becket. Meyer takes liberties with history. He seeks for motives, forces, and conflicts that lie behind historical acts, and with a poet's license invents where he finds it necessary to his purpose—which is the study of human emotions. "The Saint" in its present form, however, does not seem a very powerful or penetrating study. Meyer, who was a consummate stylist, loses, very likely, much of his effectiveness in translation.

A Treasury of Middle English Verse. By Margot Robert Adamson. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

This charming anthology is a real treasury of Middle English verse transliterated so as to be directly accessible to the ordinary reader unfamiliar with the original texts. Such readers are frightened away by even the Scotch of Burns, or the archaic spellings of Spenser, or the unfamiliar language of Chaucer. They have never, therefore, been able to appreciate the wealth of song which has come down to us from medieval and for the most part anonymous singers. Miss Adamson, whose ear is delicately and accurately attuned to rhythm and rhyme, has in this volume given such readers their rightful heritage. Her transliterations, in so far as I have had the chance to test them, are very close to the original text. She presents only such brief lyrics as will be self-explanatory. Since, as she states, the medieval poets did a "lot of talking on their knees," the greater number of the songs included are naively religious. But there is a scattering of seasonal songs, lullabys, and verse dialogues. The book as it stands serves excellently for the general reader; one regrets, however, that for classroom use Miss Adamson did not see fit to add an appendix of notes stating definitely just what word changes she has made in order to carry out the verse pattern or rhyme scheme of the original.

When the West Is Gone. By Frederic L. Paxson. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

This volume is made up of three lectures delivered by the author under the Colver Foundation at Brown University in 1929. Although the volume is small, only 132 pages, it is one of the most valuable contributions to the history of the influence of the frontier on American life that has come to hand in a long time. The first lecture discusses the formation and typical character of the successive frontiers that we have come to call the "West." The second is a singularly lucid and stimulating account of how the old America came to survive and be enshrined in the "Middle West," while the East, South, and Far West developed encircling types of civilization of their own, differing from one another and the past. In the final lecture the author attempts to forecast the future trend of character and events now that the West is gone in the old sense. The frontier, winning against conservatism under Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln, was defeated under Bryan. The book is as strong in its appeal to the interest of the scholar as to that of the layman, and thanks to its attractive style can be enjoyed by both.

The Misadventures of Martin Guerre: A Dramatic Idyll. By Gaston Delayen. Translated from the French by Farrell Symons. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

The publishers announce this tale as one intended for sophisticated readers. It is laid in sixteenth-century France and tells of the childhood marriage, the tragic impotence, the picaresque wanderings, and the final return of its hero. A long court trial to determine which of two returned Martin Guerres is the impostor and which the true husband and heir concludes the story and supplies the drama. The story is written in ironic vein and is supplied with copious mock-serious notes and a parade of pseudo-learning. This is a difficult order of writing and one for which there is no formula. Rabelais, Sterne, Anatole France, to name a few, have used it to create masterpieces, but usually, as in this instance, it falls rather flat.

A Lesson from Moscow

IT is to be assumed that only the best of the Soviet pictures are exported abroad. But whatever those kept for home consumption may be, no country has yet equaled the Soviet record on the picture screens of America as set during the past season in that extraordinary series of pictures: "Arsenal," "New Babylon," "A Fragment of an Empire," "China Express," "Old and New," and "Turksib," to which now we have to add "Cain and Artem" (Cameo). Without claiming for all of them the exalted name of masterpiece, it must be admitted that their general level of excellence is something altogether unprecedented in the history of the cinema. Whether one approves or not the main line of development in the Soviet cinema, Moscow's leadership today is indisputable, as it is certainly highly welcome.

The latest Soviet arrival, "Cain and Artem," would have made a sensation if it had appeared three years ago when the silent film was still holding sway. In these days of the talking picture it would do Hollywood an unholy amount of good to learn this picture's methods of telling a plain, straightforward story both intelligently and imaginatively. Unlike so many Soviet films, "Cain and Artem" has no political ax to grind, or perhaps it has just enough to observe the Soviet proprieties without appreciably spoiling the story. It is as broad in its appeal, as tensely dramatic, and as full of color as Hollywood could wish. But over and above this it has something that so far only Moscow has been able to supply—a freedom from the stereotyped and a genuine pathos.

The plot of the film, which is based on Maxim Gorki's story, is concerned with the romance of the wife of an elderly fishmonger with a handsome longshoreman, Artem, the sullen and bullying hero of a market place in a small Volga town. With the help of a few hired roughs the jealous husband nearly succeeds in doing away with Artem; but taken care of by a little Jew, Cain, a mender of boots, Artem recovers, while the fishmonger's wife, believing him dead, drowns herself in despair. Around this simple plot the director, P. P. Petrov-Bytov, has painted a picture in rich and vibrant colors of the stifling, stagnant life of the small toiling and trading folk in old Russia. The market place is the focus of that life, and as one striking detail after another is presented, the spectacle of a few sensitive souls suffering in the midst of dismal poverty, filth, brutality, and superstition takes on the quality of something that is tangibly real. Then the plot begins to develop, and the dramatic situation, growing in intensity, passes through a series of rising climaxes. Here again the director's masterly treatment brings out the utmost in each situation, and now and then strikes a note of marked originality, as in the use of distorted images, or in the alternate "cutting" of the woman coming down the steps to the river bank and the view of the river.

Next to the richness of characteristic detail and its telling use for dramatic effect, the most notable feature of the picture is Emil Gall's acting in the part of Cain. This is a rare example of acting in which it is impossible to detect a single false note—so convincing and so moving it is in revealing the beauty of character that irradiates the unkempt and sorry image of the little Jew.

Among the few blemishes that mar the picture the most important is the too theatrical conception of the part of Artem, which finds its expression even in his make-up as a tattered toreador. ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Drama

"Lysistrata"

A CLASSIC has been happily defined as simply a work of such intense vitality that it is always modern, and "Lysistrata" (Forty-fourth Street Theater), first presented in Athens 2,341 years ago, fills this definition completely. It is a play about war and about sex, and it reminds us that in spite of all the profound differences that thousands of profound Keyserlings find between the mentality of one nation and another, and notwithstanding the profound differences that hundreds of profound Spenglers find between the world outlook and Zeitgeist of one time and another, the psychology of war and sex was not substantially different in the Athens of 411 B.C. from that in the New York of 1918 A.D. Then as now the populations of warring cities were taught to believe that the enemy was utterly without honor, that his soldiers were at once cowards and brutes; each city was sure that it was doing more than its allies to win the war, and as passions ran higher war aims became more and more unintelligible. All this Aristophanes attacked not with bitterness but with derision; and he pictured the war spirit not as something wicked but as something puerile.

When "Lysistrata" was produced, the Peloponnesian War had been going on for twenty years. It is with this situation that the play opens. Lysistrata, realizing that the war will only bring ruin to Athens, and that the men will never settle it, conspires to put all the women, not only of Athens but of Sparta and her allies, under oath to have nothing to do with their husbands or lovers until the war is ended. This peace plan, through terrific renunciation, is carried to success. The result (in 1930) is still a rollicking and bawdy farce-comedy that it would be sinful to miss. And it succeeds in exact proportion as everyone concerned forgets that it is a sacred classic. Great credit must go to the adaptation and translation of Gilbert Seldes, which is thoroughly modern and non-literary without ever descending to cheap slang. Mr. Seldes might, indeed, have profitably taken more liberties than he actually did with the original text; the scene between the women and the old men, for example, becomes tedious after the first ten minutes. The two outstanding comic performances are those of Ernest Truex as one of the returning Athenian soldiers and of Sydney Greenstreet as president of the Athenian senate. Mr. Truex acts as if he were in a modern, although slightly more outspoken, bedroom farce, which is exactly right, and Mr. Greenstreet is clever enough to take it for granted that the president of the Athenian senate is no different in essence from a Tammany alderman. Miriam Hopkins and Hortense Alden also take their parts in the Al Woods spirit. Violet Kemble Cooper's acting, while distinguished, appears a trifle stiff; she seems too aware that this is after all from the ancient Greek. Most of the rest of the cast are overwhelmed by this consideration, and their performance reminds one chiefly of a college revival under the direction of studiously gay professors.

The setting by Norman-Bel Geddes was architecturally impressive, but otherwise irritating. It was, to begin with, tragic rather than comic in its atmosphere—less Aristophanes than Aeschylus. And it was unsafe. It has never been clear to me why so much "modern" scenery must consist in flights of stairs. True, it makes pretty pictures and striking silhouettes for the high-class theater magazines, but surely at the price of physical risk for the actors. Even if they never turn an ankle or bump a shin, the spectator is distracted from the main business in hand by the constant fear that they are going to. There was, in fact, one major and quite unintended sprawl in the performance I witnessed. When, in the last scene, everyone on the stage was supposed to abandon himself to an orgy of joyous dancing, I found myself watching the performers carefully picking their way from step to step. Must both play and performers be subordinated to a setting? It is time the scenery designer was put in his place.

The new "Artists and Models" (Majestic Theater) began in Boston and Philadelphia as a musical comedy called "Dear Love," acquired Phil Baker somewhere, and now opens on Broadway as a commonplace revue. Such plot as it retains is stale and feeble, nor it there a single song or tune in it worth remembering. Nearly all its humor is supplied by the aforesaid Mr. Baker and his assistant in the box, who continue to be genuinely amusing. For the rest the management relies heavily on the most generous display of nudity that has been seen here in several years. HENRY HAZLITT

The Grand Street Follies are dead. Long live the Garrick Gaieties! The current performance (Theater Guild) is swift, gay, and youthful. Among the most attractive numbers are a lively travesty on Grover Whalen's return to Wanamaker's; Albert Carroll's skilful, and rather disturbing, misinterpretation of the art of Mei Lan-Fang; and a risqué skit in which the junior members of the Senior League produce some extraordinary testimonials for the Persimmons bed. And then, of course, Philip Loeb, Sterling Holloway, and Edith Meiser are Gaieties in themselves. M. G.

The Killings at Peshawar

THE events at Peshawar on April 23 have never been fully reported. There are very strong indications, as Richard B. Gregg pointed out in our issue of June 18, that they were not creditable to the government. A rigid censorship was immediately imposed; a government communiqué was issued placing all blame on the Nationalists; V. I. Patel, Nationalist leader, and Pandit Malaviya, prominent Indian liberal, were denied permission to go to Peshawar and make an investigation. If the following frankly Nationalist account, which was printed in Young India for May 8, is the truer version, it throws an entirely different light on the Peshawar incident. It should be remembered that Peshawar is a Moslem city and that the British have been deliberately courting Moslem support in fighting the Nationalist movement.

Mr. Abdul Quadir Kasuri, president of the Punjab Provincial Congress Committee, Lahore, and president of the Punjab Satyagraha Committee, has circulated the following statement:

As various and conflicting versions of the happenings at Peshawar have been appearing from time to time, I have been at pains to discover the true facts as far as possible at this juncture. I have interviewed several responsible eyewitnesses, and after considering all the statements I believe the following version to be the nearest possible to truth.

It is well known that the All-India Congress Committee deputation that went to make inquiry into the working of the Northwest Frontier regulations was stopped at Attock early in the morning of April 22 and not allowed to proceed any farther.

Meanwhile all the prominent Congress leaders and workers with a large crowd had assembled at the Peshawar railway station for a fitting reception to this deputation. When the news came through that the deputation was not allowed to come to Peshawar, a procession was formed and led through the city and in the evening a huge mass-meeting was held to protest against the repressive policy of the government. It was also announced at the meeting that the decision of the Frontier Provincial Congress Committee that had already been arrived at to picket the five liquor shops in the city would be put into effect from the morning of the 23d.

The Frontier government, seeing the thoroughly businesslike preparations made by the Congress Committee to carry out the picketing and fearing that it would have great effect on the people, decided to arrest all the important leaders. Consequently between three and six in the early hours of the morning on the 23d of April six [leaders] were arrested. . . .

At six o'clock in the morning, when the congressmen came to know of the arrest of the above-mentioned six leaders, they met in the Congress Committee office and there they also learned that warrants were out against Syed Lal Badshah, member of the All-India Congress Committee and president of the War Council, and Mr. Mohd Khan, secretary of the City Congress Committee, and immediately, without any police officer's asking for the arrest of these two, they took them out in a procession to the police station just inside the Kabli Gate and handed them over to the police officer there in charge. The crowd accompanying the procession afterward came back in a very peaceful manner to the Congress office. . . .

At sunrise, as soon as the news got abroad that the leaders had been arrested, there was a spontaneous hartal all over the city. At about nine-thirty, when a huge crowd was standing peacefully in front of the Congress Committee offices in a very orderly manner and giving a great ovation to the volunteers who were being sent out on picketing duty, a subinspector of police with armed constables came in a lorry to the Congress Committee office and told the person in charge there that he had with him two more warrants of arrest—against Mr. Gulam Rubani and Mr. Allah Bux. On receiving this news the crowd immediately made way for the two leaders to come out of the office and they presented themselves before the subinspector, who put them in the lorry and proceeded to the town. When the lorry reached the Chowk Yadgar it had a punctured tire, and while the subinspector was thinking of sending for another lorry the two arrested gentlemen told the subinspector that they would of their own accord present themselves in the Thana just as the two other leaders had done earlier in the day. The police agreed to this and went away, and the procession started with these two gentlemen and reached the Kabli Gate Thana. They found, however, the gates of the Thana closed. The two leaders shouted out that they had come to offer themselves for arrest, but nothing was done until about half an hour later when the subinspector who had come to the Congress Committee office to arrest them reached the spot and assured the officer in charge that the crowd was peaceful. . . . After the gates were opened and the prisoners were taken in, the crowd in a most peaceful manner gave a great ovation to the arrested leaders and raising shouts of Inquilab Zindabad started to go back toward the city. This fact should be noted—that though it was by now a little past ten o'clock and some leaders had been arrested, some had voluntarily offered themselves for arrest, and there was a complete hartal in the city, nothing had been done by the crowd to give the least cause for the officers to have any apprehension.

Under such circumstances, when the crowd had throughout been behaving in an exemplary manner and was returning toward the city, two armored cars full of soldiers came from behind without blowing their horns or giving any notice whatever of their approach and drove into the crowd regardless of the consequences. Many people were brutally run over, several were wounded, and at least three people died on the spot. In spite of this provocation the crowd still behaved with great restraint, collecting the wounded and the three dead persons. We possess photographs of some of them. At this time an English officer on a motor cycle came dashing past. What happened to him is not quite clear. There are two conflicting versions. The semi-official version says that he fired into the crowd and a man whom he wounded by a shot struck him on the head and he died. The other version that has been given to me is that he collided with the armored car which was standing by and was killed as a result of the collision. Until further inquiry is made it is difficult to say what are the true facts. At the same time one of the armored cars caught fire. Here again it is alleged on the one hand that it was set fire to by the mob, while another version is that it caught fire accidentally. By this time, however, a troop of English soldiers had reached the spot and without any warning began firing into the crowd, in which there were women and children as well as men. Now the crowd gave a good example of the lesson of non-violence that had been instilled into them. When those in front fell down wounded by the shots, those behind came forward with their breasts bared and exposed themselves to the fire, so that some persons got as many as twenty-one bullet wounds in their bodies and all the people stood their ground without getting into a panic. Sikh boy came and stood in front of a soldier and asked him to fire at him, which the soldier unhesitatingly did, killing him. Similarly an old woman seeing her relatives and friends being wounded came forward, was shot, and fell down wounded. An old man with a four-year-old child on his shoulders, unable to brook this brutal slaughter, advanced asking the soldier to fire at him. He was taken at his word, and soon he also fell wounded. Scores of such instances will come out on further inquiry. The crowd kept standing at the spot facing the soldiers and was fired at from time to time, until there were heaps of wounded and dying lying about. The Anglo-Indian paper of Lahore, which represents the official view, itself wrote to the effect that the people came forward one after another to face the firing and when they fell wounded they were dragged back and others came forward to be shot at. This state of things continued from eleven till five o'clock in the evening. When the number of corpses became too many the ambulance cars of the government took them away. It is said that they were taken to some unknown place, and though they were mostly Mohammedans the bodies were burned. After this struggle the leaders of the public and volunteers collected all the remaining bodies. These alone came to sixty-five in number. . . .

Two facts are noteworthy in this connection. One is that of all the dead collected by the congressmen there was not one single instance where there was the mark of a bullet in the back. Further, all the wounds were bullet wounds and there was no trace of grape shot. Neither the police nor the military nor anybody else alleges that there was any stick or weapon, blunt or sharp, with the persons in the crowd. The attitude of the crowd and the splendid hold that the Congress had on the people are evidenced by the fact that in spite of the presence of the British troops patrolling the city the picketing went on without a break and the batches of volunteers were sent according to the program. The whole day of the 23d the picketing continued and no arrests were made. Though Section 144 was promulgated on the night of the 23d and any gathering of more than five persons was prohibited, the picketing was continued on the 24th and Section 144 was defied openly and peacefully. On the 24th three batches of volunteers were one after the other arrested, but more batches came and the picketing continued. The authorities, finding their policy of arrest unavailing, released the volunteers and, it is said, also ordered the liquor shops to be closed for two months.

At this stage it is very difficult to say what is the number of the dead and wounded. It seems likely that the number of dead is in the hundreds, and a careful study of the situation indicates that the incident was a repetition of the Jallianwala Bagh [Amritsar] massacre.

It is a regrettable fact that the government showed its customary heartlessness by providing no facilities even for first aid to the wounded; all that it did was to cart away as many dead bodies as possible and burn them, as alleged, in some far-away spot with a view to minimizing the extent of the havoc. . . .

These are the facts as far as I can gather them. On learning of this terrible incident I sent the following telegram to the Chief Commissioner of the Northwest Frontier Province: "Committee sending medical deputation for relief of wounded as result of firing at Peshawar. Hope deputation will be provided facilities for this humane work."

I received the following reply: "Have consulted local leaders who authorize me to assure you that all arrangements for medical treatment have been made and there is no need for you to send medical deputation. Please therefore do not send it."

Thereupon I sent another telegram to the chief commissioner intimating to him that I had received no reply to my telegram from the Congress Committee of Peshawar and asking how he could say that the leaders did not want any help. This telegram did not elicit any reply.
